The chiefs here have requested me further to declare to you that, in order to prevent any disagreeable circumstances from happening in future, they have come to a determination not to permit the least intercourse between their people and those of the United States. They have, in consequence, ordered them to cease all communication, directly or indirectly, with the territory or citizens of the United States; and they do take this public mode of warning the citizens of the United States from entering their territory, or communicating directly or indirectly with the Creek people. They also request that you will understand their territories to be as they stood in the year 1811. In my absence, I have directed First Lieutenant William Hambly, the head interpreter, to communicate with you on any point relative to the Creeks; and I have given him my most positive orders that he shall at all times do his best to keep peace and good neighborhood between the Creeks and your citizens.

I am, sir, your very humble servant,

EDWARD NICHOLLS,
Commanding the British forces in the Floridas.

Part of the ninth article of the treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, relative to the Indians who have been in alliance with Great Britain, and in hostility with the United States.

The United States of America engage to put an end, immediately after the ratification of the present treaty, to hostilities with all the tribes or nations of Indians with whom they may be at war at the time of such ratification, and forthwith to restore to such tribes or nations, respectively, all the possessions, rights, and privileges which they may have enjoyed or been entitled to in 1811, previous to such hostilities: Provided always, That such tribes or nations shall agree to desist from all hostilities against the United States of America, their citizens and subjects, upon the ratification of the present treaty being notified to such tribes or nations, and shall so desist accordingly.

We, the undersigned, chiefs of the Muscogee nation, declared by His Britannic Majesty to be a free and independent people, do, in the name of the said nation, agree to the ninth article of the treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States; and we do further declare that we have given most strict and positive orders to all our people that they desist from hostilities of every kind against the citizens or subjects of the United States.

Colonel Nicholls to Colonel Hawkins.

BRITISH POST, APPALACHICOLA RIVER, May 12, 1815.

In my letter to you of the 28th ultimo, I requested you would be so good as to make inquiry into the murder and robberies committed on the Seminoles belonging to the chief called Bowlegs; at the same time declaring my determination of punishing with the utmost rigor of the law any one of our side who broke it. Of this a melancholy proof has been given, in the execution of an Indian of the Ataphalgo town, by Hothly Poya Tustunnuggee, chief of Ockmulgees, who found him driving off a gang of cattle belonging to your citizens; and for which act of justice I have given him double presents, and a chief's gun, in the open square before the whole of the chiefs, and highly extolled him. These, sir, are the steps I am daily taking to keep the peace with sincerity; but I am sorry to say the same line is not taken on your side, nor have you written to say what steps you are taking, or intend to take, to secure this mutual good. Since the last complaint from Bowlegs, I have had another from him, to say your citizens have again attacked and murdered two of his people; that they had stolen a gang of his cattle, but that he had succeeded in regaining them.

I asked him what proof they had of their being killed. They said they had found their bloody clothes in the American camp, which was hastily evacuated on their approach. Now, sir, if these enormities are suffered to be carried on in a Christian country, what are you to expect by showing such an example to the uncultivated native of the woods? (for savage I will not call them—their conduct entitles them to a better epithet.) I have, however, ordered them to stand on the defensive, and have sent them a large supply of arms and ammunition, and told them to put to death, without mercy, any one molesting them; but at all times to be careful and not put a foot over the American line; in the mean time, that I should complain to you that I was convinced you would do your best to curb such infamous conduct; also, that those people who did such deeds would, I was convinced, be disowned by the Government of the United States, and severely punished. They have given their consent to await your answer before they take revenge; but, sir, they are impatient for it, and, well armed as the whole nation now is, and stored with ammunition and provisions, having a stronghold to retire upon in case of a superior force appearing, picture to yourself, sir, the miseries that may be suffered by good and innocent citizens on your frontiers, and I am sure you will lend me your best aid in keeping the bad spirits in subjection. Yesterday, in a full assembly of the chiefs, I got them to pass a law for four resolute chiefs to be appointed in different parts of the nation, something in the character of our sheriffs, for the purpose of inflicting condign punishment on such people as broke the law; and I will say this much for them, that I never saw men execute laws better than they do. I am also desired to say to you, by the chiefs, that they do not find that your citizens are evacuating their lands, according to the ninth article of the treaty of peace, but that they were fresh provisioning the forts. This point, sir, I beg of you to look into. They also request me to inform you that they have signed a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain, as well as one of commerce and navigation, which, as soon as it is ratified at home, you shall be made more fully acquainted with.

I am, sir, your very humble servant,

EDWARD NICHOLLS,

CREEK AGENCY, May 24, 1815.

On the 18th I had the pleasure to receive your communication of the 28th ultimo. I expected, from the tenor of your orders, which I conveyed to you from Admirals Cochrane and Cockburn, on the 19th of March, that you had left the Floridas ere this with the British troops under your command, and that Spain and the United States would have no more of British interference in the management of their Indian affairs. The newspaper I sent you was one in which the official acts of our Government are published. There could be no motive for falsification; your deeming it incorrect must have proceeded from a knowledge that your conduct in relation to the negroes was at variance with it. It would have been acceptable in the communication relative to the disposition of "the negroes taken from the citizens of the United States, or Indians in hostility to the British," to have received the number, particularly belonging to the latter. As peace is restored between Great Britain and the United States, I feel a reluctance to put on paper any thing that may have the tendency to tarnish the British character, or that of any officer of its Government; but I owe it to the occasion to state the declaration of Captain Henry, that "the English are sent out by their great father and King to restore his Indian people to their lands, and we are desired by him not to take away their negroes, unless they freely give them to us, or sell them for money," is violated. It is proper, also, to add, I did not enrol any Indians into the service of the United States until after the negroes of Marshall, Stedham, and Kinnard, three half-breeds, were taken from them, by force or stratagem, by British officers. Your restriction of the captain's declaration to negroes belonging to Indians friendly to Great Britain, if by that is meant Indians hostile to the United States, is an erroneous one, as there is not one Creek who has negroes so situated.

The Creek chiefs (to use a courtly phrase) have just cause, at least, to say this is an "unjustifiable aggression." You having acted by orders, and it being now beyond your control, a remedy must and will be sought for elsewhere.

The documents you enclose, signed by three chiefs, purporting to be the agreement of the Muscogee nation to the ninth article of the treaty of peace, I shall lay before the chiefs of the nation, at a convention soon to be held at Coweta, and send you the result of their deliberations on it. The result of my reflections, with due deference, I give you, as on the envelope it purports to be on His Britannic Majesty's service. It is within my knowledge that one of the chiefs is a Seminole of East Florida, and has never resided in the United States; and that neither of the three has ever attended the national councils of the Creeks, or is in any way a part of their Executive Government. If the four witnesses had signed it as principals, and the three chiefs as witnesses, it would have been entitled to equal respect from me.* Could you be serious in communicating such a nullity with their mock determination not to permit the least intercourse between their people (meaning the Creek nation) and those of the United States? &c. As to the territory of the Seminoles, it being out of the United States, it is an affair between them and the Government of Spain; and that of the Creeks is as fixed and guarantied in their treaty stipulations with the United States. I do not know that any occurrences can happen which will render it necessary for me to communicate with Lieutenant William Hambly. If, by doing so, I can render acts of kindness to Indians or others, it would afford me pleasure; but, under present impressions, the fifth article of the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation between the United States and the King of Spain will govern me in all cases respecting the Indians in the two Floridas.

I am, with due regard, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

CREEK AGENCY, May 28, 1815.

On the 24th I wrote to you in reply to yours of the 28th ultimo, and since have had the pleasure to receive yours of the 12th. I had received from Bowlegs, direct, a complaint of an outrage committed "by the people of Georgia, who had gone into East Florida, driven off his cattle, and destroyed his property." I have sent this complaint to the Governor of Georgia, who will readily co-operate with the officers of the General Government to cause justice to be done to the injured, if the complaint is true. The laws of the United States provide completely for the protection of the Indian rights, and those intrusted with their execution have the power of doing it. All that is wanted is a proof against the transgressors.

The Indians of Aulotchwan, who, without provocation, murdered and plundered a number of the subjects of Spain on St. John's, have engendered such a deadly feud between the parties, that it will be long before the descendants of the injured can forget and forgive. Spain, from her internal commotions, has not found it convenient to settle a peace between them; and these people, it is probable, are taken for Georgians. The Indians of this agency, as well as those in the Floridas, have long known they have to apply through their chiefs to me for a redress of their grievances. The Government of the Creeks is not an ephemeral one. Its last modification is of more than ten years standing. It was the work and choice of the nation, and has a check on the conduct of the Seminoles.

In 1799 a gentleman arrived where you are from England, who had been an officer on half-pay. He came in the Fox sloop of war, furnished by the admiral on the Jamaica station, by order of the admiralty, "to facilitate to him a passage to his nation (the Creeks.") This gentleman, after attempting in various ways with the Seminoles, to usurp the government of the Creeks without success, created himself director general of Muscogee, declared war against Spain, murdered some of his subjects, and took St. Mark's. He ordered me with my assistants, in the plan of civilization, out of the Creek nation.

I communicated his proceedings to the national councils, who had been previously acquainted with him, and who replied to him that he "had a title among them which he well merited, Cap-pe-tum-nee-lox-au, (the Prince of Liars,) and no other." This director general of Muscogee, after playing a farce for two years, experienced a tragic scene, which deprived him of his liberty. He was put in irons by order of the council whose government he attempted to usurp, and sent to the Governor General of Louisiana, to answer for his crimes. His Seminole chiefs were glad to retire with impunity. After this, it was unanimously determined, in a national council of distinguished chiefs from every town, and a deputation of Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees, that the warriors should be classed, and held in readiness to execute the orders of the executive council, and that the agent for Indian affairs should have the power of executing the treaty stipulations of the Creeks with their white neighbors. Tookaubatche and Coweta, alternately, as the occasion required, were appointed the permanent seat of their national councils, where national affairs alone could be transacted. They have now two speakers. When the council meets at Coweta, Tustunnuggee Hopoie, as speaker for the Lower Creeks, is speaker for the nation; and when they meet at Tookaubatche, Tustunnuggee Thlucco, of the Upper Creeks, is speaker for the nation. Coweta is head-quarters for the present. The agent for Indian affairs can convene the council.

To this council I communicated, in your own words, the pretensions of your three chiefs. They answer; "We have had Colonel Nicholls's communication before us, that Hapoith Micco, Caupachau Micco, and Hapoie Micco are the sovereigns of this nation. We know nothing about them as such. We have often invited them to attend our talks. They never would come forward, and Hapoith Micco is a hostile Indian. They have nothing to do with our affairs. They reside in the Spanish territory."

After mentioning a solitary effort of yours "to keep the peace," you say, "I am very sorry to say the same line is not taken on your side, nor have you written to me to say what steps you are taking, or intend to take, to secure this mutual good." You could not have expected I should communicate with you, when, from your orders, you were so soon to leave the country. I have communicated to the national council several outrages committed by banditti from the Seminoles and other parts, upon the post road and frontiers of Georgia, repeatedly. They have in two instances had the guilty shot, and sent armed parties after others. As late as the 17th of April one man was killed and four wounded on the post road; our wagons twice attacked, and one wagoner killed, several horses taken and carried, as reported, to your depot, at the very time the wagons were carrying seed corn for the Indians, and flour for the support of nearly five thousand totally destitute of food.

The measure in operation here to preserve peace is with an efficient force, red and white troops, to pursue, apprehend, and punish all violators of the public peace. The executive council of the Creeks are continually at Coweta, with an assistant agent to take orders with the warriors when the necessity is apparent, and to call on me when the aid of regular troops is necessary. We do not rely on the exertions of any one but ourselves to preserve peace among the Creeks, and between them and their neighbors of the United States and the Floridas. We examine fairly, spare the innocent, and punish the guilty, and in no case suffer revenge to carve for itself.

* The witnesses, we believe, were Colonel Nicholls, Captain Woodbine, Lieutenant Hambly, and Captain Henry.

On an ex parte hearing, you have "armed the Seminoles, and given orders to put to death, without mercy, any one molesting them." This is cruelty without example—scalping men, women, and children, for troubling or vexing only, and the executioners the judges! To gratify their revenge, the good and innocent citizens on the frontiers are to be the victims of such barbarity. Suppose a banditti were to commit a violent outrage, such as that of the 17th of April; are we to charge it on the unoffending people of the frontiers, and kill them without mercy, if we could not find out the guilty? You have issued the order, provided and issued munitions of war for its execution, prepared and provisioned a stronghold to retire upon, in case of superior force appearing, to protect them in this mode of gratifying their revenge. You will be held responsible, and your strongholds will certainly not avail. If you are really on the service of His Britannic Majesty, it is an act of hostility which will require to be speedily met, and speedily crushed. But, sir, I am satisfied you are acting for yourself, on some speculative project of your own. The sovereign of Great Britain could not, from his love of justice in time of peace, his systematic perseverance in support of legitimate sovereigns, almost to the impoverishing of his own nation, suffer any of his officers to go into a neutral country to disturb its peace.

If the Seminole Indians have complaints to make, if they will do it through the chiefs of the Creek nations, or direct to me, or through an officer of His Catholic Majesty, as heretofore, I will cause justice to be done. In cases of murder, the guilty, if practicable, shall be punished; in case of theft, restitution shall be made.

The treaties you have made for the Creek nation, with the authority created by yourself for the purpose, must be a novelty. It would surprise me much to see your sovereign ratify such as you have described them to be, with a people such as I know them to be, in the territories of His Catholic Majesty. I shall communicate what has passed on the subject between us to the officers of Spain in my neighborhood, that they may be apprized of what you are doing.

As you may not have recent news from Europe, I send you some newspapers detailing important events there on the 4th of April. I am, &c.

General Gaines to the Secretary of War.

SIR: HEAD-QUARTERS, FORT STODDERT, M. T., May 14, 1815.

I have the honor to enclose herewith the deposition of Samuel Jervais, which, taken in connexion with other accounts recently received from Appalachicola, and a letter from Lieutenant Colonel Saffold, of the Territorial militia, a copy of which is also enclosed, leave little doubt that these deluded savages meditate a renewal of the war upon our frontier inhabitants.

I shall visit Forts Montgomery and Claiborne, and endeavor to ascertain, without loss of time, the real designs of the Indians; and, should they be for war, shall assemble a force to meet them.

The remains of the second and third regiments of infantry are now at the Pass Christian, and may be brought to this frontier in a few days, and, added to the remains of the twenty-fourth and thirty-ninth, now at Fort Montgomery, will give us a force of near one thousand men. With this force I shall be able to keep the Indians in check; and with another thousand, to consist of Choctaws and volunteers, I should feel sufficiently strong to make a decisive stroke upon the depots at Appalachicola, which, I persuade myself, the Government may be at liberty to sanction; for, until these depots (if they really exist) are destroyed, our frontier cannot but continue to be extremely insecure.

I am unable to say how far the statement of Jervais is entitled to credit; but I have examined him attentively, and am under a strong impression that he has stated the truth, and that the supplies mentioned in his deposition are not mistaken for those delivered last fall, but have really been delivered since the ratification of the treaty had been officially announced to the British troops at Appalachicola. These supplies were, however, brought to Appalachicola previous to the ratification of the treaty.

I have ordered the commanding officers of posts and corps to hold their commands ready for active service, and have taken measures to prepare a small train of light artillery, with a proper supply of fixed ammunition, tools, camp equipage, &c., for an Indian campaign. Whilst Spain permits our enemy to assemble forces, and make military depots for our annoyance within her territory, surely she can make no reasonable objection to our visiting those depots. Besides, Spain is expressly bound by treaty "to restrain, by force, all hostilities on the part of the Indian nations living within her boundary." If she does not restrain them, we may conclude that she has endeavored to do so, but is unable. Can she blame us, then, for restraining them, ourselves?

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect and esteem, sir, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES, Major General by brevet.

P. S. I have written to Major General Jackson upon the above subject; but as he is probably on his way to Washington, I have thought proper to address you direct.

Deposition of Samuel Jervais, enclosed in the above letter.

Samuel Jervais, being duly sworn, states: That he has been a sergeant of marines in the British service for thirteen years past; that about a month ago he left Appalachicola, where he had been stationed for several months; that the English colonel (Nicholls) had promised the hostile Indians at that place a supply of arms and ammunition, a large quantity of which had been delivered to them a few days before his departure, and after the news of a peace between England and the United States being confirmed had reached Appalachicola; that, among the articles delivered, were, of cannon, four 12 pounders, one howitzer, and two cohorts; about three thousand stands of small arms, and near three thousand barrels of powder and ball; that the British left with the Indians between three and four hundred negroes, taken from the United States, principally from Louisiana; that the arms and ammunition were for the use of the Indians and negroes, for the purposes, as it was understood, of war with the United States; that the Indians were assured by the British commander that, according to the treaty of Ghent, all the lands ceded by the Creeks, in treaty with General Jackson, were to be restored; otherwise, the Indians must fight for those lands, and that the British would in a short time assist them.

General Gaines to A. J. Dallas, Acting Secretary at War.

SIR: HEAD-QUARTERS, FORT STODDERT, M. T., May 22, 1815.

I returned last night from Fort Montgomery, where, though unable to obtain satisfactory information as to the hostile intentions of the Creek Indians, I learned that two of the party mentioned in my last had been killed, and some others wounded; and that the Indians had afterwards killed two of our citizens, a Mr. West, and another whose name my informant (Colonel Files, from the settlement of Alabama, near where the act was perpetrated) had forgotten.

Some negro men belonging to Don McGill, of Mobile, taken some months ago to Appalachicola by the British, voluntarily returned a few days past. Their statement of the supplies and negroes left by the British corresponds with that contained in the deposition of Jervais, enclosed in the letter which I had the honor to address to you on the 14th instant. The negroes add that there are at Appalachicola nearly 800 Indian warriors, and that the negroes were permitted to remain with the Indians as freemen, or to return to their masters, as they should elect, and that but few had agreed to return.

I feel convinced that the Indians are generally under the impression that the lands ceded to the United States by the treaty with General Jackson must be restored, or that a war must ensue; and that their friends, the British, will re-establish them in the possession of these lands.

So industriously have these impressions been circulated by the British and Spanish agents among the Indians, that, so far as I can learn, not only the chiefs, but the common warriors, are in the habit of saying that the British treaty with the Americans gives the Indians their lands taken by the treaty with General Jackson.

Since writing the above, I have been furnished with the enclosed deposition of S. Dale, who is a major of militia.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES, Major General by brevet.

P. S. Since closing my letter, I learn that Nicholls, said to be a colonel in the British service, is still at Appalachicola, and that he has 900 Indians and 450 negroes under arms. This account is brought by a very intelligent negro man belonging to D. Kennedy, at Mobile. I think it goes to strengthen the accounts heretofore given in my letter of the 14th instant.

E. P. GAINES.

ST. GEORGE, (BERMUDA,) May 21, 1815.

Captain Rawlins, of His Majesty's ship Borer, has stated to me in the course of various conversations that, at the time of his departure from Appalachicola, (which appears to have been about the 20th to the 28th April,) the British had collected upwards of three hundred persons at or near Prospect Bluff, partly deserters from the United States, and partly from the Spanish provinces of East and West Florida. These people had been received and protected by Colonel Nicholls, of the royal marines, who was stationed at that place, and who appears to have been under the impression (at least he said so) that the Spanish authorities had no right to the country in that vicinity.

Admiral Cochrane, however, appears to have disapproved of Nicholls's conduct in affording protection to the Spanish slaves, and had sent the Hon. Captain Spencer to Pensacola for the purpose of making arrangements for their restoration; who accordingly proceeded to Appalachicola, with Captain Pentado, named commissioner on the part of the Spaniards.

It does not appear that these gentlemen were successful in their mission, as it was understood that the refugees were not to be coerced, but merely such facilities afforded to those who voluntarily agreed to return as might be found necessary.

Much altercation has arisen out of this commission, in consequence of many officers having espoused the cause of the slaves; and, at one time, the life of Captain Spencer had been threatened by the negroes. Captain Rawlins adds that much ammunition, and a good many stands of arms, with some pieces of artillery, had been left with them; and that the fort constructed by Colonel Nicholls would not be destroyed.

I have since learned that the Carron, which must have sailed from Appalachicola previous to the Borer, is arrived at Nassau, on her way to Bermuda, with 176 slaves of all ages. As she is daily expected, and as Captain Spencer is now on his way here, it might be as well to wait their arrival before you make any official communication to your Government on the subject. It is, however, obvious that, were you in possession of the whole facts, no time ought to be lost in recommending the adoption of speedy, energetic measures, for the destruction of a thing held so likely to become dangerous to the State of Georgia. The Spaniards are not in a situation to do it, but I dare say would co-operate. I have learned that the whole of the slaves brought from the United States have been sent to Nova Scotia, with the exception of a few that were lately shipped to the island of Trinidad, in His Majesty's ship the Levant, and such as have enlisted in the colonial marines were in these islands. A few stragglers have contrived to get on shore in the Bermudas, and, by the connivance of their colonized friends, to remain, very contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants, who are, in general, desirous of getting rid of them.

It has been whispered (I know not with what truth) that the people expected in the Carron, who are from Louisiana and West Florida, are also to be sent to Trinidad.

The Carron is arrived; and this morning I understood from Messrs. James and Michael Carron, the agents of Sir Alexander Cochrane, the Carron was going to some port of the West Indies, unquestionably to Trinidad.

Address to the King of England from the Indians, published in the English newspapers of the 15th August, 1818.

We, the chiefs of the Muscogee nation, in full council assembled, on behalf of ourselves and our people, do make the following requests of our good father, King George, and declare to him certain resolutions we have come to, with our reasons for so doing.

We conceive it to be indispensably necessary for our good, as well as to make us useful allies of Great Britain, that British officers should be constantly kept among us; and we request that our good father will grant us this favor. Since Colonel Brown left us, we have been a prey to civil dissensions, fomented and kept up by our inveterate and never-to-be-satisfied foe, the Americans; by their bad advice has brother been in the act of shedding the blood of brother; and when the land becomes thus desolated, they possess themselves of it, so that we shall soon be driven to the desert sands of the sea from the fertile fields of our forefathers; and we are told that the Spaniards will not let us trade with the British from the mouths of our rivers; we, therefore, further request that our good father will secure for us the mouths of the rivers Appalachicola, Alabama, and St. Mary's: for, if our communication is once more cut off from his children, we shall be totally ruined. We have fought and bled for him against the Americans, by which we have made them our more bitter enemies; and, as he has stood the friend of the oppressed nations beyond the great waters, he will surely not forget the sufferings of his once happy children here. We therefore rely on his future protection and his fatherly kindness; we will truly keep the talks which his chief has given us, if he is graciously pleased to continue his protection. Famine is now devouring up ourselves and our children, by reason of our Upper Town brethren being driven down upon us in the time the corn was green; and now their miseries and necessities cause them to root up the seed of our future crop, so that what we sow in the day we are obliged to watch at night. Were it not for the powder we get from your chief, the whole of the nation would be in dust. The Red Sticks have shot and eaten up almost the whole of our cattle: for they have seen their children digging in the woods for want; and who can blame them, when they are pressed by such cruel necessity? Thus we are situated, and we are only looking to the departure or the stay of your children as the signal of our destruction or prosperity. In former times, after the British left us, to show our love and regard for their nation, we made a grant of our lands to the house of Panton, Leslie, & Co., and latterly to the house of John Forbes & Co., on certain terms—that they were to settle the lands with British men, and keep up a sufficient and good assortment of all sorts of merchandise suitable to our wants; but, instead of their doing this, they have attempted to settle our lands with Americans, and have refused to supply us with powder when we were attacked by our enemies, and have urged us to declare for the Americans against the British, and have offered rewards to us for that purpose; and they have actually written to their agents who reside among us, desiring them to obstruct the British officers all in their power from assisting us, and to represent to them, also, how impossible it would be for them to succeed against the Americans; and we, having intercepted their letters, did deliver them to Lieutenant Colonel Nicholls, who is our witness; and the said letters were delivered by an Indian to John Forbes, at St. Augustine, to be forwarded by him as aforesaid; and, as it does stand thus, on unquestionable proof, that the said house of Forbes & Co. have shamefully broken their contracts with us, we do, in this our full assembly, declare all their property in our nation to be confiscated to the nation; and we further annul and declare void our grant or grants of lands accordingly, warning them, and all belonging to them, never to appear again in the nation. And the United States, or some part thereof, have thought proper to run a line or wagon road through the Indian nation, from Hartford, in Georgia, to Mobile, in West Florida, without our consent, and to our great hurt and annoyance.

We implore our good father that he will cause them to disuse the said road, and to cease all communication between them and us, as we are determined to cease having any communication with them; and we warn all Americans to keep out of this nation. And whereas that a young chief, called McIntosh, was sent with a message of remonstrance against the above-mentioned road being run, and of several other encroachments on the Tombigbee, Coosa, and Alabama rivers, instead of his making such remonstrance, he suffered himself to be tricked by our enemy, and unlawfully sold to them large tracts of land on and about the rivers Oconee and Ockmulgee, which tracts of land we implore our good father to use his endeavor in getting restored, and that the Americans may be obliged to withdraw from them. The above-mentioned McIntosh holds a commission as major in the American army, and of the Creek regiment; he has caused much blood to be spilt, for which we denounce him to the whole nation, and will give the usual reward of the brave to any one who may kill him, he having, on a recent occasion, killed and scalped a brother, who was on an errand of peace to our Cherokee brethren, for no other reason alleged against him than his having British arms about him; and in this, we are told, he has been encouraged by Colonel Hawkins, although long after peace was declared, and all hostility ordered to cease. We further request Lieutenant Colonel Nicholls will return our grateful thanks to our good father and his chiefs, by sea and land, for the useful and good presents he has sent to us by them; and also that the lieutenant colonel, and the officers with him in this nation, will receive our thanks for their brotherly conduct to us. And whereas our good father having made a peace with the United States of America, and, according to his true talk, he has not forgotten the interests of us his children, but has caused to be respected our lands, and guarantied the integrity of them to us, we do declare them or him to be traitors to this nation who shall, without his and our consent, sell or make over to any foreign Power any part thereof; and we do further declare whosoever shall endeavor, directly or indirectly, to separate us from him or his children, to be the enemy of us and our children, and that we will not trade or barter with any other than the British nation if the above requests be complied with; and we do promise to give grants of land to all such British men as our good father shall give permission to stay amongst us, and that we will do our best to protect and defend them in their laws and property; and we send as our representative our brave brother Hillis Hadjo (Francis) to our father, who is authorized to ratify this treaty.

No. 10.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Baker, dated

July 10, 1815.

The conduct of Colonel Nicholls, who has taken a position on the Appalachicola, within the Spanish territory, is, on the same principle, entitled to particular attention. I transmit to you a copy of a correspondence between him and Colonel Hawkins, agent of the United States with the Creeks, and also an extract of a letter from Major General Gaines, with the affidavit of Samuel Jervais, which show the nature and effect of his extraordinary and unjustifiable interference with that nation. It appears, by Colonel Nicholls's letter, that he considers our treaty with the Creeks, though made several months before the treaty with Great Britain, as rendered void by the latter, and that he is endeavoring to impress that opinion on them, and to excite them to hostility in support of it; that he has supplied them with arms and munitions of war, and had actually formed a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with certain Indians, whom he calls the Creek nation, which he has sent to his Government for ratification; that, in short, he had made Appalachicola a military station, at which he had collected a large body of Indians and fugitive slaves from the United States, evidently for hostile purposes against the United States. The conduct of this officer is of too marked a character to require any comment. His proceedings are utterly and evidently incompatible with the late treaty with Great Britain, and with the amicable relations established by it between our countries. In calling your attention to these proceedings, it is not my object to dwell on each particular act of which I complain. I shall remark, generally, that, as the treaty with the Creeks was concluded before the treaty of peace with Great Britain, the ninth article of that treaty has no bearing with that nation; and that any interference of Colonel Nicholls, or other British agent, with the Creeks, however slight, is improper and unjustifiable.

The President cannot doubt that the conduct of Colonel Nicholls and of the other British agents, as stated in the correspondence which is communicated, is unauthorized by your Government, and that they will be justly censured and punished by it. In the mean time, as you were particularly impowered to act in all circumstances connected with the execution of the late treaty of peace, I am persuaded that you will readily interpose your authority to put an end to proceedings of a nature so unwarrantable, and which have already produced such injurious effects.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 21, 1815.

The conduct of Colonel Nicholls to the south is still more extraordinary. Having noticed it in sufficient detail in my letter to Mr. Baker, I refer you to that paper for the necessary information respecting it.

It may be fairly presumed that these acts were not authorized by the British Government; that they are imputable only to Indian agents, and those under whom they act in this country. They nevertheless deserve reprehension, which it is expected that the British Government will not hesitate to inflict.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, stating the substance of a conversation with Earl Bathurst, dated LONDON, September 19, 1815.

I said that the American Government had been peculiarly concerned at the proceedings of Colonel Nicholls, because they appeared to be marked with unequivocal and extraordinary marks of hostility. "Why," said Lord Bathurst, "to tell you the truth, Colonel Nicholls is, I believe, a man of activity and spirit, but a very wild fellow. He did make and send over to me a treaty, offensive and defensive, with some Indians; and he is now come over here, and has brought over some of those Indians. I sent for answer that he had no authority whatever to make a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Indians, and that this Government would make no such treaty. I have sent him word that I could not see him upon any such project. The Indians are here in great distress, indeed; but we shall only furnish them with the means of returning home, and advise them to make their terms with the United States as well as they can." Perceiving that I had particularly noticed his declaration that he had declined seeing Colonel Nicholls, he said that he should perhaps see him upon the general subject of his transactions, but that he had declined seeing him in regard to his treaty with the Indians.

In this conversation Lord Bathurst's manner, like that of Lord Liverpool, in the conference which I had about a month before with him, was altogether good-humored and conciliatory. The conduct of all the officers and persons complained of was explicitly disavowed; and I understood, at first, the observation of Lord Bathurst, that he had declined seeing Colonel Nicholls, as an intimation that it was intended to exhibit towards that officer unequivocal marks of displeasure. But the subsequent explanation left me to conclude that, although the disapprobation of his proceedings was strongly expressed to me, the utmost extent of it that would be shown to him would be the refusal to ratify his treaty, offensive and defensive, with the Indians.

Extract of a note from Mr. Adams to Earl Bathurst, dated

LONDON, September 25, 1815.

In the conference with your lordship, with which I was honored on the 14th instant, I represented to you, conformably to the instructions which I had received from the Government of the United States, the proceedings of several British officers in America, and upon the American coast, marked with characters incompatible, not only with those amicable relations which it is the earnest desire of the American Government to restore and to cultivate, but even with the condition of peace which had been restored between the two countries by the treaty of Ghent.

It was with the highest satisfaction that I understood your lordship, in the name of the British Government, to disavow the proceedings of all those officers, of which it had been my duty to complain; and that I received from you the assurance that orders had long since been given for the restoration of the post of Michilimackinac to the United States; that instructions had been given to promote, by all suitable means, the restoration of peace between the Indians and the United States; and, particularly, that Colonel Nicholls, in pretending to conclude a treaty, offensive and defensive, with certain Indians belonging within the jurisdiction of the United States, had not only acted without authority, but incurred the disapprobation of His Majesty's Government.

No. 13 a.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, containing the substance of a conversation with Lord Castlereagh, dated LONDON, February 8, 1816.

I next observed that, at the other extremity of the United States, the Indians again appeared in the shape of disturbers of the peace between our countries. I recapitulated your remonstrances to Mr. Baker, and mine, by your order, to Lord Bathurst, against the conduct of Colonel Nicholls; that officer's pretended treaties of alliance, offensive and defensive, and of commerce and navigation, with certain runaway Indians, whom he had seen fit to style the Creek nation; and the very exceptionable manner in which he had notified his transactions to the agent of the United States with the Creeks, with an intimation that we were to hear more about these treaties when they should be ratified in England. I mentioned that Lord Bathurst had, in the most candid and explicit manner, verbally disavowed to me these proceedings of Colonel Nicholls; had told me that the pretended treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, had been indeed transmitted by the colonel for ratification; but this Government had refused to ratify it, and informed Colonel Nicholls that they would agree to no such treaty: that the colonel had even brought over some of his Indians here, who would be sent back, with advice to make their terms with the United States as they could. These verbal assurances I had reported to my Government, and presumed they had been received with much satisfaction. Whether they had been repeated in a more formal manner, and in any written communication, I had not been informed. I had noticed the conduct of Colonel Nicholls in one of my notes to Lord Bathurst, and to that part of the note had received no answer. As the complaint had also been made through Mr. Baker, a written answer might, perhaps, have been returned through that channel. My motive for referring to the subject now was, that, by the President's message to Congress at the opening of the session, I perceived that the conduct of the Indians in that part of the United States still threatened hostilities, and because there, as in the more northern parts, the Indians would certainly be disposed to tranquillity and peace with the United States, unless they should have encouragement to rely upon the support of Great Britain. Lord Castlereagh said, with a smile, that he had a good many treaties to lay before Parliament, but none such as those I described were among them.

No. 13 b.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Adams to Lord Castlereagh, dated LONDON, March 21, 1816.

It has been more than once a painful part of the duty of the undersigned to represent to His Majesty's Government the unfriendly dispositions manifested by British military officers in America towards the United States since the peace between the two countries; and to point out specific and unequivocal facts, by which those officers, far from exerting themselves to carry into effect the avowed object of their own Government, of securing to the Indians who had followed the British standard during the war the blessings of the pacification, have labored with an activity as restless, and a zeal as ardent, as they could have done in the heat of war, to instigate Indians belonging within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States to continued or renewed hostility against them. When, in the course of last summer, the undersigned had the honor of exposing to Earl Bathurst the transactions deeply marked with this character of Colonel Nicholls, he was happy to receive from his lordship, verbally, at once the confirmation of the facts, and the disavowal of the measures. Colonel Nicholls, after the conclusion of the peace between his sovereign and the United States, not only used every effort in his power to urge to war against the United States tribes of Indians with whom they were then at peace, and who were far remote from any British possession whatever, but actually concluded a pretended treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between some of them and Great Britain against the United States. Of this treaty, Earl Bathurst, in a conference with the undersigned, expressed himself in terms of unqualified disapprobation; adding that it had not been ratified or approved, and that no such treaty would be made or agreed to by Great Britain. In the pursuit of his projects, Colonel Nicholls brought over some of these Indians to England; but as Lord Bathurst, in the most explicit manner, assured the undersigned that no use of them hostile to the United States would be made by Great Britain, the undersigned is persuaded that that determination has not been departed from by His Majesty's Government.

How far the threat of Indian vengeance is becoming to the humanity of British officers, or the dignity of their Government, in a correspondence with the officers of a civilized nation, and in a time of peace, the undersigned leaves to His Majesty's Government to decide. Neither Colonel Nicholls, nor Colonel James, was ashamed to use it; and it would be treated by the undersigned as it was by the officers of the United States to whom it was addressed, were it not his duty to remark that, in condescending to be the heralds of this menace, those officers sufficiently indicated that they understood its being carried into execution or not depended upon them; that they viewed themselves as the regulators to restrain or to license Indian barbarity at their discretion; that they (British military officers) called upon the civil authority of the United States to satisfy the revenge of Indian savages belonging within the American jurisdiction, for acts committed upon the American territory; threatening, as the alternative, to let loose those savages to wreak their own vengeance, in all its fury, upon American women and children.

Independently of the very serious character of these transactions in themselves, the undersigned entreats the attention of the British Government to the spirit by which they were dictated. This excessive earnestness of British authorities, military and civil, to hold themselves forth as the protectors, through right and through wrong, of Indians not belonging to British territories, however politic it may be deemed to imbitter enmities and to provoke hostilities between the Indians and the Americans, cannot but excite animosities far more formidable between the British and American nations. If persevered in, it must eventually prove most pernicious and fatal to the Indians themselves. The occasion will justify the expression of the hope that orders and instructions will be issued to the local authorities of the British colonies in North America, which will leave no doubt on the minds of those invested with them that the real intention of Great Britain towards the United States is peace.

No. 14.

General Jackson to the Governor of Pensacola.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR: WASHINGTON, M. T., April 23, 1816.

I am charged by my Government to make known to you that a negro fort, erected during our late war with Great Britain, at or near the junction of the Chatahoochee and Flint rivers, has been strengthened since that period, and is now occupied by upwards of two hundred and fifty negroes, many of whom have been enticed away from the service of their masters, citizens of the United States; all of whom are well clothed and disciplined. Secret practices to inveigle negroes from the citizens of Georgia, as well as from the Cherokee and Creek nations of Indians, are still continued by this banditti and the hostile Creeks.

This is a state of things which cannot fail to produce much injury to the neighboring settlements, and excite irritations which eventually may endanger the peace of the nation, and interrupt that good understanding which so happily exists between our Governments.

The principles of good faith, which always insure good neighborhood between nations, require the immediate and prompt interference of the Spanish authority to destroy or remove from our frontier this banditti, put an end to an evil of so serious a nature, and return to our citizens and friendly Indians inhabiting our territory those negroes now in the said fort, and which have been stolen and enticed from them. I cannot permit myself to indulge a belief that the Governor of Pensacola, or the military commander of that place, will hesitate a moment in giving orders for this banditti to be dispersed, and the property of the citizens of the United States forthwith restored to them, and our friendly Indians particularly, when I reflect that the conduct of this banditti is such as will not be tolerated by our Government, and, if not put down by Spanish authority, will compel us, in self-defence, to destroy them. This communication is intrusted to Captain Amelung, of the first regiment of United States infantry, who is charged to bring back such answer as you may be pleased to make to this letter. In your answer you will be pleased to state whether that fort has been built by the Government of Spain, and whether those negroes who garrison it are considered as the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and, if not by His Catholic Majesty, by whom and under whose orders it has been erected.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding Division of the South.

No. 15.

Governor Zuniga to General Jackson.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: PENSACOLA, May 26, 1818.

On the 24th of the present month, Captain Amelung, of the first United States regiment, put into my hands your excellency's letter, dated at Washington, Mississippi Territory, on the 23d of April last, in which, after apprizing me that your Government had given it in charge to you to inform me that the fort of the negroes, erected during the last war (with Great Britain) near the junction of the Chatahoochee and Flint rivers, had been reinforced, and was now occupied by more than two hundred and fifty negroes, many of whom were seduced from the service of their masters, (who are citizens of the United States;) and that all of them are well armed, provisioned, and disciplined, you make many wise reflections with respect to the serious injuries which may result from tolerating such an establishment, not only to those in the immediate neighborhood of it, by disturbing the peace of the nation, but likewise to the good understanding which happily exists between our respective Governments; you enter into an investigation to show what the Spanish authorities ought to do to put an end to an evil of so serious a nature, in the mode prescribed by the principles of good faith, which are the foundation of friendly neighborhood among nations; you distinctly state what the Government ought immediately to do, in failure of which your Government will be obliged to do it, to insure the safety of the inhabitants of the United States; and you conclude by requesting me to state, in my answer to your letter, whether the said fort has been constructed by the Spanish Government, and whether the negroes, who compose its garrison, are deemed subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and, if the fort was not built by Spanish authority, to state by what authority, and by whose order, it was built.

In answer to your excellency, I will state (with the veracity which comports with the character of an honorable officer, in which class I rank myself) that, having arrived at this place nearly at the close of the month of March preceding, and being informed of what your excellency has communicated to me, (with this difference, that the fort, instead of being where you place it, is to be found on the eastern bank of the Appalachicola, at about fifteen miles from its mouth or entrance into the sea,) I lost no time in proposing to my captain general the measures which appeared to me proper, as well for securing the inhabitants of the country under my command from the damages, losses, and injuries which they have suffered, and still suffer, from this establishment, as to prevent the American citizens and the friendly Indians of the neighborhood from continuing to experience them. I have hitherto received no answer, and consequently your excellency (who knows how limited are the powers of a subordinate officer) cannot be surprised that I should make known to you that, although my mode of thinking exactly corresponds with yours as to dislodging the negroes from the fort, the occupying it with Spanish troops, or destroying it, and delivering the negroes who may be collected to their lawful owners, I shall not be able to act until I receive the orders of my captain general, and the assistance necessary to enable me to undertake the enterprise with a moral certainty of accomplishing the end. I am persuaded that the determination of the said chief cannot be long delayed; and, should it authorize me to act, your excellency may rest assured and persuaded that I will not lose an instant in adopting, on my part, the most efficacious measures for cutting up by the root an evil which is felt to the full extent stated in your letter by the inhabitants of this province, who are the subjects of my sovereign, and whose prosperity and tranquillity it is my duty to preserve and protect.

With this explanation, your before-named letter may be considered as fully answered, as it gives me pleasure to understand that, thinking as your excellency thinks with respect to the necessity of destroying the negroes, the fort at Appalachicola occupied by them was not constructed by orders of the Spanish Government; and that the negroes, although in part belonging to inhabitants of this province, and, as rational beings, may be the subjects of the King, my master, are deemed by me insurgents or rebels against the authority, not only of His Catholic Majesty, but also of the proprietors from whose service they have withdrawn themselves; some seduced by the English Colonel Nicholls, Major Woodbine, and their agents, and others from their inclination to run off. But as your excellency manifests a particular desire that, in case the fort was not erected by Spanish authority, I should state by what authority and by whose orders it was erected, I have no difficulty in satisfying your curiosity, by informing you that I have understood, ever since my arrival at this place, that the said fort, and another near the confluence of the Chatahoochee and Flint rivers, (which it appears no longer exists,) were built by the order of the before-named Colonel Nicholls. I will not assure you that he did it under authority from his Government; but I can say that he proceeded to place artillery, munitions, and provisions in it, by the arrangement of Vice Admiral Malcolm; and that when Colonel Nicholls and the troops of his detachment, after the conclusion of the expedition against Louisiana, withdrew from that point, he left orders with the negroes, totally contrary to the incontestable right of sovereignty which the King, my master, exercises from the line of the thirty-first degree of north latitude to the south. My predecessors in this Government have given an account of all these actions to the authorities on whom they depended, that the satisfaction which the violation required might be demanded by those on whom this duty devolves.

I think I have answered your excellency's letter satisfactorily, and in terms which cannot leave a doubt of the sincerity of my intentions in favor of the common cause of the American and Spanish inhabitants; and that my present inaction does not proceed from a want of inclination. I likewise flatter myself that, until my captain general decides, no steps will be taken by the Government of the United States, or by your excellency, which may be prejudicial to the sovereignty of the King, my master, or the district of Appalachicola, which is a dependency of this Government. And, finally, I conclude by assuring your excellency that it will afford me particular satisfaction to have opportunities of evincing my desire, not only to contribute, so far as depends on me, to the cementing of the good understanding which subsists between our respective Governments, but also to prove to your excellency the high opinion I entertain of your virtues and military talents. God preserve your excellency many years.

MAURICIO DE ZUNIGA.

His Excellency ANDREW JACKSON.

No. 16.

SIR: NEW ORLEANS, June 4, 1816.

In obedience to your order, received on the 6th of May last, I proceeded the next day for Pensacola; but owing to adverse winds, (having to wait twelve days at the bay of St. Louis,) I only arrived at that place on the 24th May. I was received and treated with great attention by the governor and his officers, and, after receiving his answer to your letter, I left there on the 27th, and arrived here on the 2d instant.

I have the honor to transmit herewith the answer of the governor, which, I think, embraces all the points touched upon in your letter; and also take the liberty to subjoin a translation thereof, as it might happen that no person is near you understanding the Spanish language. I am firmly of opinion that the governor asserts the truth in his communication; and am convinced that the inhabitants of Pensacola have suffered, and do now suffer, more than our citizens from the existence of the fort and its garrison.

I also take the liberty of communicating such intelligence as I have been able to collect from good authority, and which might perhaps be of some use.

The fort in question is situated at Bonavista, on the eastern branch of the Appalachicola river, 15 miles above its mouth, and 120 miles east of Pensacola. The river discharges itself into St. George's Sound, and vessels drawing not more than ten feet water may come in between St. George's and St. Vincent's islands; the bar, however, is dangerous, and requires skilful pilots.

The fort was constructed by Nicholls and Woodbine, and the British occasionally resorted thither; but, on their final evacuation of this country, left it in the possession of a garrison composed of negroes and Indians, with four pieces of heavy ordnance, and 10,000 pounds of powder, &c. About twenty Choctaws, a number of Seminoles, and a great number of runaway negroes are supposed to have been there some time ago, but a great part of these brigands have abandoned the fort on account of scarcity of provisions, and have gone to Savannah (alias St. Joseph's) river, in East Florida, whither they will, no doubt, all retire, in case of an attack by land, as they have a schooner and several large boats to make good their retreat by sea, if not interrupted.

From this spot they can easily annoy our settlements on Flint river, and the whole Georgia frontier, and are in a country where they can procure subsistence with facility.

Pensacola itself is, I can assure you, entirely defenceless. The garrison consists of from 80 to 100 effective men, exclusive of a battalion of colored troops, say about 150 men, of whom the inhabitants themselves stand in constant dread. They have about 150 serviceable muskets, about 500 musket cartridges, and not enough gunpowder to fire a salute; one gun was mounting at Barrancas on the day I left there. To this is to be added the dissatisfaction of the inhabitants, and even of a number of the officers of Government, and the desire of a majority to see a change effected. I must not forget to present to you, on the part of the governor, the thanks of the inhabitants of Pensacola for the exemplary and humane conduct of the army under your command at Pensacola, and I verily believe their professions to be sincere.

The governor also, on my mentioning in conversation that I was persuaded you would willingly assist in destroying the fort, said, if the object was of sufficient importance to require the presence of General Jackson, he would be proud to be commanded by you; and that, if the Captain General of Cuba could not furnish him with the necessary means, he might perhaps apply to you for assistance.

Having nothing farther to add, I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

VERO Z. AMELUNG,
Captain 1st infantry.

SIR: HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, NASHVILLE, June 15, 1816.

I have this moment received the answer of the commanding officer and Governor of Pensacola to mine of the 23d of April, which I hasten to forward for your information, as well as the copy of the report of Captain Amelung, of the 1st infantry, who was the bearer of my letter. I send you the original, retaining a copy in English forwarded to me by Captain Amelung.

The answer bears the marks of candor and breathes the spirit of friendship; and as those marauders on our frontier are acknowledged officially as rebels against the Government of Spain, there can be no fear of disturbing the good understanding that exists between us and Spain, by destroying the negro fort, and restoring to the owners the negroes that may be captured.

The 4th and 7th infantry will be sufficient to destroy it. A few troops from the 1st infantry, with a small naval force, will prevent their escape, and capture those vessels named by Captain Amelung in his report. I shall await your order on this subject, which shall be promptly obeyed and executed.

I am, respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,

SIR: CAMP NEAR FORT JACKSON, April 30, 1816.

I have just now received a letter from Lieutenant Colonel Clinch, dated near the mouth of Summochichoba, the 26th instant, enclosing a communication from the Little Prince, a copy of which I enclose herewith.

This chief is on a tour down the river to visit the Seminole chiefs near the Appalachicola.

The ostensible object of the visit was to adopt measures to take the negro fort; and as Colonel Hawkins had confidence in the promises of the Indians to effect this object, I sanctioned a requisition for supplying them with three hundred bushels of corn, to serve as rations. That I have little faith in their promises, I will not deny; but it seemed to me proper to encourage them in the prosecution of a measure which I felt persuaded would, if successful, be attended with great benefit to our southern frontier inhabitants, as well as the Indians themselves.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES.

Talk from the Little Prince, Tustunnuggee Hopoy, to the Commander of the United States forces in the Indian nation.

Sir:

Jackson and Hawkins spoke to us, and told us we were their children. At the Tuskeegee meeting you told us you would have the land as far down as the Summochichoba; but we chiefs did not agree to it. You did not tell us then you would build forts along the river bank down to the fork; but we heard, since, you issued orders to that effect. We do not think it friendly for one friend to take any thing from another forcibly. The commander and Hawkins did not tell us any thing about building of these forts. Did you know these things, and keep them hidden from me? We told our friend Hawkins we would hold a meeting at this place on our way down. We were [told] at the fort at Summochichoba, built by the commanding officer, that he had orders to build three forts. Our friend Hawkins told us to go down to the fort of the blacks, and take them out of it, and give them to their masters; which we are at at this present, when we have heard of Jackson's orders about building these forts. We hear of your meeting at Tuskeegee. We hope you will detain the forces at the places they are at at present, and wait on the Indians, as I am sure they will be able to settle every thing; but all the chiefs are not yet met. You know that we are slow in our movements. I spoke to the commanding officer at Summochichoba. He will read this, and write it off on a clean sheet, and send it on to the commander-in-chief and Colonel Hawkins. I beg you will send me back an answer, and a sheet of paper, and a little ink, in order to enable me to write you again, if it should be necessary.

I remain your friend,

TUSTUNNUGGEE HOPOY.

W. S. PENDLETON.

No. 19.

General Gaines to Colonel Clinch.

Sir: Head-quarters, Fort Montgomery, M. T., May 23, 1816.

Your letters up to the 9th instant have been received. The British agent, Hambly, and the Little Prince and others, are acting a part which I have been at a loss for some time past to understand. Are they not endeavoring to amuse and divert us from our main object? Their tricks, if they be so, have assumed a serious aspect, and may lead to their destruction; but we have little to apprehend from them. They must be watched with an eye of vigilance. The post near the junction of the rivers, to which I called your attention in the last month, must be established speedily, even if we have to fight our way to it through the ranks of the whole nation.

The surveyors have commenced laying off the land to be sold and settled, and they must be protected. The force of the whole nation cannot arrest your movement down the river on board the boats, if secured up the sides with two-inch plank, and covered over with clapboards; nor could all the nation prevent your landing and constructing a stockade work, sufficient to secure you, unless they should previously know the spot at which you intended to land, and had actually assembled at that place previous to or within four hours of your landing; but your force is not sufficient to warrant your march to the different villages, as suggested, by land. The whole of your force (except about forty men, or one company, for the defence of Fort Gaines) should be kept near your boats and supplies until the new post shall be established. You may then strike at any hostile party near you, with all your disposable force; but even then you should not go more than one or two days' march from your fort.

If your supplies of provisions and ammunition have reached you, let your detachment move as directed in my letter of the 28th of last month. You can venture to move with twenty-five days' rations, but you should order a supply to the agency, or Fort Gaines, where a boat should be built, and held in readiness to send down, in case any accident should prevent or delay the arrival of a supply which I have ordered from New Orleans.

I enclose you an extract of a letter containing an arrangement for the supply by water, and have to direct that you* will provide a boat, and despatch it with an officer and fifty men to meet the vessels from New Orleans, as soon as you are advised of their being on the river. One of your large boats will answer the purpose, provided you have no barge or keel-boat. Should the boats meet with opposition at what is called the Negro fort, arrangements will immediately be made for its destruction; and for that purpose you will be supplied with two eighteen-pounders and one howitzer, with fixed ammunition, and implements complete, to be sent in a vessel to accompany the provisions. I have, likewise, ordered fifty thousand musket cartridges, some rifles, swords, &c. Should you be compelled to go against the negro fort, you will land at a convenient point above it, and force a communication with the commanding officer of the vessels below, and arrange with him your plan of attack. Upon this subject you shall hear from me again, as soon as I am notified of the time at which the vessels will sail from New Orleans.

With great respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES, Major General commanding.

No. 20.

General Gaines to Commodore Patterson.

Sir: Fort Montgomery, May 22, 1816.

By a letter I have received from Lieutenant Colonel Clinch, commanding a battalion of the 4th regiment of infantry on the Chatahoochee, I learn that, in the early part of the present month, a party of Indians surprised and took from the immediate vicinity of his camp two privates sent out to guard a drove of beef cattle purchased for the subsistence of the troops. The cattle, amounting to thirty head, were also taken. The Indians were pursued forty-five miles, on a path leading to St. Mark's, but, being mounted, and having travelled all night, escaped with their prisoners and booty.

* Thirty thousand rations have been ordered from New Orleans up the Appalachicola, and Commodore Patterson requested to send a convoy of one or two gun-vessels.

This outrage, preceded by the murder of two of our citizens, Johnson and McGaskey, by Indians below the lines, and followed by certain indications of general hostility, such as the war dance, and drinking war physic, leaves no doubt that we shall be compelled to destroy the hostile towns.

The detached situation of the post which I have ordered Lieutenant Colonel Clinch to establish near the Appalachicola will expose us to great inconvenience and hazard in obtaining supplies by land, particularly in the event of war, as the road will be bad, and the distance from the settlement of Georgia near one hundred and fifty miles.

Having advised with the commander-in-chief of the division upon this subject, I have determined upon an experiment by water, and for this purpose have to request your co-operation; should you feel authorized to detach a small gun-vessel or two as a convoy to the boats charged with our supplies up the Appalachicola, I am persuaded that, in doing so, you will contribute much to the benefit of the service, and accommodation of my immediate command in this quarter. The transports will be under the direction of the officer of the gun-vessel, and the whole should be provided against an attack by small arms from shore. To guard against accidents, I will direct Lieutenant Colonel Clinch to have in readiness a boat sufficient to carry fifty men, to meet the vessels on the river and assist them up.

Should you find it convenient to send a convoy, I will thank you to inform me of the date of its departure, and the time which, in your judgment, it will take to arrive at the mouth of the river, (Appalachicola.)

Enclosed you will receive the best account I can give you, from the information I have received of the negro fort upon the Appalachicola. Should we meet with opposition from that fort, it shall be destroyed; and, for this purpose, the commanding officer above will be ordered to prepare all his disposable force to meet the boats at or just below the fort, and he will confer with the commanding officer of the gun-vessels upon the plan of attack.

I am, with great consideration and esteem, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES, Major General by brevet.

Commodore DANIEL T. PATTERSON,
United States Navy, commanding New Orleans station.

No. 21.

Commodore Patterson to Lieutenant Commandant Crawley.

SIR: NEW ORLEANS, June 19, 1816.

The enclosed copy of a letter from Major General Gaines, commanding the United States military forces in the Creek nation, fully informs you of his situation, and his expectation of immediate commencement of hostilities on the part of those Indians.

In consequence of the information contained in that letter, I have promised the convoy therein requested; you will therefore take under your command gun-boat No. 149, and, with that letter for your guide, convoy the transports, with ordnance, provisions, &c., up the Appalachicola and Chatahoochee, to such point or points as may be required, if practicable. Should you meet with opposition from the negro fort, situated, as stated in the letter, on the former river, the military commanding officer will have orders to destroy it, in which you will co-operate; the plan of attack to be concerted between yourself and him: the transports will be under your direction entirely.

In the event of hostilities between the Indians and the United States, you will, if practicable, afford any aid with your vessels in your power to the army. Remain in that river, and co-operate with them, until it shall be necessary to return here for provisions; but, if you cannot aid them in their operations, you will then return immediately, bringing with you the transports.

The transports will rendezvous at the Pass Christian, and consist of the following vessels: schooner Semilante, laden with ordnance; schooner General Pike, laden with provisions.

By late information, the negro fort mounts only six pieces of cannon, with about one hundred men in and about it planting corn, and I apprehend no opposition from them whatever; in the event of your remaining to act with the army, you will communicate with me by mail through General Gaines. Should the boat, mentioned in General Gaines's letter, not meet you prior to your arrival at or near the negro fort, and you have cause to expect opposition, you will wait her arrival before you attempt to pass it.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DANIEL T. PATTERSON.

Lieut. Com. CHARLES E. CRAWLEY, U. S. cutter Fox.

No. 22.

SIR: NEW ORLEANS, June 19, 1816.

The enclosed despatch for Lieutenant Commandant Crawley is transmitted under cover to you, lest he might not arrive at the Pass Christian by the time the transports laden with ordnance, provisions, &c., mentioned to you verbally when here, shall arrive, and be ready to proceed to their place of destination; in which case, you will consider them as addressed to you, and act accordingly; in that event, you will take under your command gun-boat No. 154, together with the transports, and proceed in execution of these instructions.

In the performance of the duties therein pointed out, it will be necessary to act with vigor and judgment; and you will refrain from any act of hostilities against the Spanish force, or violation of their rights and laws. You will make no delay in your departure from the Pass Christian, after the arrival there of No. 154 and the transports.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DANIEL T. PATTERSON.

No. 23.

J. Loomis to Commodore Patterson.

UNITED STATES GUN-VESSEL No. 149,

SIR: BAY ST. LOUIS, August 13, 1816.

In conformity with your orders of the 24th of June, I have the honor to report that, with this vessel and No. 154, Sailingmaster James Bassett, I took under convoy the schooners General Pike and Semilante, laden with provisions and military stores, and proceeded for Appalachicola river; off the mouth of which we arrived on the 10th July. At this place I received despatches from Lieutenant Colonel Clinch, commanding the fourth regiment United States infantry, on the Chatahoochee river, borne by an Indian, requesting me to remain off the mouth of the river until he could arrive with a party of men to assist in getting up the transports; desiring me, also, to detain all vessels and boats that might attempt to descend the river.

On the 15th, I discovered a boat pulling out of the river, and, being anxious to ascertain whether we should be permitted peaceably to pass the fort above us, I despatched a boat with an officer to gain the necessary information; on nearing her, she fired a volley of musketry into my boat, and immediately pulled in for the river; I immediately opened a fire on them from the gun-vessels, but with no effect.

On the 17th, at 5 A. M. I manned and armed a boat with a swivel and musketry and four men, and gave her in charge of Midshipman Luffborough, for the purpose of procuring fresh water, having run short of that article. At 11 A. M. Sailingmaster Bassett, who had been on a similar expedition, came alongside with the body of John Burgess, ordinary seaman, who had been sent in the boat with Midshipman Luffborough; his body was found near the mouth of the river, shot through the heart. At 4 P. M. discovered a man at the mouth of the river on a sand bar, sent a boat and brought him on board; he proved to be John Lopaz, ordinary seaman, the only survivor of the boat's crew sent with Midshipman Luffborough. He reports that, on entering the river, they discovered a negro on the beach near a plantation; that Mr Luffborough ordered the boat to be pulled directly for him; that on touching the shore he spoke to the negro, and directly received a volley of musketry from two divisions of negroes and Indians, who lay concealed in the bushes on the margin of the river; Mr. Luffborough, Robert Maitland, and John Burgess were killed on the spot; Lopaz made his escape by swimming, and states that he saw the other seaman, Edward Daniels, made prisoner. Lopaz supposed there must have been forty negroes and Indians concerned in the capture of the boat.

On the 20th July, I received, by a canoe with five Indians, despatches from Colonel Clinch, advising that he had arrived with a party of troops and Indians at a position about a mile above the negro fort, requesting that I would ascend the river and join him with the gun-vessels. He further informed me that he had taken a negro bearing the scalp of one of my unfortunate crew to one of the unfriendly Indian chiefs. On the 22d, there was a heavy cannonading in the direction of the fort. On the 23d, I received a verbal message from Colonel Clinch, by a white man and two Indians, who stated that Colonel Clinch wished me to ascend the river to a certain bluff, and wait there until I saw him. Considering that, by so doing, in a narrow and crooked river, from both sides of which my decks could be commanded, and exposed to the fire of musketry, without enabling me to act in my own defence, and also that something like treachery might be on foot, from the nature of the message, I declined acting, retained the white man and one of the Indians as hostages, and despatched the other, with my reason for so doing, to Colonel Clinch, stating that his views and communications to me in future must be made in writing, and by an officer of the army.

Lieutenant Wilson and thirteen men joined me on the 24th to assist in getting up with the transports; he likewise informed me that Colonel Clinch had sent the canoe the day before.

On the 25th, I arrived with the convoy at Dueling bluff, about four miles below the fort, where I was met by Colonel Clinch; he informed me that, in attempting to pass within gunshot of the fortifications, he had been fired upon by the negroes, and that he had also been fired upon for the last four or five days, whenever any of his troops appeared in view. We immediately reconnoitred the fort, and determined on a site to erect a small battery of two eighteen-pounders to assist the gun-vessels to force the navigation of the river, as it was evident from their hostility we should be obliged to do.

On the 26th, the colonel began to clear away the brushwood for the erection of the battery; he, however, stated to me that he was not acquainted with artillery, but that he thought the distance was too great to do execution. On this subject we unfortunately differed totally in opinion, as we were within point-blank range; he, however, ordered his men to desist from further operations; I then told him that the gun-vessels would attempt the passage of the fort in the morning, without his aid. At 4 A. M., on the morning of the 27th, we began warping the gun-vessels to a proper position; at 5, getting within gunshot, the fort opened upon us, which we returned, and, after ascertaining our real distance with cold shot, we commenced with hot, (having cleared away our coppers for that purpose,) the first one of which, entering their magazine, blew up and completely destroyed the fort. The negroes fought under the English jack, accompanied with the red or bloody flag.

This was a regularly constructed fortification, built under the immediate eye and direction of Colonel Nicholls, of the British army; there were mounted on the walls, and in a complete state of equipment for service, four long twenty-four-pounder cannon; four long six-pounder cannon; one four-pounder field-piece, and a five and a half inch brass howitzer, with three hundred negroes, men, women, and children, and about twenty Indian warriors of the renegado Choctaws; of these, two hundred and seventy were killed, and the greater part of the rest mortally wounded, but three escaped unhurt; among the prisoners were the two chiefs of the negroes and Indians. On examining the prisoners, they stated that Edward Daniels, ordinary seaman, who was made prisoner in the boat on the 17th July, was tarred and burnt alive. In consequence of this savage act, both the chiefs were executed on the spot by the friendly Indians.

From the best information we could ascertain, there were 2,500 stands of musketry, with accoutrements complete; 500 carbines; 500 steel scabbard swords; 4 cases, containing two hundred pairs pistols; 300 quarter casks rifle powder; 762 barrels of cannon powder, besides a large quantity of military stores and clothing that I was not able to collect any account of, owing to an engagement made by Colonel Clinch with the Indians, in which he promised them all the property captured, except the cannon and shot.

The property captured on the 27th July, according to the best information we could obtain, and at the lowest calculation, could not have been less than $200,000 in value; the remnant of the property, that the Indians did not take, was transported to Fort Crawford and to this place, an inventory of which I have the honor to transmit for your further information.

On sounding the river, I found it impassable for vessels drawing more than four and a half feet water; consequently, Colonel Clinch took the provisions from the General Pike into flats, and lightened the Semilante, so as to enable her to ascend the river as high as Fort Crawford. On the 3d August, after setting fire to the remaining parts of the fort and village, I left the river and arrived at this anchorage on the 12th current.

I cannot close this letter without expressing to you my entire approbation of the conduct of Sailingmaster James Bassett, commanding gun-vessel No. 154, for his cool, deliberate, and masterly conduct, and the support I received from him in all cases of difficulty and danger. In fact, sir, every man and officer did his duty.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. LOOMIS.

Commodore DANIEL T. PATTERSON,
Commanding United States naval forces, New Orleans station.

No. 24.

Commodore Patterson to the Secretary of the Navy.

SIR: NEW ORLEANS, August 15, 1816.

It is with great satisfaction I do myself the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the report of operations of two gun-vessels, under the command of Sailingmaster Jairus Loomis, despatched at the request of Major General Gaines, commanding the United States army in the Creek nation, to convoy two transports, laden with ordnance stores and provisions, up the rivers Appalachicola and Chatahoochee, to Fort Crawford, for the use of the army; as also copies of the major general's letter to me, and of my instructions to Mr. Loomis.

You will perceive by Mr. Loomis's statement that the unprovoked and wanton aggression committed by a party of negroes on his boats, as also their hostile disposition and conduct to the army and the gun-vessels, and their approaching the fort, evinced in the strongest manner their intention to dispute his passage past their fort, and rendered it necessary to silence their fire and capture the fort. The very able manner and short time in which this was so effectually accomplished, with a force so very inferior, reflects the greatest credit upon Mr. Loomis and the officers and men under his command, the ninth shot and first hot one producing the explosion; and unless the fort had surrendered or been destroyed, it would have been impossible for the army to have received those supplies, of which they stood so much in need, and without which their operations against the hostile Indians must necessarily have been materially retarded, if not totally suspended; and it was from the very great importance, as detailed by General Gaines, that those stores and provisions should reach the army in safety, that I felt it a duty incumbent upon me, when thus called upon, to afford the requisite convoy for their protection.

The service rendered by the destruction of this fort, and the band of negroes who held it, and the country in its vicinity, is of great and manifest importance to the United States, and particularly those States bordering on the Creek nation, as it had become the general rendezvous for runaway slaves and disaffected Indians; an asylum where they were assured of being received; a stronghold where they found arms and ammunition to protect themselves against their owners and the Government. This hold being destroyed, they have no longer a place to fly to, and will not be so liable to abscond. The able manner in which this enterprise was conducted cannot but impress the hostile Indians also with a dread of our arms, and increase the confidence of those who are friendly; add to which, that the force of the negroes was daily increasing; and they felt themselves so strong and secure that they had commenced several plantations on the fertile banks of the Appalachicola, which would have yielded them every article of sustenance, and which would, consequently, in a short time have rendered their establishment quite formidable and highly injurious to the neighboring States.

The English union jack and red or bloody flags, under which they committed their unprovoked hostilities against the American flag, are in my possession, and I shall have the satisfaction of forwarding them to the Department by the first safe conveyance. It appears very extraordinary, and remains with the English Government to explain the authority for their flag being thus hoisted by a band of outlaws, as also their officer, Colonel Nicholls, having placed so strong a work, and with so large a supply of arms, (most of which were perfectly new and in their cases,) ammunition, and every other implement requisite to enable the negroes and Indians to prosecute offensive operations against the United States—in possession of negroes, too, known to be runaways from the United States; and that, too, some time after peace had taken place.

Herewith is transmitted a copy of the inventory of the articles saved from the explosion, designating those furnished the army for public use, and those brought off and deposited here.

I regret extremely the loss of Mr. Luffborough, killed in the service, who, though much indisposed, and having sent in his resignation to the Department, very handsomely volunteered his services and accompanied the expedition. Mr. Loomis reports his conduct in the highest terms of approbation.

I avail myself of this occasion, with great satisfaction, to recommend to the particular notice of the Department Sailingmasters Jairus Loomis and James Bassett, commanding the gun-boats on this expedition, as highly meritorious officers.

I cannot but lament exceedingly the great loss of lives occasioned by the destruction of the fort, though caused by their opposition to a passage of the river, and hostilities most wickedly commenced upon a friendly flag, under which not the slightest aggression would have been offered them.

The course pursued in this service, and the result, will, I trust, meet the approbation of the President of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

DANIEL T. PATTERSON.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: ST. AUGUSTINE, EAST FLORIDA, February 18, 1815.

The support and protection which the subaltern officers of the troops under your command now on Cumberland island afford to the runaway slaves of this province under my charge, inviting them to desert their masters and enlist as soldiers, with the tempting promise of the liberty which they will enjoy when once they are transported to His Britannic Majesty's colonies, have filled with consternation the peaceable inhabitants, subjects of His Catholic Majesty; to which may be added the aggravation offered them by the manner in which the restoration has been eluded, as to answer the claim which their masters make personally, by saying that they might take those that would accompany them voluntarily, is the same thing as to refuse their restoration; for where is the slave that will voluntarily return to slavery if left to his election? For my part, even if there did not exist that good understanding, concord, and friendship betwixt our respective nations, I should feel very averse to suppose that the British Government, generous England, would tolerate in its subjects the spoliation of this property, belonging to the pacific, industrious, and defenceless planter, not only of a friendly Power, but (excepting in certain cases) I conceive they would not permit it towards an enemy. I pronounce it as undeniable that this laudable maxim has ever been so religiously observed by civilized and enlightened people, that until now it has always been considered as an inviolable principle of the laws of nations.

This abuse or disorder, most excellent sir, from its important nature, demands from your excellency the most prompt and efficacious remedy in your power, in order to do away those appearances of hostility which such unusual proceedings manifest, as well as to avoid the consequences which must result from them, and which, for my part, I shall endeavor to obviate by every means in my power; requesting your excellency again to order the restoration, without restriction, of the aforesaid Spanish property, which I now demand of you, officially, for the second time.

Permit me to offer to your excellency, personally, my sentiments of high consideration, whose life I pray God to preserve many years.

SOB. KINDELAN.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR: FORT GADSDEN, March 25, 1818.

I have ordered a supply of provisions to be sent from New Orleans, via Pensacola, to Fort Crawford, on the Conecuh. This route has been adopted as the most speedy one of provisioning one of my garrisons, which must be maintained during the present contest against our mutual enemies, the Seminole Indians; and I cannot but express a hope that no attempt will be made to interrupt the free passage of my transports to that post. I am not disposed to enter into any controversy with you on the right which our Government may claim to the free navigation of such watercourses as head within her limits, but flow through the territory of His Catholic Majesty; preferring to leave these subjects to be settled by those legally authorized. But as it is necessary for me to make use of the Escambia river in passing up provisions to the garrison at Fort Crawford, I wish to be distinctly understood that any attempt to interrupt the passage of my transports cannot be received in any other light than as a hostile act on your part. I will not permit myself for a moment to believe that you would commit an act so contrary to the interests of the King, your master. His Catholic Majesty, as well as the United States, are alike interested in chastising a savage foe, who have too long warred with impunity against his subjects as well as the citizens of this republic; and I feel persuaded that every aid which you can give to promote this object will be cheerfully tendered.

I am, with sentiments of respect, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General commanding.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: PENSACOLA, April 15, 1818.

Your excellency's letter of the 25th of last month has been delivered to me; also that of the 16th, in answer to mine of the 16th of February preceding. I now have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of both, and to reply to the former.

In the month of May last, yielding to a spirit of conciliation, I gave permission to the schooner Victory from New Orleans to pass up the Escambia to the American fort with a cargo of provisions: prompted by the same sentiment, I gave a similar permission in January last to Captain Call, of the schooner Italiana, to proceed to the same place; and, subsequently, pursuing the same friendly and conciliatory feelings, I allowed Lieutenant Eddy, belonging to the garrison of the fort above alluded to, who had been commissioned for that purpose by Major Youngs, the commandant, to supply himself here with sixty barrels of provisions. The cargo of the schooner Italiana being still deposited here, I conceive that the introduction of the further supply requested by your excellency is not necessary at present. Notwithstanding this, as I infer from your excellency's letter that the said provisions are now on the way, and am disposed to grant the same indulgence as heretofore, while it is not less my duty to enforce the established regulations and restrictions which require that the supplies should be consigned to a Spanish trading house, which will undertake to forward them and secure the payment of the royal import and export duties, I will give permission for them to pass in like manner as the first; it being, however, well understood that neither now nor hereafter the United States can pretend to or acquire any right in consequence of these indulgences, which are perfectly gratuitous, and granted solely in consequence of existing circumstances, which, as your excellency states to me, prevent the arrival of supplies to the said Fort Crawford through any other channel.

In addition, you are pleased to remark that you are not disposed to enter into any discussion with me on the subject of the right which may be claimed by the United States to the free navigation of the Escambia. To a discussion of this nature I am no less averse than your excellency; because it is one not within my province, and because it is my duty, as a subordinate officer, to conform to the orders of my superior; therefore, until I receive orders to the contrary, I am bound, in reference to this point, strictly to adhere to the existing treaties between the United States and Spain. On referring to the last treaty of amity, limits, and navigation, I perceive nothing that stipulates the free navigation of the river alluded to; but, on the contrary, that the sovereignty of the King, my master, in and over all the territories, coasts, rivers, posts, and bays situate to the south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude is solemnly and explicitly acknowledged by the United States; and if, in consideration of the present extraordinary circumstances, further momentary concessions are required, I request your excellency to have the goodness to apply for that purpose in future to the authority on whom they may depend, as I am wholly unauthorized in this matter.

God preserve you many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

No. 30.

General Jackson to Governor Mazot.

SIR: HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, ST. MARK'S, April 27, 1818.

After I left this post for St. Juan, to disperse and destroy the mutual enemy of Spain and the United States, a small schooner with men and supplies arrived from Pensacola, and was taken possession of and detained by my officer left in command. This vessel has been liberated, with all her effects, excepting some clothing of the United States, (unaccompanied with any invoice,) and which has been detained as supposed to be a part of that taken in the boat, within the territory of this republic, in which Lieutenant Scott, of the United States army, with his command, was so inhumanly massacred.

I regret being compelled to state to you that, from the papers and other proofs taken at St. Juan, the quantity of American cattle found at St. Mark's, and purchased by me from the commissary of the post, and the intercourse kept up between this post and the hostile Indians, there is too much ground to believe that the Indians have been encouraged, aided, and abetted by the officers of Spain in this cruel war against the United States. Proof positive exists that the Indians were supplied with ammunition by the late commandant of St. Mark's. The United States' clothing being found on board of a vessel in the employ of the Government of Spain, sailing from Pensacola direct for this post, compels me to call on you for a statement in what manner you came possessed of said clothing.

The good understanding that so happily exists between His Catholic Majesty and the United States formed a just ground to believe that his agents would have discountenanced this cruel and savage war, waged against the citizens of this republic. Too weak to comply with her treaties with the United States, or chastise her own savage subjects waging war against a friendly nation, it was scarcely to be believed that her officers would have been detected in aiding and abetting this enemy, assisting him with intelligence of our movements, and purchasing of him the property depredated of us. America, just to her treaties, and anxious to maintain peace with the world, cannot and will not permit such a savage war to be carried on in disguise any longer.

Asylums have been granted to the persons and property of our Indian foe, (fugitives from the territory of the United States.) Facilities deemed by me necessary to terminate a war, which, under existing treaties, should have been maintained by Spain, for feeding my troops, and liberating the subjects of Spain imprisoned by the Indians, have all been denied by the officers of His Catholic Majesty. All these facts prove the unjust conduct of Spanish agents in the Floridas. It cannot be longer tolerated; and, although a republic fond of peace, the United States know their rights, and at the expense of war will maintain them.

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General commanding.

SIR: PENSACOLA, April 27, 1818.

Your letters of the 27th instant, dated Camp on the Escambia and Fort Crawford, enclosing a proclamation, were this day delivered to me at 3 o'clock P. M. by an artificer, a man of color, whose immediate return does not allow me at present to reply particularly to them; and I shall only state that the few peaceful Indians who were at this place, and in its neighborhood, left it on the 26th, and at daybreak several of them were murdered by the troops of the United States, and among them some women and children. As I am unable to account for this act, and the violation resulting from it, I have to inform you that I shall transmit an account of the whole transaction to my superior, and I hope that, in the mean time, you will not permit any further hostilities to be committed, on any pretence, in this territory; and, in case the Indians give any reason for complaint, that you will inform me of it, that I may chastise them for it, as far as it depends on my authority.

If there be Indians still remaining in this territory, I will have them sought for, and communicate your letter to them, and advise you of the result. I do assure you, on my word, that your statement of the aggressions committed by the Indians is the first intelligence I have had of it, and that when I agreed to the passage of the escort of which you speak, those Indians of whom Lieutenant Eddy was apprehensive were the only ones pointed out to me.

I must repeat to you that all my wishes and efforts are directed to preserve the peace happily subsisting between our Governments; and, relying on your friendly sentiments towards me, I offer you, in return, the assurances of mine.

God preserve you many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

Governor Mazot to Major Youngs.

SIR: PENSACOLA, April 30, 1818.

In consequence of the request contained in your letter of the 27th instant, I assembled the principal chiefs of the Upper Creek towns of Colome, Canaan, Corvale, and Forsytche, and communicated its contents to them. They all replied that they had long been very unhappy and miserable, without shelter or country; but that at last, by the advice of a good friend, they had found one; that they all cheerfully adopted it, and were very grateful for the offers you had made them. These Indians amount to about eighty-seven, including women and children. I have settled that they should divide into two companies, and they will set out as soon as your answer is received, which they think it prudent to keep, as you will, when informed of their acceptance of your offer, be enabled to give proper orders for their safety on their journey, and their avoiding any unpleasant rencontre with the Choctaws, who, if not duly informed of it, might attack them; in which case, the measures taken for the peaceful arrangements that we both have so much at heart would be defeated.

Opahi-hola, an Alabamian chief, on account of his age and infirmities, will remain here, for the present, with his family. I have given orders for his relief, and pledge myself for his good behavior.

You will always find me ready to unite with you in such measures as may be beneficial to our respective countries, and are conformable to existing treaties.

I renew the assurances of my respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: PENSACOLA, May 18, 1818.

On the 10th instant I received your letter of the 27th of April last, informing me that on board a small schooner, despatched from this port for Appalache, there were found several articles of clothing, such as is used by the United States troops, and which you suppose were taken in the boat in which Lieutenant Eddy was unfortunately cut off, together with his escort. You inquire of me how I came possessed of those articles of clothing; and you proceed to state that you regret the necessity which compels you to inform me that, from written and other proofs obtained at St. John's, the quantity of American cattle found at St. Mark's, and the active communication kept up between the latter place and the hostile Indians, there appear sufficient grounds to believe that they were encouraged and excited to this savage warfare against the United States by the Spanish officers. You add, that there exist positive proofs that the Indians were supplied with ammunition by the late commandant of St. Mark's; and you conclude by declaring that shelter and protection have been given at this place to the persons and property of the Indians who are in hostility with the United States, and have fled from the American territory; that these facts, and the refusal to allow the passage of provisions for the supply of your troops, fully evince the unjust conduct of the Spanish agents in the Floridas. To these several charges I shall reply in their order, frankly, unreservedly, and unequivocally. The first relates to the articles of clothing found on board the schooner Maria, and detained on the presumption of their being the property of the United States. A part of these, as is proved by the copy No. 1, was purchased at New Orleans in May last, a part came from Havana, and part was bought here; all which being fully substantiated, the charge is consequently disproved, and your inquiry satisfactorily answered. The second is more serious, and refers to the conduct of the commandant of St. Mark's at a recent period. I immediately demanded of him an account of his proceedings, his report of which is enclosed under the No. 2. But as I am desirous that you would bring forward unquestionable proof of the malconduct of that officer, I have to request you to furnish me with it, in order that, if his misconduct be established, he may receive condign punishment; hereby assuring your excellency, with that sincerity which belongs to me, that, in such event, he has acted entirely contrary to his instructions, and that, on receiving the evidence required, he shall be tried by a court-martial, and punished in an exemplary manner, according to the merits of the case. Your sense of equity will, however, satisfy you that the Spanish Government cannot be held responsible for the misconduct of its agents, while it does not support them in it, nor tolerate their errors when proved.

Your subsequent complaints are directed personally and pointedly against me, and relate to the shelter and protection alleged to have been afforded to the persons and property of fugitive Indians, and to the passage of provisions up the Escambia. The best mode of giving a satisfactory answer to these charges will be to offer you a brief and faithful statement of facts. With respect to the Indians, you have assuredly not been correctly informed; for, although some few remained permanently here, chiefly consisting of women and children employed in supplying the inhabitants with fish, fuel, and other trifling articles, and had been living here long before the present war with the Seminoles, it is a fact, that when I sent round to assemble them for the purpose of communicating to them the proposal of Major Youngs, their whole number amounted to but eighty-seven; and surely the small proportion of men among them, unarmed, miserable, and defenceless, could not be considered as objects of hostility to the United States—a proof of which was shown in the continual passage of American citizens to this place, travelling unarmed and alone, without a single instance of accident happening either to their persons or property. In regard to the passage of provisions up the Escambia, so far from suspending it, I facilitated it as far as depended on me, even to committing myself; since, as a subordinate officer, I could not becomingly allow a proceeding which was not fully authorized. I therefore, in consideration of circumstances, took that responsibility upon myself, as I stated to your excellency in my letter of the 15th ultimo by Major Perrault, to which I beg your reference. But with a view to the benefit of this place, by means of a free intercourse with the interior, I hereby declare that, in future, the merchants and traders belonging to it shall pass freely from hence to Fort Crawford, and other places on the frontier, and transport all necessary supplies, either by land or water; by which means it is to be expected they will be abundantly provided, and your excellency entirely satisfied.

In offering you these explanations and details, I flatter myself I have given so full and satisfactory an answer to your excellency's letter, as to leave no doubt of the sincerity of my intentions, and, at the same time, to have presented a certain pledge that it is my earnest wish to contribute, by every means in my power, to the maintenance of the good understanding happily subsisting between our two Governments.

God preserve you many years.

PENSACOLA, May 18, 1818.

Having observed, among other things, what is stated to you by Major General Andrew Jackson, of the United States troops, in his note of the 27th of April last, and communicated to me in yours of the 13th instant, in which you request me to inform you of what description the articles referred to by the said general were, also by whom the coats worn by the men belonging to the gray and brown companies (de pardos y morenos) from the Havana, under my command, were sold or brought to this place, they being the same uniform as that worn by the troops of the United States, I have to inform you, in reply, that with respect to the articles of clothing shipped on board the schooner Maria, for the supply of a detachment from the aforesaid companies at Appalache, and detained by General Jackson, they consisted of fifteen four-point woollen blankets, and were brought here in His Majesty's schooner brigantine "El Almirante," arrived in this port 2d January last; twenty-five pairs of French shoes, bought here of Don Henrique Grandpré, as per exhibit No. 1, annexed; fifteen common negro hats, bought of Don Henrique Michelet, per exhibit No. 2; and twenty shirts of Crea linen, and the same number of pantaloons, received by the above-named armed vessel, with the exception of three or four of the latter articles, which were made in North America for the use of their troops, and came into my possession in the manner I shall presently explain to you. All which clothing I requested you, in mine of the 7th April, to be pleased to direct the proper department to have inserted in the clearance, as being for its account and risk. By the voucher annexed, (No. 3,) you will perceive, that on the 1st and 4th of May last, and 29th of July, there were shipped to me by Don Pedro Dalharte y Clareria, merchant of New Orleans, the hundred and thirty-one coats of the uniform reformed there, according to his letter of advice; also, twenty-eight pairs of shoes, twenty Russia sheeting waistcoats, two hundred and fifty-three leathern caps for the use of the chasseurs, and a quantity of half boots and leather stocks; all which articles were purchased from the military storekeeper at New Orleans, and brought here in the schooners Maria and Jalousie, under the charge of their skippers, Bartelome Alberty and José Medina, who included them in the manifests they exhibited on their arrival, and the duties on them were secured, as appears by their appraisement by the proper officers on the 19th May and 11th August last. Hence, it is evident that the conjecture formed by General Jackson that the articles of clothing detained by him were part of those captured from the escort of Lieutenant Scott, at the time he was cut off within the limits of the territory of the republic, is entirely disproved; inasmuch as the unfortunate accident of that officer and his escort happened on the Appalachicola in December last, and the articles of clothing alluded to were purchased in New Orleans in May and July preceding, as is fully proved by the letters of advice and invoices comprised in exhibit No. 3, to which I have referred above.

God preserve you many years.

BENIGNO GARCIA CALDERON.

To Jose Mazot.

(No. 1.)

I hereby certify that, on the 10th of February last, I sold to Captain Don Benigno Garcia Calderon, commanding the gray and brown companies from Havana, two hundred and eighteen pairs of French shoes, iron shod, for the use of the men belonging to the said companies; and, at the request of the said officer, I have delivered him the present certificate, dated at Pensacola, this 18th day of May, 1818.

(No. 2.)

I hereby certify that, on the 12th of February last, I sold to Captain Don Benigno Garcia Calderon, commanding the gray and brown companies from the Havana, nine dozen round negro hats, for the use of the men belonging to the said companies; and, at the request of the said officer, I have delivered him the present certificate, dated at Pensacola, this 18th day of May, 1818.

HENRIQUE MICHELET.

To Don Benigno Garcia Calderon, Pensacola: New Orleans, April 30, 1817.

Enclosed you have an account of the cost and charges of fifty-four shirts and twenty-eight pairs of shoes, for amount whereof you are debited in account fifty-three dollars. Although I had no orders from you for the shirts, I was induced to purchase them by the low prices and the probability of your employing them to advantage. In the sack they are put up in, you will find a uniform coat which has been reformed here, and can be set by the storekeeper at twelve rials. I think it would answer. There are one hundred and twenty of them. I am offered by the same storekeeper fifty field-tents, nearly new, at three dollars; and a parcel of strong leathern caps, such as are worn by the chasseurs, that can be set at less than two rials, of which there are about two hundred. The storekeeper having made me a second offer of the shirts, I proposed to take them in barter for coffee at ten or eight and a half; even at ten I am persuaded it would be a good bargain, as it would give the opportunity of putting off the coffee, its inferior quality making it rather dull sale. The quality most called for is the green, which is much superior, and that hardly commands twenty dollars. The cost and charges of the said shipment of shirts, by schooner Maria, are carried to your debit in account current, viz. $176 13.

Account of costs and charges of sundries shipped on board the schooner Maria, Captain Alberty, for account and risk of, and to be delivered to, Don Benigno Garcia de Calderon, Pensacola, viz:

Pensacola, May 14, 1818.

In replying to your letter of yesterday's date, in which, among other things connected with its subject, you communicate to me the several points treated of by Major General Jackson in his letter of the 27th ultimo, and on which he founds his assertion that the Indians not only received succors at Appalache, but that they were excited to commit hostilities against the forces of the United States, and of whose movements they were exactly informed, I have to express my utter astonishment at this business, in which imposture and malevolence have been equally employed to criminate the parties alluded to in the general's letter. It is stated by the general, that, from written and other proofs obtained at St. John's, the number of American cattle found at St. Mark's, and bought by the commissary there, and the constant intercourse kept up between that place and the hostile Indians, there appear sufficient grounds to believe that they were encouraged and excited to this savage warfare by the Spaniards. To this I have to reply that it has never come to my knowledge that any person belonging to the fort had any connexion, directly or indirectly, with St. John's. And although it is true I wrote two letters to Mr. Arbuthnot, an English merchant, one of them was merely to thank him for the three letters he wrote me, informing me of the proceedings of the insurgents at Amelia island, and of Captain Woodbine, who, I informed you by express, was one of the two chiefs who were hung the day I left Appalache; and the purport of the other was to request him to come or send immediately for the property, which, at the request of the Indian chiefs, and to avoid increasing their suspicions, I gave permission to be deposited in the fort, and to withdraw O-Kelagne, in whose custody that property was placed. And although, in taking this step, I ran the risk of incurring the resentment of both parties, yet it was one which did not seem likely to incur suspicion. Nor does the charge of a purchase of an extraordinary number of American cattle, alleged to have been made at St. Mark's, authorize greater room for suspicion, since it is notorious that, from the time of its establishment, its supplies were obtained from the drovers of cattle brought there for sale by the Indians, who had very large ones towards Mickasuky and the neighboring country. It seldom happened that we considered ourselves as fully supplied for several months together; and if the supplies were in fact derived from the plunder committed on the Americans, the sellers took good care to conceal that fact, as they were known to have droves, and were in the habit of bringing them for sale. It may be remarked that very little care was manifested by the American commandant or magistrate within whose district these excesses were committed, to be placed in a situation to complain of them to the commandant of St. Mark's, and to send him the marks of the cattle, which would have shown from whence they came, and have tended to prevent the purchase of them. With respect to the intercourse kept up between the fort and the Indians, complained of by General Jackson, and the excitement and encouragement given them by the Spaniards to commit hostilities, the charge is altogether inadmissible. An intercourse and good understanding with the Indians were at all times strongly recommended by the Government, and never were they more necessary than in the circumstances in which we have lately been placed at the fort; General Jackson having founded on them a demand of its occupation by his troops, and suggesting that such a step could not fail to receive the approbation of His Catholic Majesty. In the same letter, he stated that he had been informed by an Indian woman, a prisoner, that the hostile Indians and negroes had received considerable supplies of ammunition at the fort. I presumed that I had convinced him of the contrary in my answer, in which I represented to him that no one better than Mr. William Hambly, who, during his stay here, repeatedly interpreted to me the anxiety of the chiefs to obtain such supplies, could undeceive him on this point, as well as on that of the counsel I uniformly gave them to avoid the destruction that awaited them, and which I foresaw from the first. But it appears he is not yet satisfied, and persists in his charge. A reference to the returns of the public storekeeper will show that, from the month of May last, and prior to the receipt of your orders, there had been issued to a few of the most noted chiefs, and that merely from motives of policy, only three pounds of powder, three pounds of ball, and fourteen flints. The interpreter, Juan Sandoval, and his son, Francisco, through whom I communicated with the Indians, can testify to the truth of this statement—a step which I request of you to take in support of my refutation of General Jackson's charge. He cannot but know that a short time before the negro fort on the Appalachicola was blown up, all the chiefs of the neighboring tribes went there and supplied themselves with powder and ball, left for them by the English; and that at Mickasuky, and the huts thereabouts, there was a considerable quantity. Having thus obtained a large supply of the kind of powder and ball they most esteemed, they set little value on ours, which, in fact, they view with such indifference that it is only a chance hunter among those who come to the fort with venison, wild fowl, &c. that is willing to use it. And although, as I formerly stated in an official communication, a supply was repeatedly demanded of me by the chief Kinache, with a view to prove, by the refusal of it, that the American interest prevailed in the fort, he did not succeed in it. In consequence, we, whom they considered as American partisans to the last, were reproached with it, and have even to put up with some impertinences from them. I shall, however, in a strict adherence to truth, and because the circumstance may have given birth to these suspicions, proceed to state that the chief Pelisacho, who was executed, received, among other things, at the fort, from Mr. Arbuthnot, an English merchant, when he came from Suwanee, to request aid against the negroes, from whom he apprehended an attack, a small barrel of powder, which might contain from twenty to twenty-five pounds, and was placed, with other property, under the charge of O-Kelagne. What he did with it, I know not; but I well know that the chief caused me extreme perplexity and vexation, by surrounding the fort with a body of four or five hundred Indians.

I never had an idea that he employed it against the Americans, but that he used it in the purchase of peltry, which he was collecting for the said Arbuthnot at the time of the arrival of the Americans. The charge alleged against the officers at St. Mark's in exciting and stirring up the Indians, and in giving them information of the movements of the Americans, is the effect of a disordered imagination; for how or whence could their movements be better known at the fort than from the Indians themselves? Thither they came and went, and passed and repassed incessantly; and their reports were so various that they deserved very little attention; as a proof of which, nothing certain was known of their operations until the different columns of their troops appeared at the mouth of the Pinar; and, although three of their boats were at anchor there for three or four days, they kept English colors flying until the day before the arrival of the army. My different communications to you are pledges that I took no part in the contest between the Americans and the Indians. I, however, had great cause of complaint against the latter. How, then, is it possible to believe that I gave them that aid of which General Jackson complains? or how can the steps I took to liberate Messrs. Edmund Doyle and William Hambly, by which I exposed myself and my garrison to the vengeance of the Indians, be reconciled with the idea of affording them succor and aid, or the fact of rescuing from them, at the most critical moment, an American soldier whom they would otherwise have put to death? I leave it to impartial observers to decide if these be not proofs of the existence at St. Mark's of a bias in favor of the American interest; and of this I trust General Jackson will be thoroughly convinced on deliberately reflecting upon the subject. I shall not attempt to deny that I have observed towards those barbarians a policy which had the appearance of a warm friendship, but by which I have incurred a considerable expense. If, however, my situation be attentively examined in its different points of view, it will be seen that all this was necessary to restrain them from doing what they had at one time premeditated, on the pretext I have just alluded to, and on others suggested to them by some persons who had gone from hence to those parts of the country. Although I have, as I conceive, given entire satisfaction on all the points embraced by Major General Jackson, I beg leave to request that, for the purpose of corroborating my statement, you will be pleased to give orders for having the declarations taken of the interpreter and of his son, of the subaltern Don Miguel Ordonez, of Don Anastasio Montes de Oca, the public storekeeper, and of surgeon Don Diego de Barrios, as the persons who have the necessary knowledge of the subjects in question.

God preserve you many years.

Governor Mazot to General Jackson.

Pensacola, May 23, 1818.

Having received information that you have passed the frontiers with the troops under your command, and are now within the territory of this province of West Florida, which is under my government, I have solemnly to protest against this proceeding as an offence against my sovereign; and I do exhort you, and require of you, forthwith to withdraw from the same; in default of which, and in case of a continuance of your aggression, I shall repel force by force.

In this event, the consequences will doubtless be the effusion of blood, and the interruption of the good understanding which has hitherto subsisted between our two nations; but as the party repelling an insult is never deemed the aggressor, you will be responsible before God and men for all the fatal consequences which may ensue.

God preserve you many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

No. 34.

General Jackson to Governor Mazot.

Sir: On the line of march, May 23, 1818.

The southern frontier of the United States has, for more than twelve months, been exposed to all the horrors of a cruel and savage war. A party of outlaws and refugees from the Creek nation; negroes who have fled from their masters, citizens of the United States, and sought an asylum in Florida; and the Seminole Indians inhabiting the territory of Spain, all uniting, have raised the tomahawk, and, in the character of savage warfare, have neither regarded sex nor age. Helpless women have been massacred, and the cradle crimsoned with the blood of innocence.

The United States, true to their own engagements, and confiding in the faith of Spain to enforce existing treaties, never entertained a doubt but that these atrocities would early attract the attention of the Spanish Government, and that speedy and effectual measures would have been adopted for their suppression. Under this persuasion, a cordon of military posts was established to give immediate protection to such of our frontier settlers as were peculiarly exposed, and strict injunctions issued to the American officers to respect the territory of Spain, and not to attempt operations within its limits. These instructions were most scrupulously observed; and, notwithstanding the inactivity of the American troops had encouraged the Indians to the more daring and outrageous acts of violence against our citizens, the Government of the United States was still disposed to respect the territory of Spain, and confide in the ability of the Spanish Government to execute existing treaties, until advised through you that, with every disposition, the Spanish authorities had not the power of controlling the Indians in Florida; that their acts of late were viewed as equally hostile to the interests of Spain as those of the United States; that Spanish subjects were not exempted from the evils of which we complained; and that the negro establishments on the Appalachicola and St. Juan rivers were founded by British agents, contrary to the will of Spain. These representations determined the President of the United States to adopt effectual measures to restore tranquillity to the southern frontier of the American republic; and, pursuant to his orders, justifiable by the immutable laws of self-defence, I have penetrated into Florida, reduced to ashes the Seminole villages, destroyed their magazines of provisions, beaten their warriors whenever they hazarded a contest, dispersed some, and expelled others across the river.

In the course of my operations, it became necessary to visit the Spanish fortress of St. Mark's. Entering the territory of Spain to fight her battles, to relieve from bondage her subjects, and to chastise an Indian tribe whom she acknowledged, under existing treaties, she was bound to preserve at peace with the United States, I had every reason to expect that the American army would have been received as friends, and every facility afforded to insure success to operations so interesting to both Governments.

My expectations have not been realized. It had been reported to me, direct from you, that Fort St. Mark's had been threatened by the Indians and negroes; and you expressed serious apprehensions, from the weakness of the garrison and defenceless state of the work, for its safety. From other sources to be relied on, the same information had been furnished me. It became necessary, therefore, to anticipate the movements of the enemy, and amicably to get possession of a work the dislodging the enemy from which might have cost me much precious blood. On entering St. Mark's, evidence of the duplicity and unfriendly feelings of the commandant evinced itself. I found that the gates of this fort had been thrown open to the avowed savage enemies of the United States; that councils of war had been permitted to be held within his own quarters by the chiefs and warriors; that the Spanish storehouses had been appropriated to the use and were then filled with goods belonging to the hostile party; that cattle knowingly plundered from the citizens of the United States had been contracted for and purchased by the officers of the garrison from the Spanish thieves; that foreign agents had free access within the walls of St. Mark's; and a Mr. Arbuthnot, condemned and executed as the instigator of this war, an inmate in the commandant's family.

From this fort was information afforded the enemy of the strength and movements of my army by the said Arbuthnot, the date of departure of express noted by the Spanish commissary, and ammunition, munitions of war, and all necessary supplies furnished.

On my return from my operations east, your letter was received, positively refusing to permit (unless exorbitant duties were paid) any provisions passing up to the American fort on the Escambia. Connected with this strong indication of your unfriendly disposition on your part, I have it, from the most unquestionable authority, that the city of Pensacola has, for some months past, been entirely under the control of Indians; that free ingress and egress are permitted to the avowed savage enemies of the United States; that supplies of ammunition, munitions of war, and provisions have been received by them from thence; that, on the 15th of April last, there were no less than five hundred Indians in Pensacola, many of them known to be hostile to the United States, and who had but lately escaped my pursuit. The late massacre of eighteen individuals on the federal road was committed by Indians direct from their return to Pensacola, who were received by you, and transported across the bay, to elude the pursuit of the American troops. The Americans returning, the savages were permitted to return. An Indian, wounded in pursuit by a party, for having killed a citizen of the United States, was openly, in the sight of many Americans, received by you, and every comfort administered. Such practice, if authorized by the King, would justify me in open hostilities. Disposed, however, to believe that it was one of the unauthorized acts of his agents, I deem it politic and necessary to occupy Pensacola and the Barrancas with an American garrison until the Spanish Government can be advised of the circumstance, and have force sufficient to maintain, and agents disposed to enforce, existing treaties.

This is the third time the American troops have been compelled to enter Pensacola from the same causes. Twice had the enemy been expelled, and the place left in quiet possession of those who had permitted the irregular occupancy. This time, it must be held until Spain has the power or will to maintain her neutrality. This is justifiable on the immutable principles of self-defence. The Government of the United States is bound to protect her citizens; but weak would be all her efforts, and ineffectual the best advised measures, if the Floridas are to be free to every enemy, and, on the pretext of policy or necessity, Spanish fortresses are to be opened to their use, and every aid and comfort afforded. I have been explicit, to preclude the necessity of a tedious negotiation. My resolution is fixed, and I have strength enough to enforce it. My army now occupies the old fort St. Michael, commanding Pensacola. If the town and Barrancas are peaceably surrendered, an inventory of all the property, ammunition, arms, &c. shall be taken by officers appointed by both parties, and the amount receipted for by me, to be accounted for by the American Government. The property of Spanish subjects shall be respected; their religion and laws guarantied to them; the civil government permitted to remain as now established, subject to the control of the military authority of the United States; the ingress and egress open to all individuals; commerce free to the subjects of Spain, as usual; and the military furnished with transportation to Cuba.

If the peaceable surrender be refused, I shall enter Pensacola by violence, and assume the government, until the transaction can be amicably adjusted by the two Governments. The military, in this case, must be treated as prisoners of war.

The proof supporting the accusation against your official station will justify this procedure.

In reply to your communication of the 22d instant, I have only to observe that the clothing detained will be a subject for future friendly settlement.

How far the Indians permitted to remain in the neighborhood of Pensacola were friendly disposed to the citizens of the United States, is tested by the late massacre committed by them on the Alabama. The Red Ground chiefs, Muldecoxy and Holmes, avowedly hostile to the United States, were but lately seen in Pensacola, and a body of Indians descried, a few days since, in the vicinity of the Barrancas, in presence of several Spanish officers. They have not delivered themselves up; and these Red Sticks, who have surrendered, were not advised to this measure by you, until intelligence of my movements had been received.

By a reference to my communications of the 25th March, you will see how far I have been the aggressor in the measure protested against.

You are there distinctly advised of the objects of my operations, and that every attempt on your part to succor the Indians, or to prevent the passage of my provisions in the Escambia, would be viewed in no other light than as hostile acts on your part.

You have done both, and exposed my troops to the severest privations by the detention occasioned in the exaction of duties on my provision vessels in Pensacola. You have, therefore, been the aggressor; and the blood which may be shed by a useless resistance on your part to my demand will rest on your head. Before God and man you will be responsible.

This will be handed to you by my aid-de-camp, Captain Gadsden, by whom an answer is expected.

ANDREW JACKSON, Maj. Gen. commanding.

Sir: Head-quarters, Division of the South, Pensacola, May 24, 1818.

The enclosed communication was forwarded to you by my aid-de-camp, Captain Gadsden, last evening; not finding you, however, in Pensacola, its delivery was delayed.

I have entered Pensacola to provision my troops. I have only to add, that an immediate compliance with my demand is expected. Resistance on your part would be a needless sacrifice of men.

Governor Mazot to General Jackson.

Most Excellent Sir: Fort St. Carlos of Barrancas, May 24, 1818.

Your two notes, dated the 23d and on this day, were delivered to me at ten o'clock this morning, by your aid-de-camp, Captain Gadsden. Having, in mine of the 18th instant, answered the former in a satisfactory manner, I shall only add that, as to what relates to the Indians, you have been much misinformed, the facts alluded to by you being for the most part unfounded; in proof of which, I have to state that the only two Indians who have been here since the peace negotiated by me, exclusive of the eighty-seven sent off to Major Youngs, are the two who are in the jail with three women and children; and, further, that long prior to your movements I had sent orders to Appalache, to prevent any succors being given to the Seminoles, and had also given public notice to the same effect in Pensacola, where those unfortunates had from time immemorial received regular supplies.

Your excellency is disposed to lay to my charge the blood which may be shed in consequence of my refusal to deliver up this province. A compliance with your demand would dishonor the close of my life and long military career; and I feel assured that, if placed in a similar situation, your conduct would be the same, from your natural desire to preserve unsullied your well-earned laurels.

Whatever motives may be assigned, no nation is authorized in violating the territory of another, before due representations have been made to its Government.

Your excellency has violated the Spanish territory at Appalache by seizing on that fort and hoisting your flag—a proceeding in complete hostility with the good understanding subsisting between our respective Governments.

On the 21st instant, by your excellency's orders, Don Pedro Philibert and other inhabitants were made prisoners on their parole of honor, and this day, before Captain Gadsden's arrival at Pensacola, your army advanced upon it, and made prisoner, on his parole of honor, Don Pedro de Alba, the interpreter, the same who translated your two letters above mentioned. These persons, and other military men, whose presence was important to the tranquillity of the place, have thus been seized in an unjustifiable manner.

These facts being established, I ask, who but your excellency will have to answer for the bloodshed which may ensue in consequence of the determination announced in your letter of taking possession of Pensacola and Barrancas? I protest before God and men that my conduct is blameless, and that my sincere wishes ever have been to maintain peace and amity between our respective nations. The sincerity of my intentions is founded upon the President's message of 25th March last to Congress; the tenor of which holds out assurances that no aggressions were to be expected from the troops of the United States. Unfortunately, however, their operations have violated the tranquillity and peace of the province.

I expect, from the generosity of your excellency, that you will leave the officers and troops of the garrison of Pensacola at perfect liberty; that your army, after receiving the necessary supplies, will evacuate the province as speedily as possible; and that you will not carry on a partial warfare against West Florida at a time when our two nations are in a state of profound peace.

Lieutenant Colonel Don Leni Piernas, provisional commandant of Pensacola, is duly authorized to represent me, and to receive any communications your excellency may be pleased to make. To all such the most prompt answers shall be given, through the ministry of the bearer, the interpreter, Don Pedro de Alba. In conclusion, if, contrary to my hopes, your excellency should persist in your intention to take possession of this fortress, I am resolved to repel force by force, and to defend it to the last extremity. He who resists aggression can never be deemed the aggressor. God preserve your excellency many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

His Excellency Major General Andrew Jackson,
Commanding the army of the United States.

General Jackson to Governor Mazot.

Sir: Head-quarters, Division of the South,
Pensacola, May 25, 1818.

The accusations against you are founded on the most unquestionable evidence. I have the certificate of individuals, who, on the 23d instant, at or near the Little Bayou, counted seventeen Indians in company of several Spanish officers. I have only to repeat that the Barrancas must be occupied by an American garrison, and again to tender you the terms offered, if amicably surrendered; resistance would be a wanton sacrifice of blood, for which you and your garrison will have to atone. You cannot expect to defend yourself successfully, and the first shot from your fort must draw down upon you the vengeance of an irritated soldiery. I am well advised of your strength, and cannot but remark on the inconsistency of presuming yourself capable of resisting an army which has conquered the Indian tribes, too strong, agreeably to your own acknowledgment, to be controlled by you. If the force which you are now disposed wantonly to sacrifice had been wielded against the Seminoles, the American troops had never entered the Floridas. I applaud your feeling as a soldier, in wishing to defend your post; but where resistance is ineffectual, and the opposing force overwhelming, the sacrifice of a few brave men is an act of wantonness, for which the commanding officer must be accountable to his God.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding Division of the South.

Certificates and declarations.

No. 37 a.

We certify that, being in Fort St. Mark's, Barrancas, on the 28th of May, 1818, in the afternoon, soon after the American troops took possession of the works, and as the Spanish troops were marching out, we saw an Indian carried out by some of the Spanish soldiers: he was laid on the beach, to be put on board a boat. He was wounded in his leg or thigh, and had every appearance of having been engaged in the defence of the fort.

I certify that, on the 23d of May, being in the bayou which enters Pensacola bay, one and a half mile from the town, I saw at the ferry, on the road to Barrancas, a number of Indians (I think about seventeen) in company with four Spanish officers. The officers were carried over, and the boat returned to ferry over the Indians. I saw one boatload landed on the side next the Barrancas. The Indians concealed themselves in the bushes on discovering us.

RICHARD BRICKHAM.

Witness: T. Cross, Lieutenant 1st Infantry.

I certify that I was in the boat with Brickham at the place and time mentioned in the above certificate; that I saw several Indians in company with four Spanish officers. The officers were ferried over with one Indian. I did not see the Indians ferried over; they concealed themselves on discovering us.

I certify that, between the 5th and 7th of May, 1818, whilst at Fort Gadsden, on the Appalachicola river, I was informed by a Mr. Larua and Benneto Gassea, both citizens of, and at that time direct from Pensacola, that at the time of their departure thence there were five hundred Indians in and about Pensacola; and I further certify that, on my arrival at Pensacola, on the 23d of May, I was informed by Mr. Skeate and other citizens of that place, that on the 22d, which was the day before my arrival, Holmes (a noted Red Stick) with his party had left Pensacola to proceed to the Choctawhatchy for safety, having been for several days previous in town. Province of West Florida, Town of Pensacola, September 18, 1818.

In pursuance with an order to me directed by Colonel William King, civil and military governor of said province, (a copy whereof is hereto annexed,) I caused to appear before me, at the quarters of Captain Hugh Young, of the army of the United States, in this town, the following persons, viz: Manuel Gonzales, Dr. Brosnaham, William Cooper, J. Dauphin, ——— Skeate, Felippa Prieto, Joachim Barrelas, P. Alba, jun., José Bonefi, (Marian,) and Charles Le Jeune, to answer, on oath, such interrogatories, not tending to criminate themselves, as might be propounded to them by Captain Young, relating to the intercourse which took place between the late Spanish authorities of this province and the hostile Indians during the recent war with the United States.

Joachim Barrelas, being duly sworn, declares that he has frequently seen parties of Indians in the town of Pensacola since the month of November, 1817; says that parties of Indians have been provisioned by the late authorities at this place on several occasions; has frequently heard and believed that the Indians were in the habit of bringing into this place horses, cattle, &c., for the purpose of selling them and other plunder. Says he was at Barrancas at the time that General Jackson came to Pensacola, in May last; deponent acted there as commissary, and knows that several Indians went from town down to Barrancas with the Spanish forces, and took refuge in the fort; that, at the same time, several small parties were encamped about the Barrancas; that, upon the arrival of General Jackson before the Barrancas, Tapaulca and family were also in the fort; deponent has seen said chief several times in Pensacola, and believes him to be either a Creek or Seminole Indian; that while deponent was at Barrancas, and subsequently to the said month of November, 1817, he saw an Indian, named Luna, an express from St. Mark's, cross over from Santa Rosa island to Barrancas with despatches for the governor here; says that, since the said month of November, 1817, Governor Mazot, being himself at Barrancas, did order this deponent to give rations to several parties of Indians then there, of at least from thirty to forty strong, men, women, and children.

JOACHIM BARRELAS.

GEORGE SKEATE, being duly sworn, declares that he has constantly resided in the town of Pensacola since November, 1817; since which he has repeatedly seen, at different times, in said town, from thirty to forty Indians; has not seen any ammunition given to the Indians within the period alluded to; has heard and believes that horses, cattle, &c. were brought into this place by the Indians and sold, which deponent, however, did not see. Deponent believes that the late governor (Mazot) was well acquainted with the several murders that were committed on the neighboring American frontier; knows of no supplies furnished by order of the Spanish Government since about the month of March, 1817, when a supply of knives, a few blankets, and some copper kettles were furnished and delivered to a party of Indians, for the purpose, as was then said, of acting against the insurgents who were expected; that the said party of Indians shortly disappeared, and nothing more was heard of them. Deponent saw, on the day that Major Youngs attacked a party of Indians in the neighborhood of this town, a number of Indians who, he believes, were sent (or went themselves) across the bay in a boat belonging to Don Antonio Molina, captain of the port.

GEORGE SKEATE.

Mr. CHARLES LE JEUNE, being duly sworn, declares that he has resided in Pensacola since November, 1817; since which he has frequently seen in this town or its vicinity parties of upwards of a hundred Indians encamped; that these parties were armed either with rifles or with the arms that were furnished them by the English; that although he cannot state that these parties had received ammunition from the Spanish Government here, he nevertheless can and does state that the said parties were provisioned from the King's stores by Prieto, King's storekeeper; that previous to November, 1817, the Government was regularly in the habit of giving out ammunition to the Indians from a store which was expressly for that purpose here; that, on the day that Major Youngs attacked the Indians near this town, there was a considerable number encamped near the water side, in town, who, upon hearing the report of fire-arms, crossed the bay in their own boats, and in other larger boats belonging to others.

CARLOS LE JEUNE.

WILLIAM COOPER, being duly sworn, declares that he has resided in Pensacola since November, 1817; during which period he has frequently seen in town and its vicinity several parties of Indians; saw one in particular with some sheet lead, and has heard that the Indians had introduced some clothes into town that looked like American manufacture: states, also, that Tapaulca was a Red Stick chief, and had been frequently about Pensacola for several years past.

WILLIAM COOPER.

PENSACOLA, September 19, 1818.

I certify that the aforegoing depositions were sworn to and subscribed before me, on this day,

No. 37 e.

JOHN DUFFY, being duly sworn, declares as follows:

Question. Have you resided in and about Pensacola since November, 1817?

Answer. I have.

Question. Have you seen in said town or its vicinity, within or since that period, any Indians?

Answer. I have.

Question. How many did you see at any particular time?

Answer. About the latter end of that spring I saw in town from fifty to sixty Indians; but few of these were armed, because they were prohibited coming into town armed. I suppose their arms were left in their camps in the neighborhood.

Question. How did these Indians subsist themselves, and how did they procure ammunition?

Answer. Probably from the Government here; of this, however, I am not certain.

Question. Did you see any horses, cattle, or other plunder, brought into this place by the Indians?

Answer. No.

Question. How many Indians were in Pensacola and its neighborhood at the time that Major Youngs attacked a party near this town?

Answer. Of all descriptions, viz: men, women, and children, there must have been a considerable number; not less, probably, than one hundred and fifty or sixty.

Question. When Major Youngs attacked a party near town, how did those in town find means to escape across the bay?

Answer. I have understood and believe that they were sent across the bay by order of the governor.

SANTIAGO DAUPHIN.

JOSEPH BONEFI, being duly sworn, declares as follows, viz:

Question. Have you lived in Pensacola since November, 1817?

Answer. I have.

Question. Have you not, between that period and the approach of the American forces under Major General Jackson, repeatedly seen divers parties of hostile Indians in this town or its neighborhood?

Answer. I have. Indeed, between the said month of November and the time that the hostile party surrendered to Major Youngs, there were more or less in town; sometimes in numbers considerable, sometimes fewer.

Question. How or by whom were those Indians subsisted; and from whom or by what means did they procure ammunition and other warlike stores or weapons?

Answer. I have understood and do believe that they were fed by the Government here; as to ammunition, &c., I cannot state how they procured supplies, except it might have been from the stores about town.

Question. Have you seen or been informed of any horses, cattle, or other plunder, having been brought in here by the Indians within the time above alluded to?

No. 37 f.

PIERRE SENAC, being solemnly sworn, declares as follows: That he has resided in the town of Pensacola constantly since the month of November last past; that, since that time, and until the arrival of Major Youngs near this town, there were always considerable numbers of hostile Indians in or near the town; that, on many occasions within that period, he has seen from one hundred and fifty to two hundred Indians here; that their forces were regularly provisioned from the King's store here; that he has seen large quantities of sheet lead in the possession of the Indians, and considers it as greatly resembling the lead aprons of cannon; that the Government must have furnished the lead in question, as there were no other means here of getting such lead, and that the said lead was run off into balls, which this deponent saw; that, on the day Major Youngs attacked a party of Indians near this town, there were then in town a considerable number more, who were sent across the bay in boats provided for that purpose by the Spanish governor.

Deponent further states that, about the first of March last past, three considerable parties of hostile Indians, one party under the command of Leon Lesassier, another under the command of Arnaud Gilmer, (both lieutenants in His Catholic Majesty's service,) and the third commanded by an Indian chief, retired out of this town, and went down towards the neighborhood of Barrancas, where provisions and ammunition were regularly supplied them by the Spanish Government; that the said Indians were armed with guns which they had received from the English during the late war, and that they remained encamped within from one to three leagues of Barrancas for the space of nearly a month; that these Indians, besides being armed with guns, had also tomahawks, which deponent understood and believes were furnished by John Innerarity; and that, when the Government caused the said parties to be thus assembled and equipped, they were collected at Barrancas for the purpose, as deponent conceives, of eluding the vigilance of such individuals in Pensacola as would not concur in such measures.

Deponent further states that, since the said month of November last past, he has seen brought in here by the Indians a quantity of cottonade and women's clothing, brought or said to have been brought from the American frontier; that these things were publicly sold in this town, notwithstanding it was notoriously known here that those articles and property had just been taken from those whom the Indians had killed on the American frontier.

JOSE E. CARO, a citizen of Pensacola, being sworn, states that, early in the present year, (1818,) a party of hostile Indians were in Pensacola, their numbers not known, but probably fifty; that, on hearing of the approach of the American army under General Jackson, the Governor of Pensacola furnished those Indians with provisions and ammunition, and sent them in public boats across the bay; the deponent saw the rations issued and the party embarked. The deponent further states that, subsequent to this, he saw three parties of hostile Indians furnished with provisions, the ostensible object of which was to enable those Indians to march to the interior and give themselves up, but it was very generally believed that those Indians had no such intention. The deponent saw those Indians set out, and states that they had their arms.

CHARLES BARON, a resident of Pensacola, being sworn, states that, about the latter end of April or beginning of May, 1818, a party of Indians, amounting to near one hundred, were in Pensacola with a quantity of plunder which, it was generally believed, was taken at the time Stokes's family were murdered on the Escambia. The Indians sold this plunder openly to the inhabitants of Pensacola, and the deponent could not learn that the Spanish authorities at Pensacola made any inquiries respecting it. The deponent further states that, at several times in the present year, (1818,) he saw parties of Indians furnished with provisions and ammunition from the King's stores; but he does not recollect the dates of these transactions. The deponent further states that he has frequently heard Spanish officers at Pensacola justify the conduct of the Indians towards the United States, manifesting in their conversation a decided hostility towards the Americans.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, FORT GADSDEN,

SIR: (East bank of the Appalachicola river, formerly Negro Fort,) March 25, 1818.

At seven o'clock P. M., on the 9th instant, I reached Fort Scott with the brigade of Georgia militia, nine hundred bayonets strong, and some of the friendly Creeks who had joined me on my march a few days before, where, finding but one quart of corn per man and a few poor cattle, which, added to the live pork I brought along, would give us three days' rations of meat, determined me at once to use this small supply to the best advantage. Accordingly, having been advised by Colonel Gibson, quartermaster general, that he would sail from New Orleans on the 12th February, with the supplies, and being also advised that two sloops, with provisions, were in the bay, and an officer had been despatched from Fort Scott, in a large keel-boat, to bring up a part of their lading, and deeming that the preservation of those supplies would be to preserve the army, and enable me to prosecute the campaign, I assumed the command on the morning of the 10th, ordered the live stock slaughtered and issued to the troops, with one quart of corn to each man, and the line of march to be taken up at twelve, meridian. Having to cross the Flint river, and it being very high, combined with some neglect in returning the boats during a very dark night, I was unable to move from the opposite bank until nine o'clock on the morning of the 11th, when I took up my line of march down the east bank of the river for this place, touching the river as often as practicable, looking for the provision boat which was ascending, and which I was fortunate enough to meet on the 13th instant, when I ordered an extra ration to the troops, they not having received a full one of meal or flour since their arrival at Fort Early. On that day my patroles captured three prisoners, and found some hidden corn. On the morning of the 14th I ordered the boat down the river to this place, whilst I descended by land, and reached here, without interruption, on the morning of the 16th. The eligibility of this spot as a depot determined me, and I immediately directed my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, of the engineer corps, to furnish a plan for and superintend the erection of a fortification. His talents and indefatigable zeal displayed in the execution of this order induced me to name it Fort Gadsden, to which he is justly entitled.

On my arrival here, I immediately despatched the boat to the bay for the balance of provisions known to be there, and to ascertain whether the flotilla in charge of Colonel Gibson had reached there; and which returned on the 19th, with the unpleasing intelligence that nothing had been heard of the flotilla from New Orleans since it was seen passing Fort Bowyer. I immediately put the troops on half rations, and pushed the completion of the fort for the protection of the provisions; in the event of their arrival, intending to march forthwith to the heart of the enemy, and endeavor to subsist upon him. In the mean time, I despatched Major Fanning, of the corps of artillery, to take another look into the bay; whose return, on the morning of the 23d, brought the information that Colonel Gibson, with one gun-boat and three transports, and others in sight, were in the bay. On the same night I received other information that no more had arrived. I am, therefore, apprehensive that some of the smaller vessels have been lost, as one gun-boat went to pieces, and another, when last spoken, had one foot water in her hold. All of the vessels had been spoken after the gale which dispersed them. A north and northwest wind has prevailed for six days, but has fortunately changed this morning. I am now awaiting a boat from the bay, (which is expected to-day,) to complete eight days' rations for my troops, upon which I mean to march.

From information received from Pensacola and New Orleans, I have no doubt but that St. Mark's is in possession of the Indians. The Governor of Pensacola informed Captain Call, of the 1st infantry, (now here,) that the Indians had demanded arms, ammunition, and provisions, or the possession of the garrison of St. Mark's of the commandant, and that he presumed possession would be given from inability to defend it. The Spanish Government is bound by treaty to keep the Indians at peace with us; they have acknowledged their incompetency to do this, and are consequently bound by the law of nature and nations to yield us all facilities to reduce them. Under this consideration, should I be able, I will take possession of the garrison as a depot for my supplies, should it be found in the hands of the Spanish garrison, they having supplied the Indians; but if in the hands of our enemy, I will possess it for the benefit of the United States, as a necessary position for me to hold, to give peace and security to this frontier, and put a final end to Indian warfare in the south.

Finding it very difficult to supply Fort Crawford, on the Conecuh river, by land, I have ordered the supplies for that garrison by water, and written to the Governor of Pensacola that if he interrupts them during the present Indian war, I shall view it as aiding our enemy, and treat it as an act of hostility; and stated to him the propriety, under existing circumstances, of his affording all facilities to put down their own as well as our enemies, and that our Governments, whilst negotiating, can take this subject under consideration; but, in the mean time, our provisions must pass to Fort Crawford without interruption.

In mine of the 14th February from Hartford, I informed you of the measures adopted to procure supplies, and in my last of the 26th, from Fort Early, I informed you of their situation. To those communications I beg leave to refer you. I have only to add, that I left Fort Early for Fort Scott, and subsisted my troops on ground pease, corn, and some pork, that I could occasionally procure from the Indians, with some pork that I had on foot, the whole subsistence for man and horse not costing five hundred dollars. Of all the supplies purchased for the relief of Fort Scott, and the support of the Georgia militia, not one pound was received until I passed Fort Scott. I said in my last that blame rested somewhere; the cause of those failures will in due time be a subject of investigation, and Colonel Brearly has been arrested on the application of General Gaines.

By some strange fatality, unaccountable to me, the Tennessee volunteers have not yet joined me. They promptly left their homes, and through the inclement weather reached Fort Mitchell, where I had ordered them supplies, and where Colonel Hayne, who led them, met my instructions to pass by Fort Gaines, where he would get a supply of corn, that would enable him to reach Fort Scott: but the idea of starvation had stalked abroad; a panic appears to have spread itself everywhere, and he was told that they were starving at Forts Gaines and Scott, and was induced to pass into Georgia for supplies. His men and officers, as reported to me, were willing to risk the worst of consequences on what they had to join me; however, they have been marched from their supplies, to a country stripped of them, when every consideration should have induced his advisers to have urged him on to secure the supplies in the bay, and preserved themselves and Fort Scott from starvation. I have a hope that they will join me before I reach St. Mark's, or the Mickasuky towns; this would be desirable, as the troops ordered from New Orleans to protect the supplies have not reached the bay, and leaving garrisons at Forts Scott and Gadsden weakens my force much, the whole effective strength of the regulars being but three hundred and sixty privates.

In mine of the 26th ultimo, from Fort Early, I informed you that despatches received by General Gaines on the 19th ultimo from the commanding officer at Fort Scott induced him to set out that night for Fort Scott, to prevent its abandonment, &c. In his passage down the Flint river he was shipwrecked, by which he lost his assistant adjutant general, Major C. Wright, and two soldiers, (drowned.) The general reached me six days after, nearly exhausted with hunger and cold, having lost his baggage and clothing, and being compelled to wander in the woods four and a half days without any thing to subsist on, or any clothing except a pair of pantaloons. I am happy to have it in my power to say that he is now with me at the head of his brigade in good health.

The great scarcity of subaltern officers in the 4th and 7th regiments of infantry has induced me to appoint several young men (present) as second lieutenants in those regiments, who, from personal knowledge and good recommendations, I have no doubt will prove themselves worthy; and trust the measure will meet the approbation of the President. A list of their names, and the regiments to which they are attached, will be furnished the adjutant and inspector general by my adjutant general.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Maj. Gen. commanding.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Department of War.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have the pleasure to inform you that the boat from the bay has arrived with provisions, also Colonel Gibson and Captain McKeever of the navy. I shall move to-morrow, having made the necessary arrangements with Captain McKeever for his co-operation in transporting my supplies around to the bay of St. Mark, from which place I shall do myself the honor to communicate to you. Should our enemy attempt to escape with his supplies and booty to the small islands, and from thence to carry on a predatory warfare, the assistance of the navy will prevent his escape. General William McIntosh, commanding the friendly Creeks who had been ordered to reconnoitre the right bank of the Appalachicola, reported to me on the 19th instant that he had captured, without the fire of a gun, one hundred and eighty women and children, and fifty-three warriors of the Red Ground chief's party, with their cattle and supplies; the chief and thirty warriors making their escape on horseback: ten of the warriors, attempting their escape after they had surrendered, were killed by the general.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR: FORT MONTGOMERY, June 2, 1818.

The Seminole war having terminated, I deem it politic and advisable to send to Washington John Blunt and his Indian comrades, who have acted as pilots to me during the late campaign. John Blunt is a Tuckabatchee Indian, has long been friendly to the United States, and, in consequence of his opposition to the Red Stick party during the Creek war, has drawn down upon himself their vengeance during the late contest. His settlement being in an exposed situation on the Appalachicola river, he was early attacked by the Seminoles, his property destroyed, and his family rifled from him. Alone he escaped, and fled to Fort Scott, where, joining the American standard, he has proven himself a most zealous friend and faithful pilot to this period. In justice to him, I am bound to state that, to his correct knowledge of the country, and zealous attachment to the cause in which we were engaged, am I measurably indebted for the success of the present campaign.

Mr. Hambly accompanies John Blunt. Mr. Hambly is a Spanish subject by birth, and has long been a resident as a trader on the Appalachicola river. In consequence of his attachment to the American cause, and his active exertions to check the hostile feelings of those Indians disposed to war against the United States, he drew down upon himself and family their vengeance. He was forcibly taken from his home at an early period of the war; his property, goods, and negroes taken from him, and he violently transported from Mickasuky, Suwanee, and St. Mark's, until finally relieved by Captain McKeever, of the American navy. Since which period, he has been attached to my army as Indian interpreter. You will find him an honest and faithful friend to our Government, and valuable for the information which he can afford of Spanish policy and intrigue. He is well acquainted with all the transactions of foreign agents in this country, of their practices, &c., and how far encouraged by the Spanish authorities, &c.

With respect, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Maj. Gen. commanding.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR: CAMP NEAR ST. MARK'S, April 8, 1818.

I wrote you from Fort Gadsden, communicating the embarrassments under which I had labored previous to my arrival at that post, and my determination, being then in a situation to commence active operations, to penetrate immediately into the centre of the Seminole towns. My army marched on the 26th ultimo, and on the 1st of April was reinforced by the friendly Creek warriors under General McIntosh, and a detachment of Tennessee volunteers, commanded by Colonel Elliott. On the same day, a mile and a half in advance of the Mickasukian villages, a small party of hostile Indians were discovered judiciously located on a point of land projecting into an extensive marshy pond—the position designated, as since understood, for the concentrating of the negro and Indian forces to give us battle. They maintained for a short period a spirited attack from my advanced spy companies, but fled and dispersed in every direction upon coming in contact with my flank columns, and discovering a movement to encircle them. The pursuit was continued through the Mickasukian towns, until night compelled me to encamp my army. The next day detachments were sent out in every direction to reconnoitre the country, secure all supplies found, and reduce to ashes the villages. This duty was executed to my satisfaction; nearly three hundred houses were consumed, and the greatest abundance of corn, cattle, &c. brought in. Every indication of a hostile spirit was found in the habitations of the chiefs; in the council-houses of Kenhagee's town, the King of the Mickasukians, more than fifty fresh scalps were found; and, in the centre of the public square, the old Red Stick's standard, a red pole, was erected, crowned with scalps, recognised by the hair as torn from the heads of the unfortunate companions of Scott.

As I had reason to believe that a portion of the hostile Indians had fled to St. Mark's, I directed my march towards that fortress. As advised, I found that the Indians and negroes combined had demanded the surrender of that work. The Spanish garrison was too weak to defend it; and there were circumstances reported, producing a strong conviction in my mind that, if not instigated by the Spanish authorities, the Indians had received the means of carrying on the war from that quarter; foreign agents, who have been long practising their intrigues and villanies in this country, had free access into the camp; St. Mark's was necessary as a depot to insure success to my operations. These considerations determined me to occupy it with an American force. An inventory of the Spanish property, munitions of war, &c. has been taken and receipted for, and the commandant and garrison furnished with transportation to Pensacola. My correspondence with the Spanish commandant, the evidences under which I acted, and a detailed account of my operations, will be furnished you as early as practicable. Success depends upon the rapidity of my movements; and to-morrow I shall march for the Suwanee river, the destroying the establishments on which will, in my opinion, put a final close to this savage war. Captain McKeever, of the navy, cruising at my request on this coast, has been fortunate enough in securing Francis, or Hillis Hadjo, the great prophet, and Homathlemico, an old Red Stick. They visited his vessels, under an impression that they were English, from whom, as they stated, supplies of munitions of war, &c., under late promises, were expected. Arbuthnot, a Scotchman, and suspected as one of the instigators of this savage war, was found in St. Mark's; he is in confinement until evidences of his guilt can be collected.

With respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General commanding.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

BEFORE ST. MARK'S, April 6, 1818.

SIR:

To chastise a savage foe, who, combined with a lawless band of negro brigands, have, for some time past, been carrying on a cruel and unprovoked war against the citizens of the United States, has compelled the President to direct me to march my army into Florida. I have penetrated to the Mickasuky towns, and reduced them to ashes.

In these towns I found many indications of a hostile spirit. On a red pole, in the centre of the council-houses of Kenhagee's town, more than fifty fresh scalps of all ages, from the infant to the aged matron, were found suspended.

In addition to this, upwards of three hundred old scalps were found in the dwellings of the different chiefs settled on the Mickasuky pond. Those barbarians who escaped death have fled. From information communicated by the Governor of Pensacola to two of my captains, (Gordon and Call,) I was induced to believe that they had fled to St. Mark's for protection. The governor stated that the Indians and negroes had demanded of you large supplies of munitions of war, with a threat, in the event of a refusal, of taking possession of your fortress. He further expressed an apprehension that, from your defenceless state, they were already in possession of St. Mark's. The wife of Chenubby, a noted chief, now a prisoner in my camp, informed me that the hostile Indians and negroes obtained their supply of ammunition from St. Mark's.

To prevent the recurrence of so gross a violation of neutrality, and to exclude our savage enemies from so strong a hold as St. Mark's, I deemed it expedient to garrison that fortress with American troops until the close of the present war. This measure is justifiable on the immutable principle of self-defence, and cannot but be satisfactory, under existing circumstances, to His Catholic Majesty the King of Spain. Under existing treaties between our two Governments, the King of Spain is bound to preserve in peace, with the citizens of the United States, not only his own subjects, but all Indian tribes residing within his territory. When called upon to fulfil that part of the treaty in relation to a savage tribe who have long depredated, with impunity, on the American frontier, incompetency is alleged, with an acknowledgment that the same tribe have acted in open hostility to the laws, and invaded the rights of His Catholic Majesty. As a mutual enemy, therefore, it is expected that every facility will be afforded by the agents of the King of Spain, to chastise these lawless and inhuman savages. In this light is the possession of St. Mark's by the American forces to be viewed.

I come not as the enemy, but as the friend of Spain. Spanish rights and property will be respected. The property and rights of Spanish subjects will be guarantied them. An inventory of all public property, munitions of war, &c. shall be made out, and certified by an officer appointed by each of us, and a receipt given for the same, to be accounted for to His Catholic Majesty by the United States. The subject of my possession of the garrison of St. Mark's will be referred to our respective Governments for amicable adjustment. Some armed vessels of the United States are in the bay of St. Mark, with whom I wish to communicate. You will, I trust, furnish me with a small vessel to convey a letter as well as some sick and wounded that are with me. As our mutual savage enemies are concentrating their forces near or on the Suwanee, an early and prompt answer is requested to this letter, with an English translation, as neither myself nor staff are acquainted with the Spanish.

This will be handed you by my aid-de-camp Lieutenant James Gadsden, by whom an answer is expected.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: ST. MARK'S OF APPALACHE, April 7, 1818.

Being made to understand, although with the greatest difficulty, the contents of the letter with which your excellency honored me yesterday evening, delivered to me by your aid-de-camp, James Gadsden, I will declare to your excellency the satisfaction the knowledge of your expedition against Mickasuky has afforded me. That such would be the event could not be doubted, on considering the superior talents and skilful conduct of your excellency, and to these must be attributed the success, on which I tender you my most cordial congratulations.

My chief, the Governor of Pensacola, had in truth reason to mention to your captains (Gordon and Call) what your excellency states to me, and to entertain fears for the fate of this fort, menaced by Indians and negroes, for some months past, and particularly since they have been disappointed in their expectations of obtaining powder and ball, which they have so repeatedly solicited, and to which they thought themselves entitled, from the practice which existed of supplying them annually therewith. This proves how entirely unfounded is the assertion of the wife of the chief Chenubby, that the Indians have been supplied with munitions in this fort since I was advised and determined to maintain the most perfect neutrality. No one can better remove from your excellency's mind any unfavorable impressions you may have formed on this subject than the bearer, William Hambly, as he has at various times interpreted to me the solicitations of the several Indian chiefs in my neighborhood; and he can also inform you of the advice I always gave them to avoid the destruction which has overtaken them, and which I foresaw from the beginning.

This being realized, and there being now no motive to fear any insult to the fort from these barbarians and the negroes, I beg permission of your excellency to call your attention to the difficulty I should involve myself in with my Government if I were presently to assent to what your excellency proposes to me—to garrison this fort with the troops of the United States without first receiving its orders. Such I will solicit immediately an opportunity offers, and I do not for a moment doubt that they will be given to me, so zealous is my Government to comply with the stipulations between her and the United States. In the interim, I hope your excellency will desist from your intention, and be firmly persuaded of the good faith and harmony which will reign between this garrison and whatever troops you may think fit to leave in this vicinity, who may assist me in the defence of this fort on any unforeseen event.

The sick your excellency sent in are lodged in the royal hospital, and I have afforded them every aid which circumstances admit. I hope your excellency will give me other opportunities of evincing the desire I have to satisfy you. I trust your excellency will pardon my not answering you as soon as requested, for reasons which have been given you by your aid-de-camp. I do not accompany this with an English translation, as your excellency desires, because there is no one in the fort capable thereof; but the before-named Wm. Hambly proposes to translate it to your excellency in the best manner he can.

May our Lord preserve your excellency many years, such is my prayer.

Most excellent sir, I kiss your excellency's hands.

Your most devoted and obedient servant,

FRANCISCO CASO Y LUENGO.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR: CAMP NEAR ST. MARK'S, April 7, 1818.

I refer you to my communication of yesterday for the motives which have compelled me to occupy the fort of St. Mark. I again repeat that I have entered the territory of Spain as a friend, to chastise a mutual enemy of both nations, and whom His Catholic Majesty was bound, under the most sacred of treaties, to have punished himself. Peculiar circumstances, however, have prevented, and it was therefore expected that every facility would have been given to the American arms to have insured success to their operations. The occupation of St. Mark's is essential to the accomplishment of my campaign, and is peculiarly so at this period, when evidence is derived from every source of the designs of the negroes and Indians against that fortress. They are now concentrating with the intention of taking possession of St. Mark's the moment my army moves from its vicinity; the dislodging them from which will cost me more American blood than I am disposed should be shed. Success to my operations requires despatch; you will excuse me, therefore, in refusing your request that a suspension should be granted until a permit is obtained from your Government, and in insisting that St. Mark's should be immediately occupied by American troops.

Major Fanning, my inspector general, and Lieutenant Simmons, of the ordnance department, are appointed to act with one or two officers nominated on your part, to take an inventory of and inspect all public property in the fort of St. Mark, for which receipts will be given in the name of the American Government.

Any disposition which you would wish made with the private property of yourself, officers, and soldiers, or any other arrangements gratifying to yourself, will be settled by my aids-de-camp, Lieutenants Gadsden and Glassell.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR: CAMP NEAR ST. MARK'S, April 7, 1818.

I have received your protest against my proceedings. The occupancy of Fort St. Mark's by my troops previous to your assenting to the measure became necessary from the difficulties thrown in the way of an amicable adjustment, notwithstanding my assurances that every arrangement should be made to your satisfaction, and expressing a wish that my movements against our common enemy should not be retarded by a tedious negotiation. I again repeat what has been reiterated to you through my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, that your personal rights and private property shall be respected, that your situation shall be made as comfortable as practicable while compelled to remain in Fort St. Mark's, and that transports shall be furnished as soon as they can be obtained to convey yourself, family, and command to Pensacola.

I daily expect some vessels from the bay of Appalachicola: as soon as they arrive, the most suitable shall be selected for said purpose.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: APPALACHICOLA, April 7, 1818.

I should insist on what I stated to your excellency in my letter of this morning, as to the necessity of awaiting orders from the Governor of Pensacola for the delivery of the fort under my command, were I not, in addition to what your excellency says in your answer, threatened by your aid-de-camp and the other officers appointed to negotiate on the subject, and had not so large a body of troops entered without awaiting my permission, and taken possession of all the stores and posts, lowering the Spanish flag, and hoisting the American. So manifest a violation of the territory of His Catholic Majesty obliges me to complain of it, and to protest against it, and I accordingly do protest against it, and beg of your excellency to provide, as speedily as possible, the vessels necessary to transport me to Pensacola, together with the troops and those persons who are in the royal employ; and also to give orders that, in the interim, the private property and effects of every Spanish individual here be respected. With respect to the public property of His Catholic Majesty, I have nominated the subaltern of the detachment and commissary of the fort to make, with three officers whom you name to me, an inventory thereof.

I repeat to your excellency my respects, and pray to God to preserve your life many years.

Most excellent sir, I kiss your excellency's hands.

Your most obedient and devoted servant,

FRANCISCO CASO Y LUENGO.

W. Hambly's certificate, July 24, 1818.

I do hereby certify that, during my long residence on the river Appalachicola, my knowledge of the Indian language, and my intimate acquaintance with the different chiefs, gave me many opportunities of knowing through them the advice given them, from time to time, by the governors of West Florida hostile to the United States. In the year 1812 or 1813, I saw a letter from the Governor of Pensacola to the late chief of the Seminoles, Thomas Perryman, advising him to collect his forces and join his Upper Town brethren, who he said had come to a determination to rise in arms and shake off the American yoke; he would supply their arms and ammunition; and he said he was sure that, in less than a month, their fathers and protectors, the Spaniards, would have a sufficient army in the field to aid and protect them. Not long after I saw this letter, a large party of Indians went down to Pensacola, where they received a large supply of ammunition and some arms. It was but shortly after this when they attacked and destroyed the garrison of Fort Mimms; this was the commencement of the first Indian war. On the 13th of December last, when on my plantation on the Appalachicola, I was made a prisoner by a party of Seminole Indians, and was taken up to the Ocheehee bluffs in company with Mr. Doyle, who was made a prisoner with me; they kept us here three days, during which time they were busily engaged with some transports which were then ascending the river to Fort Scott; from thence they took us to the Mickasuky, where the Indians informed me that they had been told by the commandant of St. Mark's that war was declared between Spain and the United States. From this place we were carried to the Suwanee, were Kenhagee, principal chief of the Seminoles, told me that we had been taken and robbed by order of Arbuthnot, and brought there to be tried by him; shortly after we reached this, Arbuthnot arrived from Providence, when we were tried and sentenced by said Arbuthnot to be tortured; this sentence was not put in execution by the friendly interference of Mr. Cook, clerk to Arbuthnot, and the negro chief Nero; we were then conducted back to the Mickasuky; then Kenhagee went down to the Fort St. Mark's to consult the commandant if he would take us as prisoners to keep at his order; they held a council among the neighboring chiefs, and on the fifth day he returned, and ordered us to be conducted down next morning; we arrived at St. Mark's on the 12th February, at night; the Spanish officers received us kindly, but the commandant did not forget to remind us that we were still prisoners, and marked out that night the limits of our prison, which he rigidly kept during the time of our stay. Next morning, the first thing that presented itself to my view was my saddle-horse which had been taken from me by the Indians; he was in the possession of the commissary. I mentioned it to the commandant, but he said that he bought him of an Indian, and he could do nothing in it. A few days after, in the course of conversation, I mentioned it to the Spanish doctor; he assured me that two-thirds of the property taken from us by the Indians had been bought by them and others in the fort. The plundered property from Georgia was every day briskly bought by the commandant and others. I know one instance of an Indian making an engagement with the commandant for cattle that he was going then to plunder, and in fourteen or fifteen days brought them in and sold them. On our first arrival at St. Mark's, we had, by help of a friendly Indian, conveyed intelligence to our friends in Pensacola of our situation, and they sent us on a small vessel to effect our escape; on her arrival, the commandant said to us that he had no objection to our getting out of the power of the Indians, but that he should first demand a written obligation that we should never return to that country, nor hold any communication, direct or indirect, with the United States Government, or any of her officers. This being settled, we left St. Mark's on the night of the 28th March, and joined Captain McKeever, in his gun-boats, in the bay of Appalachicola; on the 30th returned with him to St. Mark's, where we found General Jackson, on the 6th of April. Given under my hand the 24th July.

W. Hambly and E. Doyle to General Jackson.

SIR: FORT GADSDEN, May 2, 1818.

We beg leave to submit to you the following facts:

On the 13th December, 1817, we were violently torn from our settlement on the Appalachicola river, by a number of Indians, headed by Chenubby, a chief of the Fowl Town tribe, carried to Mickasuky, and delivered to Kenhagee, King of the Mickasukians. Kenhagee carried us to the negro towns on the Suwanee, and thence to the Spanish fort, St. Mark's, to the commandant of which he delivered us as prisoners of war, captured under the orders of a Mr. Arbuthnot, reported to us as a British agent. At St. Mark's we were treated as prisoners, and not permitted to wander beyond the walls of the garrison. While at that post, the ingress and egress of Indians hostile to the United States were unrestrained, and several councils were held, at one of which, Kenhagee, King of the Mickasukians, Francis, or Hillis Hadjo, Hamathlemico, the chief of the Autesses, and the chief of Kolemies, all of the old Red Stick party, and Jack Mealy, chief of the Ochewas, were present. When it was reported that these chiefs and their warriors were entering Fort St. Mark's for the purpose of holding a council, Hambly represented to the commandant the impropriety of permitting such proceedings within the walls of a Spanish fortress, the officer of which was bound to preserve and enforce the treaties existing between the King of Spain and the United States. He replied to Hambly with some degree of warmth, observing that it was not in his power to prevent it. On the Indians coming into the fort, at their request we were confined. The council was held in the commandant's quarters. He, the commandant, was present, but strictly forbade the intrusion of any of the officers of the garrison. The Indians were in the habit of driving to Fort St. Mark's, and disposing of cattle to the commandant and other Spanish officers. While at that post, three or four droves were brought in, acknowledged by the Indians to have been stolen from the citizens of the United States, and purchased by the Spanish officers. We were present at most of these contracts, and Hambly was often referred to as an interpreter between the purchaser and seller. Chenubby, a Fowl Town Indian, once applied to Hambly to mention to the commandant that he was about visiting the frontiers of Georgia on a plundering expedition, and wished to know whether he would purchase the cattle brought in. A contract was entered into, and Chenubby, some time after, brought in and disposed of eleven head of cattle to the Spanish commandant of Fort St. Mark's. These same cattle were those purchased by you from the commandant as his private property.

WILLIAM HAMBLY,
EDWARD DOYLE.

J. Gadsden to General Jackson.

SIR: FORT GADSDEN, May 3, 1818.

In conversation with the commandant of Fort St. Mark's, on the subject of having that work occupied by an American garrison, I had occasion to notice the aid and comfort the hostile party of Indians had received, as reported from him; that they had free access within the walls of his fort; and that it was well known no small supplies of ammunition had been received from that quarter. In reply, he stated that his conduct had been governed by policy: the defenceless state of his works, and the weakness of his garrison, compelled him to conciliate the friendship of the Indians, to supply their wants, to grant what he had not the power to deny, and to throw open, with apparent willingness, the gates of his fortress, lest they should be forced by violence; that he had been repeatedly threatened by Indians and negroes; and that his security depended upon exhibiting an external friendship. After Fort St. Mark's was occupied by the American troops, a black man and Spanish soldier was reported to me as having been arrested, clad in American uniform, recognised as part of the clothing of the 4th and 7th regiments, captured in the boat commanded by Lieutenant Scott, in ascending the Appalachicola river.

In explanation, the Spanish commandant observed that his soldiers and the Seminole Indians were in the habit of trading with each other, and that this negro, with others of his garrison, had received his permission to purchase some clothing reported to have been brought in by the Indians.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES GADSDEN, Aid-de-camp.

SIR: FORT GADSDEN, May 3, 1818.

After the occupancy of Fort St. Mark's with American troops, on the 7th of April last, it became my duty to take charge of some goods found in one of the public stores.

These goods were pointed out by the Spanish commandant, who, through Mr. Hambly as interpreter, separated several of the articles claimed as his own private property, and designated others as the property of Francis, or Hillis Hadjo, and Arbuthnot, a British agent or trader. An inventory of these was taken, and deposited with the American officer left in command of Fort St. Mark's.

With respect, &c.

D. E. TWIGGS, Brev. Maj. 7th Infantry.

I certify that I acted as interpreter in the transaction above alluded to, and that two separate parcels of goods were designated by the Spanish commandant of St. Mark's as belonging to Hillis Hadjo and Arbuthnot.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that, at the capture of Fort St. Mark's, East Florida, by Major General A. Jackson, on the 7th April, 1818, there were some cattle purchased on account of the United States, and turned over to us, which we are of opinion had been driven from the frontiers of Georgia, (a part of them, at least;) and we were strengthened in our opinion by a number of officers and men from Georgia offering to swear to a number of them as the property of their neighbors and friends.

SIR: NASSAU, N. P., August 26, 1817.

I am especially authorized to address you by the chiefs of the Creek nation whose names I affix to the present.

They desire it to be made known that they have implicitly followed our advice in living friendly with the Americans who were their neighbors, and nowise attempted to molest them, though they have seen the Americans encroach on their territory, burning their towns, and making fields where their houses stood; rather than make resistance, they have retired lower in the peninsula. The town of Ecan Halloway, on the Chatahoochee, where Otosmico was chief, is one instance of the encroachments of the Americans. This town is situated under the guns of Fort Gaines, and Mico was desired to submit to the Americans, or his town would be blown to atoms. Rather than do this, he retired, is now living in the lower nation, and his fields, where the town stood, are ploughed up by the Americans. They complain of the English Government neglecting them, after having drawn them into a war with America; that the promise made them of sending people to reside among them has not been kept; and if they have not some person or persons to reside in the nation to watch over their interests, they will soon be driven to the extremity of the peninsula. You left Mr. Hambly to watch over the interests of the Creek nation, but you had hardly left the nation when he turned traitor, and was led by Forbes to take the part of the Americans. His letter (No. 47 b.) to me, of which I annex a copy, will show you what lengths he would go if he had the means. It is Hambly and Doyle who gave the Indians all the trouble they experience. They send their emissaries among the Lower Creeks, and make them believe that the Cowetas, aided by the Americans, are coming down on them. They send to the Cowetas, and report that the lower nation is arming against them. Thus both are put in fear, and their fields are neglected, and hunting is not thought of. I have endeavored to do away this fear, by writing to the chiefs of Coweta town that they ought to live on friendly terms with their brethren of the lower nation, whose wish it was to be on good terms with them, and not to listen to any bad talks, but to chase those that give them from among them. My letter was answered by them rather favorably; and I hope the talk that was sent to the Big Warrior last June will heal the differences between them.

Hillis Hadjo arrived in my schooner at Ochlochnee Sound last June, and was well received by all the chiefs and others who came to welcome him home. In consequence of his arrival, a talk was held, the substance of which I put on paper for them, and it was sent, with a pipe of peace, to the other nations.

Hillis Hadjo wished to return to Nassau with me, but I prevailed on him to stay with the nation and keep them all at peace.

I am desired to return Hillis Hadjo's warmest acknowledgment for the very handsome manner in which you treated him in England; and he begs his prayers may be laid at the foot of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent. I left him and all his family well on the 20th of June.

Old Cappachimico desired me to send you his best respects, and requests you will send him out some people to live among them, and all the land they took from Forbes shall be theirs. At all events, they must have an agent among them, to see that the Americans adhere to the treaty, and permit them to live unmolested on their own land. This agent should be authorized by His Majesty's Government, or he will not be attended to by the Americans.

In the gazettes of Georgia the Americans report that the Seminole Indians are continually committing murders on their borders, and making incursions into the State. These are publications tending to irritate the American Government against the poor Indians; for, during the time I was in the nation, there was only one American killed; and he, with two others, was in the act of driving off cattle belonging to Boleck, chief of Suwanee; whereas, three men and a boy were killed last June, by a party of cattle-stealers, while in their hunting-camps; the boy they scalped; and one of Boleck's headmen was killed on St. John's river in July. The back-woods Georgians, and those resident on the borders of the Indian nation, are continually entering it and driving off cattle. They have in some instances made settlements, and particularly on the Choctawhatchy river, where aconsiderable number have descended.

By the treaty with Great Britain, the Americans were to give up to the Indians all the lands that may have been taken during the war, and place them on the same footing they were in Choctawhatchy in 1811. It appears that they have not done so; that Fort Gaines, on the Chatahoochee river, and Camp Crawford, on the Flint river, are both on Indian territory that was not in possession of the Americans in 1811.

They are fearful that, before any aid is given them by the English Government, they will no longer be in possession of any territory. I wrote last January to his excellency the Hon. Charles Bagot, representing the encroachments of the Americans, (as I was informed, by the copy of a letter from the Right Hon. Earl Bathurst, handed me by his excellency Governor Cameron, that His Majesty's ambassadors had received orders to watch over the interests of the Indians.) Since my return here, I have received from Mr. Moodie, of Charleston, an extract of a letter from the Hon. Charles Bagot, that the expense of postage is so considerable that any further communications of the same nature must be sent him by private hands. Now, sir, as no person goes direct from this to Washington, how am I to be able to comply with this desire? Thus, he will be kept ignorant of the real situation of the poor Indians, and the encroachments made on their lands by American settlers, while we may be told by the American Government that no encroachments have been made, and that the forts they still hold are necessary to check the unruly Seminoles. Thus, the persons appointed to watch over the poor Indians have no other means of information than from the parties interested in their destruction; and, from seeing, from time to time, in the American gazettes, accounts of cruel murders, &c. committed by the Indians on the frontier settlers of the United States, he apprehends the Indians merit all the Americans do to them. But let His Majesty's Government appoint an agent with full powers, and to correspond with His Majesty's ambassador at Washington, and his eyes will then be open as to the motives that influence American individuals, as well as the Government, in vilifying the Indians.

The powers given me and the instructions were to memorialize His Majesty's Government, as well as the Governor General of Havana; but if you will be pleased to lay this letter before His Majesty's Secretary of State, it will save the necessity of the first, and I fear that a memorial to the governor general would be of no use. Referring you to the enclosed, (No. 47 b,)

I remain, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

MONSIEUR ET AMI: APALACHE, Decembre 25, 1817.

Les affaires entre les sauvages et les Américains étant devenues de quelque conséquence, et ne doutant que l'orage viendra frapper par ici, je crains pour vos petits objets; en conséquence, je crois qu' il est de votre intérêt de ne pas déférer un moment pour les retirer d'ici. Je serai content de vous voir, tant pour avoir le plaisir de vous embrasser, comme pour causer un peu sur les affaires politiques du jour, qu'il ne convienne, dans les actuelles circonstances, à les confier à la plume; et en attendant cette satisfaction, suis, avec ma petite famille,

Monsieur, votre très affectionné serviteur et ami,

FRANCISCO CASO Y LUENGO.

Mons. A. ARBUTHNOT, Neg't, Suwanee.

[TRANSLATION.]

SIR AND FRIEND: APPALACHICOLA, December 25, 1817.

Affairs having assumed a serious aspect between the savages and the Americans, and not doubting that the storm will pass this way, I entertain apprehensions for the safety of your little objects, and believe it to be your interest not to lose a moment in removing them from hence.

I shall be happy to see you, that I may have the pleasure of embracing you, and an opportunity of conversing with you on the politics of the day; which, under existing circumstances, it is improper to commit to paper. In the expectation of this pleasure, I am, with my little family,

Sir, your very affectionate servant and friend,

FRANCISCO CASO Y LUENGO.

By order of MAJOR GENERAL JACKSON:

ROBERT BUTLER, Adjutant General.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 26, 1818.

The court convened, pursuant to the foregoing order; when, being duly sworn in the presence of the prisoner, and he being asked if he had any objections to any member thereof, and replying in the negative, the following charges and specifications were read, viz:

Charges against A. Arbuthnot, now in custody, and who says he is a British subject.

CHARGE 1. Exciting and stirring up the Creek Indians to war against the United States and her citizens, he, A. Arbuthnot, being a subject of Great Britain, with whom the United States are at peace.

Specification. That the said A. Arbuthnot, between the months of May and July, or some time in June, 1817, wrote a letter to the Little Prince, exhorting and advising him not to comply with the treaty of Fort Jackson, stating that the citizens of the United States were infringing on the treaty of Ghent, as he believed, without the knowledge of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, and advising the Upper and Lower Creeks to unite and be friendly, stating that William Hambly was the cause of their disputes; also advising the Little Prince to write to the Governor of New Providence, who would write to His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, through whom the United States would be called to a compliance with the treaty of Ghent, and advising them not to give up their lands under the treaty of Fort Jackson, for that the American citizens would be compelled to give up to them all their lands under the treaty of Ghent.

CHARGE 2. Acting as a spy, and aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, supplying them with the means of war.

Specification 1. In writing a letter from St. Mark's fort, dated April 2, 1818, to his son John, at Suwanee, (marked A,) detailing the advance of the army under General Jackson, stating their force, probable movements, and intentions, to be communicated to Bowlegs, the chief of the Suwanee towns, for his government.

Specification 2. In writing the letters marked B, without date; and C, with enclosures, January 27, 1818; and D, called "a note of Indian talks;" and E, without date, applying to the British Government, through Governor Cameron, for munitions of war and assistance for our enemies; making false representations, and also applying to Mr. Bagot, British ambassador, for his interference, with a statement, on the back of one of the letters, of munitions of war for the enemy.

CHARGE 3. Exciting the Indians to murder and destroy William Hambly and Edmund Doyle, and causing their arrest, with a view to their condemnation to death, and the seizure of their property, on account of their active and zealous exertions to maintain peace between Spain, the United States, and the Indians, they being citizens of the Spanish Government.

Specification 1. In writing the letters marked F, dated August 26, 1817; G, dated May 13, 1817; and H, threatening them with death, alleging against them false and infamous charges, and using every means in his power to procure their arrest; all which writings and sayings excited, and had a tendency to excite, the Indians and negroes to acts of hostility with the United States.

By order of the court: J. M. GLASSELL, Recorder.

To which charges and specifications the prisoner pleaded not guilty.

The prisoner having made application for counsel, it was granted him, when the court proceeded to the examination of the evidence.

JOHN WINSLETT, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that some time before last July the Little Prince received a letter, signed by a Mr. Arbuthnot, advising the upper part of the nation to unite with the lower chiefs in amity, and stating that the best mode for them to repossess themselves of their lands would be to write to him, (Arbuthnot,) and he would send on their complaints to the Governor of Providence, whence it would be forwarded to His Britannic Majesty, and he would have the terms of the treaty of Ghent attended to; he, moreover, stated his belief that the encroachments on the Indian lands were unknown to the President of the United States. The witness also identified the signature of the letter of the prisoner to his son, (marked A,) referred to in the first specification to the second charge, and heretofore noted as being the same with that sent to the Little Prince.

The witness, on being further interrogated, stated the language of the letter alluded to to be, that the British Government, on application, would cause to be restored to them their lands they held in 1811, agreeably to the terms of the treaty of Ghent.

Question by the prisoner. Who is the Little Prince, or is he known by any other name?

Answer. He is known by the name of Tustennuggee Hopoy, and is the second chief of the nation.

Question. Where is the letter you allude to, or in whose possession?

Answer. It was left in the possession of the Little Prince when I last saw it.

Question. Has this Little Prince no other name than what you state?

Answer. Not that I know of.

Question. Do you swear that the letter alluded to was addressed to the Little Prince?

Answer. I do not. It was presented to me by the Little Prince to read and interpret for him, which I did.

Question. Are you certain that the letter stated that the Chief Magistrate of the United States could have had no knowledge of settlements made on Indian lands, or injuries committed?

Answer. The letter stated that to be the belief of the writer.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated, with regard to the first specification of the second charge, that, being at Suwanee, in the town, about the 6th or 7th of April, he was awakened early in the morning by Mr. Ambrister's receiving, by the hands of a negro, who got it from an Indian, a letter from St. Mark's, at that time stated by Ambrister to be from the prisoner.

Question by the prisoner. Did you see that letter, or hear it read?

Answer. I did see the paper, but I did not hear it read.

Question by the prisoner. Did you state that the letter was received by an Indian express?

Answer. So the black man that delivered it said.

A question being raised by a member of the court as to their jurisdiction on the third charge, and its specification, the doors were closed, and, after mature deliberation, they decided that this court is incompetent to take cognizance of the offences alleged in that charge and specification.

PETER B. COOK, a former clerk to the prisoner, and a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, about December or January last, the prisoner had a large quantity of powder and lead brought to Suwanee in his vessel, which he sold to the Indians and negroes; that, subsequent to that time, which he cannot recollect, Ambrister brought for the prisoner in his (the prisoner's) vessel nine kegs of powder, and a large quantity of lead, which were taken possession of by the negroes. The witness also identified the letters referred to in the foregoing charges and specifications, marked A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and H; also, the power of attorney, No. 1, granted by the Indians to A. Arbuthnot, being the prisoner's handwriting.

Question by the court. Have you at any time within the last twelve months heard any conversation between the prisoner and the chief called Bowlegs relating to the war between the United States and the Seminoles?

Answer. I heard the prisoner tell Bowlegs that he had sent letters to the Prince Regent, and expected soon to have an answer. Some time afterwards, some of the negroes doubted his carrying those letters, when the prisoner stated that he had, but, the distance being great, it would take some time to receive an answer.

By the court. State to the court when and where you first saw the letter signed A. Arbuthnot, dated April 2, 1818, referred to in the first specification of the second charge.

Answer. About the 6th of April, a black man, who said he had received it from an Indian, gave it to Mr. Ambrister, whom I saw reading it.

Question by the court. Do you know by what means that letter was conveyed to Suwanee?

Answer. I understood by an Indian who was sent from Fort St. Mark's.

Question by the court. Who paid the Indian for carrying the letter referred to in the last interrogatory?

Answer. I do not know.

Question by the court. What steps were taken by the negroes and Indians on the receipt of the letter?

Answer. They at first believed the bearer an enemy, and confined him, but, learning the contrary, began to prepare for the enemy, and the removal of their families and effects across the river; the Indians lived on the opposite side.

Question by the court. Did the Indians and negroes act together in the performance of military duty?

Answer. No; but they always said they would fight together.

Question by the court. Did not Nero command the blacks, and did not Bowlegs own Nero, and was not the latter under the immediate command of Bowlegs?

Answer. Nero commanded the blacks, and was owned and commanded by Bowlegs; but there were some negro captains who obeyed none but Nero.

Question by the court. What vessel brought to Suwanee the ammunition which you said was sold by the prisoner to the Indians and negroes?

Answer. The schooner Chance, now lying at the wharf; she is a fore-topsail vessel belonging to the prisoner.

The witness also identified the manuscript of the prisoner in a paper granting him full power to act in all cases for the Indians, numbered 1; and, also, a letter without signature to the Governor of St. Augustine, numbered 2; further, a letter, without date, to Mr. Mitchell, Indian agent, numbered 3; and an unsigned petition of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to Governor Cameron, praying his aid in men and munitions of war, numbered 4; all of which the witness stated to be in the handwriting of the prisoner.

The court then adjourned to meet to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 27, 1818.

When the further examination of the witness, PETER B. COOK, took place, viz:

Question by the prisoner. How long have you been acquainted with the settlement on the Suwanee?

Answer. Between six and seven months.

Question. For what term of years did you engage to live with the prisoner?

Answer. For no stated period: I was taken by the year.

Question. Were you not discharged by the prisoner from his employ?

Answer. He told me he had no further use for me after I had written the letters to Providence.

Question. Where did you stay after you were discharged?

Answer. I staid in a small house belonging to a boy called St. John, under the protection of Nero.

Question. What was the subject-matter of the letters you wrote to Providence?

Answer. After being refused by the prisoner a small venture to Providence, I wrote to my friends for the means to trade by myself.

Question. Do you believe the prisoner had knowledge of the venture being on board the schooner?

Answer. I do not believe he had; it was small, and in my trunk.

Question. Do you know that Ambrister was the agent of the prisoner?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Do you think that the powder and lead shipped would more than supply the Indians and negro hunters?

Answer. I did not see the powder and lead myself, but was told by Bowlegs that he had a great quantity; he had three kegs, keeping to fight with.

Question. Did the Indians reside on the east side of the river?

Answer. They did.

Question. You were asked of the negroes and Indians, when the letter marked A was communicated, if they did not take up arms; had they received information of the defeat of the Indians at Mickasuky prior to this date?

Answer. It was afterwards, I believe, that they received the information.

Question. Did not Bowlegs keep other powder than that got from the prisoner?

Answer. He had some he got from the Bluff, which was nearly done; he said his hunters were always bothering him about powder.

Question. Did you state that, at the time Ambrister ascended the river, there was no other vessel at the mouth of the river?

Answer. There was none other there; there was one had sailed.

Question. There is a letter (A) spoken of; how do you know that the son of the prisoner had that letter in his possession?

Answer. I saw him with it, which he dropped, and a boy called John picked it up and gave it to me.

Question. You stated that the Indians and negroes doubted the fidelity of the prisoner in sending letters to the Prince Regent; do you think that the prisoner would have been punished by them had he not complied with their wishes?

Answer. I do not know.

Question. Do you believe that the prisoner was compelled to write the Indian communications?

Answer. He was not compelled.

William Hambly, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, and commencing a statement of what he heard the chiefs say, and the prisoner objecting to hearsay evidence of that kind, the court was cleared, in order to take the question; when it was decided that the prisoner's objection was not valid. The witness was, therefore, recalled, and stated that, fifteen or twenty days after the prisoner's arrival at Ochlochnee, the Seminole Indians began to steal horses from the United States settlements, and commit murders on the Satilla river, which, he was informed by them, was at the instigation of the prisoner.

The chiefs of the little villages in the witness's neighborhood then desired him to write a few lines to the prisoner, stating those reports, and that he did not know that those Indians he was exciting had long been outlawed, and caution him against such proceedings, or he might be involved in their ruin. This the witness did, when the prisoner wrote him a long and insulting letter, (which was lost,) upbraiding the witness for calling those Indians outlaws, and accusing him of exciting the Indians to cruel war. The witness was told by all the chiefs and Indians who had seen the prisoner that he advised them to go to war with the United States if they did not surrender the lands which had been taken from them, and that the British Government would support them in it.

The Indians who took the witness and a Mr. Doyle prisoners, which happened on the 13th December last, told them it was by the prisoner's order; and on their arrival at Mickasuky, (as prisoners,) Kenhagee, and all his chiefs, told them it was by the prisoner's orders they were taken and robbed. On their arrival at Suwanee, they were told by the Indian and negro chiefs, who sat in council over them, that the prisoner had advised that he should be given up to five or six Choctaw Indians, who were saved from the negro fort, who would revenge themselves for the loss of their friends at that place. On their return from Suwanee, the chief Kenhagee told them that he had got the prisoner to write several letters for him; one to the Governor of Providence, one to the British minister at Washington, one to the Secretary of State in London, and one to the American agent for Indian affairs, protesting against the proceedings of the commanding officer at Fort Scott. While the witness was at Suwanee, the Indian chief told him that the prisoner had arrived at that place with ten kegs of powder on board of his vessel; and, while in Fort St. Mark's, some time in March, Hillis Hadjo, or Francis, brought an order from the prisoner to the commandant for two kegs of powder, with other articles, which were in his possession.

Question by the court. Were any murders or depredations committed on the white settlements by the Indians previous to the prisoner's arrival at Ochlochnee?

Answer. None, except one murder near Fort Gaines, which was before or about the time of the prisoner's arrival.

Question. How long have you resided among the Indians? State to the court whether you are acquainted with the Indian language, and how long since you learned it.

Answer. I have resided among them fourteen years, and have understood their language twelve years.

Question. Do you believe the Seminoles would have commenced the business of murder and depredation on the white settlements had it not been at the instigation of the prisoner, and a promise, on his part, of British protection?

Answer. I do not believe they would without they had been assured of British protection.

Question. What was the light in which the prisoner was viewed by the hostile Seminoles: was it that of an authorized agent of the British Government?

Answer. The different chiefs always represented him to me as such.

The witness recognised the letter marked G, and signed A. Arbuthnot, as being a copy of the one alluded to in his testimony as lost.

Question by the president. Are you acquainted with the prisoner's handwriting?

Answer. I have seen it, but cannot say I am acquainted with it.

Question. Is that which you have just seen, and say is the copy of the one you lost, the prisoner's handwriting?

Answer. It looks to be his handwriting, but I cannot say positively.

Question. Was the prisoner considered as the agent of the Seminoles at the time those murders were committed?

Answer. I had not seen the prisoner at that time; the Indian chiefs told me that the prisoner had reported himself to them as an English agent.

Question. Where did you understand the prisoner to be when you were taken prisoner?

Answer. The Indians told us that he had gone over to Providence, but was expected back by the time we should arrive at Suwanee.

Question. Did you not request Kenhagee to prevail upon the prisoner to give you a passage in his schooner to Providence?

Answer. Yes; but was told that the prisoner refused it, stating that, if we were forced upon him, he would blindfold us, and make us walk overboard.

Question. What were the reasons given by Kenhagee for the prisoner's not granting your request?

Answer. Kenhagee stated that the prisoner was fearful of meeting with an American vessel, when we should be taken out, and he thereby lose his schooner.

Edmund Doyle, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, was questioned as follows:

Question by the judge advocate. Do you know any thing that would tend to substantiate the charges against the prisoner now before you?

Answer. I know nothing but from common report.

William S. Fulton, an evidence on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, testified to the copy of a letter from A. Arbuthnot to General Mitchell, agent for Indian affairs, dated Suwanee, January 19, 1818, and marked No. 6, as acknowledged by the prisoner to be the same, in substance, as one written by himself at that time; an extract from that letter was then read to the court.

Question by the president. Where did the prisoner acknowledge the letter just read to be a copy of the one written by himself?

Answer. In the encampment before this place, about the 6th or 7th instant.

Question. Was not the acknowledgment made when he was a prisoner?

Answer. It was.

Question by the president. Did you hear a gentleman say to the prisoner, whilst in custody, that those who recommended the scalping-knife and tomahawk should feel their keenest edge?

Answer. I did hear a gentleman say that those who excited the Indians to the murder of the unoffending should feel the keenest edge of the scalping-knife; but, as well as I recollect, that observation was not made until after the repeated acknowledgments of the prisoner of having written the letter.

Question by the court. Was not the confession of the prisoner to this letter made voluntarily, and without any constraint whatever?

Answer. I conceive it was.

The evidence on the part of the prosecution being closed, the prisoner requested, as a witness, Robert C. Ambrister as one of his witnesses, against whom criminal charges had been filed, and who was in custody on account thereof; to which the judge advocate objecting, the court was cleared to take its sense, when it was decided that Robert C. Ambrister, now in custody for similar offences with the prisoner, cannot be examined as evidence before the court.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a previous witness, now on the part of the prisoner, being again sworn, was questioned as follows, viz:

Question by the prisoner. Was there any other vessel at the mouth of the Suwanee river when Ambrister seized your schooner?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What vessel was it? Was it not the vessel which Ambrister came in?

Answer. It was a sloop, and I understand Ambrister came in her.

Question. Did Ambrister ever mention to you who recommended him to seize the prisoner's schooner, or who assisted him in stimulating the negroes to do so?

Answer. No; I understood he came on board of his own accord.

Question by the court. Have you, since you commanded the prisoner's vessel, ever brought any arms to that part of the country?

Answer. No; I brought a quantity of lead and ten kegs of powder in the last trip.

JOHN WINSLETT, a former witness on the part of the prosecution, being recalled on behalf of the prisoner, was questioned as follows, viz:

Question by the prisoner. Are you not of opinion that the letter which you say was written by the prisoner to the Little Prince is now in the possession of the Little Prince?

Answer. After reading it, I returned it to him, and I believe it to be still in his possession, as Indians seldom destroy papers of that kind.

The prisoner requesting some time to make up his defence, he was given until to-morrow evening, at four o'clock.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 28, 1818, four o'clock P. M.

The recorder having read over the proceedings of the court with closed doors, the prisoner was recalled into court, and made the defence marked K, and attached to these proceedings. The doors were then closed, and, after the most mature deliberation on the evidence adduced, the court find the prisoner, Alexander Arbuthnot, guilty of the first specification to the first charge, and guilty of the first charge; guilty of the first and second specifications to the second charge, and guilty of the second charge, leaving out the words "acting as a spy;" they, therefore, do, on the most mature reflection, sentence the prisoner, Alexander Arbuthnot, to be suspended by the neck until he is dead; two-thirds of the court concurring therein.

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Major General by brevet, President of the Court.
J. M. GLASSELL, Recorder.

A.

From A. Arbuthnot to his son, John Arbuthnot.

DEAR JOHN: FORT ST. MARK'S, April 2, 1818, nine o'clock in the morning.

As I am ill able to write a long letter, it is necessary to be brief. Before my arrival here, the commandant had received an express from the Governor of Pensacola, informing him of a large embarcation of troops, &c., under the immediate command of General Jackson; and the boat that brought the despatch reckoned eighteen sail of vessels off Appalachicola. By a deserter that was brought here by the Indians, the commandant was informed that three thousand men, under the orders of General Jackson, one thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse, under General Gaines, and five hundred under another general, were at Prospect Bluff, where they are rebuilding the burnt fort; that one thousand Indians, of different nations, were at Spanish Bluff, building another fort under the direction of American officers; that, so soon as these forts were built, they intended to march—they have commenced. Yesterday morning advice was received that they had appeared near —— and taken two of the sons of McQueen and an Indian. Late in the afternoon three schooners came to anchor at the mouth of the river, and this morning the American flag is seen flying on the largest.

I am blockaded here; no Indians will come with me; and I am now suffering from the fatigue of coming here alone.

The main drift of the Americans is to destroy the black population of Suwanee. Tell my friend Boleck that it is throwing away his people to attempt to resist such a powerful force as will be down on Suwanee; and, as the troops advance by land, so will the vessels by sea. Endeavor to get all the goods over the river in a place of security, as also the skins of all sorts; the corn must be left to its fate. So soon as the Suwanee is destroyed, I expect the Americans will be satisfied, and retire: this is only my opinion; but I think it is conformable to the demand made by General Gaines of Kenhagee some months since. In fact, do all you can to save all you can; save the books particularly. It is probable the commandant will receive some communication from the vessels to-day, when he will know more certainly what are their motives in coming off the fort. I think it is only to shut up the passage to the Indians. Twenty canoes went down the river yesterday, and were forced to return. The road between this and Mickasuky is said to be stopped. Hillis Hadjo and Homathlemico were here late last night to hear what vessels; they will remove all their cattle and effects across St. Mark's river this morning, and perhaps wait near thereto for the event.

I have been as brief as I can, to give you the substance of what appear facts that cannot be doubted; to enter into details in the present moment is useless. If the schooner is returned, get all the goods on board of her, and let her start off for Mannatee creek, in the bottom of Cedar Key bay; you will then only have the skins to hide away. But no delay must take place, as the vessels will, no doubt, follow the land army, and perhaps even now some are gone round. I pray your strictest attention, for the more that is saved will be eventually more to your interest. Let the bearer have as much calico as will make him two shirts, for his trouble; he has promised to deliver this in three, but I give him four days.

I am yours, affectionately,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

B.

From A. Arbuthnot to Charles Cameron, Governor of Bahamas.

Sir:

Being impowered by the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to represent the state of their nation to your excellency, that you may be pleased to forward the same for the information of His Majesty's Government, to whom alone they look up for protection against the aggressions and encroachments of the Americans, I beg leave to submit to your excellency the enclosed representations, humbly praying that your excellency will be pleased to take an early opportunity of forwarding the same to Great Britain.

I am also instructed by Boleck, chief of Suwanee, to make the demand herein enclosed, he never having had any share of the presents distributed at Prospect Bluff, though he rendered equally essential services as any of the other chiefs to the British cause while at war with America, and was at New Orleans with a part of his warriors. His frontiers being more exposed to the predatory incursions of the back Georgians, who enter his territory and drive off his cattle, he is obliged to have large parties out to watch their motions, and prevent their plundering; and being now deficient of ammunition, he prays your excellency will grant his small demand.

Humbly submitting the same, I have the honor to remain your excellency's most humble servant,

A. A.

The humble representations of the chiefs of the Creek nation to His Excellency Governor Cameron.

First, we beg leave to represent that Edmund Doyle and William Hambly, lately clerks at Prospect Bluff to Messrs. Forbes, and who still reside on the Appalachicola river, we consider as the principal cause of our present troubles and uneasiness. Hambly was the instrumental cause of the fort at Prospect Bluff being destroyed by the Americans, by which we lost the supplies intended for our future wants. Since then both these men have kept emissaries among us, tending to harass and disturb our repose, and that of our brethren of the Middle and Upper nations; they spread among us reports that the Cowetas, aided by the Americans, are descending to drive us off our land; they equally propagate false.

C.

From A. Arbuthnot to Benjamin Moodie, Esq., enclosing letters to Charles Bagot, Esq., British minister at Washington.

Sir: SUWANEE, IN THE CREEK NATION, January 27, 1818.

The enclosed containing matter of serious moment, and demanding the immediate attention of his excellency the British ambassador, I trust he will, for this time, forgive the trifling expense of postage, which I have endeavored to prevent as much as possible by comprising much matter in one sheet of paper. Should you, sir, be put to any trouble or expense by this trouble I give you, on being made acquainted with the same, I will instruct Bain, Dunshee, & Co. to order payment of the same.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

From A. Arbuthnot to the Honorable Charles Bagot.

Sir:

It is with pain I again obtrude myself upon your excellency's notice; but the pressing solicitations of the chiefs of the Creek nation, and the deplorable situation in which they are placed by the wanton aggressions of the Americans, I trust your excellency will take as a sufficient apology for the present intrusion.

In August last, the head chief of the Seminole Indians received a letter from General Gaines, of which I have taken the liberty of annexing your excellency the contents, as delivered me by the chief's head English interpreter, with Kenhagee's reply thereto.

This letter appears to have been intended to sound the disposition of the chief, and ascertain the force necessary to overrun the nation, for from then until an actual attack was made on Fowl Town, the same general, with General Jackson, seems to have been collecting troops and settlers in various quarters.

If your excellency desires to have further information respecting the situation of this country and its inhabitants, I can, from time to time, inform your excellency of such facts and circumstances as are stated to me by chiefs of known veracity, or which may come under my own observation; and your excellency's orders addressed to me at New Providence will either find me there, or be forwarded me to this country.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient servant,

A. A.

(No. 1.)

From General Gaines to the Seminole chiefs.

TO THE SEMINOLE CHIEFS:

Your Seminoles are very bad people; I don't say whom; you have murdered many of my people, and stolen my cattle; and many good houses, that have cost me money, you have burnt for me; and now that you see my writing, you will think I have spoken right. I know it is so—you know it is so; for now you may say I will not go upon you at random; but just give me the murderers, and I will show them my law; and when that is finished and passed, if you will come about any of my people, you will see your friends; and if you see me, you will see your friend. But there is something out in the sea, a bird with a forked tongue; whip him back before he lands, for he will be the ruin of you yet; perhaps you do not know who or what I mean—I mean the name of Englishman.

I tell you this, that if you do not give me up the murderers who have murdered my people, I say I have got good strong warriors with scalping-knives and tomahawks. You harbor a great many of my black people among you at Suwanee. If you give me leave to go by you against them, I shall not hurt any thing belonging to you.

GENERAL GAINES.

(No. 2.)

From Kenhagee to General Gaines, in answer to the foregoing.

You charge me with killing your people, stealing your cattle, and burning your houses. It is I that have cause to complain of the Americans. Where one American has been justly killed while in the act of stealing cattle, more than four Indians have been murdered while hunting by those lawless freebooters. I harbor no negroes. When the Englishmen were at war with America, some took shelter among them; and it is for you white people to settle those things among yourselves, and not to trouble us with what we know nothing about. I shall use force to stop any armed Americans from passing my towns or on my lands.

KENHAGEE.

To General GAINES.

"Note of Indian talks."

In August, Capp had a letter from General Gaines, in substance as annexed, No. 1, and returned the answer as by No. 2. Nothing further was said on either side. The end of October, a party of Americans from a fort on Flint river surrounded Fowl Town during the night, and began burning it; the Indians then in it fled to the swamp, and in their flight had three persons killed by fire from the Americans; they rallied their people, and forced the Americans to retire some distance, but not before they had two more persons killed. The Americans built a block-house or fort where they had fallen back to, and immediately sent to the forts up the country for assistance, stating the Indians were the aggressors. One of those letters falling into the hands of General Mitchell, he made inquiry, and found his people were the aggressors, and also settled with Inhimathlo for the loss his people had suffered; at the same time sending a talk to Kenhagee, by a headman, Opony, that he would put things in such a train as to prevent further encroachments, and get those Americans to leave the forts. But no sooner was this good talk given, and before the bearer of it returned home, than hundreds of Americans came pouring down on the Indians. Roused to a sense of their own danger, they flew to arms, and have been compelled to support them ever since. It is not alone from the country, but by vessels entering Appalachicola river, that troops and settlers are pouring into the Indian territory, and, if permitted to continue, will soon overrun the whole of the Indian lands.

From the talk sent Kenhagee by General Mitchell, I am in hopes that those aggressions of the Americans on the Indian territory are not countenanced by the American Government, but originate with men devoid of principle, who set laws and instructions at defiance, and stick at no cruelty and oppressions to obtain their ends. Against such oppressors the American Government must use not only all their influence, but, if necessary, force, or their names must be handed down to posterity as a nation more cruel and savage to the unfortunate aborigines of this country than ever were the Spaniards, in more dark ages, to the natives of South America.

The English Government, as the special protectors of the Indian nations, and on whom alone they rely for assistance, ought to step forward and save those unfortunate people from ruin; and as you, sir, are appointed to watch over those interests, it is my duty, as an Englishman, and the only one in this part of the Indian nation, to instruct you of the talks the chiefs bring me for your information; and I sincerely trust, sir, you will use the powers you are vested with for the service and protection of those unfortunate people, who look up to you as their savior. I have written General Mitchell, who I learn is an excellent man, and, as he acts as Indian agent, I hope his influence will stop the torrent of innovators, and give peace and quietness to the Creek nation.

I pray your excellency will pardon this intrusion, which nothing but the urgency of the case would have induced me to make.

I have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient servant,

A. A.

From Cappachimico and Boleck to Governor Cameron.

It is with pain we are again obliged to obtrude ourselves on your excellency's notice, in consequence of the cruel war we have been forced into by the irruption of the Americans into the heart of our lands. It will be first necessary to state to your excellency that one head chief, Kenhagee, received a letter from General Gaines in August last, a copy of which is enclosed, with the answer returned thereto. This letter only appears to have been a prelude to plans determined on by the said general and General Jackson, to bring on troops and settlers to drive us from our lands and take possession of them; for, in the end of October, a party of Americans surrounded Fowl Town during the night, and in the morning began setting fire to it, making the unfortunate inhabitants fly to the swamp, and who, in their flight, had three persons killed by the fire of the Americans. Our Indians, rallying, drove the Americans from the town, but, in their exertions, had two more of their people killed. The Americans retired some distance and built a fort or block-house to protect themselves until the assistance they had sent for to the forts up the country should arrive. A letter falling into the hands of General Mitchell, the Indian agent, which stated the Indians to have been the aggressors, he suspected its truth, and, on inquiry, found it was the reverse; in consequence, he made satisfaction to Inhimathlo, the chief of Fowl Town, and his people, for the injuries and losses they had sustained; at the same time he desired a talk to be sent to our head chiefs, stating his wish to see all the Indians friends, and that in twenty days he would send and get the Americans to retire from the forts. But this had no effect on the lawless invaders of our soil, for, before the bearer of the talk could return home, he met hundreds of Americans descending on us; they have also settlers and troops which come from Mobile, and go up the Appalachicola river. Thus, seeing no end to those inroads, necessity compelled us to have recourse to arms, and our brethren are now fighting for the land they inherited from their fathers for their families and friends. But what will our exertions do without assistance? Our sinews of war are almost spent; and harassed as we have been for years, we have not been able to lay by the means to provide for our extraordinary wants; and to whom can we look up to for protection and support, but to those friends who have at all former times held forth their hands to uphold us, and who have sworn, in their late treaty with the Americans, to see our just rights and privileges respected and protected from insult and aggression? We now call on your excellency, as the representative of our good father, King George, to send us such aid in ammunition as we are absolutely in want of, as our brother chief, Hillis Hadjo, was informed, when in England, that, when ammunition was wanted to enable us to protect our just rights, your excellency would supply us with what was necessary. We have applied to the Spanish officer at the fort of St. Mark, but his small supply prevents his being able to assist us, and we have only on your excellency to depend. We likewise pray your excellency would be pleased to send an officer or person to lead us right, and to apportion the supply you may be pleased to send us agreeably to our proper wants.

In praying your excellency will lend an ear to our demand, and despatch it without delay,

We remain your excellency's faithful and most obedient friends and servants,

CAPPACHIMICO,
BOLECK,

For ourselves and all the other chiefs of the Lower Creek nation.

To His Excellency Governor CAMERON.

Letter from A. Arbuthnot to Colonel Edward Nicholls.

SIR: NASSAU, N. P., August 26, 1817.

Especially authorized by the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation, whose names I affix to the present, I am desired to address you, that you may lay their complaint before His Majesty's Government. They desire it to be made known that they have implicitly followed your advice in living friendly with the Americans, who were their neighbors, and nowise attempted to molest them, though they have seen the Americans encroach on their territory, burning their towns, and making fields where their houses stood, on the Chatahoochee: rather than make resistance, they have retired lower in the peninsula. The town of Ecan Halloway, where Otis Mico was chief, is one instance of the encroachments of the Americans. This town is situated under the guns of Fort Gaines; and Micco was desired to submit to the Americans, or his town would be blown to atoms: rather than do so, he retired, and is now living in the lower nation; and his fields, and even where the town stood, is ploughed up by the Americans. They complain of the English Government neglecting them after having drawn them into a war with America; that you, sir, have not kept your promise of sending people to reside among them; and that, if they have not some person or persons resident in the nation to watch over their interests, they will soon be driven to the extremity of the peninsula. You left Mr. Hambly to watch over the interests of the Creek nation, but you had hardly left the nation when he turned traitor, and was led by Forbes to take the part of the Americans. His letter to me, of which I annex you a copy, will show you what lengths he could go if he had the means. It is Hambly and Doyle who give the Indians all the trouble they experience; they send their emissaries among the Lower Creeks, and make them believe the Cowetas, aided by the Americans, are arming against them: thus both are put in fear; and their fields are neglected, and hunting is not thought of. I have endeavored to do away this fear, by writing the chief of the Coweta towns that they ought to live on friendly terms with their brethren of the lower nation, whose wishes were to be on good terms with them, and not to listen to any bad talks, but to chase those that give them from among them. My letter was answered by them rather favorably, and I hope the talk that was sent to the Big Warrior last June will heal the difference between them.

Hillis Hadjo arrived in my schooner at Ochlochnee Sound last June, and was well received by all the chiefs and others who came to welcome him home. In consequence of his arrival, a talk was held, the substance of which I put on paper for them, and it was sent with a pipe of peace to the other nations. Hillis Hadjo wished to return to Nassau with me, but I prevailed on him to stay in the nation, and keep them all at peace. I regret, sir, to notice this poor man's affairs, though by his desire: it appears that he arrived in Nassau a short time after I had left it, in January, and Captain W. being here, took charge of him, his goods and money, prevailing on the governor to let him stay with him until he went down to the nation, which it was his intention to do. Of the money received of Governor Cameron, he had only given him eighty dollars, by Captain W., a barrel of sugar, a bag of coffee, and a small keg of rum; and the interpreter, Shugert, informed me that when Hillis Hadjo asked for an account, Captain W. refused it, saying it would be useless to a man who could not read. He also misses two cases, one of which contained, he thinks, crockery; I have made inquiry of His Majesty's ordnance storekeeper, and he informs me the whole were delivered to Captain W.; they are therefore lost to Hillis Hadjo.

I am desired to return Hillis Hadjo's warmest acknowledgments for the very handsome manner you treated him in England, and he begs his prayer may be laid at the foot of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent. I left him and all his family well on the 20th of June. Old Cappachimico desires me to send his best respects, and requests that you would send out people to live among them, and all the land they took from Forbes shall be theirs. At all events, they must have an agent among them, to see that the Americans adhere to the treaty, and permit them to live unmolested on their own lands. This agent should be authorized by His Majesty's Government, or he will not be attended to by the Americans. In the gazettes of Georgia, the Americans report the Seminole Indians are continually committing murders on their borders, and making incursions into the State. These are fabrications tending to irritate the American Government against the poor Indians; for, during the time I was in the nation, there was only one American killed, and he, with two others, was in the act of driving off cattle belonging to Bowlegs, chief of Suwanee; whereas three men and a boy were killed last June, by a party of American cattle-stealers, while in their hunting-camps; the boy they scalped; and one of Bowlegs' headmen was killed on St. John's river, in July. The back-woods Georgians, and those resident on the borders of the Indian nation, are continually entering it, and driving off cattle. They have, in some instances, made settlements, and particularly on the Choctawhatchy river, where a considerable number have descended.

By the treaty with Great Britain, the Americans were to give up to the Indians all the lands that they may have taken from them during the war, and place them on the same footing they were in 1811. It appears they have not done so; that Fort Gaines, on the Chatahoochee river, and Camp Crawford, on the Flint river, are both on Indian territory, that was not in possession of the Americans in 1811. They are fearful that, before any aid is given by the English Government, they will no longer be in possession of any territory.

I wrote last January to his excellency the honorable Charles Bagot, respecting the encroachments of the Americans; as I was informed by the copy of a letter from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, handed me by his excellency Governor Cameron, that His Majesty's ambassador had received orders to watch over the interests of the Indians. Since my return here, I have received of Mr. Moodie, of Charleston, an extract of a letter from the honorable Charles Bagot, stating that the expense of postage is so considerable, that any further communications of the same nature must be sent him by private hands. Now, sir, as no person goes direct from this to Washington, how am I to be able to comply with his desire? Thus he will be kept ignorant of the real situation of the poor Indians, and the encroachments daily made on their lands by American settlers: while he may be told by the American Government that no encroachments have been made, and that the forts they still hold are necessary to check the unruly Seminoles. Thus the person appointed to watch over the interests of the Indians having no other means of information than from the parties interested in their destruction, and seeing from time to time, in the American gazettes, accounts of cruel murders, &c. committed by the Indians on the frontier settlements of the United States, he apprehends the Indians merit all the Americans do to them.

But let His Majesty's Government appoint an agent, with full powers, and to correspond with His Majesty's ambassador at Washington, and his eyes will then be opened as to the motives that influence American individuals, as well as the Government, in vilifying the Indians. The powers given me and the instructions were to memorialize His Majesty's Government as well as the Governor General of Havana; but if you will be pleased to lay this letter before His Majesty's Secretary of State, it will save the necessity of the first; and I fear that a memorial to the governor general would be of no use. Referring you to the answer,*

I am, most respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

Lieut. Col. EDWARD NICHOLLS.

G.

From A. Arbuthnot to William Hambly.

SIR: OCHLOCHNEE SOUND, May 3, 1817.

On my return here this day, I received a letter signed by you, and dated 23d March. As you therein take the liberty of advising me, as you say, by order of the chiefs of the Creek nation, I am glad of, and shall embrace this opening you give me, and reply to you at some length. First, sir, let me premise that, when you lived at Prospect Bluff, a clerk to Messrs. Forbes & Co., you did not consider Cappachimico, McQueen, or any other of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation, as outlaws, nor have they ever been considered as such by the English Government, who are the especial protectors of the Indian nations; and it ill becomes Mr. Hambly to call Cappachimico an outlaw—that man who has ever been his friend, and by his authority has prolonged his life. Yes, sir, the young chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation, considering you as the chief cause of their troubles, would have long ere this had possession of you, and, perhaps, with your life made you pay the forfeit for the injuries heaped on them, had not that man, who has been your friend from your early youth, stepped in as your protector. Yet this is the man whom Mr. Hambly presumes to call an outlaw! A pardoned villain, when going to the gallows, would bless the hand that saved his life; but Mr. Hambly blasphemes his savior!

As Mr. Hambly's generous friend is the principal cause of my being in this country, as an honest man I shall endeavor to fulfil my promise to him and the other chiefs. The guilty alone have fear; an honest and upright man dreads no danger, fears no evil, as he commits no ill; and your arm of justice ought to be applied where it would rightly fall—on the heads of the really guilty. Your mean and vile insinuation, that I have been the cause of thefts and murders, comes ill from him who has been the cause of the murder of hundreds. Though your usage was made villainous at the fort, yet your revenge was too savage and sanguinary. If your conduct, sir, to the Indians were guided by as pure motives as mine, you would endeavor to influence them to esteem and respect each other as brothers, and live in harmony and friendship; cultivating their lands in summer, and taking their diversions of hunting in winter; respecting their neighbors, and making yourself respected by them. If thus, sir, you would act, (and by your knowledge of their language you have much more in your power than any other man,) you would then be the true friend of the Indians. Were I an instigator to theft and murder, would I hold the language I have done to the chiefs and others who have called on me? Ask the lieutenant commanding at Fort Gaines if my letter to him breathed the strains of a murderer; ask Opoy Hatcho, or Dany, his interpreter, if the recommendatory note I sent him by order of Opony could be written by an instigator to murder; ask Opony himself if my language to him was that of a murderer; ask Mappalitchy, a chief residing among the Americans on Ockmulgee, if my language and advice to him savored of that of a murderer. All those, and every Indian who has heard my talks, will contradict your vile assertions.

But Mappalitchy has given me a clue by which I can unravel from whence the aspersions come: not from Opony, Hatcho, or any of the chiefs of the upper towns, but from him who endeavors to lead them to mischiefs and quarrels with each other. Did not the chiefs hear my note read with respect, and perfectly accord with my sentiments of being all as brethren, uniting in the bonds of friendship and love? Did not they agree to smoke the pipe of peace with their brethren of the lower nation, and live in future as brothers? What made some of them alter their minds afterwards? The interference of a humane man, who caused them to write a letter to me demanding my removal from a band of outlaws, and which letter is signed "William Hambly."

I shall only make one more observation, and that will show from whence I came, and whether I came amongst the Indians as a revenger, or as the friend of peace and harmony.

In the spring of 1816, Mr. Hambly sent Governor Cameron a letter containing talks of the chiefs of the Indian nations: they were forwarded to England, and his excellency handed me, on my leaving Providence, an answer thereto from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, one of His Majesty's chief secretaries of state, that I might make the same known to the chiefs on my arrival in the nation. What will Governor Cameron think of the man who, in 1816, could write against the encroachments of the Americans on the Indian nation, and in the spring of 1817 call the chiefs of that nation, for whom he more especially wrote, outlaws? Mr. Hambly may sell his services to America, but no man can expatriate himself from the allegiance due to his native country; and a Government may call on a friendly nation to give up a subject that has seriously wronged her.

I recommend Mr. Hambly to be content with the douceur he may have received, and permit the unlettered Indian to live quietly and peaceably on his native land.

I shall send a copy of this letter with the one from you, to be read to the chiefs of the nation, and shall, at the same time, take an opportunity of explaining myself more fully than I did in the note sent by Opony. Wishing you a speedy recantation of your errors, and a return to your former way of thinking,

I am, your obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

Letter from A. Arbuthnot to the Governor of Havana.

The chiefs of the Creek nation, whose names are hereunto annexed, beg leave to approach your excellency and represent their complaints. Long imposed on by the persons keeping stores in this country, in charging us exorbitant prices for their goods, while they only allowed us a very trifling one for our peltry, we have found it necessary to look out for a person that will deal fairly with us, and we wish to establish a store for him on Appalache river. We have made application to the commandant of St. Mark's, and he has referred us to your excellency. It is not alone the impositions that have been practised upon us that has made us presume to address your excellency: we have complaints of a more serious nature against the persons employed by the only house that has been established among us, that of Mr. Forbes. In the first place, some years back, under false pretences, they attempted to rob us of a very large portion of our best lands, and we the more readily acceded to it, from the faithful promise given us that they would get English people to settle it and live among us; but, far from doing this, Mr. Forbes attempted to sell it to the American Government, and settle it with Americans. Thus finding ourselves deceived and imposed on, we withdrew our grant about three years since, which, from the stipulations contained therein not being fulfilled on the part of Mr. Forbes, we conceived we had a right to do. Secondly, Mr. Doyle and Mr. William Hambly, the two persons left in the nation to carry on Mr. Forbes's business, have, for more than two years, been endeavoring to influence us to join the Americans; and finding that fair means would not swerve us from our attachments to our ancient friends, the English, they have recently had recourse to threats of bringing the Americans down upon us; and that people only want a pretext to attack us, which the said Doyle and Hambly attempt to give them by spreading false reports of our murdering the Americans, stealing their cattle, and preparing for war against them, while, in fact, it is the Americans who murder our red brethren, steal our cattle by hundreds at a time, and are daily encroaching on our lands, and maintaining the settlers in their ill-gotten possessions by armed force.

On the Choctawhatchy river there is a large body of Americans, forming settlements, and more are daily joining them. As this river is far within that line marked out by your excellency's Government and the Americans some years since, (though that line was unknown to us until very lately, and we never gave our sanction, nor, in fact, knew of any sale of our lands being made to the Americans,) we trust your excellency will give orders to displace them from within the line, and send them back to their own country. Our delaying to address your excellency to represent the afore-mentioned grievances has been owing to the want of a person to attend to our talks, and put them in writing for us. The commandant of the fort of St. Mark has heard all our talks and complaints. He approves of what we have done and what we are doing, and it is by his recommendation we have thus presumed to address your excellency.

We have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient and very humble servants,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

To His Excellency the GOVERNOR GENERAL, &c.

No. 2.

[Supposed to be from Bowlegs to the Governor of St. Augustine.]

SIR:

I had the honor of receiving your letter of September, but the impossibility of finding a person to write an answer to the same is the cause of this apparent neglect.

I shall be very happy to keep up a good understanding and correspondence with you, and hope you will, when occasion offers, advise me of such things as may be of service to myself and people. My warriors and others that go to St. Augustine return with false reports tending to harass and distress my people, and preventing them from attending to their usual avocations. At one time the Americans and upper Indians, supported by a force of about three thousand men, were running lines far within the Indian territory; at another time, they are collecting a force at Fort Mitchell, in the forks of Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, to fall on the towns below. Now, sir, we know of no reason the Americans can have to attack us, an inoffensive and unoffending people. We have none of their slaves; we have taken none of their property since the Americans made peace with our good father, King George. We have followed the orders of his officer that was with us, Lieutenant Colonel Edward Nicholls, and in nowise molested the Americans, though we daily see them encroaching on our territory, stealing our cattle, and murdering and carrying off our people. That same officer also told us, we, as allies to the great King, our father, were included in the treaty of peace between our good father and the Americans, and that the latter were to give up all the territory that had been taken from us before and during the war. Yet, so far from complying with the ninth article of that treaty, they are daily making encroachments on our land, getting persons who are not known to the chiefs, and without any power or authority to grant and sign over lands to them. Thus they deceive the world, and make our very friends believe we are in league with them.

The principal chiefs of the nation, with the head warriors, assembled at my town on the 8th instant, and came to the resolution of informing the British minister at Washington of the conduct of the Americans and the officers of their Government towards us; it has been done accordingly, and copies sent to England. We demand of the King, our father, to fix some of his people among us, who may inform him from time to time of what is passing, and see the Americans do not extend themselves on our lands. The Spanish subjects in the Floridas are too much in the interests of the Americans to be our friends. For the governors I shall always entertain the greatest regard; but for the people, they do not act so as to merit my esteem and protection. You desire I would chase those marauders who steal my cattle: my people have lately driven some Americans from Lahhewary, and I have no doubt the Americans will lay hold of this as a pretext to make war on us, as they have before done, in stating we harbor their runaway slaves.*

No. 3.

Sir:

Kenhagee, the head chief of the Lower Creek nation, has called on me to request I would represent to you the cruel and oppressive conduct of the American people living on the borders of the Indian nation, and which he was in hopes, from a talk you were pleased to send him some weeks since, would have been put a stop to, and peace restored between the Indians and American people. But, far from any stop being put to their inroads and encroachments, they are pouring in by hundreds at a time, not only from the land side, but ascending the Appalachicola in vessel-loads. Thus, the Indians have been compelled to take up arms to defend their homes from a set of lawless invaders. Your known philanthropy and goodwill to the Indians induce the head chiefs to hope that you will lose no time in using your influence to put a stop to those invasions of their lands, and order that those who have already presumed to seize our fields may retire therefrom.

The Indians have seized two persons who they think have been greatly instrumental in bringing the Americans upon them, and they are now in their possession as prisoners. It is even reported they have made sales of Indian lands without the knowledge, consent, or approbation of the chiefs of the nation; and, from their long residence in the nation, and the great influence that one of those people formerly enjoyed among the chiefs as their chief, there is some reason to believe he has been guilty of improper conduct with regard to the Indian nation.†

General Mitchell, Agent for Indian Affairs.

Petition of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to Governor Cameron.

We, the undersigned, have been deputed by the chiefs of the Creek nation to wait on your excellency, and lay before you their heavy complaints. To the English we have always looked up as friends, as protectors; and on them we now call to aid us in repelling the approaches of the Americans, who, regardless of treaties, are daily seizing our lands and robbing our people. They have already built seven forts on our lands; they are making roads and running lines into the very heart of our country; and, without the interference of the English, we shall soon be driven from the land we inherited from our forefathers.

The Americans tell us the English will regard us no more, and that we had better submit to them; but we cannot submit to their shackles, and will rather die in defence of our country.

When peace was made between the English and Americans, we were told by Lieutenant Colonel E. Nicholls that the Americans were to give up our lands they had taken, and we were desired to live quietly and peaceably, in nowise molesting the Americans. We have strictly followed these orders; but the Americans have not complied with the treaty. Colonel Nicholls left William Hambly in charge of the fort at Prospect Bluff, with orders to hear us, if any cause of complaint, and represent the same to the British Government; but he turned traitor, and brought the Americans down on the fort, which was blown up, and many of our red brethren destroyed in it. The ammunition and stores intended for our use were either destroyed or taken off by the Americans. We have sent several messengers to inform your excellency of these proceedings of the Americans, but they have never returned to us with an answer. Three of our red brethren have lately been killed by the Americans, while hunting on our own lands; and they threaten to attack the towns of Mickasuky and Suwanee, the only two large towns left us in the Creek nation; and, without aid from your excellency, we cannot repel their attack. We are, therefore, deputed to demand of your excellency the assistance of troops and ammunition, that we may be able effectually to repel the attack of the Americans, and prevent their further encroachments; and if we return without assistance, the Americans, who have their spies among us, will the more quickly come upon us. We most humbly pray your excellency will send such a force as will be respected and make us respectable.‡

Charles Cameron, Esq., Governor, Commander-in-chief, &c.

I beg leave to represent to your excellency the necessity of my again returning to the Indian nation with the deputies from the chiefs; and as my trouble and expense can only be defrayed by permission to take goods to dispose of among them, I pray your excellency will be pleased to grant me such letter or license as will prevent me from being captured, in case of meeting with any Spanish cruiser on the coast of Florida.

SIR:

I duly received your letter of the 20th instant, enclosing one from Nassau. I shall be obliged to you if you will take an immediate opportunity of writing to the gentleman from whom you received that letter, acquainting him from me that the expenses of postage are so considerable that I must request, if he has occasion to write to me again upon the same subject, he will forward his letters by private opportunities only.

No. 6.

Copy of a letter from A. Arbuthnot to General Mitchell, (enclosed by Col. Brearly, 27th February, 1818.)

[The last paragraph is the extract referred to in page 590. No. 3 appears to be the rough draught of the other paragraphs.]

SIR: SUWANEE, LOWER CREEK NATION, January 19, 1818.

Kenhagee, head chief of the Lower Creek nation, had called on me to request I would represent to you the cruel and oppressive conduct of the American people living on the borders of the Indian nation, and which he was in hopes, from a talk you were pleased to send him some weeks since, would have been put a stop to, and peace restored between the Indians and the American people; but far from any stop being put to their inroads and encroachments, they are pouring in by hundreds at a time, not only from the land side, but both troops and settlers ascending the Appalachicola river in vessel-loads. Thus, the Indians have been compelled to take up arms to defend their homes from a set of lawless invaders.

Your known philanthropy and goodwill towards the Indians in general induce the chiefs to hope that you will lose no time in using your influence to put a stop to those invasions of their lands and paternal birthright, and also order that those who have already seized on their fields may retire therefrom.

The Indians have seized two persons known to have been greatly instrumental in bringing the Americans down on their lands, and they are now in their possession as prisoners; and they have it in report that sales of their lands have been made by those two people without the consent, approbation, or knowledge of the chiefs; and from their long residence in the nation, and the one having enjoyed great confidence in the nation, and with the chiefs, as English interpreter, there is some reason to believe those reports, when leagued with the swarms of Americans coming from Mobile and other places, seizing the best of the Indian lands. Such improper sales have actually been made.

In taking this liberty of addressing you, sir, in behalf of the unfortunate Indians, believe me I have no wish but to see an end put to a war which, if persisted in, I foresee must eventually be their ruin, and, as they were not the aggressors, if, in the height of their rage, they committed any excesses, that you will overlook them as the just ebullition of an indignant spirit against an invading foe.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient and humble servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

By order of Kenhagee and Bowlegs, acting for themselves and the other chiefs.

To General MITCHELL, Agent for Indian Affairs.

CAMP BEFORE ST. MARK'S, April 8, 1818.

The foregoing letter was produced to A. Arbuthnot, on his examination before me, and acknowledged by him to have been written by him to General Mitchell, agent for the Creek nation.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Present: Mr. FULTON.

DEFENCE.

May it please this Honorable Court:

The prisoner arraigned before you is sensible of the indulgence granted by this honorable court in the examination of the case now before them. It is not the wish of the prisoner, in making his defence, to tire the patience of the court by a minute reference to the voluminous documents and papers, or to recapitulate the whole of the testimony which has come before this honorable court in the course of this investigation. Nor is it the intention of the prisoner to waste the invaluable time of this court by appeals to their feelings or sympathy, though I am persuaded that sympathy nowhere more abounds than in a generous American breast. My only appeal is to the sound and impartial judgment of this honorable court, the purity and uprightness of their hearts, that they will dispassionately and patiently weigh the evidence which they have before them, apply the law, and on these, and these alone, pronounce their judgment.

If this honorable court please, I shall now proceed to examine the law and evidence that is relied on by this honorable court in support of the first charge and specification.

Winslett, a witness on the part of the prosecution, says: The Little Prince showed him a letter written in June last, signed A. Arbuthnot, requesting his friendship with the lower nation of Indians. The same witness stated he believed the letter to be now in the possession of the Little Prince. Here, may it please this honorable court, I would call their attention to the law relating to evidence; first premising that the rules of evidence are the same, whether in civil or military tribunals. (McCom. 99.) This point being conceded, the next inquiry is, what are the rules of evidence with respect to the admission of letters or papers of private correspondence in a court of criminal jurisdiction? May it please this honorable court, must you not produce the original letters and papers, if they are not lost or mislaid so that they cannot be obtained? And, in case they are lost, proof must be made of the handwriting being the same as that of the original, before they can be received as evidence. (McCom. on Courts-Martial. Peake's Evidence. Gilbert's Law of Evidence.) No instance can be cited where a copy of a letter was read as evidence when the original could be obtained, much less the giving in evidence the contents of such letter from bare recollection. The only proof that this honorable court has of the existence of such a letter being in the hands of any person, or its contents being known, is the vagrant memory of a vagrant individual. Make this a rule of evidence, and I ask you where would implication, construction, and invention stop? Whose property, whose reputation, or whose life would be safe? Here I would beg leave to mention a remark made by the president of this court in the course of this investigation, which was, that, notwithstanding the letter was proved by the witness to be in the possession of the Little Prince, this court could not notice that circumstance, because there was no means by which it could be obtained. I would ask the honorable court what means have they adopted, or what exertions have they made to procure this letter? If the honorable court please, I shall here close the defence on the first charge and specification, believing that they are neither supported by law nor evidence.

May it please the honorable court, I will now come to the second charge, and first specification of that charge. In support of this charge and specification, the evidence before the court is a letter written to my son. If the court please, this letter was written in consequence of the situation of my property at Suwanee, and the large debts that were due me from Bowlegs and his people. Nothing, I believe, of an inflammatory nature can be found on reading the document marked A, authorizing the opinion that I was prompting the Indians to war. On the contrary, if the honorable court will examine the document marked A, they will see that I wish to lull their fears, by informing them that it was the negroes and not the Indians that the Americans were principally moving against.

If the honorable court please, I will make a few remarks upon the second specification, and then close my defence. In proof of this charge, the court have before them the evidence of Hambly, Cook, and sundry letters purporting to be written by myself to different individuals. May it please the court, what does Cook prove? Why, that I had ten kegs of powder at Suwanee. Let me appeal to the experience of the court, if they think that this quantity of powder would supply one thousand Indians, and an equal number of blacks, more than two months for hunting. As to the letters named in this specification, may it please the court, the rules of evidence laid down in the first part of this defence will apply with equal force in the present case. It remains now, may it please the court, to say something as to Hambly's testimony. And may it please this honorable court, the rule laid down in this case as to hearsay evidence will be found without a precedent. A strong case was stated by an intelligent member of this court, on the examination of this part of the evidence; that is, "would you receive as testimony what a third person had said, who, if present, you would reject as incompetent?" Apply this principle to the present case; could an Indian be examined on oath in our courts of judicature? If, then, the testimony of savages is inadmissible, Hambly proves nothing.

Here, may it please the honorable court, I close my reply to the charges and specifications preferred against me; being fully persuaded that, should there be cause for censure, my judges will, in the language of the law, lean to the side of mercy.

Continuation of the minutes of the proceedings of a special court, whereof Major General Gaines is president, convened by order of the 26th April, 1818.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 27, 1818.

The court proceeded to the trial of Robert C. Ambrister, a British subject, who, being asked if he had any objections to any one of the members of the court, and replying in the negative, was arraigned on the following charges and specifications, viz:

Charges against Robert C. Ambrister, now in custody, who says he is a British subject.

CHARGE 1. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, supplying them with the means of war, he being a subject of Great Britain, at peace with the United States, and lately an officer in the British colonial marines.

Specification 1. That the said Robert C. Ambrister did give intelligence of the movements and operations of the American army between the 1st and 20th March, 1818, and did excite them (the negroes and Indians) to war against the army of the United States, by sending their warriors to meet and fight the American army, whose Government was in peace and friendship with the United States, and all her citizens.

CHARGE 2. Leading and commanding the Lower Creek Indians in carrying on war against the United States.

Specification 1. That the said Robert C. Ambrister, a subject of Great Britain, which Government was in peace and amity with the United States and all her citizens, did, between the 1st of February and 20th of March, 1818, levy a war against the United States, by assuming command of the Indians in hostility and open war with the United States, and ordering a party of them to meet the army of the United States, and give them battle, as will appear by his letters to Governor Cameron, of New Providence, dated 20th March, 1818, which are marked A, C, and D; and the testimony of Mr. Peter B. Cook, and Captain Lewis, of the schooner Chance.

By order of the court:

J. M. GLASSELL, Recorder.

To which charges and specifications, the prisoner pleaded as follows, viz:
To the first charge and specification, not guilty.
To the second charge and specification, guilty, and justification.
The court adjourned until to-morrow morning, at seven o'clock.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 28, 1818.

The court met pursuant to adjournment. Present:

Major General GAINES, President.

Members.

Colonel King,	Colonel Dyer,
Colonel Williams,	Lieutenant Colonel Lindsay,
Lieutenant Colonel Gibson,	Lieutenant Colonel Elliott,
Major Muhlenberg,	Major Fanning,
Major Montgomery,	Major Minton,
Captain Vashon,	Captain Crittenden.

Lieutenant J. M. Glassell, Recorder.

The recorder then read to the court the following order, viz:

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, NEAR ST. MARK'S, April 28, 1818.

GENERAL ORDER.

Captain Allison, of the 7th infantry, is detailed to form a supernumerary member of the special court now sitting at Fort St. Mark's.

By order: ROBERT BUTLER, Adjutant General.

Pursuant to the above order, the supernumerary member took his seat.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, about the 5th or 6th of April, 1818, his vessel and himself having been captured by the prisoner, and he brought to Suwanee as a prisoner, there was an alarm among the negroes and Indians, created by learning some news from Mickasuky, at which time the prisoner appeared active in giving orders and sending a detachment to meet the American army. The witness also stated that the prisoner appeared to be a person vested with authority among the negro leaders, and gave orders for their preparation for war, procuring ammunition, &c., and that the leaders came to him for orders; the prisoner furnished them with powder and lead, and recommended to them the making of balls, &c. very quickly. The witness also stated that the prisoner occasionally dressed in uniform, with his sword, and that on the first alarm, which he understood was from Mickasuky, by a negro woman, he put on his uniform. The witness further stated that, some time about the 20th of March, 1818, the prisoner, with an armed body of negroes (twenty-four in number) came on board his vessel, and ordered him to pilot them to Fort St. Mark's, which he stated he intended to capture before the Americans could get there, threatening to hang the witness if he did not obey.

Question by the court. Did you ever understand by whose authority and for what purpose the accused came into the country?

Answer. I have frequently heard him say that he came to attend to Mr. Woodbine's business at the bay of Tampa.

Question by the prisoner. Did I not tell you, when I came on board the schooner Chance, I wished you to pilot me to St. Mark's, as I was informed that two Americans, by the names of Hambly and Doyle, were confined there, and I wished to have them released from their confinement?

Answer. You stated you wanted to get Hambly and Doyle from St. Mark's; I do not know what were your intentions in so doing.

Question. Did I not tell you that I expected the Indians would fire on me when I arrived at St. Mark's?

Answer. You did not; you stated that you intended to take the fort in the night by surprise.

Question. Did you see me give ammunition to the negroes and Indians; if so, how much, and at what time?

Answer. I saw you give powder and lead to the negroes when you came on board, and advised them to make balls; and I saw you give liquor and paint to the Indians.

Question. Have you not often heard me say, between the 1st and 20th of April, that I would not have any thing to do with the negroes and Indians in exciting them to war with the United States?

Answer. About the 15th of April I heard you say you would not have any thing to do with the negroes and Indians; I heard nothing about exciting them to war.

Question. Can you read writing?

Answer. Not English writing.

Question. Did you not hear me say, when arriving at Suwanee, that I wished to be off immediately for Providence?

Answer. I did not; after the alarm, you said you wished to be off for Tampa.

Question. Did you not say to the accused you wished to visit Mr. Arbuthnot at his store on Suwanee, and get provisions yourself?

Answer. I did not; I stated I wanted provisions.

Question. Did I send or command any Indians to go and fight the Americans?

Answer. I do not exactly know that you sent them; the Indians and negroes were crowding before your door, and you were dividing the paint, &c. among them; and I understood a party was going to march.

Question. Did I not give up the schooner in charge to you as captain?

Answer. After our return from Suwanee town, you directed me to take charge of her to go to Tampa.

JOHN J. ARBUTHNOT, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, some time about the 23d of March, the prisoner came with a body of negroes, partly armed, to his father's store, on Suwanee river, and told the witness that he had come to do justice to the country, by taking the goods and distributing them among the negroes and Indians, which the witness saw the prisoner do; and that the prisoner stated to him that he had come to the country on Woodbine's business, to see the negroes righted. The witness has further known the prisoner to give orders to the negroes; and that, at his suggestion, a party was sent from Suwanee to meet the Americans to give them battle; which party returned on meeting the Mickasuky Indians in their flight. The witness also testified to the handwriting of the letter marked A, and referred to in the specification of the second charge as the writing of the prisoner.

Question by the prisoner. Did you hear me say that I came on Woodbine's business?

Answer. I did.

Question by the prisoner. Were not the negroes alluded to at Arbuthnot's store before I arrived?

Answer. No, you came with them.

PETER B. COOK, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that he never heard the prisoner give any orders to Indians or negroes; that the prisoner did distribute Arbuthnot's goods, and also paint, to the negroes and Indians; also, that some powder was brought from Suwanee by the prisoner, and distributed among the negroes by Nero. Some time in March the prisoner took Arbuthnot's schooner, and, with an armed party of negroes, about twenty-four in number, set out for St. Mark's for the purpose of taking Arbuthnot's goods at that place, and stated that he would compel the commandant to give them up. On hearing of the approach of the American army, the prisoner told the negroes it was useless for them to run; for, if they ran any farther, they would be driven into the sea.

The prisoner told the witness that he had been a lieutenant in the British army under Colonel Nicholls. The prisoner was sent by Woodbine to Tampa to see about those negroes he had left there. The prisoner told the witness that he had written a letter to Governor Cameron for ammunition for the Indians some time in March, and also told the witness that he had a commission in the patriot army under McGregor, and that he expected a captaincy. The witness testified that the letters marked A, B, C, and D, and referred to in the specification to the second charge, were in the handwriting of the prisoner; also one marked E.

Question by the prisoner. Did you not frequently hear me say that I would have nothing to do with the Indians in exciting them to war with the United States?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Are you acquainted with Lewis Phenix, and have you not heard him express ill-will against me in consequence of my wishing him to pilot me to St. Mark's?

Answer. I never did.

Question. Do you know of my sending troops at any time to fight against the United States; and have I not been constantly with you, so that you would have had an opportunity of knowing if there had been any sent by me?

Answer. I have not. They might have been sent without my knowledge.

JACOB HARMON, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, some time in the latter end of March, or 1st of April, the prisoner took possession of the schooner Chance, with an armed party of negroes, and stated his intentions of taking St. Mark's. On his way thither, on going ashore, he learned from some Indians that Arbuthnot had gone to St. Mark's, which induced him to return. The witness also stated that while the prisoner was on board, he had complete command of the negroes, who considered him as their captain. The prisoner took the cargo of the vessel up towards Suwanee, which consisted of, with other articles, nine kegs of powder and five hundred pounds of lead.

The evidence on both sides being closed, the prisoner was allowed until five o'clock this evening to make his defence.

The time allowed the prisoner for the preparation of his defence having expired, he was brought before the court, and made the defence marked M, which is attached to these proceedings.

The court was then cleared, and the proceedings read over by the recorder, when, after due deliberation on the testimony brought forward, the court found the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, guilty of so much of the specification to the first charge as follows, viz: "And did excite them to war with the United States, by sending their warriors to meet and fight the American army, he being a subject of Great Britain, which Government was at peace and friendship with the United States and all her citizens;" but not guilty of the other part of the specification; guilty of the first charge; guilty of the specification of the second charge, and guilty of the second charge; and do therefore sentence the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, to suffer death, by being shot, two-thirds of the members of the court concurring therein.

One of the members of the court requesting a reconsideration of his vote on the sentence, the sense of the court was taken thereon, and decided in the affirmative; when the vote was again taken, and the court sentenced the prisoner to receive fifty stripes on his bare back, and be confined with a ball and chain to hard labor for twelve calendar months.

The court adjourned sine die.

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Maj. Gen. by brevet, President of the court.

SIR: SUWANEE, NEAR FORT ST. MARK'S, March 20, 1818.

I am requested particularly by all our Indian chiefs to acquaint your excellency that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them two years ago, and have advanced some considerable distance in their country, and are now making daily progress. They say they sent a number of letters to your excellency by Mr. Arbuthnot, but have never received one answer, which makes them believe that he never delivered them, and you will oblige them much if you will let them know whether he did or not. The purport of the letters was, begging your excellency to be kind enough to send them down some gunpowder, muskets, balls, lead, cannon, &c., as they are now completely out of those articles. The Americans may march through the whole territory in one month, and, without arms, &c., they must surrender. Hillis Hadjo, or Francis, the Indian chief, the one that was in England, tells me to let your excellency know that the Prince Regent told him that whenever he wanted ammunition your excellency would supply him with as much as he wanted. They beg me to press upon your excellency's mind to send the above-mentioned articles down by the vessel that brings this to you, as she will sail for this place immediately, and let the Prince Regent know of their situation. Any letters that your excellency may send down be good enough to direct to me, as they have great dependence in my writing. Any news that your excellency may have respecting them and America, you will be doing a great favor to let me know, that I may send among them.

There is now a very large body of Americans and Indians, which I expect will attack us every day, and God only knows how it will be decided; but I must only say that this will be the last effort with us. There has been a body of Indians gone to meet them, and I have sent another party. I hope your excellency will be pleased to grant the favor they request. I have nothing further to add,

But am, sir, with due respect, your obedient, humble servant,

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

B.

From Robert C. Ambrister to Brevet Major Edward Nicholls.

DEAR SIR: SUWANEE, NEAR RIVER APPALACHICOLA.

Francis and all the Indian chiefs have requested me particularly to acquaint you that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them these two years past, and are making daily progress in their territory, and say they will proceed; that you are the only friend they have in that part of the world, and hope you will exert yourself in their behalf, and ask for as much assistance as can be had; that the Americans are at the forks of the river Appalachicola; they have written a number of times to England and Providence, but have never received one answer; they expect the man never delivered the letters, but they have full hopes in my writing; they request you will make the Prince Regent acquainted with their deplorable situation. The Americans have been very cruel ever since they have commenced, and hope you will not lose a single moment in forwarding their views; they say they will be extremely happy to see you out; nothing would give them greater pleasure than to see you out at this present time. If they should not see you, send them out all news and directions, that they may be guided by them. There are about three hundred blacks at this place, and a few of our bluff people; they beg me to say they depend on your promises, and expect you are on the way out; they have stuck to the cause, and will always believe in the faith of you, and any directions you may give. Send to me at this place, and I will do what I can.

I remain, my dear sir, most truly yours,

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

N. B. Francis says you must bring the horses when you come out that you promised, and that his house has been burnt down, and with it his uniform clothes.

R. C. A.

C.

I am requested particularly by the Indian chiefs to acquaint your excellency that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them a long time since, and have advanced some distance in their territory, and are still continuing to advance; that they, the chiefs of Florida, have sent repeatedly to your excellency, and have never received one answer; they suspect Mr. Arbuthnot has never delivered the papers to your excellency; they wish me to state to you that they are completely out of ammunition, muskets, &c., begging your excellency will be pleased to send them the articles above mentioned, with a few cannon, as the Americans build their boats so strong that their rifle balls cannot penetrate their sides. To the captain of the vessel, who will come down again, I have given an order to make your excellency acquainted with what time the vessel will sail for this place. Your excellency will, I hope, be good enough to make the Prince Regent acquainted with their situation, and ask for assistance, which they have pressed me very hard to press on your excellency's mind, and likewise to send them down what news may be respecting them and the country, which will be a great satisfaction to them.

I have the honor to be, sir, with due respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

N. B. They beg your excellency will be as expeditious as possible. Your excellency is the only dependence they have, and who the Prince Regent told them would give them every assistance that lay in your power.

R. C. A.

D.

I am requested by Francis, and all the Indian chiefs, to acquaint your excellency that they are at war with the Americans, and have been some time back; that they are in great distress, for the want of ammunition, balls, arms, &c., and have written by Mr. Arbuthnot several times, but they suppose he never delivered them to your excellency. You will oblige them much to let them know whether he did or not. I expect the Americans and Indians will attack us daily. I have sent a party of men to oppose them.

They beg me to press on your excellency's mind to lay the situation of the country before the Prince Regent, and ask for assistance. All news respecting them your excellency will do a favor to let me know by the first opportunity, that I may make them acquainted. I have given directions to the captain to let your excellency know when the vessel will sail for this place.

I hope your excellency will be pleased to send them the ammunition. I expect, if they don't procure some very shortly, that the Americans will march through the country. I have nothing further to add,

But am, dear sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

E.

Robert C. Ambrister to Peter B. Cook.

DEAR COOK: MOUTH OF THE RIVER, Tuesday, 3 o'clock.

The boat arrived here about three o'clock on Thursday. The wind has been ahead ever since I have been down; the rudder of the vessel is in a bad condition, but I will manage to have it done to-night. The wind, I am in hopes, will be fair in the morning, when I will get under way, and make all possible despatch. I will make old Lewis pilot me safe. If those Indians do not conduct themselves strait, I would use rigorous measures with them. Beware of Mr. Jerry; I found him on board when I came; keep a good look out. I have sent two kegs of powder, and a bar of lead.

Yours, &c. R. C. A.

DEFENCE.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 28, 1818.

The United States of America vs. Robert Christie Ambrister,

Who being arraigned before a special court-martial upon the following charges, to wit:

CHARGE 1. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, supplying them with the means of war, he being a subject of Great Britain, at peace with the United States, and lately an officer in the British colonial marines.

CHARGE 2. Leading and commanding the Lower Creek Indians in carrying on war against the United States.

To the first charge, the prisoner at the bar pleaded not guilty; and as to the second charge, he pleaded guilty, and justification. The prisoner at the bar feels grateful to this honorable court for their goodness in giving a sufficiency of time to deliberate and arrange his defence on the above charges.

The prisoner at the bar here avails himself of the opportunity of stating to this court, that, inasmuch as the testimony which was introduced in this case was very explicit, and went to every point the prisoner could possibly wish, he has nothing further to offer in his defence, but puts himself upon the mercy of this honorable court.

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Camp four miles north of ST. MARK'S, April 29, 1818.

GENERAL ORDERS.

At a special court-martial, commenced on the 26th instant, at St. Mark's, and continued until the night of the 28th, of which Brevet Major General E. P. Gaines is president, was tried A. Arbuthnot, on the following charges and specifications, viz:

CHARGE 1. Exciting and stirring up the Creek Indians to war against the United States and her citizens, he, A. Arbuthnot, being a subject of Great Britain, with whom the United States are at peace.

CHARGE 2. Acting as a spy, aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, and supplying them with the means of war.

CHARGE 3. Exciting the Indians to murder and destroy William Hambly and Edmund Doyle, confiscate their property, and causing their arrest, with a view to their condemnation to death, and the seizure of their property, they being citizens of Spain, on account of their active and zealous exertions to maintain peace between Spain, the United States, and the Indians.

To which charges the prisoner pleaded not guilty.

The court, after mature deliberation on the evidence adduced, find the prisoner, A. Arbuthnot, guilty of the first charge, and guilty of the second charge, leaving out the words "acting as a spy;" and, after mature reflection, sentence him, A. Arbuthnot, to be suspended by the neck until he is dead.

Was also tried Robert C. Ambrister, on the following charges, viz:

CHARGE 1. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, and supplying them with the means of war, he being a subject of Great Britain, at peace with the United States, and late an officer of the British colonial marines.

CHARGE 2. Leading and commanding the Lower Creek Indians in carrying on war against the United States.

To which charges the prisoner pleaded as follows, viz:

To the first charge, not guilty. To the second charge, guilty, and justification.

The court, on examination of the evidence, and on mature deliberation, find the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, guilty of the first and second charges, and do, therefore, sentence him to suffer death, by being shot. One of the members requesting a reconsideration of the vote on this sentence, and it being had, they sentence the prisoner to receive fifty stripes on his bare back, and be confined with a ball and chain to hard labor for twelve calendar months.

The commanding general approves the finding and sentence of the court in the case of A. Arbuthnot; and approves the finding and first sentence of the court in the case of Robert C. Ambrister; and disapproves the reconsideration of the sentence of the honorable court in his case; it appearing, from the evidence and pleading of the prisoner, that he did lead and command within the territory of Spain (being a subject of Great Britain) the Indians in war against the United States, these nations being at peace. It is an established principle of the law of nations, that any individual of a nation, making war against the citizens of another nation, they being at peace, forfeits his allegiance, and becomes an outlaw and pirate. This is the case of Robert C. Ambrister, clearly shown by the evidence adduced.

The commanding general orders that Brevet Major A. C. W. Fanning, of the corps of artillery, will have, between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock A. M., A. Arbuthnot suspended by the neck with a rope until he is dead; and Robert C. Ambrister to be shot to death, agreeably to the sentence of the court.

John James Arbuthnot will be furnished with a passage to Pensacola by the first vessel.

Captain R. K. Call, of the 1st regiment of infantry, is appointed volunteer aid-de-camp to the commanding general, until further orders.

The special court, of which Brevet Major General E. P. Gaines is president, is dissolved.

By order of Major General A. JACKSON:

ROBERT BUTLER, Adjutant General.

MILLEDGEVILLE, February 5, 1817.

You no doubt have already been informed that the notorious Woodbine has recently made his appearance again, at the mouth of the Appalachicola, and that he has an agent now among the Seminole Indians and negroes in that quarter, stirring them up to acts of hostility against this country; and that Woodbine himself has gone, in an armed vessel, to some part of the West Indies for supplies. Connected with this fact is another, which may serve as an intimation of the future conduct of these people, when once in the possession of the supplies which it is said they expect on the return of Woodbine. About ten or twelve days ago, a small party of those Indians entered the frontier of Wayne county, and stole two horses and some cattle; they were pursued by some of the inhabitants, who peaceably demanded a restoration of the stolen property; and, instead of a compliance on the part of the Indians, they immediately fired upon the whites, who retired without returning a shot. One of the whites was mortally wounded.

FEBRUARY 24, 1817.

The charge given me by Colonel Clinch and yourself, and other officers of the United States, induces me to believe there is a confidence placed in me which I ought not to deceive; I therefore think it my duty as well as my inclination to give you the following information: There was a friend of mine, not long since, in the Fowl Town on Flint, and he saw many horses, cattle, and hogs, that had come immediately from the State of Georgia; and they are bringing them away continually. They speak in the most contemptuous manner of the Americans, and threaten to have satisfaction for what has been done—meaning the destruction of the negro fort. There is another of my acquaintances returned immediately from the Seminole towns, and saw the negroes on parade there; he counted about six hundred that bore arms; they have chosen officers of every description, and endeavor to keep up a regular discipline, and are very strict in punishing violators of their military rules. There is said to be about the name number of Indians belonging to their party, and there are both negroes and Indians daily going to their standard. They say they are in complete fix for fighting, and wish for an engagement with the Americans, or McIntosh's troops; they would let them know they had something more to do than they had at Appalachicola. They have chosen Bowlegs for their head, and nominated him King, and pay him all kind of monarchial respect, almost to idolatry, keeping a picket guard at the distance of five miles. They have a number of the likeliest American horses. But there are one or two chiefs that are not of the choir; Kenhagee, the Mickasuky chief, is one that is an exception.

FEBRUARY 26, 1817.

On the 24th instant the house of Mr. Garret, residing in the upper part of this county, near the boundary of Wayne county, was attacked during his absence, near the middle of the day, by this party, consisting of about fifteen, who shot Mrs. Garret in two places, and then despatched her by stabbing and scalping. Her two children, one about three years, the other two months, were also murdered, and the eldest scalped; the house was then plundered of every article of value, and set on fire.

MARCH 15, 1817.

I enclose, for your information, two letters which I received a few days since. Yesterday William Perryman, accompanied by two of the Lower chiefs, arrived here; he informs me that McQueen, the chief mentioned in one of the enclosed letters, is at present one of the heads of the hostiles; that they are anxious for war, and have lately murdered a woman and two children. He likewise says that he expects the news in George Perryman's letter is true, for there are talks going through the towns that the English are to be at Ochlochnee river in three months.

MILLEDGEVILLE, GEORGIA, March 30, 1817.

By yesterday's mail I received a letter from Mr. Timothy Barnard, who resides at Flint river, in the Indian country, a considerable distance below the agency, in which he observes: "I have been informed two days past, from below, where the Red Stick class reside, that a party has been down near St. Mary's, and murdered a woman and two children, and brought off some horses." "I will further state that I have received information from other persons at and near Fort Gaines, that a British agent is now among these hostile Indians, and that he has been sending insolent messages to the friendly Indians and white men settled above the Spanish line; he is also charged with stimulating the Indians to their present hostile aspect; but whether he is an acknowledged agent of any foreign Power, or a mere adventurer, I do not pretend to determine, but am disposed to believe him the latter."

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T., April 3, 1817.

I received by the last mail a letter from Archibald Clarke, Esq., intendant of the town of St. Mary's, by which it appears that another outrage, of uncommon cruelty, has recently been perpetrated by a party of Indians upon the southern frontier, near the boundary of Wayne county. They have massacred a woman, (Mrs. Garret,) and two of her children; the mother and eldest child were scalped; the house plundered and burnt.

Extract of a letter from A. Culloh to General Gaines, written at Fort Gaines.

We are hourly told by every source of information, by the friendly Indians, by letters from William Hambly and Edmund Doyle, who reside low down on the Appalachicola, that all the lower tribes of Indians have embodied, and are drying their meats to come on to the attack of this post. The British agent at Ochlochnee Sound is giving presents to the Indians. We have among us Indians who have been down and received powder, lead, tomahawks, knives, and a drum for each town, with the royal coat of arms painted on it. We have at this time at least five hundred Indians skulking in this neighborhood, within three or four miles of us, who will not act for themselves, and who are evidently waiting for the signal to strike an effectual blow. They have stolen almost every horse belonging to the citizens. They have scared them from the fields which they have cleared, and have taken possession of their houses. They are now stealing horses, cattle, and hogs from the Georgia lines, and have killed one or two families on the Satilla.

FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA, November 21, 1817.

The first brigade arrived at this place on the 19th instant. I had previously sent an Indian runner, to notify the first town chief, E-me-he-mant-by, of my arrival, and, with a view to ascertain whether his hostile temper had abated, requesting him to visit me. He replied that he had already said to the commanding officer here all he had to say, and he would not come.

Among the articles found in the house of the chief was a British uniform coat (scarlet) with a pair of gold epaulets, and a certificate signed by a British captain of marines, "Robert White, in the absence of Colonel Nicholls," stating that the chief had always been a true and faithful friend to the British.

The reports of friendly Indians concur in estimating the number of hostile warriors, including the Red Sticks and Seminoles, at more than two thousand, besides the blacks, amounting to near four hundred men, and increasing by runaways from Georgia. They have been promised, as several Indians inform me, assistance from the English at New Providence. This promise, though made by Woodbine, is relied on by most of the Seminole Indians. I have not a doubt but they will sue for peace as soon as they find their hopes of British aid to be without a foundation.

No. 51 a.

SIR: HEAD-QUARTERS, FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA, December 2, 1817.

I had the honor to receive, on the 26th ultimo, your communication of the 30th October.

I am very happy to find that the President approves of my movement, but I much regret that his just expectations as to the effect there was reason to believe would be produced on the minds of the Indians by this movement have not been realized. I am now quite convinced that the hostility of these Indians is, and has long since been, of so deep a character as to leave no ground to calculate upon tranquillity, or the future security of our frontier settlements, until the towns south and east of this place shall receive a signal proof of our ability and willingness to retaliate for every outrage. It is now my painful duty to report an affair of a more serious and decisive nature than has heretofore occurred, and which leaves no doubt of the necessity of an immediate application of force, and active measures on our part. A large party of Seminole Indians on the 30th ultimo formed an ambuscade upon the Appalachicola river, a mile below the junction of the Flint and Chatahoochee, attacked one of our boats ascending near the shore, and killed, wounded, and took the greater part of the detachment, consisting of forty men, commanded by Lieutenant R. W. Scott, of the 7th infantry. There were also on board, killed or taken, seven women, the wives of soldiers. Six men of the detachment only escaped, four of whom were wounded. They report that the strength of the current at the point of attack had obliged the lieutenant to keep his boat near the shore; that the Indians had formed along the banks of the river, and were not discovered till their fire had commenced, in the first volley of which Lieutenant Scott and his most valuable men fell.

The lieutenant and his party had been sent from this place some days before to assist Major Muhlenberg in ascending the river with three vessels laden with military stores brought from Montgomery and Mobile. The major, instead of retaining the party to assist him, as I had advised, (see enclosure No. 2,) retained only about twenty men, and in their place put a like number of sick, with the women, and some regimental clothing. The boat, thus laden, was detached alone for this place. It is due to Major Muhlenberg to observe that, at the time he detached the boat, I have reason to believe he was not apprized of any recent hostilities having taken place in this quarter. It appears, however, from Lieutenant Scott's letter, received about the hour in which he was attacked, (see enclosure No. 3,) that he had been warned of the danger. Upon the receipt of this letter, I had two boats fitted up with covers and port-holes for defence, and detached Captain Clinch with an officer and forty men, with an order to secure the movement of Lieutenant Scott, and then to assist Major Muhlenberg.

This detachment embarked on the evening of the 30th, and must have passed the scene of action below at night, and some hours after the affair terminated. I have not yet heard from Captain Clinch. I shall immediately strengthen the detachment under Major Muhlenberg with another boat, secured against the enemy's fire. He will, therefore, move up with safety, keeping near the middle of the river. I shall, moreover, take a position with my principal force at the junction of the river, near the line; and shall attack any vessel that may attempt to intercept our vessel and supplies below, as I feel persuaded the order of the President, prohibiting an attack upon the Indians below the line, has reference only to the past, and not to the present or future outrages, such as the one just now perpetrated, and such as shall place our troops strictly within the pale of natural law, where self-defence is sanctioned by the privilege of self-preservation. The wounded men who made their escape concur in the opinion that they had seen upwards of five hundred hostile Indian warriors at different places below the point of attack. Of the force engaged they differ in opinion; but all agree that the number was very considerable, extending about one hundred and fifty yards along the shore, in the edge of a swamp or thick woods. I am assured by the friendly chief that the hostile warriors of every town upon the Chatahoochee prepared canoes and pushed off down the river to join the Seminoles as soon as the account of my movement from the Alabama reached them.

The Indians now remaining upon the Chatahoochee, I have reason to believe, are well disposed. One of the new settlers, however, has recently been killed; but it has been clearly proved that the murderer had belonged to the hostile party. The friendly chiefs in the neighborhood, when apprized of the murder, assembled a party, and sent in pursuit of the offender, and followed him to the Flint river, on the route to Mickasuky, whither he escaped. Onishajo and several other friendly chiefs have offered me their services, with their warriors, to go against the Seminoles. I have promised to give them notice of the time that may be fixed for my departure, and then to accept their services. The enclosure No. 1 contains the substance of what I have said to the chiefs who have visited me; several of whom reside south of the Spanish line, and west of Appalachicola river. It was expected by the chiefs that I should communicate to them my views and wishes. I felt authorized to say but little, and I deemed it necessary, in what I should say, to endeavor to counteract the erroneous impressions by which they have been misled by pretended British agents.

I hope the President will see in what I have said nothing to disapprove. I feel persuaded a report of the various talks which I received from the chiefs would show the propriety of what I have said to them; such a report I have not a moment's time now to make. The Indians are at this moment firing at our camp from the opposite side of the river.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES, Major General commanding.

Talk enclosed in 51 a, (No. 1.)

CHIEFS AND WARRIORS:

The President of the United States has been informed of the murders and thefts committed by the hostile Indians in this part of the country. He has authorized General Jackson to arrest the offenders, and cause justice to be done. The Indians have been required to deliver up the murderers of our citizens and the stolen property, but they refused to deliver either. They have had a council at Mickasuky, in which they have determined upon war; they have been at war against helpless women and children; let them now calculate upon fighting men. We have long known that we had enemies east of this river; we likewise know we have some friends, but they are so mixed together we cannot always distinguish the one from the other. The President, wishing to do justice to his red friends and children, has given orders for the bad to be separated from the good. Those who have taken up arms against him, and such as have listened to the bad talks of the people beyond the sea, must go to Mickasuky, Suwanee, where we wish to find them together. But all those who were our friends in the war will sit still at their homes in peace. We will pay them for what corn and meat they have to sell us. We will be their friends, and when they are hungry we will give them meat. The hostile party pretend to calculate upon help from the British! as well look for soldiers from the moon to help them. Their warriors were beaten and driven from our country by American troops. The English are not able to help themselves; how, then, should they help the old "Red Sticks," whom they have ruined by pretended friendship?

SIR:

The waters having risen sufficiently high to enable you to ascend the river with all the vessels, I wish you to do so, though it should take longer than I had anticipated. You can avail yourself of the aid of Lieutenant Scott's detachment to expedite your movement hither. Keep your vessels near to each other; and, should you meet any insuperable obstacle, endeavor to apprize me thereof, and you shall have additional relief. Wishing to see you soon, with your fleet,

I remain, with great regard, your obedient servant,

E. P. GAINES.

SPANISH BLUFF, November 28, 1817.

SIR:

Enclosed you will receive Major Muhlenberg's communication, which he directs me to forward to you by express from this place. Mr. Hambly informs me that Indians are assembling at the junction of the river, where they intend to make a stand against those vessels coming up the river. Should this be the case, I am not able to make a stand against them. My command does not exceed forty men, and one-half sick and without arms. I leave this immediately.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. W. SCOTT,

Lieutenant 7th Infantry, commanding detachment.

NOTE.—The bearer of this is entitled to three dollars on delivering this letter. The Indians have a report here that the Indians have beaten the white people.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FORT SCOTT, November 30, 1817.

SIR:

You will embark with the party assigned you on board the two covered boats; descend the river until you meet with Lieutenant Scott; deliver to him a cover for his boat, and give him such assistance as, in your judgment, shall be necessary to secure his party, and expedite his movement to this place. You will then proceed, with the residue of your command, down the river, until you meet with Major Muhlenberg; report to him, and act under his orders. You will, in no case, put your command in the power of the Indians near the shore. Be constantly on the alert. Remember that United States troops can never be surprised by Indians without a loss of honor, to say nothing of the loss of strength that might ensue.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH, BOWLEGS' TOWN,

SUWANEE RIVER, April 20, 1818.

SIR:

My last communication, dated Camp before St. Mark's, 8th April, and those to which it referred, advised you of my movements and operations up to that date, and, as I then advised you, I marched from that place on the morning of the 9th. On the evening of the 10th I was joined by the rear of the Tennessee volunteers, also by the Indians under General McIntosh, whom I had left at Mickasuky to scour the country around that place. Although the weather has been dry and pleasant, and the waters had subsided in a great degree, our march might be said to have been through water, which kept the infantry wet to the middle; and the depth of the swamps, added to the want of forage, occasioned the horses to give out daily in great numbers. On the morning of the 12th, near Econfinnah, or Natural Bridge, a party of Indians were discovered on the margin of a swamp, and attacked by General McIntosh and about fifty Tennessee volunteers, who routed them, killing thirty-seven warriors, and capturing six men and ninety-seven women and children; also recapturing a white woman who had been taken at the massacre of Scott. The friendly Indians also took some horses and about five hundred head of cattle from the enemy, who proved to be McQueen's party. Upon the application of an old woman of the prisoners, I agreed that if McQueen was tied and carried to the commandant of St. Mark's, her people should be received in peace, carried to the upper tribes of the Creek nation, and there provisioned until they could raise their own crops. She appeared much pleased with those terms, and I set her at liberty, with written instructions to the commandant of St. Mark's to that effect. Having received no further intelligence from McQueen, I am induced to believe the old woman has complied with her part of the obligation.

From St. Mark's I marched with eight days' rations, those that joined me having but five; this was done under the expectation of reaching this place in that time, founded on the report of my faithful Indian guide, which I should have accomplished but for the poverty of my horses and the continued sheets of water through which we had to pass. On the morning of the 15th my scouts overtook a small party of Indians, killing one man and capturing the residue, consisting of one man and woman and two children, and on that evening I encamped, as my guide supposed, within twelve miles of Suwanee. I marched very early on the 16th, under the hope of being able to encompass and attack the Indian and negro towns by one o'clock P. M., but, much to my regret, at three o'clock, and after marching sixteen miles, we reached a remarkable pond, which my guide recollected, and reported to be distant six miles from the object of my march; here I should have halted for the night, had not six mounted Indians, (supposed to be spies,) who were discovered, effected their escape: this determined me to attempt, by a forced movement, to prevent the removal of their effects, and, if possible, themselves from crossing the river, for my rations being out it was all-important to secure their supplies for the subsistence of my troops. Accordingly, my lines of attack were instantly formed and put in motion, and about sunset my left flank column, composed of the second regiment of Tennessee volunteers, commanded by Colonel Williamson, and a part of the friendly Indians, under Colonel Kanard, having approached the left flank of the centre town and commenced their attack, caused me to quicken the pace of the centre, composed of the regulars, Georgia militia, and my volunteer Kentucky and Tennessee guards, in order to press the enemy in his centre, whilst the right column, composed of the first regiment of Tennessee volunteers, under Colonel Dyer, and a part of the friendly Indians, headed by General McIntosh, who had preceded me, were endeavoring to turn his left and cut off his retreat to the river; they, however, having been previously informed of our force, by a precipitate retreat soon crossed the river, where, it is believed, Colonel Kanard, with his Indians, did them considerable injury. Nine negroes and two Indians were found dead, and two negro men made prisoners.

On the 17th foraging parties were sent out, who found a considerable quantity of corn and some cattle. The 18th, having obtained some small craft, I ordered General Gaines across the river with a strong detachment and two days' provision to pursue the enemy. The precipitancy of their flight was soon discovered by the great quantity of goods, corn, &c. strewed through the swamps, and convinced General Gaines that pursuit was in vain. Nine Indians and five negro prisoners were taken by our Indians. The evidence of haste with which the enemy had fled induced the general to confine his reconnoissance to search for cattle and horses, both of which were much wanted by the army. About thirty head of cattle were procured; but, from the reports accompanying General Gaines's, which will in due time be forwarded to you, and the disobedience of his orders by the Indians, not one pound was brought into camp.

As soon as time will permit, I shall forward a detailed account of the various little affairs with the enemy, accompanied with reports of the commanding officers of the detachment. Suffice it for the present to add, that every officer and soldier under my command, when danger appeared, showed a steady firmness, which convinced me that, in the event of a stubborn conflict, they would have realized the best hopes of their country and general.

I believe I may say that the destruction of this place, with the possession of St. Mark's, having, on the night of the 18th, captured the late Lieutenant Ambrister, of the British marine corps, and, as represented by Arbuthnot, successor to Woodbine, will end the Indian war for the present; and, should it be renewed, the position taken, which ought to be held, will enable a small party to put it down promptly.

I shall order, or take myself, a reconnoissance west of the Appalachicola at Pensacola point, where, I am informed, there are a few Red Sticks assembled, who are fed and supported by the Governor of Pensacola. My health being impaired, as soon as this duty is performed, the positions taken, well garrisoned, and security given to the southern frontiers, (if the Government have not active employment for me,) I shall return to Nashville to regain my health. The health of the troops is much impaired, and I have ordered the Georgia troops to Hartford to be mustered, paid, and discharged; the general having communicated his wishes, and that of his troops, to be ordered directly there, and reporting that they have a plenty of corn and beef to subsist them to that point. I have written to the Governor of Georgia to obtain from the State the necessary funds to pay General Glasscock's brigade when discharged, and that the Government will promptly refund it. I am compelled to this mode to have them promptly paid, Mr. Hogan, the paymaster of the seventh infantry, (for whom I received from Mr. Brent an enclosure said to contain $50,000,) not having reached me.

From the information received from Ambrister and a Mr. Cook, who was captured with him, that A. Arbuthnot's schooner was at the mouth of this river, preparing to sail for the bay of Tampa, my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, volunteered his services with a small detachment to descend the river and capture her. The importance of this vessel to transport my sick to St. Mark's as well as to destroy the means used by the enemy, induced me to grant his request; he sailed yesterday, and I expected to have heard from him this morning. I only await his report to take up the line of march on my return for St. Mark's. The Georgia brigade, by whom I send this, being about to march, compels me to close it without the report of Lieutenant Gadsden.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General commanding.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR: FORT ST. MARK'S, April 26, 1818.

I wrote you from Bowlegs' Town on the 20th instant. On the night of the same day I received the expected despatch from my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, communicating the success of his expedition; and, on the next day, as soon as the sick of my army were despatched down the Suwanee river, to be conveyed in the captured schooner to St. Mark's, I took up the line of march for that fort. I arrived at this place last evening, performing a march of one hundred and seven miles in less than five days. Lieutenant Gadsden had reached it a few hours before me. He communicates having found, among the papers of Arbuthnot, Ambrister, and Cook, letters, memorials, &c., all pointing out the instigators of this savage war, and, in some measure, involving the British Government in the agency. These will be forwarded you in a detailed report I purpose communicating to you as early as practicable.

The old woman spoken of in my last communication to you, who promised to use her influence in having McQueen captured and delivered up, has not been heard of. From signs discovered on the opposite shore of the St. Mark's river, I am induced to believe that the Indian party is still in this neighborhood. A detachment will be sent out to reconnoitre the country, to receive them as friends if disposed to surrender, or inflict merited chastisement if still hostile.

I shall leave this in two or three days for Fort Gadsden, and, after making all necessary arrangements for the security of the positions occupied, and detaching a force to scour the country west of the Appalachicola, I shall proceed direct for Nashville. My presence in this country can no longer be necessary. The Indian forces have been divided and scattered, cut off from all communication with those unprincipled agents of foreign nations who had deluded them to their ruin; they have not the power, if the will remains, of again annoying our frontier.

I remain, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
FORT GADSDEN, May 5, 1818.

SIR:

I returned to this post with my army on the evening of the 2d instant, and embrace an early opportunity of furnishing you a detailed report of my operations to the east of the Appalachicola river. In the several communications addressed you from Hartford, Fort Scott, and this place, I have stated the condition of the army on my assuming the immediate command, the embarrassment occasioned from the want of provisions, the privations of my troops on their march from the frontiers of Georgia, and the circumstances which compelled me to move directly down the Appalachicola river to meet with and protect the expected supplies from New Orleans. These were received on the 25th March, and on the next day I was prepared for active operations. For a detailed account of my movements from that period to this day, you are respectfully referred to the report prepared by my adjutant general, accompanied with Captain Hugh Young's topographical sketch of the route and distance performed. This has been principally a war of movements. The enemy, cut off from their strongholds, or deceived in the promised foreign aid, have uniformly avoided a general engagement. Their resistance has generally been feeble; and in the partial rencontres into which they seem to have been involuntarily forced, the regulars, volunteers, and militia, under my command, realized my expectations; every privation, fatigue, and exposure was encountered with the spirit of soldiers, and danger was met with a degree of fortitude calculated to strengthen the confidence I had reposed in them.

On the commencement of my operations, I was strongly impressed with a belief that this Indian war had been excited by some unprincipled foreign or private agents. The outlaws of the old Red Stick party had been too severely convinced, and the Seminoles were too weak in numbers to believe that they could possibly alone maintain a war with even partial success against the United States. Firmly convinced, therefore, that succor had been promised from some quarter, or that they had been deluded into a belief that America dare not violate the neutrality of Spain by penetrating to their towns, I early determined to ascertain these facts, and so direct my movements as to undeceive the Indians. After the destruction of the Mickasukian villages, I marched direct for St. Mark's. The correspondence between myself and the Spanish commandant, in which I demanded the occupancy of that fortress with an American garrison, accompanies this. It had been reported to me, direct from the Governor of Pensacola, that the Indians and negroes unfriendly to the United States had demanded of the commandant of St. Mark's a supply of ammunition, munitions of war, &c., threatening, in the event of a non-compliance, to take possession of the fort. The Spanish commandant acknowledged the defenceless state of his fortress, and his inability to defend it; and the Governor of Pensacola expressed similar apprehensions. The Spanish agents throughout the Floridas had uniformly disavowed having any connexion with the Indians, and acknowledged the obligations of His Catholic Majesty, under existing treaties, to restrain their outrages against the citizens of the United States. Indeed, they declared that the Seminole Indians were viewed as alike hostile to the Spanish Government, and that the will remained, though the power was wanting, to inflict merited chastisement on this lawless tribe. It was, therefore, to be supposed that the American army, impelled by the immutable laws of self-defence to penetrate the territory of His Catholic Majesty, to fight his battles, and even to relieve from a cruel bondage some of his own subjects, would have been received as allies, hailed as deliverers, and every facility afforded to them to terminate speedily and successfully this savage war. Fort St. Mark's could not be maintained by the Spanish force garrisoning it. The Indians and negroes viewed it as an asylum, if driven from their towns, and were preparing to occupy it in this event. It was necessary to anticipate their movements, independent of the position being deemed essential as a depot, on which the success of my future operations measurably depended. In the spirit of friendship, therefore, I demanded its surrender to the army of the United States until the close of the Seminole war. The Spanish commandant required time to reflect. It was granted. A negotiation ensued, and an effort was made to protract it to an unreasonable length. In the conversations between my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, and the Spanish commandant, circumstances transpired convicting him of a disposition to favor the Indians, and of having taken an active part in aiding and abetting them in this war. I hesitated, therefore, no longer; and as I could not be received in friendship, I entered the fort by violence. Two light companies of the 7th regiment of infantry, and one of the 4th, under the command of Major Twiggs, were ordered to advance, lower the Spanish colors, and hoist the star-spangled banner on the ramparts of Fort St. Mark's. The order was executed promptly. No resistance was attempted on the part of the Spanish garrison. The duplicity of the Spanish commandant of St. Mark's, in professing friendship towards the United States while he was actually aiding and supplying her savage enemies, throwing open the gates of his garrison to their free access, appropriating the King's stores to their use, issuing ammunition and munitions of war to them, and knowingly purchasing of them property plundered from the citizens of the United States, is clearly evinced by the documents accompanying my correspondence. In Fort St. Mark's, as an inmate in the family of the Spanish commandant, an Englishman, by the name of Arbuthnot, was found. Unable satisfactorily to explain the objects of his visiting this country, and there being a combination of circumstances to justify a suspicion that his views were not honest, he was ordered into close confinement. The capture of his schooner, near the mouth of Suwanee river, by my aid-de-camp, Mr. Gadsden, and the papers found on board, unveiled his corrupt transactions, as well as those of a Captain Ambrister, late of the British colonial marine corps, taken as a prisoner near Bowlegs' town. Those individuals were tried, under my orders, by a special court of select officers, legally convicted as exciters of this savage and negro war, legally condemned, and most justly punished for their iniquities. The proceedings of the court-martial in this case, with the volume of testimony justifying their condemnation, present scenes of wickedness, corruption, and barbarity, at which the heart sickens, and in which, in this enlightened age, it ought not scarcely to be believed that a Christian nation would have participated; and yet the British Government is involved in the agency. If Arbuthnot and Ambrister are not convicted as the authorized agents of Great Britain, there is no room to doubt but that that Government had a knowledge of their assumed character, and was well advised of the measures which they had adopted to excite the negroes and Indians in East Florida to war against the United States. I hope the execution of these two unprincipled villains will prove an awful example to the world, and convince the Government of Great Britain, as well as her subjects, that certain (if slow) retribution awaits these unchristian wretches, who, by false promises, delude and excite an Indian tribe to all the horrid deeds of savage war.

Previous to my leaving Fort Gadsden, I had occasion to address a communication to the Governor of Pensacola on the subject of permitting supplies to pass up the Escambia river to Fort Crawford. This letter, with a second from St. Mark's, on the subject of some United States' clothing, shipped in a vessel in the employ of the Spanish Government, to that post, I now enclose, with his reply. The Governor of Pensacola's refusal of my demand cannot but be viewed as evincing a hostile feeling on his part, particularly in connexion with some circumstances reported to me from the most unquestionable authority. It has been stated that the Indians at war with the United States have free access into Pensacola; that they are kept advised from that quarter of all our movements; that they are supplied from thence with ammunition and munitions of war; and that they are now collecting in large bodies, to the amount of four or five hundred warriors, in that city; that inroads from thence have lately been made on the Alabama, in one of which eighteen settlers fell by the tomahawk. These statements compel me to make a movement to the west of the Appalachicola; and, should they prove correct, Pensacola must be occupied with an American force, the governor treated according to his deserts, or as policy may dictate. I shall leave strong garrisons in Fort St. Mark's, Fort Gadsden, and Fort Scott; and in Pensacola, should it become necessary to possess it.

It becomes my duty to state it as my confirmed opinion that, so long as Spain has not the power or will to enforce the treaties by which she is solemnly bound to preserve the Indians within her territory at peace with the United States, no security can be given to our southern frontier, without occupying a cordon of posts along the seashore. The moment the American army returns from Florida, the war hatchet will be again raised, and the same scenes of indiscriminate murder with which our frontier settlers have been visited will be repeated. So long as the Indians within the territory of Spain are exposed to the delusions of false prophets, and the poison of foreign intrigue; so long as they can receive ammunition, munitions of war, &c. from pretended traders, or Spanish commandants, it will be impossible to restrain their outrages. The burning of their towns, the destroying of their stock and provisions, will produce but temporary embarrassments; resupplied by Spanish authorities, they may concentrate or disperse at will, and keep up a lasting predatory warfare against the frontiers of the United States, as expensive as harassing to her troops. The savages, therefore, must be made dependant on us, and cannot be kept at peace without being persuaded of the certainty of chastisement being inflicted on the commission of the first offence.

I trust, therefore, that the measures which have been pursued will meet the approbation of the President of the United States. They have been adopted in pursuance of your instructions, under a firm conviction that they alone were calculated to insure "peace and security to the southern frontier of Georgia."

The army will move on the 7th from hence, crossing the Appalachicola river at the Ochesee bluff, about thirty miles above.

With respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Maj. Gen. com'dg.

No. 55.

General Jackson to the Secretary of War.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

SIR: FORT MONTGOMERY, June 2, 1818.

In a communication to you of the 5th of May, I detailed at length the operations of my army up to that period. Leaving a strong garrison of regulars in Forts Scott and Gadsden, I resumed my march, with a small detachment of the 4th regiment of infantry, one company of artillery, and the effectives of the Tennessee volunteers, the whole not exceeding twelve hundred men, to fulfil my intentions, communicated to you, of scouring the country west of the Appalachicola river. On the 10th of May, my army crossed that river at the Ochesee village, and, after a fatiguing, tedious, and circuitous march of twelve days, misled by the ignorance of our pilots, and exposed to the severest of privations, we finally reached and effected a passage over the Escambia. On my march, on the 23d of May, a protest from the Governor of Pensacola was delivered me by a Spanish officer, remonstrating in warm terms against my proceedings, and ordering me and my forces instantly to quit the territory of His Catholic Majesty, with a threat to apply force in the event of a non-compliance. This was so open an indication of a hostile feeling on his part, after having been early and well advised of the object of my operations, that I hesitated no longer on the measures to be adopted. I marched for and entered Pensacola, with only the show of resistance, on the 24th of May. The governor had previously fled to Fort Carlos de Barrancas, where, it was said, he had resolved upon a most desperate resistance. A correspondence ensued between us, (accompanying this, marked A,) detailing at length my motives for wishing and demanding that Pensacola and its dependencies be occupied with an American garrison. The package marked B are documents substantiating the charges, in part, against the conduct of the Spanish governor, having knowingly and willingly admitted the savages, avowedly hostile to the United States, within the town of Pensacola. The peaceable surrender of the fort at the Barrancas was denied. I marched for and invested it on the evening of the 25th of May, and on the same night pushed reconnoitering parties under its very guns. On the morning of the 26th, a military reconnoissance was taken; and on the same night, a lodgement was made, under a fire from the Spanish garrison, by Captain Gadsden of the engineers, aided by Captains Call and Young, on a commanding position, within three hundred and eighty-five yards of the Spanish works, and a nine-pounder mounted. A howitzer battery was simultaneously established on the capitol, and within seven hundred and sixty yards of the fort. At daylight on the 27th, the Spanish garrison opened their artillery on our batteries; a parley was sounded, a flag sent in, and the surrender of Fort Carlos de Barrancas again demanded; the favorable positions obtained were pointed out, and the inutility of resistance urged. Anxious to avoid an open contest, and to save the effusion of blood, the same terms previously offered were again tendered. These were rejected, and offensive operations recommenced. A spirited and well-directed fire was kept up the greater part of the morning, and at intervals during the afternoon. In the evening a flag was sent from the Spanish commandant, offering to capitulate, and a suspension of hostilities was granted until eight o'clock next day, when the enclosed articles of capitulation (marked C) were signed and agreed to. The terms are more favorable than a conquered enemy would have merited; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, my object obtained, there was no motive for wounding the feelings of those whose military pride or honor had prompted to the resistance made. The articles, with but one condition, amount to a complete cession to the United States of that portion of the Floridas hitherto under the government of Don José Mazot.

The arrangements which I have made to secure Pensacola and its dependencies are contained in the general orders, marked D. I deemed it most advisable to retain, for the present, the same government to which the people had been accustomed, until such time as the Executive of the United States may order otherwise. It was necessary, however, to establish the revenue laws of the United States, to check the smuggling which had been carried on successfully in this quarter for many years past, and to admit the American merchant to an equal participation in a trade which would have been denied under the partial operations of the Spanish commercial code. Captain Gadsden was appointed by me collector, and he has organized and left the department in the charge of officers on whom the greatest confidence may be reposed.

Though the Seminole Indians have been scattered, and literally so divided and reduced as no longer to be viewed as a formidable enemy, yet, as there are still many small marauding parties supposed to be concealed in the swamps of the Perdido, Choctawhatchy, and Chapouley who might make occasional and sudden inroads on our frontier settlers, massacreing women and children, I have deemed it advisable to call into service for six months, if not sooner discharged, two companies of volunteer rangers, under Captains McGirt and Boyles, with instructions to scour the country between the Mobile and Appalachicola rivers, exterminating every hostile party who dare resist, or will not surrender and remove with their families above the thirty-first degree of latitude.

The Seminole war may now be considered as at a close, tranquillity again restored to the southern frontier of the United States; and, as long as a cordon of military posts is maintained along the Gulf of Mexico, America has nothing to apprehend from either foreign or Indian hostilities. Indeed, sir, to attempt to fortify or protect an imaginary line, or to suppose that a frontier on the thirty-first degree of latitude, in a wilderness, can be secured by a cordon of military posts while the Floridas lay open to an enemy, is visionary in the extreme.

Under this firm belief, I have bottomed all my operations. Spain had disregarded the treaties existing with the American Government, or had not power to enforce them; the Indian tribes within her territory, and which she was bound to keep at peace, had visited our citizens with all the horrors of savage war; negro brigands were establishing themselves when and where they pleased; and foreign agents were openly and knowingly practising their intrigues in this neutral territory.

The immutable principles, therefore, of self-defence justified the occupancy of the Floridas, and the same principles will warrant the American Government in holding it until such time as Spain can guaranty, by an adequate military force, the maintaining her authority within the colony.

A topographical sketch of the country from the Appalachicola to Pensacola accompanies this. Captain Young will prepare, as soon as practicable, a topographical memoir of that part of the Floridas in which my army has operated, with a map of the country.

Captain Gadsden is instructed to prepare a report on the necessary defences of the country, as far as the military reconnoissance he has taken will permit, accompanied with plans of existing works, what additions or improvements are necessary, and what new works should, in his opinion, be erected to give permanent security to this important territorial addition to our republic.

As soon as this report is prepared, Captain Gadsden will receive orders to repair to Washington City with some other documents which I may wish to confide to his charge.

At the close of a campaign which has terminated so honorably and happily, it gives me pleasure to express my approbation generally of the officers and soldiers of every species of corps which I have had the honor to command. The patience with which they endured fatigue and submitted to privations, and the determination with which they encountered and vanquished every difficulty, are the strongest indication of the existence of that patriotic feeling which no circumstances can change, and of that irresistible ardor in the defence of their country which will prove her strength and bulwark under any exposure. I should do violence to my feelings if I did not particularly notice the exertions of my quartermaster general, Colonel George Gibson, who, under the most embarrassing circumstances, relieved the necessities of my army, and to whose exertions I was indebted for the supplies received. His zeal and integrity in this campaign, as well as in the uniform discharge of his duties since his connexion with my staff, merit the approbation and gratitude of his country.

With respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Major General commanding.

ST. MARY'S RIVER, September 27, 1817.

"On our arrival here we found General McGregor in command of Amelia island. A few days afterwards he decamped, and embarked on board the privateer McGregor, formerly the San Josef."

"The noted Woodbine, of infamous memory, arrived here from Nassau, with a view, as was said, to join the patriots; but his friend McGregor having left the cause, he was disappointed, and embarked with McGregor, who sailed a few days since for Nassau, to commence some new expedition, which, it is generally supposed, will be to the bay of Espiritu Santo, or bay of Tampa, in latitude 28 degrees 15 minutes north, and longitude 76 degrees 30 minutes west. This is an extensive bay, and capable of admitting ships of any size, contiguous to which are the finest lands in East Florida, which Woodbine pretends belong to him by virtue of a grant from the Indians. He says he has surveyed the whole of the Gulf of Mexico, and Tampa bay is the only place into which large ships can enter."

DECEMBER 24, 1817.

"My informants, I have no doubt, are possessed of as much information of the views and plans of McGregor and Woodbine as any person in the United States." "They sailed from Amelia in September, in company with a schooner belonging to Woodbine, he being on board. Some time after they had got to sea, General McGregor and family were put on board the schooner with Woodbine, and steered for New Providence."

"From what has been written, it may readily be supposed that my friends had an opportunity of learning something of the plan of the future operations of McGregor and Woodbine, and they believe it to be as follows: Woodbine persuaded McGregor that he could find friends and funds in New Providence, and that a British regiment had lately been disbanded there; that they would pick up as many of the soldiers as possible, and, with what negroes and others they could gather, would make a tolerable force. They were then to sail for Tampa bay, a fine harbor to the northwestward of Cape Florida, where they were to be joined by 1,500 Indians, already engaged to Woodbine, and invade Florida from that point; they were then to march across, and attack St. Augustine."

The vessels must be at Tampa bay, commonly called Espiritu Santo. I calculate to be at Tampa bay by the latter end of April, or 1st day of May, 1818. There are three bars: the northernmost bar is best, having five fathom water; keep on the larboard shore going in. There is a small sandy key between the northern and middle channels; upon this sandy key there will be a flag-staff, and, on hoisting your signal, you will be answered by the Florida flag, and a pilot will come off.

BALTIMORE, July 30, 1817.

Allow me now to relate, in detail, the particulars of my intercourse with General McGregor whilst in this city, in regard to his objects. He declared his object to be, in the first place, to take possession of Amelia; thence to wrest the Floridas from Spain, when he should immediately call on the inhabitants, by proclamation, to designate some of their most respectable fellow-citizens to form a constitution on the model of some of the adjoining States; that, so far as it might depend on him, he would encourage the existing disposition of the people in that section to confederate with the United States; leaving it to the will and policy of this [our] Government, and to political circumstances, as they might arise, to indicate the most favorable time for their admission into the Union.

Extracts from the minutes of the proceedings of the court-martial in the trial of Ambrister.

From the examination of JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a witness on the part of the prosecution:

Question by the court. Did you ever understand by whose authority, and for what purpose, the accused came into the country?

Answer. I have frequently heard him say he came to attend to Mr. Woodbine's business at the bay of Tampa.

From the examination of JOHN J. ARBUTHNOT, a witness on the part of the prosecution:

"And that the prisoner stated to him that he had come to the country on Woodbine's business, to see the negroes righted."

Question by the prisoner. Did you hear me say that I came on Woodbine's business?

Answer. I did.

From the examination of PETER B. COOK, a witness on the part of the prosecution:

"The prisoner told the witness that he had been a lieutenant in the British army, under Colonel Nicholls. The prisoner was sent by Woodbine to Tampa, to see about those negroes he had left there. The prisoner told the witness that he had written a letter to Governor Cameron for ammunition for the Indians, some time in March; and also told the witness that he had a commission in the patriot army, under McGregor, and that he expected a captaincy."

Ambrister's memorial to the Duke of York.

BAHAMA ISLAND:

To His Royal Highness Frederick, Duke of York, Commander-in-chief, &c., the memorial of Robert Christie Ambrister, of the island of New Providence, gentleman, humbly showeth:

That your memorialist, a British subject, and son of James Ambrister, Esquire, lieutenant colonel, and commanding the militia of New Providence, having served for nearly four years past as midshipman in the British navy, on board His Majesty's ships Sparrow, Captain Edward Burt, Rhodean, Captain George Mowbray, Reindeer, Captain J. P. Douglass, and Bramble, Captain William P. Poyson; from which last-mentioned ship he obtained his discharge in England in 1813, and returned to the island of New Providence, where his friends reside; that Major Nicholls, of the royal marines, having shortly after arrived at the said island of New Providence, in His Majesty's ship Hermes, in company with His Majesty's ship Carron, for the purpose of raising recruits for a corps denominated the corps of colonial marines, destined to serve during the American war in such parts of the Indian territory bordering upon the United States of America, or in the States themselves, as circumstances should render it necessary, your memorialist applied for, and obtained, a commission of auxiliary second lieutenant in that regiment, which he immediately joined, and proceeded, under the command of the said Major Edward Nicholls, to Appalachicola, from whence he proceeded to the Creek nation, where he served until those forces were disbanded upon the termination of hostilities with the Americans, when he returned to the said island of New Providence.

And your memorialist further showeth, that, having been assured by the said Major Nicholls, at the time of his accepting the above-mentioned commission, (a copy of which he begs leave to annex,) that he had no doubt but he would be placed upon half-pay when his services were no longer required, your memorialist is desirous either of obtaining half-pay, or of being more actively employed, and of obtaining a commission either in one of His Majesty's West India regiments, or in such other of His Majesty's regiments as to your Royal Highness shall seem fit.

Your memorialist, therefore, humbly prays your Royal Highness to take into your consideration this his memorial, and he shall ever pray.

Ambrister's commission as auxiliary second lieutenant.

By the honorable Sir Alexander Cochrane, knight of the bath, vice admiral of the red, and commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed, and to be employed, on the North American station, &c., to Mr. Robert C. Ambrister, hereby appointed auxiliary second lieutenant of the corps of colonial marines to be raised upon the continent of North America:

Whereas I have thought fit to send a detachment of the royal marine corps to the Creek nations for the purpose of training to arms such Indians and others as may be friendly to, and willing to fight under the standard of His Majesty, I do, by these presents, constitute and appoint you an auxiliary second lieutenant of such corps of colonial marines as may be raised upon the continent of North America, to hold such local rank while actually employed upon the said continent, until further orders. You are therefore carefully and diligently to discharge the duty of auxiliary second lieutenant, by exercising and well-disciplining both the inferior officers and marines of the said corps; and I do hereby command them to obey you as their second auxiliary lieutenant. And you are to observe and follow such orders and directions from me, or any other of your superior officers, according to the rules and discipline of war, in pursuance of the trust hereby reposed in you.

MY DEAR AMELIA: SUWANEE, January 19, 1818.

I have embraced this opportunity of writing you, hoping to find you well, as it leaves me at present; and I am very sorry to inform you of the times at present. We are threatened every day by the d——d Americans; not threatened only, but they have made an attempt, which we have stopped. On 1st December I marched with thirty men to go against them. After seven days' march we arrived at the fort; and, after our men got rested, I went against it. We had an engagement for four hours, and seeing that we could do no good with them, we retreated and came off. The balls flew like hail-stones; there was a ball that had like to have done my job; it just cleared my breast. For six days and six nights we had to encamp in the wild woods, and it was constantly raining night and day; and as for the cold, I suffered very much by it; in the morning the water would be frozen about an inch thick. There was a boat that was taken by the Indians, that had in it thirty men, seven women, and four small children; there were six of the men got clear, and one woman saved, and all the rest of them got killed; the children were taken by the heels, and their brains dashed out against the boat. We have got Mr. Hambly and Doyle prisoners, and we are going to send them to Nassau to stand their trial, as they have caused all this disturbance. Hambly told me that it was published in the American newspapers that they were to take possession of the nation in March, and if that be the case, you will see us sooner than you expected. If they should come when the vessel is away, we shall have to take to and run in our canoes, as we have some very fine ones here. One knows not hardly what to do for those d——d puppies, as we may call them, for they are no better.

We find that what I have mentioned is all d—d lies. But Arbuthnot has threatened my life once or twice; but, on my return, I will punish him by the law. You must excuse my bad writing, as I am in a hurry. Give my love to your mother and your sister, and Mrs. Roberts, and all inquiring friends. I have nothing more to say at present, as times will not admit.

I remain yours, forever,

PETER B. COOK.

SIR: OCHLOCHNEE SOUND, May 3, 1817.

On my return here this day, I received a letter signed by you, and dated the 23d March last. As you have taken the trouble of advising me, you will, of course, expect my reply; and I embrace the opportunity of doing it at length. First let me premise, sir, that, when you lived at Prospect Bluff, a clerk to Messrs. Forbes & Co., you did not consider Cappachimico, McQueen, or any other of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation, as outlaws. Does the man whom the attachment of Cappachimico has saved from the hands of retributive justice presume to call him an outlaw? For shame, sir. The most hardened villain would not thus calumniate the savior of his life. Your generous friend, sir, and the other chiefs, have called me to this country. They insist on the fulfilment of my promise; and, as an honest man, I will endeavor to do it. Let your arm of justice fall on the guilty. An honest and upright man, who harms no man, and endeavors to do all the good he can, fears no man or judge; his acts are open to inspection, and will bear the test of scrutiny. Thus, sir, I answer your insinuation that, since my arrival in this country, I have instigated persons to steal and murder. Ask the lieutenant commanding at Fort Gaines if the letter I wrote him bears the features of an instigator to murder. Ask Opoy Hatcho if the recommendatory note I sent him, by order of Opony, breathes the strains of a murderer. Ask Opony himself if my language and advice to him was that of a murderer. Ask Mappalitchy, a chief residing on the Ockmulgee, among the Americans, what my advice was. All those will contradict your vile insinuation. But Mappalitchy informed me the Cowetas were all pleased with the letter and my note Opony sent them, and perfectly accorded with my sentiments of living as brethren, and as one large family, respecting their neighbors, but, at the same time, at all times ready to protect their property. Yet several of them, a few days afterwards, (no doubt influenced by some humane and good man,) recanted their promise, and ordered a letter to be written me; which letter, I presume, I have this day received, signed by you. Now, sir, if your principles were as humane as mine—if you took as much pleasure in fostering any spark of friendship the upper Indians may show to their brethren of the lower nation as you do in fomenting the quarrels between them, you would then be their friend and benefactor. You, sir, that speak their language fluently, have much in your power; but I fear you use that power to the injury of all, and, eventually, to your own ruin. Let me advise you to change your tone and mode of acting. How much more creditable would it be for you to propagate friendly actions, and create an attachment among the Indians of all nations one to the other, than to endeavor to foment quarrels, and have your emissaries in every quarter of the nation spreading false reports, tending to harass and disturb them. Now, sir, with regard to your and Mr. Doyle's reporting that I am no Englishman, and only one of those wild adventurers who risk life and property for lucre, be pleased to come down to Ochlochnee, and I will show you a letter written by Earl Bathurst to Governor Cameron, (and which I received from him to read to the chiefs of the Creek nation,) an answer to a letter, I believe, written by you, early in the spring of 1816.

I shall not reflect on the part you took in blowing up the fort at Prospect Bluff; it is not my business. I know the blacks used you shamefully, as they did all that went near them, yet I think the revenge you took savors much of a savage.

Do not think, sir, that I am to be frightened away from this place while I have the protection of the Spaniards, and the support of honest men. An upright man is not easily daunted.

I keep a copy of this letter, and send a copy of yours, with my answer, to Opoy Hatcho, and, as I am in daily expectation of letters from New Providence, perhaps they may induce me to write you further.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

The murders and thefts you talk of I do not believe. There are a parcel of outlaws calling themselves Americans, who are continually coming into the nation, stealing cattle, &c., and lately, I hear, one was killed out of three, and his horse taken and publicly sold while in the act of stealing and driving off cattle. Indian Talk.

To our good brother the Chief Tustonaky Thlucco, the Big Warrior:

Your brothers, chiefs of the Creek nation, whose names are put to the talk we now send you, have found it necessary to hold the same, that their sentiments and opinions may be known to all their red brethren of the four nations, and stop the mouths of bad men who are continually sending false and bad talks to us as well as to our brethren, for the purpose of making ill-blood between us. Know, then, we have met at Ochlochnee Sound with our warriors and young chiefs, and have held our talk, which is this:

The red brethren of the four nations are all descended from the same fathers, and ought to live as brothers; and for this reason we now take them by the hand, to live henceforth at peace and united to each other, and let no bad talks be listened to, or come among us.

When Colonel Nicholls, the English officer who was last among us, went away, he gave us a good talk, desiring us to live well with all our brethren, and never permit ill-blood to be between us, and to respect the Americans that were our neighbors, and not molest them, or permit our people to steal. We have carefully kept this talk, followed his advice, &c.

It is nearly three years since we received a white bead from the Cherokees; we have held it sacred, and it has been in our ——— at all our talks; we now send you, that you may forward to their head, Minichico Mico, a pipe from his old friends; you will also send him the present talk, and from him let it be sent to the Chickasaws, and from them to the Choctaws.

Colonel Nicholls promised us to send people from England to keep stores in different parts of the nation to furnish us with goods; he had found people willing to come, but when they heard that the fort of Appalachicola was destroyed, they were fearful of coming, and withdrew their promise.

Let us protect all white men that give us good talks, but let us not regard or listen to those who give us bad ones, but rather send them from among us, for he must be a bad man who wishes ill-blood between brothers.

From this time, therefore, let us not listen to any bad talks; let us all hold each other fast by the hand of peace, and each brother hold the other in his heart.

This is sent with a good will, and will be kept by us.

Mr. Arbuthnot to the Honorable Charles Bagot.

[Found with Arbuthnot's papers.]

Sir:

On my return to this from the Indian nation, about a month since, I received a letter from Mr. Moodie, annexing an extract from a letter of your excellency, and which in future shall be attended to, when I have occasion to write on Indian affairs.

As I am now especially authorized by the chiefs whose names I beg leave to annex to the present to make such representations as may be of service to the nation, and learning by the copy of a letter from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, handed me by his excellency Governor Cameron, that your excellency is instructed to watch over the interests of the four nations, I shall take the liberty to lay before your excellency such matters as have come under my own observation, and what has been reported to me by chiefs in whose veracity I can place some confidence. On my arrival at Ochlochnee Sound last January, I was met by several of the principal chiefs, who reiterated the complaints that were stated to your excellency in their letter of last November. On the Chatahoochee particularly, they stated the Americans were descending in numbers, driving the poor Indian from his habitation. The report was confirmed some weeks after by Otosmico, the chief of the town of Ecan Halloway, on the Chatahoochee, who informed me that the officer commanding at Fort Gaines had repeatedly sent messages to him, desiring he would submit to live under the American Government, and threatening that his non-compliance would force him to turn the guns of the fort against the town and drive them out. These threats, and swarms of American settlers descending, drove the poor Indians from their homes, and thirty-six fields in a state of cultivation were occupied by the new settlers, and where the houses stood the plough has passed over.

On the Choctawhatchy, which is far within the Indian territory, Americans have formed a large settlement, which, if persisted in, will soon drive the Indians to the extremity of the peninsula.

Agreeably to the treaty between Great Britain and America, the latter were to confine themselves to the same boundaries they enjoyed in 1811, prior to the war. This they have not done, but encroached on almost every point of the Indian territory. The chiefs think that it is impossible the conduct of the persons acting so contrary to the treaty can be known to the American Government; and, the more to blind the Government, and to mislead them as to the true state and disposition of the Indians, they are continually spreading reports in the public gazettes of Georgia, &c., of cruelty committed by the Seminole Indians on inhabitants living on the borders of the United States; whereas it is persons in the back settlements of Georgia who enter the Seminole territory in large parties to steal cattle, which they frequently drive off in gangs of 50 and 100 at a time; and if in these excursions the Indians meet them and oppose these predatory plunderers, blood sometimes has been spilt, which was the case in April last, when a party of Mickasuky Indians met three men driving off cattle, and attacked them, killing one, and retaking the cattle. But those bloodthirsty back-settlers of Georgia soon retaliated on the poor Indians, for early in June they returned to plunder, and meeting with an Indian encampment they killed one man; another making his escape, they pursued him to another encampment, where they killed two others and a boy; the boy they scalped. Early in July a headman of the town of Suwanee was killed on St. John's river, while hunting, but the chief does not reckon the persons who killed him true Americans. For the better showing your excellency how those poor Indians are abused, I beg leave to enclose you paragraphs taken from American papers, the whole of which are complete fabrications, tending to mislead the American Government. I also beg your excellency's attention to a letter from an American officer, dated at Fort Gaines, with Cappachimico, the head chief of the Seminoles' answer thereto; but notwithstanding it is stated to be by authority of the President of the United States, the gentleman waited no time to receive an answer, but, prior to the chief's messenger arriving at the fort, had continued his road for St. Mary's, leaving them ignorant of what talk he was authorized to give them; and I have since learned that Mr. Dinkins was an officer of General Jackson's staff, travelling through the nation.

SUWANEE, LOWER CREEK NATION, January 30, 1818.

When I last took the liberty of writing to you, by the desire of the chiefs of the Creek nation, I little expected that war would so soon have commenced between the Americans and them. It is, however, actually begun, by the wanton aggressions of the former, in an attack on Fowl Town, during the night. Though this wanton attack has been disavowed by General Mitchell, the American agent for Indian affairs, and he has made reparation for the injury and loss sustained by Inhimathlo and his people, yet the continued aggressions of the Americans, and the numbers pouring into the nation, not from the land side alone, but from Mobile and elsewhere, by the Appalachicola river, have compelled the Indians to take arms as their only resource from oppression.

Your friend Hillis Hadjo has been called by his people to put himself at their head, and he is now encamped at Spanish Bluff, the residence of Doyle and Hambly, which is now in the possession of the Indians, with from one thousand to one thousand two hundred men; those men are principally Red Sticks, who are scattered about in the nation, and who have collected and put themselves under his command, with a few hundred Upper Indians, who have joined them.

I cannot allow myself to believe that those encroachments on Indian territory are made with the knowledge of the American Government, and General Mitchell's conduct and message to Kenhagee assure me it is not so. But there are persons who wish to get hold of the Indian lands, and they stick at no means, however cruel and oppressive, to obtain their ends. General Gaines's letter, of August last, to Kenhagee, clearly shows that he and General Jackson are determined, if possible, to get hold of the whole Indian lands. After falsely accusing them of murders, thefts, burning houses, &c., he says: "But there is something out in the sea, a bird with a forked tongue; whip him back before he lands, for he will be the ruin of you yet. Perhaps you do not know what or whom I mean—I mean the name of Englishman."

The other contents of this letter plainly show me that those two generals have formed a plan of possessing themselves of the whole Indian lands. That this plan has originated with Forbes, Innerarity's, or those of their subordinate agents, I have little doubt, as every part of the conduct of those inferior actors shows they have been employed for the express purpose of rooting out the poor Indian from his paternal inheritance. The report of Hambly having made sales, in the name of the chiefs, of all the lands from Pensacola to St. Augustine, comes from St. Mark's fort. I shall soon be there, and learn from what source they derive their information.

That false and improper sales have been made, I have no doubt; without such had been the case, the Americans would have never poured into the Indian nation by the Appalachicola.

It is reported that John Forbes has withdrawn from all Indian concerns; but the Innerarity's are enough, with their subordinate agents, to disturb the whole Indian nation; and I have not the least doubt that through them the present troubles come.

The chiefs have written to Governor Cameron for a supply of ammunition, and which Kenhagee informs me Hillis Hadjo, when in England, had orders to demand, in case of actual need. It is really necessary the English Government should do something for those people. In the late war they drew them into their quarrel against America; at the peace they agreed to see them protected in their rights and privileges, and placed on the same footing as before the war; since then they have never troubled themselves about them, thinking it enough that His Majesty's ambassador had orders to see that those people were protected in their rights and privileges. But how is his excellency the British ambassador to know if the Indian is righted, and permitted to live quietly on his own land? He interdicts the correspondence of any private individual on Indian affairs, unless it can be put into his hand without any expense. Does he expect a true account of what passes in the Indian nation from the American Government, or from the hireling gazettes of the towns of Upper Georgia? It is the interest of both to deceive, and, unless the door is opened for British subjects to speak what they know, and instruct his excellency of such matters respecting the Creek nation as they are certain to be true, he can never have the means of judging what is proper to be done.

I have, by desire of the chiefs, written to his excellency the honorable Charles Bagot on their affairs, and also Governor Cameron, with a demand for a small supply, [of arms, munitions, &c.] of which they stand greatly in need. I trust, sir, you will make such representations to His Majesty's Government as the circumstances of the case require, that those unfortunate people, who look up to you as their friend, may soon rest peaceably and quiet in their country.

You will pardon the liberty I take, which nothing but the pressing solicitations of Kenhagee would have induced me to take; and,

With much respect, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

[Translation from the Spanish translation received from Governor Coppinger, and communicated by Mr. De Onis, enclosed in his letter of the 27th March, 1818, to the Secretary of State. For the original, in English, see No. 49, court-martial proceedings, No. 2.]

SIR: SUWANEE, November 18, 1816.

I had the honor of receiving your letter of September, but the impossibility of finding a person to write an answer is the cause of this apparent neglect.

I shall be very happy to keep up a good understanding and correspondence with you; and I hope you will, when occasion offers, advise me of such things as may be of service to myself and my people. My warriors and others who go to St. Augustine return with false reports, tending to harass and disturb my people, and prevent them attending to their usual avocations. At one time, the Americans, supported by a force of three thousand men, and such of our brethren as they have compelled to join them, are running lines far within our territory; at another, they are collecting a large force at Fort Mitchell, in the forks of the Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, to fall on the towns that may not join them. Now, sir, we know of no reason they can have for attacking an inoffensive and unoffending people, whose wish is to inhabit their woods, without disturbing or being disturbed by any one. We have none of their slaves; we have taken none of their property since they made peace with our good father, King George. We have followed the orders of the officer of our father who was among us, Colonel Edward Nicholls, and in nowise molested the Americans, though we daily see them encroaching on our lands, stealing our cattle, and murdering or carrying off our people. We were told by the same officer that, as allies of our father, we were included in the treaty of peace between our good father and the Americans, and that the latter were to give up all the territory that had been taken from us before the war; but, so far from complying with the ninth article of that treaty, they are making daily encroachments, and forging treaties (which they pretend are concluded with our people) for cessions and grants of lands which never were in existence, and the signatures of which are unknown to the chiefs of the Creek nation, who alone have a right to assign or transfer the common property. The want of a proper person among our people to acquaint us with these transactions is the cause of our long silence on them, and leads the world, as well as our friends, to think we are in league with the Americans.

The principal chiefs of the nation assembled lately at my town of Suwanee, and resolved to inform the minister of King George at Washington of our grievances, and of the conduct and usurpation of the Americans; which was accordingly done, and copies sent to England. Until we have one or more persons among our people to watch over our rights and interests, we shall continue to be exposed to the same conduct on the part of the Americans, whose system appears to be the destruction of our peace and tranquillity, and expelling us from our native land.

You desire that I would chase off those who steal my cattle, &c. Some of my people have lately driven away several Americans who were endeavoring to settle at Lachua; and I do not doubt they will represent that as an act of hostility, although you well know that Lachua is in the heart of my territory, and was, until the Americans killed my brother, our chief town. I return you my thanks for your letter,

And am, with great respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

BOLECK, his × mark,
Chief of the Seminole nation.

FRIEND AND BROTHER BOLECK: ST. AUGUSTINE, IN FLORIDA, December 20, 1816.

Your letter of the 18th of November was delivered to me yesterday by one of your servants, in which you inform me of the receipt of mine of the 26th September last, and other circumstances which give you and your warriors uneasiness. I see with pain that the whole comes from the information of persons in whom you ought not to place the smallest confidence, it being their principle to employ such opportunities for the purpose of seducing you and your people from their daily labors. In consequence of this, and of what you tell me of your desire to keep up the best understanding and correspondence with me, and of your hope that the opportunities will not be wanting, let me give you such counsel as may be useful to you, your people, and warriors. I will do so from the sentiments of sincere friendship I bear towards you, fearful, however, that the sentiments of others, who come into the territory under the appearance of friendship, but with bad intentions, may influence your minds and obtain your confidence by their flattering representations. It is ascertained here that two persons have lately presented themselves as commissioners of the English nation, who have carried off several runaway negroes belonging to subjects of the King, my master, and your friend, among whom was one of Don Francisco Pellicer's, and another of Mr. Bunch's, both inhabitants of this province. This did not seem credible to me, as I could not suppose that so good a friend to our nation as you are could consent to such proceedings; but, in case they have really happened, you will be sensible of their great impropriety, and of the just grounds of complaint on the part of the persons so injured, who are desirous, as well as myself, of assuring you of the sincere good-will and friendship we have for the Seminole tribe of Indians, of which you are the chief.

I am, with great respect, your most affectionate and faithful servant,

JOSÉ COPPINGER.

To Friend and Brother BOLECK, Chief of the Seminole tribe of Indians.

October 23d (continued.) They had a long talk with Captain W., and stopped all night; this day, meridian, observed in latitude 29° 21′, Suwanee bearing northeast three miles. 24th. Started with two men in boat to survey if any entrance to the west branch of the river; found all shallow; pulled boat over the mud, and entered west branch; made poles to mark the easternmost outlet, and descended, but could not this day find the direct channel through the oyster bank, the tide having flowed too much. 25th, at 2 A. M., wind shifted to east, and by 8 A. M. to southeast, when we got under way, and stood off to sea, wind freshening and a nasty short sea rising; at 10 tacked in shore, three fathoms, Suwanee northeast seven miles; the north point of the bay north ten miles, Cedar Keys south seven miles; from sundown to midnight, heavy squalls, with rain and much thunder and lightning; at 0 anchored in four fathoms, no wind, and heavy swell. 26th. First part rainy and squally; at 10 A. M., got under way, Cedar Keys just in sight from deck; stood east-northeast, and at 2 P. M. hove to, to wait for canoes seen coming off; came to anchor in two fathoms; six canoes came on board full of Indians and blacks, Billy and Jack among them, with several negroes that were at the bluff; found that Bowlegs and Doherty had started in a canoe last night; this day at meridian observation good, latitude 29° 13′, Cedar Keys, the outermost, bearing east-southeast six miles. At 6 P. M. Bowlegs, with retinue, consisting of five canoes, came on board, and continued all night; had a very long talk with Captain W. 27th. The brother-in-law of Bowlegs desired Captain W. to listen to what he had heard from the Spaniards of the Americans' intention of attacking them; they wished to live quietly and attend to their cattle, &c., but could not for the Americans and revolted Spaniards, who daily killed their cattle, &c. &c. This day bought six deer skins, sixteen racoon skins, and three pounds wax, paid in taffia. Bowlegs and retinue left me at 2 P. M.; Captain W. had started about an hour before for Suwanee. At 8 P. M. began to blow fresh from southeast, continued blowing all night. 28th, at 2 P. M., got under way and stood to sea. 29th. Wind northwest, blowing hard and squally, all day beating off and on, double-reefed foresail, reefed mainsail, &c.; at 4 P. M. struck on a shallow bank six miles southeast from the mouth of the river; bore up and stood off; lowered jib and mainsail, and repaired latter, which had given way near the gaff; wore and stood in shore, and came to anchor in fourteen feet water, Great Cedar Key bearing southeast six miles. 30th, at 7 A. M., got under way, and stood for the entrance between the two large keys, luffing and bearing away so as to keep in two fathoms; came to anchor at 9 A. M., a mile and a half from islands. Captain went to sound channel; returned and reported channel to the southward, and that the large island must be brought to bear northeast. At 11 A. M. a canoe, two men, three women and their children, from Cape Anetole; got under way, rounded the bank, and grounded between two banks, where we lay all night. 31st October, warped into a deep channel, with much difficulty drawing her through the mud; wrote W. and Auchisee Indians, and also fishermen; cut poles to stake out channel. 1st November. Wind northeast, extremely cold, again warping, but did not succeed in getting into anchorage; observed meridian, latitude 29° 11′, the south end of the Great Cedar Key northwest by north, three-quarters of a mile; the outer or southwest point of the high or South Key southeast and by south one and a half mile; lay quite dry at low water; at 10 P. M. floated off, and stood into a good channel, but laying the warp too far out she tailed on the west side, where we lay for the night, after bowsing taught our best bower, laid in mid channel. 2d. Floated off at 10 A. M., and pulled up to good anchorage under the lee of the island; boat went to an inshore key to look for water, and returned two casks full. 3d. Self and captain on shore until half-past 11 A. M.; caught nothing; observation good, latitude 29° 11′; the high part of South Key due east two miles, the sandy beach of Great Cedar Key west half a mile. At sundown, Captain W. arrived from Suwanee; several canoes with negroes at the point; captain returned from fishing on point; some good fish. 4th. Idle all day; afternoon prepared rum, sugar, coffee, and molasses to send Robin Creighton, per colored lad named Charles, (see note thereof;) during the night the wind shifted to the north and north-northeast, drizzling rain and very cold. 5th. Wind north-northeast, rain, and very cold; cleared up before midday; at 4 P. M. two canoes from Suwanee; one came on board, reported Cappachimico and all the chiefs waited for Captain W.; prepared sundry articles for Suwanee, and sent a canoe off to get Frank's canoe to go with Captain W. and self. 6th, at 12 o'clock M., started for Suwanee, in Frank's canoe, camped for the night at the little island, mouth of the river; a canoe, with several men and women, with corn, camped at same place, bound for schooner, with corn, &c. 7th. At 4 o'clock A. M. started up the river; at 8 o'clock A. M., camped and breakfasted at Pine bluff, and at 2 o'clock P. M. arrived at Buera landing, took through the pine barren, and lost our way to Christophertown; again getting to the river, at half past 4 P. M. arrived at Robert's; Captain W. and guide had arrived a little before; visited Cappachimico and McQueen at Indiantown. 8th. A long talk with Indians; their complaints of the conduct of the Americans. McQueen mentioned they had taken one of his negroes and confined him in the fort at the forks. A chief from Chehaw said that they had killed three Indians in his neighborhood, on their own ground, and taken eleven horses; several others stated losses in cattle and horses, and the Seminole chiefs in particular; a chief —— of —— said that, in confidence of the treaty being faithfully fulfilled on the part of the Americans, a half-breed man, named Moses, before the war, settled near the forks, returned to take possession of his fields, and was murdered by the Americans. The chiefs ordered a letter, in way of memorial, to be written to our ambassador in America, and copies to be sent to England, representing the conduct of Americans; the same was done agreeably to the substance of their talk, read and interpreted to them by their own interpreters afterwards; each chief put his mark in my presence, which I certified. 9th. Cold and clear; Cappachimico, McQueen, and the other chiefs met, and had a long talk, more fully particularizing their particular grievances; they also stated the number of forts (seven) the Americans had built, and the roads they had cut, and were still continuing to cut, within their territory.

McQueen stated that McIntosh and the Coweta Indians were the cause of the Americans' conduct; that, after the peace, a deputation had been sent up to have a talk with the commander at Fort Mitchell, in the forks, who were instructed to inform him of what Colonel Nicholls had stated to them with regard to their rights to the territory prior to the war being guarantied by the treaty between England and the United States, and to request that he, the commandant, would refrain from further encroachments, and give orders that their lands should be respected.

The answer they received from the commander was, that it was all true they had told him, but that he had orders to act as he did. A chief of the Fowl Town Indians stated that the American troops, returning from the destruction of the fort at Prospect Bluff, burnt one entire town and murdered several of their people, because they would not join them when going down the river. The Tiger warrior, and two other men of note, spoke, stating the circumstances of aggression and cruelty that had come to their knowledge. Cappachimico, McQueen, and the others, further stated what reports they had from Doyle, Hambly, &c., and all were of opinion, and firmly believed, that Hambly, a clerk to and influenced by Forbes, was the cause of the destruction of the fort at the bluff; and that Hambly went down the river as a guide to the American army, and was particularly instrumental in its being blown up, as he pointed out to the American officers where the magazines were placed, that they might play their shells against them. Such few negroes as were saved from the explosion unhurt were carried off by the Americans, with cannon, ammunition, arms, &c. that were found in the fort.

N. B. I take no notice of Captain W.'s talk to the Indians, because I doubt much of what he stated was not founded in fact, and was only mentioned by him to strengthen the chiefs in their attachment to the British Government. I say no further on this head. Of his promises, I fear he has also gone too far; and, perhaps, at a future time, when the Indians find them unperformed, the rage for their disappointment may fall on me as a party aiding and abetting Captain W. in his deception. I have gone beyond my promise to Captain W.; I have been deceived in almost every thing; and yet he thinks every thing and person must be subservient to him. I have had himself and aid-de-camp on board since the 31st August; in any expedition, in canoe or boat, I have supplied his wants. I kept three negroes on board more than two months on his account. I presented the chiefs for him and on his account. I have seen my provisions taken and given away when we were on short allowance; for Captain W. gives liberally when it is not out of his own pocket, but is extremely costive when any thing is wanted from home.

10th. Cappachimico and McQueen gave me a note of the most necessary articles they wanted immediately, and which I promised them to bring, if possible, by the end of December, and land them as agreed. Gave them a card with seals, &c. &c., as a token that, when they received a messenger with the duplicate thereof in R. W., he came with the straight talk from me; made each a present of rum, sugar, coffee, and one hundred segars; also, the Tiger warrior and two others and the rest had a good lot of segars each; gave them a parting glass; took leave at twelve, midday. They all started on horseback. The two deputies that go to Nassau with me left behind.

These men are children of nature; leave them in their forests to till their fields and hunt the stag and graze their cattle, their ideas will extend no farther; and the honest trader, in supplying their moderate wants, may make a handsome profit of them.

They have been ill-treated by the English, and robbed by the Americans; cheated by those who have dealt with them, receiving goods and other articles at most exorbitant prices for their peltry, which has been much undervalued. I say the English ill-treat them: after making them parties in the war with America, they leave them without a pilot, to be robbed and ill-treated by their natural and sworn enemies, the Americans. When the English officer, Colonel Nicholls, left Prospect Bluff, on the Appalachicola river, he left particular orders with Cappachimico and the other chiefs not on any account to enter on the territory of the Americans; while, at the same time, he informed them the Americans were to give up that territory they had taken possession of during the war; but, while he informed the Indians how they should act, and what the Americans were to do in compliance with the treaty, he left no person to guide them in their conduct in case the latter should not comply, or continue to extend their encroachments and commit aggressions. When such was the case, they had none to represent their case to the British Government but William Hambly, the clerk of John Forbes, and Doyle, another of his clerks, both of whom had long before the conclusion of the war sold themselves to the American Government, and, while they were receiving British pay, acted as spies to the Americans. These persons were not likely to represent the conduct and encroachment of the Americans in their true light. No, they attempted to influence the chiefs to join the Americans. Doyle stated, in a talk at St. Mark's, that in four years no Englishman durst set his foot in the Floridas; yet these were the only persons to whom the poor untutored Indian could apply to represent their grievances to the British Government, or any governor of their islands; and it was not likely they, the tools of the Americans, would give a just and true account of the Indian grievances. Hambly, the Indian interpreter, was ordered to write to the Governor of New Providence, demanding his interference; and, by an intercepted letter from his brother, dated at Regla, in February last, it appears he had written a letter to New Providence; but to whom?

SIR: OCHLOCHNEE SOUND, March 3, 1817.

I am desired by Peter McQueen, an unfortunate chief, who was some years since obliged to fly from his town of Tuckabatchee, on the Tallapoohatche river, to claim of your friendship the delivery of a negro man named Joe, (taken away from him since the peace,) whom he states to be in Fort Gaines. When McQueen left Tuckabatchee, his property was considerable, both in negroes and cattle; of the former, ten grown negroes were taken by a half-breed man named Barney; nine of whom he learns were sold, and one, a girl, is still in possession of said Barney. Twenty able negroes were taken by a chief named Colonel, or Auchi Hatche, who acts also as an interpreter; and, as he never had possession of any of those persons' property, nor ever did them any injury, to his knowledge, he claims a further proof of your friendship, that you will use your influence in procuring those negroes for him; and, should they be given up by the persons holding them, there is one faithful negro among them, named Charle, who will bring them to him at Ochlochnee river.

The American headmen and officers, that were accustomed to live near him, can testify to his civility and good fellowship with them; and there are none of them, he is convinced, that would not serve him if in their power. As he owes nothing, nor ever took any person's property, none have a right to retain his; and he hopes that, through your influence, those persons now holding his negroes will be induced to give them up.

While I am thus advocating the cause of one unfortunate individual, allow me to claim an extension of your philanthropy to all the Indians within your circle, by your representing to them the folly of their quarrels, and that they ought to live quietly and peaceably with each other.

The Lower Creeks seem to wish to live peaceably and quietly, and in good friendship with the others; but there are some designing and evil-minded persons, self-interested, who are endeavoring to create quarrels between the Upper and Lower Creek Indians, contrary to their interest, their happiness, and welfare. Such people belong to no nation, and ought not to be countenanced by any Government.

The head chiefs request I will inquire of you why American settlers are descending the Chatahoochee, driving the poor Indian from his habitation, and taking possession of his home and cultivated fields.

Without authority, I can claim nothing of you; but a humane and philanthropic principle guiding me, I hope the same will influence you, and, if such is really the case, and that the line marked out by the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, respecting the Indian nations, has been infringed upon by the subjects of the latter, that you will represent to them their improper conduct, and prevent its continuance.

I hold in my possession a letter received from the Governor of New Providence, addressed to him by His Britannic Majesty's chief Secretary of State, informing him of the orders given to the British ambassador at Washington to watch over the interests of the Indian nations, and see that their rights are faithfully attended to and protected, agreeably to the treaty of peace made between the British and Americans.

I am in hopes that ere this there is arrived at New Providence a person from Great Britain with authority to act as agent for the Indian nations; and, if so, it will devolve on him to see that the boundary lines, as marked out by the treaty, are not infringed upon.

I hope you will not think these observations, made by desire of the chiefs, any improper interference; and requesting the favor of an answer, I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

P. S. McQueen states that the offspring of the negroes when he left Tuckabatchee were seven of those taken by Barney, and nine of those taken by Auchi Hatche, and he supposes they have increased.

DEAR SIR: FORT GAINES, May 1, 1817.

On being informed by the commanding officer that you had written, in behalf of Peter McQueen, for a negro man once in the possession of myself at this place, requiring the return of said negro to (as you said) the rightful owner, I take the liberty of informing you that the said negro is now at Fort Hawkins, Oakmulgee river, claimed by an American citizen by the name of Bowen White. He remained with us; he was a deposite of some of the Indians, to be given to the said Bowen when called for. Further of his origin, or manner in which he was claimed as property, I cannot tell any thing. You inquired why citizens were descending this river. In answer, I say in right of and conformably to a late treaty between the United States and the Creek nation; for this part of the territory was ceded to us as a compensation for expenses and aid furnished and incurred by the friendly Creek Indians against McQueen and his party, not having any reference or touching any article or part of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain. As to McQueen's having any claims on the good feeling and philanthropy of any citizen of the United States, it is a mockery and a farce; on the contrary, he has incurred both the ill-will and hatred of his own people and them, and has, in fact, been the cause of the destruction and loss of his native country.

Your obedient servant,

AM. CULLOH.

SIR: SUWANEE, LOWER CREEK NATION, January 19, 1818.

Kenhagee, head chief of the Lower Creek nation, has called on me to request I would represent to you the cruel and oppressive conduct of the American people living on the borders of the Indian nation, and which he was in hopes, from a talk you were pleased to send him some weeks since, would have been put a stop to, and peace restored between the Indians and the American people; but, far from any stop being put to their inroads and encroachments, they are pouring in by hundreds at a time, not only from the land side, but both troops and settlers ascending the Appalachicola river in vessel-loads. Thus, the Indians have been compelled to take up arms to defend their homes from a set of lawless invaders.

Your known philanthropy and good-will towards the Indians in general induce the chiefs to hope that you will lose no time in using your influence to put a stop to those invasions of their lands and paternal birthright, and also order that those who have already seized on their fields may retire therefrom. The Indians have seized two persons known to have been greatly instrumental in bringing the Americans down on their lands, and they are now in their possession as prisoners; and they have it in report that sales of their lands have been made by those two people, without the consent, approbation, or knowledge of the chiefs; and, from their long residence in the nation, and the one having enjoyed great confidence in the nation and with the chiefs, as English interpreter, there is some reason to believe those reports, when leagued with the swarms of Americans coming from Mobile and other places seizing the best of the Indian lands. Such improper sales have actually been made.

In taking this liberty of addressing you, sir, in behalf of the unfortunate Indians, believe me I have no wish but to see an end put to a war which, if persisted in, I foresee must eventually be their ruin; and as they were not the aggressors, if, in the height of their rage, they commit any excesses, that you will overlook them as the just ebullitions of an indignant spirit against an invading foe.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CAMP BEFORE ST. MARK'S, April 8, 1818.

The foregoing letter was produced to A. Arbuthnot, on his examination before me, and acknowledged by him to have been written by him to General Mitchell, agent of the Creek nation.

MR. ARBUTHNOT.

The following letters, in addition to those already made public, tend to show the deep interest which this unfortunate gentleman took in procuring redress for what he conceived to be the unprovoked aggressions of the American back settlers on the Indian boundary line.

A. Arbuthnot to the commanding officer at Fort Gaines.

*Copy of a talk sent from the British agents in East Florida to the Big Warrior, head chief of the Creek nation of Indians.

OCHLOCHNEE RIVER, March 3, 1817.

When the English made peace with the Americans, they included the whole of the Indian nations, viz: Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee. Those nations were guarantied in the quiet possession of their lands, and the Americans engaged to give up such lands of the Indians as they had taken possession of during the war.

If they have not done so, or if they have been making further encroachments, the chiefs have only to represent their complaints and the aggressions of the Americans to the Governor of New Providence, who will forward them to England, or get them conveyed to the British minister at Washington, who has orders from the King of England to see that the rights of the nations above mentioned are protected, and the stipulations contained in the treaty, in their favor, are faithfully carried into execution.

The Americans have no wish to go to war; they will not, therefore, do any thing contrary to the treaty; and what encroachments have been made must be without the knowledge of the chief of the American Government; and, so soon as he is informed thereof by the British minister at Washington, he will order the American people who have taken possession of Indian lands to draw back to their own possessions.

The Indian nations are all one great family; they possess lands their great forefathers handed down to them, and they ought to hand them down entire to their children. If they sell their land, what do they receive for it? Nothing that will last. It is wasted away in a few years. Whether, therefore, they sell, or give it away, they are robbing their children of the inheritance they had a right to expect. As a great family, they ought to live as such with each other. Let the four nations join in bonds of brotherly love; let them smoke the pipe of peace; let the cultivation of their lands be their chief object during spring and summer, and hunting their diversion during winter; and the produce of their labor will be bought by good people, who will come and deal with them when they know there is any thing to be purchased for goods or money.

If the Americans or other nations live near them, let them live in friendship with them, and keep up a good understanding, but on no account sell or give away any of their lands. I recommend this as a friend of humanity and of good order.

A. ARBUTHNOT.

The head chiefs of the Upper Creek nation have desired me, Opony, to get the straight talk for them; what is written in the foregoing I believe to be the true and straight talk received from an Englishman,† who carried two deputies to New Providence, and has returned with them to Ochlochnee. I, Opony, have been sent by you, the head chiefs of the Upper Creek nation, to see the Seminole Indians. I have done so; they live quietly and peaceably, and wish to do so, with all their red brethren, in every part of the nation.

Opoy Hatcho has desired me to see those things; I have done so; and see all quiet, and had the talk I now send you, and shaken hands with the friend who gave it me.

That the friend I have met came over with goods by desire of the chiefs of the lower towns, and is a true friend to the Indians. The various and untrue talks that you sent me from time to time must be made by some person an enemy to us all red brethren, and ought not to be listened to; let me know who they are, and send me an answer as soon as possible to the present talk.

OPONY, his × mark.

SIR: WASHINGTON, December 12, 1818.

I have had the honor to receive your note of the 30th ultimo, in reply to mine of the 24th of the same month, by which I perceive, with great concern, the failure of the flattering hope I had formed of seeing a speedy and amicable termination of the differences existing between our respective Governments. But I leave to those who may impartially inquire into the state of things, their origin, nature, and all the circumstances hitherto attending them—to those who form their judgments upon the principles of justice, the dictates of conscience, and the most established rules of human reason, whether, on my part, I have not done even more than could be hoped for at once to terminate a controversy no less unpleasant than it is injurious to the interests of both nations.

It was painful to His Catholic Majesty's Government to find that the differences which originated in the pretensions first formed by the United States in the year 1805 were not then definitively settled; but the tenaciousness of the American plenipotentiaries in maintaining them, and their refusal to accede to those advanced by His Majesty, in conformity with the most inviolable duties of his royal crown, as a preliminary to the ratification of the convention of 1802, threw insurmountable obstacles in the way of both; these obstacles still existed on the part of the United States at the period of the revolution in Spain, in 1808. From that time, and until the latter part of 1815, you are aware, sir, that the Government of the United States declined to acknowledge His Catholic Majesty's minister, and that the diplomatic intercourse between the two Powers was interrupted. From the moment your Government resolved on changing its course, and receiving the minister of Spain, my Government has employed the most unceasing efforts to adjust all existing differences, and establish on a just and solid basis the most perfect harmony and lasting friendship. For this I appeal to the correspondence between His Catholic Majesty's minister of state and the plenipotentiaries of the United States at Madrid, and to that I have had the honor to carry on here with yourself and your predecessor. I leave it to the judgment of any impartial person who may be disposed to analyze it, rejecting whatsoever is irrelevant or unfounded, to determine who has reason and justice on his side, and decide whether it is possible that any nation in the world, similarly situated, could act with greater generosity and good faith than Spain, or offer greater sacrifices to meet the wishes of the United States, with a view to putting an end to the controversy between them.

*This appears to be the same talk with the letter to the Little Prince, mentioned in the proceedings of the court-martial on Arbuthnot's trial.

As you stated to me, in your note of 31st of October last, that the proposals you then made me by order of your Government comprehended every thing which the President conceived it possible, within the compass of his powers and duty, to offer for the final arrangement of the pending differences, I endeavored, in my letter of the 16th of November last, to modify the proposals made in yours of the 31st October, and approximate them to yours to the utmost extent of my powers. I even expressed my earnest desire to conclude the negotiation, so far as to admit the removal of the boundary line from the Gulf of Mexico, on the river Sabine, as proposed by you; and I only added that it should run more or less obliquely to the Missouri, thereby still keeping in view the consideration of conciliating the wish that your Government might have of retaining such other settlement as might have been formed on the bank of that river, and observing, nevertheless, that it was not to pass by New Mexico, or any other provinces or dominions of the Crown of Spain. Notwithstanding this, and the further advantages offered in the said proposals, I now observe that they still appear insufficient to meet the wishes and views of your Government; which is the more a subject of regret to me, as the reasons and grounds on which I founded a hope of a different result were, and still are, of the greatest weight.

What you now state, namely, that your proposal relative to the western boundary between the two Powers involved a great sacrifice on the part of the United States in favor of Spain, appears incomprehensible to me. That proposal, even modified and adapted to that which I made to you on the 24th of last month, included in favor of the United States a considerable extent of territory to the right and left of the Mississippi, to which they neither had nor can have any right whatever; and that fact being, as assuredly it is, beyond all contradiction or doubt, I cannot conceive in what consists the sacrifice made by the United States to Spain in the proposal offered by you. In fact, how can it be denied that Spain has ever been in the peaceable possession of all the countries lying to the westward of the Mermento, the boundary between the Spanish dominions and those of France, in that quarter, being a line running due north from the said river to the Rio Roxo (Red river) between the Adaes and Natchitoches, and thence to the Missouri, although it was not exactly determined whether it was to ascend until that river emptied into the Mississippi, or to some other point? Has the Government of France, peradventure, ever taken any step, or contested with His Catholic Majesty's crown, or carried her pretensions beyond those limits? Is it not universally notorious that this dividing line was always respected by both nations; and that, even after the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States, the different governors of Louisiana and Texas, with a view to avoid disputes, came to an agreement to consider the territory between the Mermento and the Sabine as neutral, and that it should remain unsettled? Is there the least probability that the United States would propose such an arrangement if they conceived themselves to be the owners of the immense country lying between that river and the Rio del Norte? I cannot but think you must admit these facts. As to the other points of the frontier separating the possessions of both Powers, they are equally well known, being accurately determined and defined in solemn treaties, and particularly in that of 1795, between Spain and the United States. The dividing line between the dominions of the two Powers to the eastward of the Mississippi was fixed on that river at the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, running thence due east to the mid-stream of the river Appalachicola or Chatahoochee; thence along the mid-stream of that river to its junction with the Flint; thence in a right line to the head-waters of the St. Mary's river, and following the course of the same to the Atlantic ocean. On the side of the Gulf of Mexico the line has also been accurately determined, so as to prevent its ever being confounded or misunderstood. It follows the course of the Mississippi to the Iberville, running through it, and the lakes Maurepas, Pontchartrain, and Borgne, to the Gulf of Mexico. In opposition to facts of such notoriety, unfounded assertions can have no weight. The offer of the United States, made through the medium of the French Government, to acquire of Spain the territory lying between the Mississippi and the Perdido, at the time the United States were already in possession of Louisiana, is an additional proof tending to demonstrate the certainty and notoriety of the boundaries I have just alluded to; and the French Government, which sold Louisiana to the United States, solemnly declared to this Government, in a note addressed to Mr. Monroe, dated the 21st December, 1804, not only what was its extent, but that it had delivered that province to the United States, such as Spain had retroceded it to France; and that, so far from having sold to this republic any part of the territory east of the Mississippi, known and possessed by England and by Spain under the name of West Florida, His Imperial Majesty, with a full knowledge of what belonged to His Catholic Majesty, early in the 11th year of the republic, authorized General Bournonville, his ambassador at Madrid, to open a negotiation with Spain for the purchase or cession of the Floridas. From what I have just pointed out, as well as from what I have repeatedly stated in the course of our correspondence, it evidently follows that the real and unquestionable sacrifice was that made by His Catholic Majesty in favor of the United States, as expressed in the above-mentioned proposal.

The continued persistance of your Government in its pretensions to all the territory lying between the Mermento and the river Bravo del Norte is not sufficient to invalidate the titles of property and possession which establish the right and dominion of Spain therein, when the English colonies composing the republic of the United States were not yet in existence, nor the French settlements, which serve as the pretext for the amazing pretensions of your Government. For, what titles and proofs have been produced to justify them? The disastrous expedition of M. de la Salle; the absurd grant in favor of Crozat; and the erroneous narratives of travellers, with maps formed at pleasure, by uninformed or interested geographers, such as Melish and others, who ran their lines as they were dictated to them, and thus disposed of the dominions of Spain as suited their wishes. When did La Salle enter the Rio Bravo, and take possession of the extensive countries between it and the Sabine? Was not his expedition, the sole object of which was to discover the mouths of the Mississippi, lost on the coast of the province of Texas? Did not the Spanish troops immediately advance from Mexico to expel these adventurers? What establishment did France, or any other nation, ever hold on the Bravo or the Colorado? The grant of Louis XIV., no less contemptible than the tales and fables of the missionary Hennepin—will it, perchance, name the river Bravo, the Colorado, or the Columbia? It only makes mention of the Mississippi, or river of St. Louis, and of the waters emptying therein; and if, under the sanction of that grant, it were allowable to include, without reserve, all the lands washed by those waters, or all those which might come in contact with them, it would, perhaps, be no difficult matter to extend that pretension to the remotest rocks of Patagonia, and even to the south pole.

I have demonstrated, by the most abundant evidence, what are the unquestionable boundaries which divide the Spanish possessions from those of this republic; and notwithstanding nothing has been produced by the United States to establish their pretensions, and that the rights of Spain have hitherto been acknowledged and notorious, without any Power ever having disputed the property which she has, and always has had, since the sixteenth century, in the aforesaid territories, the Government of His Catholic Majesty is, and at all times has been, ready to produce the titles and documents in support of its rights, for the greater conviction and satisfaction of your Government, and for the impartial comparison of them with those which may be presented by the United States. You have declined these, in consequence, as you inform me, of the order you have received from the President, which only requires that I should subscribe to what he has been pleased to decide on; and, in case I do not agree to this, nothing further is wished to be heard in support of the rights of Spain; and that your Government retracts the proposals it has made for the adjustment of the question of boundaries. In consequence of so peremptory and categorical a declaration, and of proposals which have never been advanced in the course of the present negotiation, until your letter of 31st October last, to which it is impossible I should yet have received an answer from my court, I had no other alternative than to transmit a copy of your letter to my sovereign, which I have done by the secretary of this legation; and it will be very satisfactory to me to learn that His Majesty, animated as he is by the most lively desire to terminate these matters amicably, and on being informed that we are already agreed upon all the other points, may, in his wisdom, find means to conciliate the wishes of the United States with the interests and dignity of his crown. In the mean while, it is necessary I should inform you that as the proposals made to me in the name of the President are, as you signify, no longer obligatory, in like manner do those cease to be obligatory which I have made to you by the order of my Government; and that, consequently, the rights of the Crown of Spain are entirely free as to whatsoever appertains to it.

I cannot, however, refrain from expressing to you my inability to comprehend upon what grounds the United States decline the proposal of submitting the pending differences, in their actual state, to the judgment and decision of one or more friendly Powers in whom the United States may place full confidence. I have read with the greatest attention the note referred to by you, and I candidly confess that I have continued in the same uncertainty. When two nations cannot meet on points upon which they may disagree, a spirit of equity and the love of justice require, and the law of nations points out, a recourse to the arbitrament of an impartial third party. This maxim, so deserving of respect, was adopted by the United States themselves on the occasion of their acceptance of the mediation of Russia in their differences with Great Britain; and also on that of their agreement with the latter Power to submit to arbitrament whatever difficulties might arise in the settlement of their boundaries. A similar course has been adopted by all nations under similar circumstances; and, in fact, what mode is there, when two nations (or two individuals in particular cases) cannot agree upon a certain point, each one conceiving they have reason and justice on their side, but to submit the question to the impartial judgment and decision of a third party, chosen to their mutual satisfaction? Spain, convinced that this mode was the fairest and most expeditious, was anxious to adopt it, with all the sincerity and good faith which have characterized her; and in the event of its not being adopted, through the unalterable opposition of your Government, there can be no room for apprehension or regret as to the opinion which will be formed by the impartial world on this point.

In reference to what you state respecting the transmission, by order of the President, to the minister of the United States at Madrid, of all the evidence and documents relative to the conduct of the Governor of Pensacola and the Commandant of St. Mark's, with instructions to lay them before His Catholic Majesty's Government; and the demand, in consequence of the nature of the facts therein exhibited, of the condign punishment of those officers, I abstain from offering further proofs in addition to those I have already presented of the good conduct, honorable proceeding, and strict discharge of duty, on the part of those individuals acting under the authority of the King, my master, and in conformity with the existing treaty between the two nations, as the opportunity will be afforded of examining and comparing at Madrid the evidence adduced by Mr. Erving with that which my Government has received, or may receive, from the authorities whose duty it is to transmit it. If, upon such examination and comparison, it should appear that the Governor of West Florida and his officers have conducted themselves improperly, I am confident that due punishment will be inflicted on them; and if, on the other hand, the American general and officers should be found to have acted in an unjustifiable manner, the United States cannot hesitate to proceed against them, nor to indemnify Spain for the losses and injuries sustained in consequence of the aggression complained of.

With respect to the conduct of General Jackson in the invasion of Florida, and the excesses committed there in violation of the sovereignty and dignity of a friendly Power, as they are public and notorious, and sufficiently reprobated by public opinion, and as they are identified with the subject which has just been referred to, I likewise abstain from answering the arguments by which you have endeavored to justify that officer in the note I have the honor to reply to. Whatever may be the causes which, in the view of your Government, justified the war against the Seminoles, you cannot fail to admit how improbable it is that those miserable Indians, feeble, and wholly destitute as they are, could have provoked it. In the letter of the chief Boleck to the Governor of St. Augustine, of 20th December, 1816, copy of which I had the honor to transmit to you on the 27th of March last, you must have remarked that he speaks of assassinations, carrying off of men and cattle, usurpations of his territory, and even forging of treaties for the cession of lands, signed or marked by the names of persons unknown to the chiefs of the Creek nation, who, he adds, are alone authorized to transfer the general property; of all which he accuses the Americans. Besides, the friendship and good understanding existing between the two nations, and the treaty itself, on the authority of which the measures of General Jackson are supported, decisively required that any complaints which there might be against the Indians should be laid before His Majesty's Government, or before his minister near this republic, previous to the adoption of violent measures; as it was scarcely possible that those excesses could be restrained by His Majesty so long as he remained ignorant of them, and was only informed of the complaints of the continual vexations exercised towards the miserable Indians by the citizens of this Union.

I refrain from attempting any refutation of your remarks on the admission, by the Spanish Governor of Florida, of two English traders into that province, without orders from His Catholic Majesty's Government, or without notifying General Jackson thereof. It is evident that, if he admitted them by order of the King's Government, he was under no obligation to notify the American general of it; and if he admitted them without the necessary order, he was solely responsible to his sovereign for his conduct. The unquestionable fact is, that General Jackson, at the head of his army, fell upon Florida as a haughty invader and conqueror, regardless of the laws of humanity and the feelings of nature, and put to a cruel death two foreigners, who there enjoyed the protection of Spain, and an asylum which has ever been held sacred by all civilized nations; thereby offering an unexampled insult to the sovereignty and independence of Spain; trampling under foot the most solemn compacts, founded on the laws of nations; and contemptuously driving from that province the Spanish commandants and troops in garrison there. Your further remarks on the restrictive system of the Spanish Government are not strictly conformable to the fact; since you cannot be ignorant that explorators, travellers, and even American officers with troops, have, at different periods, traversed the provinces and territories of the Crown of Spain in that part of America; and that only such persons have been arrested as have been found violating the laws of the country, or aiding, with arms in their hands, banditti and rebels, for the purpose of subverting good order and public tranquillity.

Before I conclude this note, I have to state that, if the project of the definitive adjustment of all the differences pending between the two Governments, which I presented to you on the part of mine, also included the claims for American captures made by the French on the coasts of Spain, or carried by them into Spanish ports, and there condemned in the first instance by French consuls, it was a sacrifice agreed to by Spain, with a view to terminate, once for all, these unpleasant disputes, and, by this additional proof of her condescension and generous friendship for the United States, to conciliate a correspondent proceeding on the part of your Government, from a respect to national law and the solemn principles of justice and equity, as it regards Spain. But this sacrifice, as well as that offered by me on the subject of boundaries and the cession of the Floridas, ceased to have any effect or force from the moment your Government refused to admit the said project, and, consequently, His Catholic Majesty relinquishes to the United States all the rights they may have to claim of France for the said prizes condemned by her consuls and tribunals. Whilst that nation exists, no recourse can in equity be had on Spain for indemnity for those spoliations. The recourse on Spain can in nowise be considered but as secondary. France, being the aggressor, comes under the obligation as a principal. It was she who derived the benefit of those prizes, and on her devolves the responsibility for their amount; and Spain has only become accountable in this concern as the security or caution of France. In conformity with this principle, an opinion has been given by three of the most eminent advocates of this country, who were consulted on the subject. It is also in strict conformity with the principles of natural law, and the venerable canons of common justice. It is in vain that reference is had to the letter of the existing treaty to suppose and insist on the contrary. That treaty can never receive an interpretation contradictory of those principles and the dictates of human reason.

The obligation of Spain cannot extend farther than to claiming of France, in behalf of the United States, and employing her best endeavors to obtain for them a settlement and satisfaction from that nation; which, however, is to be understood only in case the United States have not already been indemnified by France, as has been repeatedly declared by the French Government, or may have adjusted or abandoned that right by the treaty of 1800, and in subsequent conventions, as I have seen it stated in several public writings in this country.

Until I receive fresh orders, it is my duty to insist on the adoption of such measures by your Government as will promptly and effectually put a stop to the piracies which, for a series of years, have been carried on in various ports of this Union against the commerce of Spain. This system of plunder has been carried to a height unexampled in history; and the clamors of the reflecting part of the people of the United States denounce it to the whole world as a public calamity.

As to the exchange of the ratifications of the convention of 1802, I am ready to proceed to execute it with you, whenever you will be pleased to name a time for that purpose.

In the mean while, I renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

SIR: WASHINGTON, January 11, 1819.

I have just received a courier extraordinary of my Government; and, by the despatches he has brought me, I am authorized by His Majesty to give a greater extent to the proposals which I made to you for adjusting and terminating amicably all the subjects in dispute between the two Powers.

As the great difficulty which has hitherto opposed this desirable arrangement is the exact demarcation of the line which divides, or should divide, the dominions of the Crown of Spain from the territory of the United States westward of the Mississippi, and as you were pleased to state to me, in your note of the 30th September last, that the principal motive which induced the President to withdraw the proposals which you had made to me by his direction, was the want of instructions authorizing me to extend the boundary line to the Pacific ocean, I have the honor to inform you that His Majesty, although then unacquainted with the proposals made by you to me in your note of the 31st October, with a view to give an eminent proof of his sincere and generous friendship for this republic, has been pleased to authorize me to settle this point and others embraced by former proposals. If the President should agree to your entering into an amicable arrangement of them, and also to modify, on his part, the proposals you have made to me, I do not doubt that, either by correspondence or in conference, we may speedily attain the desired object—the termination of this interesting affair. I flatter myself that the President, as well as the whole American people, cannot but fail to acknowledge, in this disposition of His Majesty, (before he had a knowledge of the exorbitant pretensions of your Government,) the good faith and generosity of his proceeding, and to admit that a measure at once so frank and so decided claims a correspondent feeling on the part of this republic; the maintenance of perfect amity and good correspondence between the two Powers being obviously calculated to promote the best interests of both.

In the expectation of being soon favored with the decision of the President, I beg leave to renew to you the assurances of my high respect; and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

SIR: WASHINGTON, January 16, 1819.

In consequence of the wish expressed by you yesterday, in the interview to which you were pleased to invite me, that I would state the proposals for which I am authorized by the fresh instructions I have received by a special messenger from my Government, and relying on your assurances that, notwithstanding the proposals you had made to me, the President would take those into consideration which I might make anew for the purpose of settling amicably all pending differences, I have the honor to confirm to you those which I made in my note of the 16th of November last, and to add thereto that His Majesty will agree that the boundary line between the two states shall extend from the source of the Missouri, westward, to the Columbia river, and along the middle thereof to the Pacific ocean. If this basis should be accepted by the President, (as I trust it will, inasmuch as it presents the means of realizing his great plan of extending a navigation from the Pacific to the remotest points of the Northern States and of the ocean, and of enlarging the dominions of the republic by the acquisition of both the Floridas,) I will have no hesitation in agreeing to an arrangement honorable and satisfactory to both nations, upon the point on which we differ, relating to the indemnity claimed for the injuries resulting from the occupation of the territories of the King by the forces of this Union.

I conceive that you, as well as the President and the whole American people, cannot but see, in this evidence of the spirit of conciliation by which His Catholic Majesty is actuated, a certain pledge of his desire to strengthen and cement the ties of friendship with this republic; and I trust that the answer of the President will correspond with the sacrifices made by His Majesty, as well with a view to the prompt satisfaction of the citizens of the United States for whatever injuries they may have sustained, as to the complete removal of every cause of future disagreement between the two nations. But if, contrary to my expectations, this should not be the case, I shall feel a sincere regret in seeing this desirable arrangement protracted until His Majesty, on being made acquainted with the extraordinary pretensions of your Government by the despatches of which Don Luis Noeli, the secretary of this legation, was the bearer, may transmit to me such orders as he may deem expedient.

I renew to you the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, January 29, 1819.

Your letter of the 16th instant has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States, by whose directions I have the honor of informing you that the proposal to draw the western boundary line between the United States and the Spanish territories on this continent, from the source of the Missouri to the Columbia river, cannot be admitted. I have to add, that, for the purpose of an immediate arrangement of affairs with Spain, this Government repeats the proposal contained in my letter to you of the 31st October last;* and if you are not authorized to agree to it, we are willing to adjust the other subjects of difference, leaving that to be settled hereafter. But if your powers are incompetent to accept either of these offers, the President thinks it useless to pursue the discussion any further of subjects upon which there can be no hope entertained of concluding an agreement between us.

Be pleased to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

[TRANSLATION.]

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 1, 1819.

I have received your note of the 29th January, in which you are pleased to state to me, that, having laid before the President my note of the 16th, he has directed you to inform me that my proposal to fix the boundary between the two states, by a line from the source of the river Missouri to the Columbia, and along the course of the latter to the Pacific, is inadmissible; but that, with a view to an immediate arrangement of affairs with Spain, you repeat to me the proposal contained in your note of the 31st October last, and add, that, if I am not authorized to agree to it, we may adjust the other subjects of difference, leaving that to be settled hereafter.

My powers authorize me to adjust all such differences as His Majesty was apprized of at the date of my last despatches, which are of the 4th November. The proposal referred to by you is of the 31st October preceding, and, in all probability, no answer to it can be expected before the middle or end of March. Taking into consideration, however, on the one hand, the earnest desire of His Catholic Majesty to terminate these matters before the rising of Congress, and thereby to avoid a further delay of a twelvemonth in settling the indemnities claimed by citizens of the Union, and, on the other, the probable anxiety of your Government to carry into execution the establishments contemplated in the Floridas, I am prepared to take upon myself the definitive settlement of the points in controversy, provided the President, animated by correspondent feelings, is willing to modify the proposals made to me, so as to render them consistent and compatible with the interests of both Powers.

I have proved to you, in the most satisfactory manner, that neither the Red river of Natchitoches, nor the Columbia, ever formed the boundary of Louisiana; but, as you have intimated to me that it is useless to pursue the discussion any further, I acquiesce with you therein; and I agree that, keeping out of view the rights which either Power may have to the territory in dispute, we should confine ourselves to the settlement of those points which may be for the mutual interest and convenience of both.

Upon this view, therefore, of the subject, and considering that the motive for declining to admit my proposal of extending the boundary line from the Missouri to the Columbia, and along that river to the Pacific, appears to be the wish of the President to include within the limits of the Union all the branches and rivers emptying into the said river Columbia, I will adapt my proposals on this point so as fully to satisfy the demand of the United States, without losing sight of the essential object, namely, that the boundary line shall, as far as possible, be natural and clearly defined, and leave no room for dispute to the inhabitants on either side.

Having thus declared to you my readiness to meet the views of the United States in the essential point of their demand, I have to state to you that His Majesty is unable to agree to the admission of the Red river to its source, as proposed by you. This river rises within a few leagues of Santa Fé, the capital of New Mexico; and, as I flatter myself the United States have no hostile intentions towards Spain, at the moment we are using all our efforts to strengthen the existing friendship between the two nations, it must be indifferent to them to accept the Arkansas instead of the Red river as the boundary. This opinion is strengthened by the well-known fact, that the intermediate space between those two rivers is so much impregnated with nitre as scarcely to be susceptible of improvement.

In consideration of these obvious reasons, I propose to you, that, drawing the boundary line from the Gulf of Mexico, by the river Sabine, as laid down by you, it shall follow the course of that river to its source; thence, by the ninety-fourth degree of longitude, to the Red river of Natchitoches, and along the same to the ninety-fifth degree; and crossing it at that point, to run by a line due north to the Arkansas, and along it to its source; thence, by a line due west, till it strikes the source of the river San Clemente, or Multnomah, in latitude 41°, and along that river to the Pacific ocean: the whole agreeably to Melish's map.

In case this basis, which not only approximates your proposals, but fulfils, in every essential point, the wishes you have stated to me, be admitted by the President, His Majesty, with a view to give the United States a more convincing proof of his generosity and his desire to strengthen the bonds of amity with this republic, consents to relinquish the claim of indemnity for the injuries sustained by his treasury in consequence of the invasion of the Floridas, reserving only to the inhabitants of the same their right to what may appear to be justly due to them for their losses by that event.

It is understood that the convention of 1802, lately ratified, is annulled as far as it relates to the indemnity for injuries and losses claimed by the United States or their citizens of Spain; inasmuch as full compensation for the same is to be made to them from the sales of the lands in the two Floridas, and of the immense possessions westward of the Mississippi, ceded by His Majesty in virtue of that treaty; and that the United States, actuated by the most sincere desire to remove every cause of difference between the two nations in future, will take into consideration the necessity of establishing such regulations as, in their wisdom, they may deem most expedient to prevent the evasion of the laws of the republic, to the injury of the commerce of the subjects of His Catholic Majesty.

I renew to you, sir, the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Projet of an article describing the western boundary, communicated to Don Luis de Onis by the Secretary of State, February 6, 1819.

ARTICLE.—It is agreed that the western boundary between the United States and the territories of Spain shall be as follows: Beginning at the mouth of the river Sabine, on the Gulf of Mexico; following the course of said river to the thirty-second degree of latitude, the eastern bank and all the islands in the river to belong to the United States, and the western bank to Spain; thence, due north, to the northernmost part of the thirty-third degree of north latitude, and until it strikes the Rio Roxo, or Red river; thence, following the course of said river, to the northernmost point of the bend, between longitude 101° and 102°; thence, by the shortest line, to the southernmost point of the bend of the river Arkansas, between the same degrees of longitude 101° and 102°; thence, following the course of the river Arkansas, to its source, in latitude 41° north; thence, following the same parallel of latitude 41°, to the South sea. The northern banks and all the islands in the said Red and Arkansas rivers, on the said boundary line, to belong to the United States, and their southern banks to Spain: the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. But, if the source of the Arkansas river should fall south or north of latitude 41°, then the line from the said source shall run due north or south, as the case may be, till it meets the said parallel of latitude, and thence, as aforesaid, to the South sea. And it is further agreed that no Spanish settlement shall be made on any part of the said Red or Arkansas rivers, nor on any of the waters flowing into the same, nor any east of the chain of Snow mountains, between the latitudes 31° and 41°, inclusively; and that the navigation of said rivers shall belong exclusively to the United States forever.

Projet of a treaty delivered by Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State, February 9, 1819.

[Translation sent by Don Luis de Onis.]

His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, desiring to consolidate, on a permanent basis, the friendship and good correspondence which happily prevail between the two parties, have determined to settle and terminate all their differences and pretensions by a treaty, which shall designate with precision the limits of the one and the other, the settlement whereof will be productive of general advantage and reciprocal utility to both nations.

With this intention, His Catholic Majesty has appointed the most excellent Don Luis de Onis Gonzales y Vara, lord of the town of Rayaces, perpetual regidor of the corporation of the city of Salamanca, knight grand cross of the royal American order of Isabella the Catholic, decorated with the lys of La Vendée, knight-pensioner of the royal and distinguished Spanish order of Charles the Third, member of the supreme assembly of the said royal order, of the council of His Catholic Majesty, his secretary, with exercise of decrees, and his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near the United States of America; and the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of their Senate, has appointed Mr. John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States. And the plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between His Catholic Majesty, his successors and subjects, and the United States and their citizens, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. His Catholic Majesty, desiring to give a distinguished proof of his friendship to the United States, cedes to them, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the names of East and West Florida, such as they were ceded to him by Great Britain in 1783, and with the limits by which they are designated in the treaty of limits and navigation concluded between Spain and the United States on the 27th October, 1795.

ART. 3. The adjacent islands dependant on said provinces, places, public squares, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings which are not the property of some private individual, archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article.

ART. 4. That at no time whatever there may be any dispute or mistake in the boundaries which shall separate in future the territories of His Catholic Majesty and those of the United States to the westward of the Mississippi, the two high contracting parties have agreed to fix them in the following manner: The boundary line between the two countries shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea; continuing north, along the middle of that river, to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence, by a line due north, to the thirty-third degree of latitude, where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches, (Red river,) following the course of the Rio Roxo, to the westward, to the one hundredth degree of longitude, and thirty-three and one-fourth degree of latitude, where it crosses that river; thence, by a line due north, by the said one hundredth degree of longitude from London, according to Melish's map, till it enters the river Arkansas; thence, along the middle of the Arkansas, to the forty-second degree of latitude; thence, a line shall be drawn to the westward, by the same parallel of latitude, to the source of the river San Clemente, or Multnomah, following the course of that river to the forty-third degree of latitude; and thence, by a line due west, to the Pacific ocean. All the country belonging to His Catholic Majesty, included in said line to the eastward, His Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, forever; as also the islands in the rivers Sabine, Red river of Natchitoches, Arkansas, and Multnomah, that may be situated within the limits which are here pointed out: both parties to maintain the navigation of all of them free as respects the parts thereof which constitute their frontiers.

ART. 5. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of this treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line in conformity to what is above agreed upon and stipulated; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to these persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

ART. 6. The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restriction; and all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject in either case to duties.

ART. 7. The inhabitants of the two provinces aforesaid, and those in all the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty, shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as possible, agreeably to the principles of the federal constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the other States.

ART. 8. The territories of the two Floridas, which, at the time of the delivery which is to be made of them to the United States, should be occupied by the troops or authorities of the republic, shall be delivered to the commissioners which His Catholic Majesty or the captain general of the Havana may send for that purpose, in order that the said territories may be delivered up in a regular manner to the commissioners or officers appointed by the United States to receive them.

ART. 9. All the grants of lands made by His Catholic Majesty, or by his legitimate authorities, in the aforesaid territories of the two Floridas, and others which His Majesty cedes to the United States, shall be confirmed and acknowledged as valid, excepting those grants which may have been made after the 24th January of last year, the date that the first proposals were made for the cession of these provinces, which shall be held null, in consideration of the grantees not having complied with the conditions of the cession.

ART. 10. The two contracting parties, animated by the most sincere desire of conciliation, and with a view of eradicating all the dissensions which have existed between them, and to secure that good harmony which they desire perpetually to maintain with each other, reciprocally renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they themselves, as well as their respective subjects and citizens, may have suffered until the time of signing this treaty.

The renunciation of the United States will extend—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th August, 1802.

2. To all claims of prizes made by French privateers, and condemned by French consuls, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain.

3. To all claims of indemnities on account of the suspension of the right of deposite at New Orleans.

4. And to all the claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, in which the interposition of the Government of the United States may have been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, and which may have been made to the Department of State of this republic, or to the minister of the United States in Spain.

The renunciation of His Catholic Majesty extends—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th August, 1802.

2. To the sums which His Catholic Majesty advanced for the return of Captain Pike from the Provincias Internas.

3. To all injuries caused by the expedition of Miranda, fitted out and equipped at New York.

4. To the revenue collected by the United States in the territories of Florida that have been occupied by their troops, and to the indemnities which His Catholic Majesty is entitled to for the injuries caused to his royal crown by those invasions.

Finally, to all claims of subjects of His Catholic Majesty upon the Government of the United States, in which the interposition of His Catholic Majesty's Government has been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, or which may have been made to the Department of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty, or to his minister in the United States.

ART. 11. The convention entered into between the two Governments on the 11th August, 1802, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 21st December, 1818, is annulled in that part which relates to the payment of the injuries which the United States and their citizens claim; it being agreed between the two high contracting parties that these injuries shall be paid integrally by the United States from the proceeds of the public or crown lands of the two Floridas and other territories ceded by His Catholic Majesty in this treaty; so that both Governments consider all their claims, and those of their subjects and citizens, as cancelled from this date, excepting those claims which the citizens of the United States may have against Spanish individuals, or which the latter may have upon the citizens of this republic.

ART. 12. The treaty of limits and navigation of 1795 remains confirmed in all and each one of its articles, excepting the second, third, fourth, twenty-first, and the second clause of the twenty-second article, which, having been altered by this treaty, are no longer valid.

With respect to the fifteenth article of the same treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, of 1795, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, the two high contracting parties agree that this may be so understood with respect to those Powers who recognise this principle; but, if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ART. 13. In order to avoid frauds, and the great evils which arise from concealing the destination of vessels by clearing out, in general terms, for the West Indies, Spanish main, Europe, &c., the two high contracting parties have agreed that, in future, all merchant vessels belonging to their respective subjects or citizens shall be cleared out for a specified port, either at their respective custom-houses or in those of other Powers, from whose ports said vessels may depart in continuation of their primitive voyage, or in case they should undertake a new one; and the merchant vessels of either of the two nations that, in violation of their clearances, should enter other ports, without justifying the motives which induced them to it, or should be met with on the high seas by their vessels of war or privateers cleared out in violation of this article, shall be detained, proceeded against, and, upon conviction, forfeited.

ART. 14. In case there shall be just cause to suspect the character of the vessels, or which should not be cleared out for a specified port, as is stipulated in the preceding article, or that the cargo belongs to enemies of either of the contracting parties whose Governments do not recognise the principle that the flag covers the property, or which shall consist of articles contraband of war, such vessels may be detained and sent to the nearest and most convenient port to which the ship of war or privateer that may have detained such a vessel belongs, where she shall be adjudged agreeably to the law of nations, and the practice established by other maritime Powers. And it is agreed that adjudication shall be had with the least delay possible; and if it shall be proved that the detention or capture was unjust, it shall not only be the duty of the tribunal where the case was tried to release the vessel and cargo, but it shall decide the corresponding indemnity for the damages and injuries that may have been sustained, to be paid by the captors, and, in their defect, by the Government by whom they shall be commissioned.

ART. 15. Both contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce, by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective merchant vessels, have agreed that the sailors who shall desert from their vessels in the ports of the other shall be arrested and delivered up at the instance of the consul, who shall prove, nevertheless, that the deserters belong to the vessels that claim them, exhibiting the document that is customary in their nation; that is to say, that the Spanish consul in an American port shall exhibit the roll of the vessel, and the American consul in a Spanish port the document known by the name of articles; and if the name of the deserter or deserters who are claimed shall appear in the one or the other, they shall be arrested, held in custody, and delivered to the vessel to which they shall belong.

ART. 16. His Catholic Majesty having condescended to make the cessions to the United States which are specified in the present treaty, in compliment to the United States, with the object of cancelling all the claims they have demanded of the royal crown, the United States will certify, in due form, that they have not received any compensation from France for the injuries they suffered from her privateers, consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain; and they will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their true value, that Spain may claim from France the return of this amount.

ART. 17. It being mutually advantageous to the commerce of Spain and of the United States to facilitate the communication between both nations for a limited time in the territories ceded by this treaty, until they can agree upon the regulations relating to commerce which may be best adapted to favor the same, the two high contracting parties agree that Spanish vessels which may arrive loaded solely with the produce or manufactures of Spain, directly from the ports or colonies, shall be admitted into all the ports of the two Floridas that may be lawfully open to the trade of other nations, for the space of twelve years, without paying more duties for their produce or merchandise, or greater tonnage duty, than what are paid by vessels of the United States.

During said time no other nation shall be entitled to the same privileges in the ceded territories. The twelve years shall begin three months after exchanging the ratifications of the present treaty; at the expiration of said time, Spanish vessels shall be received in said territories on the same footing as the most favored nations.

ART. 18. The present treaty shall not be in force until ratified in due form by the contracting parties; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the underwritten plenipotentiaries of His Catholic Majesty and of the United States of America, have signed, by virtue of our powers, the present treaty of friendship and limits, and have thereunto affixed our seals, respectively.

Done at Washington, this — day of February, 1819.

Counter-projet of a treaty, communicated by Mr. Adams to Don Luis de Onis the 13th of February, 1819.

The United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, desiring to consolidate, on a permanent basis, the friendship and good correspondence which happily prevail between the two parties, have determined to settle and terminate all their differences and pretensions, by a treaty, which shall designate with precision the limits of their respective bordering territories in North America.

With this intention, the President of the United States has furnished with their full powers John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the said United States; and His Catholic Majesty has appointed the most excellent lord Don Luis de Onis Gonzales Lopes y Vara, lord of the town of Rayaces, perpetual regidor of the corporation of the city of Salamanca, knight grand cross of the royal American order of Isabella the Catholic, decorated with the lys of La Vendée, knight-pensioner of the royal and distinguished Spanish order of Charles the Third, member of the supreme assembly of the said royal order, of the council of His Catholic Majesty, his secretary, with exercise of decrees, and his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near the United States of America.

And the said plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States and their citizens, and His Catholic Majesty, his successors and subjects, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the names of East and West Florida. The adjacent islands, dependant on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, archives and documents, which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them.

ART. 3. The boundary line between the two countries, west of the Mississippi, shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea; continuing north, along the western bank of that river, to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence, by a line due north, to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches, or Red river; thence, following the course of the Rio Roxo westward, to the degree of longitude 102° west from London, and 25° from Washington; then, crossing the said Red river, and running thence, by a line due north, to the river Arkansas; thence, following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas, to its source, in latitude 41° north; and thence, by the parallel of latitude, to the South sea: the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published in Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. But if the source of the Arkansas river should be found to fall north or south of latitude 41°, then the line shall run from the said source due south or north, as the case may be, till it meets the said parallel of latitude 41°; and thence, along the said parallel, to the South sea; the Sabine and the said Red and Arkansas rivers, and all the islands in the same, throughout the course thus described, to belong to the United States; and the western bank of the Sabine, and the southern banks of the said Red and Arkansas rivers, throughout the line thus described, to belong to Spain. And the United States hereby cede to His Catholic Majesty all their rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories lying west and south of the above-described line; and His Catholic Majesty cedes to the said United States all his rights, claims, and pretensions to any territories east and north of the said line, and, for himself, his heirs, and successors, renounces all claim to the said territories forever.

ART. 4. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet, before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of this treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line from the mouth of the Sabine to the Red river, and from the Red river to the river Arkansas, and to ascertain the latitude of the source of the said river Arkansas, in conformity to what is above agreed upon and stipulated; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

ART. 5. The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion; without any restriction; and all those who desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject, in either case, to duties.

ART. 6. The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the federal constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

ART. 7. The officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty in the territories hereby ceded by him to the United States shall be withdrawn, and possession of the places occupied by them shall be given, within six months after the ratification of this treaty, or sooner if possible, by the officers of His Catholic Majesty, to the commissioners or officers of the United States duly appointed to receive them.

ART. 8. All grants of land made by or in the name of His Catholic Majesty in the aforesaid territories, after the 24th of January, 1818, shall be held null, the conditions of the said grants not having been performed by the grantees. All grants made before that date by His Catholic Majesty, or by his legitimate authorities, in the said territories, the conditions of which shall have been performed by the grantees according to the tenor of the respective grants, and none other, shall be confirmed and acknowledged as valid.

ART. 9. The two contracting parties reciprocally renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they themselves, as well as their respective citizens and subjects, may have suffered, until the time of signing this treaty.

The renunciation of the United States will extend—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th of August, 1802.

2. To all claims on account of prizes made by French privateers, and condemned by French consuls, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain.

3. To all claims of indemnities on account of the suspension of the right of deposite at New Orleans in 1802.

4. To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, arising from the unlawful seizures at sea, and from the unlawful seizure of vessels or cargoes belonging to citizens of the United States in the ports and territories of Spain or the Spanish colonies.

The renunciation of His Catholic Majesty extends—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th August, 1802.

2. To the sums which His Catholic Majesty advanced for the return of Captain Pike from the Provincias Internas.

3. To all injuries caused by the expedition of Miranda, that was fitted out and equipped at New York.

Finally, to all the claims of subjects of His Catholic Majesty upon the Government of the United States, in which the interposition of His Catholic Majesty's Government has been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, or which may have been made to the Department of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty, or to his minister in the United States.

And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.

ART. 10. The convention entered into between the two Governments on the 11th August, 1802, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 21st December, 1818, is annulled.

ART. 11. The United States, exonerating Spain from all demands in future on account of the claims of their citizens to which the renunciations herein contained extend, undertake to make satisfaction for the same to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To ascertain the full amount and validity of these claims, a commission, to consist of three commissioners, citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; which commission shall meet at the city of Washington, and, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, shall receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims included within the descriptions above mentioned. The said commissioners shall take an oath or affirmation, to be entered on the record of their proceedings, for the faithful and diligent discharge of their duties; and, in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of any such commissioner, his place may be supplied by the appointment as aforesaid, or by the President of the United States during the recess of the Senate, of another commissioner in his stead. The said commissioners shall be authorized to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same; and the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of said claims, according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of 27th October, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said commissioners.

The payment of such claims as may be admitted and adjusted by the said commissioners, or the major part of them, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, shall be made by the United States, either immediately at their Treasury, or by the creation of stock bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable from the proceeds of sales of public lands within the territories hereby ceded to the United States, or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may prescribe by law.

The records of the proceedings of the said commissioners, together with vouchers and documents produced before them, relative to the claims to be adjusted and decided upon by them, shall, after the close of their transactions, be deposited in the Department of State of the United States, and copies of them, or any part of them, shall be furnished to the Spanish Government, if required, at the demand of the Spanish minister in the United States.

ART. 12. The treaty of limits and navigation of 1795 remains confirmed in all and each one of its articles, excepting the second, third, fourth, twenty-first, and the second clause of the twenty-second article; which, having been altered by this treaty, or having received their entire execution, are no longer valid.

With respect to the fifteenth article of the same treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, of 1795, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, the two high contracting parties agree that this shall be so understood with respect to those Powers who recognise this principle. But, if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ART. 13. Both contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce, by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective merchant vessels, have agreed that the sailors who shall desert from their vessels in the ports of the other shall be arrested and delivered up at the instance of the consul, who shall prove, nevertheless, that the deserters belong to the vessels that claim them, exhibiting the document that is customary in their nation; that is to say, the American consul in a Spanish port shall exhibit the document known by the name of articles, and the Spanish consul in an American port the roll of the vessel; and if the name of the deserter or deserters who are claimed shall appear in the one or the other, they shall be arrested, held in custody, and be delivered to the vessel to which they shall belong.

ART. 14. The United States hereby certify that they have not received any compensation from France for the injuries they suffered from her privateers, consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, for the satisfaction of which provision is made by this treaty; and they will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their true value, that Spain may avail herself of the same, in such manner as she may deem just and proper.

ART. 15. The present treaty shall be ratified, in due form, by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, the underwritten plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of His Catholic Majesty have signed, by virtue of their powers, the present treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, and have thereunto affixed their seals, respectively.

ART. 2. Requires a more explicit explanation.*
ART. 3. The Chevalier de Onis requires that the boundary between the two countries shall be the middle of the rivers, and that the navigation of the said rivers shall be common to both nations.	The Secretary of State maintains that the United States have always intended that the property of the river should belong to them. He insists on this point, as an essential condition, as the means of avoiding all collision, and as a principle adopted henceforth by the Union in its treaties with its neighbors. He agrees, however, that the navigation of the said rivers to the sea shall be common to both people. The Secretary of State conceives that in this clause there is nothing humiliating to Spain, as seemed to be thought; since it is not intended to impose on her an onerous stipulation, but to fix a territorial limit, which, in fact, might be extended beyond the rivers mentioned. He considers this clause as indispensable, and as eminently calculated to preserve a good understanding between the two people.
The minister of Spain agrees to the one hundredth degree of longitude, and, to remove all difficulties, to admit the forty-second instead of the forty-third degree of latitude, from the Arkansas to the Pacific ocean.	Agreed.

ART. 7. Agreed, with the addition that the United States shall furnish transports and the necessary escort for conveying the aforesaid troops of His Catholic Majesty, and their baggage, to the Havana.*	Agreed.*
ART. 8. This article cannot be varied from what is contained in the chevalier's projet, as the object of the last clause therein is merely to save the honor and dignity of the sovereignty of His Catholic Majesty.*	Agreed, with the following explanation: that all grants of land which shall not be annulled by this convention are valid to the same extent as they are binding on His Catholic Majesty.*

† Mr. De Onis being at this time confined by indisposition, at his request Mr. Hyde de Neuville had a personal interview with the Secretary of State on the 15th of February, at which there was a full and free discussion of the projet of Mr. De Onis, delivered February 9th, and of the counter-projet communicated by him to Mr. De Onis, February 13th. Immediately after this interview, Mr. De Neuville reduced to writing this paper, in which are noted the objections of Mr. De Onis to parts of the counter-projet, the replies to those objections by the Secretary of State, and the points to which both parties were agreed. He sent a copy of the paper the next morning to the Secretary of State, and another copy to Mr. De Onis. Being intended merely as a private minute, that both parties might be satisfied of the correctness in which their respective remarks were stated, it was drawn up partly in French, and partly in our own language. The passages here marked with asterisks are in English in the original paper. The rest is translated.

The minutes upon the eighth article, compared with the draught in the projet of Mr. De Onis, with that of the counter-projet by the Secretary of State, and with the article as finally expressed in the treaty, fully elucidate the understanding of the parties that the grants of land dated before, as well as after the 24th January, 1818, were annulled, excepting those upon which settlements had been commenced, the completion of which had been prevented by the circumstances of Spain, and the recent revolutions in Europe.

* The passages marked thus (*) are in English in the paper received from Mr. De Neuville.

REMARKS.—The Secretary of State observed to me that the Federal Government would most assuredly never entertain the idea of disturbing individuals who were vested with a bona fide title to their property; but, as a treaty ought not to cover fraudulent practices, so no more could be asked of the United States than could be offered by His Catholic Majesty; that, being in this case substituted for His Majesty, they would scrupulously fulfil their engagements; but that more could not be expected of them.

The Secretary of State even proposes, if Mr. De Onis wishes it, that the article shall be inserted in the treaty, as proposed by the minister of Spain, on condition that the above explanation shall be given in the form of a note. The Federal Government, unwilling to leave any thing in a state of doubt or uncertainty, only wishes to place on the most secure footing whatever is just and honorable, and is, at the same time, perfectly satisfied that His Catholic Majesty neither asks nor wishes more.

ART. 9. Mr. De Onis requires that the article should run thus:
"To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain arising from [un]lawful seizures at sea, and in the ports or territories of His Catholic Majesty in Spain or in his colonies."*	Agreed.*
And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claims to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.*
To the above claim Mr. De Onis adds that the United States will satisfy all the just claims which the inhabitants and Spanish officers of the Floridas may have upon them in consequence of the damages they may have sustained by the operations and proceedings of the American army, as is customary with the citizens of the United States under similar circumstances.*	Agreed.*
ART. 10. Agreed, as it is proposed by the Secretary of State.*	Agreed.*
ART. 11. The chevalier desires that the stipulation of five millions of dollars contained in this article may be stricken out, for he is aware that the territories ceded are sufficient to pay triple that sum; and, by agreeing to that stipulation, it would appear that Spain, in consideration only of the said amount, has ceded the two Floridas and other territories, when she would not have ceded them for twenty millions were it not her desire to arrange and terminate all differences with the United States.	The Secretary of State does not appear to find a positive objection to agreeing to the alteration required. However, as he conceives this article to be more important to the United States than to Spain, he will examine the question, and see whether the request of the minister of Spain may or may not be agreed to.
The remaining parts of this article are agreed to.*
ART. 16.

REMARKS.—This article, which I have not before me, is, I believe, that in which Mr. De Onis requires that American vessels shall only receive clearances for a specified port. It appears that this article cannot be assented to by the Federal Government, and is, therefore, as observed by Mr. Adams, wholly inadmissible in the present treaty.

ART. 17. Mr. De Onis requires that Spanish vessels shall be admitted for twelve years into all the ports of the ceded territories upon the same footing as the vessels of the United States.	Agreed, as to the ports of St. Augustine and Pensacola.
2. That no nation shall enjoy the like privilege during the said term of twelve years.	Agreed.
3. That, at the expiration of the said term, Spanish vessels shall be received in said territories on the same footing as the most favored nations.	Refused.

N. B. It is agreed by both parties that the article stipulating the cession of the Floridas shall be so framed as to cover the honor of both countries, and prove that the treaty is an amicable transaction, divested of all mental reservations, disguise, or recrimination.

The writer of these hasty notes believes that he perfectly comprehended, and has faithfully stated, the conversation he had this morning with the Secretary of State.

He will be equally attentive in stating to-morrow the answer of the minister of Spain. He flatters himself that all obstacles are nearly removed, and he deems it no small satisfaction in having been invited, by the confidence manifested in him by both parties, to co-operate, however feebly, in an event which cannot fail to have a powerful influence on the peace and happiness of both hemispheres.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1819.

Mr. De Neuville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1819.

Mr. De Neuville has the honor to present his respects to Mr. Adams, and to enclose the statement hastily drawn up by him yesterday evening. Mr. De Neuville believes he has omitted nothing of what Mr. Adams did him the honor to communicate to him. He will see Mr. De Onis to-day at one o'clock, and afterwards, that is, between two and three, he will call at the office of the Department, and hand to Mr. Adams the projet sent by him to Mr. De Onis. Mr. De N. hopes that Mr. De Onis will remove the remaining unimportant difficulties, for which nothing on the part of Mr. De N. will be omitted. He avails himself with pleasure of this occasion to offer to Mr. Adams the renewed assurances of his high consideration.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America: To all whom these presents shall concern, Greeting:

Know ye, that I have given and granted, and do hereby give and grant, to John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, full power and authority, and also a general and special command, to meet and confer with the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty residing in the United States, being furnished with the like full powers of and concerning the limits between the territories of the United States and those of his said Catholic Majesty in North America, and any mutual cessions of part of the same; of and concerning all matters of difference between the said United States and His Catholic Majesty, and concerning the relations of navigation and commerce between the said United States and His Catholic Majesty; and to conclude a treaty touching the premises, for the final ratification of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, if such advice and consent be given.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under [L. S.] my hand, at the city of Washington, the sixteenth day of February, A. D. 1819, and of the independence of the United States the forty-third.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

[TRANSLATION.]

Full power of the King of Spain to Don Luis de Onis.

Don Ferdinand, by the grace of God, King, &c. &c. &c., desiring to consolidate the friendship and good understanding which happily prevail between my kingdoms and the United States of America, through the mutual interests existing between the two Governments, and reposing full confidence in you, Don Luis de Onis, knight of the royal and distinguished order of Charles III., and my minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America, by reason of your fidelity, distinguished zeal, and approved capacity, in the arduous concerns committed to you, have granted, and by these presents do grant, to you full power, in the most ample form, to treat, of yourself, and without other intermediate authority, with such person or persons as may be authorized by the President of the United States, and on the principles of the most perfect equality and fitness, to conclude and sign a treaty of amity, whereby past differences may be adjusted, and a firm and lasting peace established between the two Governments: obliging ourselves, as we do hereby oblige ourselves and promise, on the faith and word of a King, to approve, ratify, and fulfil, and to cause to be inviolably observed and fulfilled, whatsoever may be stipulated and signed by you; to which intent and purpose I grant you all authority and full power, in the most ample form, thereby and of right required.

In faith whereof, we have given command to issue the present, signed with our royal hand, sealed with our privy seal, and countersigned by our underwritten first secretary of state and of universal despatch.

Given at Madrid, the 10th day of September, 1816.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty.

The United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, desiring to consolidate, on a permanent basis, the friendship and good correspondence which happily prevail between the two parties, have determined to settle and terminate all their differences and pretensions by a treaty, which shall designate, with precision, the limits of their respective bordering territories in North America.

With this intention, the President of the United States has furnished with their full powers John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the said United States; and His Catholic Majesty has appointed the most excellent Lord Don Luis de Onis Gonsalez Lopez y Vara, lord of the town of Rayaces, perpetual regidor of the corporation of the city of Salamanca, knight grand cross of the royal American order of Isabella the Catholic, decorated with the lys of La Vendée, knight-pensioner of the royal and distinguished Spanish order of Charles the Third, member of the supreme assembly of the said royal order, of the council of His Catholic Majesty, his secretary, with exercise of decrees, and his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near the United States of America.

And the said plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States and their citizens, and His Catholic Majesty, his successors and subjects, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the names of East and West Florida. The adjacent islands dependant on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them.

ART. 3. The boundary line between the two countries, west of the Mississippi, shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea; continuing north, along the western bank of that river, to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence, by a line due north, to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches, or Red river; then, following the course of the Rio Roxo, westward, to the degree of longitude one hundred west from London, and twenty-three from Washington; then, crossing the said Red river, and running thence, by a line due north, to the river Arkansas; thence, following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas, to its source, in latitude forty-two degrees north; and thence, by that parallel of latitude, to the South sea: the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. But, if the source of the Arkansas river shall be found to fall north or south of latitude forty-two degrees, then the line shall run from the said source, due south or north, as the case may be, till it meets the said parallel of latitude forty-two degrees; and thence, along the said parallel, to the South sea: all the islands in the Sabine and the said Red and Arkansas rivers, throughout the course thus described, to belong to the United States; but the use of the waters, and the navigation of the Sabine to the sea, and of the said rivers Roxo and Arkansas, throughout the extent of the said boundary, on their respective banks, shall be common to the respective inhabitants of both nations. The two high contracting parties agree to cede and renounce all their rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories described by the said line, that is to say: The United States hereby cede to His Catholic Majesty, and renounce forever, all the rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories lying west and south of the above-described line; and, in like manner, His Catholic Majesty cedes to the said United States all his rights, claims, and pretensions to any territories east and north of the said line, and, for himself, his heirs, and successors, renounces all claim to the said territories forever.

ART. 4. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet, before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of the treaty, at Natchitoches, on Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line, from the mouth of the Sabine to the Red river, and from the Red river to the river Arkansas, and to ascertain the latitude of the source of the said river Arkansas, in conformity to what is above agreed upon and stipulated, and the line of latitude forty-two degrees, to the South sea; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and also to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

ART. 5. The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restriction; and all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject, in either case, to duties.

ART. 6. The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the federal constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

ART. 7. The officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty in the territories hereby ceded by him to the United States shall be withdrawn, and possession of the places occupied by them shall be given within six months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or sooner if possible, by the officers of His Catholic Majesty, to the commissioners or officers of the United States duly appointed to receive them; and the United States shall furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana.

ART. 8. All the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by His Catholic Majesty, or by his lawful authorities, in the said territories ceded by His Majesty to the United States, shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands, to the same extent that the same grants would be valid if the territories had remained under the dominion of His Catholic Majesty. But the owners in possession of such lands, who, by reason of the recent circumstances of the Spanish nation, and the revolutions in Europe, have been prevented from fulfilling all the conditions of their grants, shall complete them within the terms limited in the same, respectively, from the date of this treaty; in default of which, the said grants shall be null and void. All grants made since the said 24th of January, 1818, when the first proposal, on the part of His Catholic Majesty, for the cession of the Floridas was made, are hereby declared and agreed to be null and void.

ART. 9. The two high contracting parties, animated with the most earnest desire of conciliation, and with the object of putting an end to all the differences which have existed between them, and of confirming the good understanding which they wish to be forever maintained between them, reciprocally renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they themselves, as well as their respective citizens and subjects, may have suffered, until the time of signing this treaty.

The renunciation of the United States will extend—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th of August, 1802.

2. To all claims on account of prizes made by French privateers, and condemned by French consuls, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain.

3. To all claims of indemnities on account of the suspension of the right of deposite at New Orleans, in 1802.

4. To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, arising from the unlawful seizures at sea, and in the ports and territories of Spain, or the Spanish colonies.

5. To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty.

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th of August, 1802.

2. To the sums which His Catholic Majesty advanced for the return of Captain Pike from the Provincias Internas.

3. To all injuries caused by the expedition of Miranda that was fitted out and equipped at New York.

4. To all claims of Spanish subjects upon the Government of the United States arising from unlawful seizures at sea, or within the ports and territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Finally, to all the claims of subjects of His Catholic Majesty upon the Government of the United States, in which the interposition of His Catholic Majesty's Government has been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, or which may have been made to the Department of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty, or to his minister in the United States.

And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.

The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which, by process of law, shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers, and individual Spanish inhabitants, by the late operations of the American army in Florida.

ART. 10. The convention entered into between the two Governments on the 11th of August, 1802, the ratifications of which were exchanged the 21st December, 1818, is annulled.

ART. 11. The United States, exonerating Spain from all demands in future, on account of the claims of their citizens, to which the renunciations herein contained extend, and considering them entirely cancelled, undertake to make satisfaction for the same, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To ascertain the full amount and validity of those claims, a commission, to consist of three commissioners, citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; which commission shall meet at the city of Washington, and, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, shall receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims included within the descriptions above mentioned. The said commissioners shall take an oath or affirmation, to be entered on the record of their proceedings, for the faithful and diligent discharge of their duties; and, in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of any such commissioner, his place may be supplied by the appointment as aforesaid, or by the President of the United States during the recess of the Senate, of another commissioner in his stead. The said commissioners shall be authorized to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same. And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of the said claims, according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of 27th October, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said commissioners.

The payment of such claims as may be admitted and adjusted by the said commissioners, or the major part of them, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, shall be made by the United States, either immediately at at their Treasury, or by the creation of stock bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable from the proceeds of sales of public lands within the territories hereby ceded to the United States, or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may prescribe by law.

The records of the proceedings of the said commissioners, together with the vouchers and documents produced before them, relative to the claims to be adjusted and decided upon by them, shall, after the close of their transactions, be deposited in the Department of State of the United States; and copies of them, or any part of them, shall be furnished to the Spanish Government, if required, at the demand of the Spanish minister in the United States.

ART. 12. The treaty of limits and navigation of 1795 remains confirmed in all and each one of its articles, excepting the second, third, fourth, and twenty-first, and the second clause of the twenty-second article, which, having been altered by this treaty, or having received their entire execution, are no longer valid.

With respect to the fifteenth article of the same treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, of 1795, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, the two high contracting parties agree that this shall be so understood with respect to those Powers who recognise this principle; but, if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Government acknowledges this principle, and not of others.

ART. 13. Both contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce, by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective merchant vessels, have agreed that the sailors who shall desert from their vessels in the ports of the other shall be arrested and delivered up, at the instance of the consul, who shall prove, nevertheless, that the deserters belonged to the vessels that claimed them, exhibiting the document that is customary in their nation; that is to say, the American consul in a Spanish port shall exhibit the document known by the name of articles, and the Spanish consul in American ports the roll of the vessel; and if the name of the deserter or deserters who are claimed shall appear in the one or the other, they shall be arrested, held in custody, and delivered to the vessel to which they shall belong.

ART. 14. The United States hereby certify that they have not received any compensation from France for the injuries they suffered from her privateers, consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, for the satisfaction of which provision is made by this treaty; and they will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their true value, that Spain may avail herself of the same in such manner as she may deem just and proper.

ART. 15. The United States, to give His Catholic Majesty a proof of their desire to cement the relations of amity subsisting between the two nations, and to favor the commerce of the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, agree that Spanish vessels, coming laden only with productions of Spanish growth or manufactures, directly from the ports of Spain or of her colonies, shall be admitted for the term of twelve years to the ports of Pensacola and St. Augustine, in the Floridas, without paying other or higher duties on their cargoes, or of tonnage, than will be paid by the vessels of the United States. During the said term, no other nation shall enjoy the same privileges within the ceded territories. The twelve years shall commence three months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

ART. 16. The present treaty shall be ratified, in due form, by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the underwritten plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of His Catholic Majesty, have signed, by virtue of our powers, the present treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, and have thereunto affixed our seals, respectively. Done at Washington, this twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen.

Whereas a treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, was concluded and signed between their plenipotentiaries in this city, on the twenty-second day of the present month of February, which treaty is word for word as follows: [Here follows the treaty, as above.] And whereas the Senate of the United States, by their resolution of the twenty-fourth day of the same month, (two-thirds of the Senators then present concurring,) did advise and consent to the ratification of the said treaty:

16th CONGRESS.] No. 312. [1st SESSION.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SIXTEENTH CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 7, 1819.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The public buildings being advanced to a stage that afford accommodation for Congress, I offer you my sincere congratulations on the recommencement of your duties in the Capitol.

In bringing to view the incidents most deserving attention which have occurred since your last session, I regret to have to state that several of our principal cities have suffered by sickness; that an unusual drought has prevailed in the Middle and Western States; and that a derangement has been felt in some of our moneyed institutions, which has proportionably affected their credit. I am happy, however, to have it in my power to assure you that the health of our cities is now completely restored; that the produce of the year, though less abundant than usual, will not only be amply sufficient for home consumption, but afford a large surplus for the supply of the wants of other nations; and that the derangement in the circulating paper medium, by being left to those remedies which its obvious causes suggested, and the good sense and virtue of our fellow-citizens supplied, has diminished.

Having informed Congress, on the 27th of February last, that a treaty of amity, settlement, and limits had been concluded in this city between the United States and Spain, and ratified by the competent authorities of the former, full confidence was entertained that it would have been ratified by His Catholic Majesty with equal promptitude, and a like earnest desire to terminate, on the conditions of that treaty, the differences which had so long existed between the two countries. Every view which the subject admitted of was thought to have justified this conclusion. Great losses had been sustained by citizens of the United States from Spanish cruisers more than twenty years before, which had not been redressed. These losses had been acknowledged and provided for by a treaty, as far back as the year 1802, which, although concluded at Madrid, was not then ratified by the Government of Spain, nor since, until the last year, when it was suspended by the late treaty, a more satisfactory provision to both parties, as was presumed, having been made for them. Other differences had arisen in this long interval, affecting their highest interests, which were likewise provided for by this last treaty. The treaty itself was formed on great consideration, and a thorough knowledge of all the circumstances, the subject-matter of every article having been for years under discussion, and repeated references having been made by the minister of Spain to his Government on the points respecting which the greatest difference of opinion prevailed. It was formed by a minister duly authorized for the purpose, who had represented his Government in the United States, and been employed in this long protracted negotiation several years; and who, it is not denied, kept strictly within the letter of his instructions. The faith of Spain was therefore pledged, under circumstances of peculiar force and solemnity, for its ratification.

On the part of the United States, this treaty was evidently acceded to in a spirit of conciliation and concession. The indemnity for injuries and losses so long before sustained, and now again acknowledged and provided for, was to be paid by them, without becoming a charge on the treasury of Spain. For territory ceded by Spain, other territory of great value, to which our claim was believed to be well founded, was ceded by the United States, and in a quarter more interesting to her. This cession was, nevertheless, received as the means of indemnifying our citizens in a considerable sum—the presumed amount of their losses. Other considerations of great weight urged the cession of this territory by Spain. It was surrounded by the territories of the United States on every side except on that of the ocean. Spain had lost her authority over it, and, falling into the hands of adventurers connected with the savages, it was made the means of unceasing annoyance and injury to our Union in many of its most essential interests. By this cession, then, Spain ceded a territory in reality of no value to her, and obtained concessions of the highest importance, by the settlement of long-standing differences with the United States, affecting their respective claims and limits, and likewise relieved herself from the obligation of a treaty relating to it, which she had failed to fulfil, and also from the responsibility incident to the most flagrant and pernicious abuses of her rights, where she could not support her authority.

It being known that the treaty was formed under these circumstances, not a doubt was entertained that His Catholic Majesty would have ratified it without delay. I regret to have to state that this reasonable expectation has been disappointed; that the treaty was not ratified within the time stipulated, and has not since been ratified. As it is important that the nature and character of this unexpected occurrence should be distinctly understood, I think it my duty to communicate to you all the facts and circumstances in my possession relating to it.

Anxious to prevent all future disagreement with Spain, by giving the most prompt effect to the treaty which had been thus concluded, and particularly by the establishment of a Government in Florida which should preserve order there, the minister of the United States, who had been recently appointed to His Catholic Majesty, and to whom the ratification by his Government had been committed, to be exchanged for that of Spain, was instructed to transmit the latter to the Department of State, as soon as obtained, by a public ship, subjected to his order for the purpose. Unexpected delay occurring in the ratification by Spain, he requested to be informed of the cause. It was stated, in reply, that the great importance of the subject, and a desire to obtain explanations on certain points which were not specified, had produced the delay, and that an envoy would be despatched to the United States to obtain such explanations of this Government. The minister of the United States offered to give full explanation on any point on which it might be desired; which proposal was declined. Having communicated this result to the Department of State, in August last, he was instructed, notwithstanding the disappointment and surprise which it produced, to inform the Government of Spain that, if the treaty should be ratified, and transmitted here at any time before the meeting of Congress, it would be received, and have the same effect as if it had been ratified in due time. This order was executed; the authorized communication was made to the Government of Spain, and by its answer, which has just been received, we are officially made acquainted, for the first time, with the causes which have prevented the ratification of the treaty by His Catholic Majesty. It is alleged by the minister of Spain that this Government had attempted to alter one of the principal articles of the treaty, by a declaration which the minister of the United States had been ordered to present, when he should deliver the ratification by his Government in exchange for that of Spain, and of which he gave notice, explanatory of the sense in which that article was understood. It is further alleged that this Government had recently tolerated or protected an expedition from the United States against the province of Texas. These two imputed acts are stated as the reasons which have induced His Catholic Majesty to withhold his ratification from the treaty; to obtain explanations respecting which, it is reported that an envoy would be forthwith despatched to the United States. How far these allegations will justify the conduct of the Government of Spain, will appear on a view of the following facts, and the evidence which supports them.

It will be seen, by the documents transmitted herewith, that the declaration mentioned relates to a clause in the eighth article, concerning certain grants of land recently made by His Catholic Majesty in Florida, which, it was understood, had conveyed all the lands which, till then, had been ungranted. It was the intention of the parties to annul these latter grants, and that clause was drawn for that express purpose, and for none other. The date of these grants was unknown, but it was understood to be posterior to that inserted in the article. Indeed, it must be obvious to all that, if that provision in the treaty had not the effect of annulling these grants, it would be altogether nugatory. Immediately after the treaty was concluded and ratified by this Government, an intimation was received that these grants were of anterior date to that fixed on by the treaty, and that they would not, of course, be affected by it. The mere possibility of such a case, so inconsistent with the intention of the parties and the meaning of the article, induced this Government to demand an explanation on the subject, which was immediately granted, and which corresponds with this statement. With respect to the other act alleged, that this Government had tolerated or protected an expedition against Texas, it is utterly without foundation. Every discountenance has invariably been given to any such attempt from within the limits of the United States, as is fully evinced by the acts of the Government and the proceedings of the courts. There being cause, however, to apprehend, in the course of the last summer, that some adventurers entertained views of the kind suggested, the attention of the constituted authorities in that quarter was immediately drawn to them, and it is known that the project, whatever it might be, has utterly failed.

These facts will, it is presumed, satisfy every impartial mind that the Government of Spain had no justifiable cause for declining to ratify the treaty. A treaty concluded in conformity with instructions is obligatory, in good faith, in all its stipulations, according to the true intent and meaning of the parties. Each party is bound to ratify it. If either could set it aside, without the consent of the other, there would be no longer any rules applicable to such transactions between nations. By this proceeding, the Government of Spain has rendered to the United States a new and very serious injury. It has been stated that a minister would be sent to ask certain explanations of this Government; but, if such were desired, why were they not asked within the time limited for the ratification? Is it contemplated to open a new negotiation respecting any of the articles or conditions of the treaty? If that were done, to what consequences might it not lead? At what time, and in what manner, would a new negotiation terminate? By this proceeding, Spain has formed a relation between the two countries, which will justify any measures on the part of the United States which a strong sense of injury and a proper regard for the rights and interests of the nation may dictate. In the course to be pursued, these objects should be constantly held in view, and have their due weight. Our national honor must be maintained, and a new and a distinguished proof be afforded of that regard for justice and moderation which has invariably governed the councils of this free people. It must be obvious to all, that, if the United States had been desirous of making conquests, or had been even willing to aggrandize themselves in that way, they could have had no inducement to form this treaty; they would have much cause for gratulation at the course which has been pursued by Spain. An ample field for ambition is opened before them; but such a career is not consistent with the principles of their Government, nor the interests of the nation.

From a full view of all the circumstances, it is submitted to the consideration of Congress whether it will not be proper for the United States to carry the conditions of the treaty into effect in the same manner as if it had been ratified by Spain, claiming, on their part, all its advantages, and yielding to Spain those secured to her. By pursuing this course, we shall rest on the sacred ground of right, sanctioned in the most solemn manner by Spain herself, by a treaty which she was bound to ratify, for refusing to do which she must incur the censure of other nations, even those most friendly to her; while, by confining ourselves within that limit, we cannot fail to obtain their well-merited approbation. We must have peace on a frontier where we have been so long disturbed; our citizens must be indemnified for losses so long since sustained, and for which indemnity has been so unjustly withheld from them. Accomplishing these great objects, we obtain all that is desirable.

But His Catholic Majesty has twice declared his determination to send a minister to the United States to ask explanations on certain points, and to give them respecting his delay to ratify the treaty. Shall we act, by taking the ceded territory, and proceeding to execute the other conditions of the treaty, before this minister arrives and is heard? This is a case which forms a strong appeal to the candor, the magnanimity, and honor of this people. Much is due to courtesy between nations. By a short delay we shall lose nothing; for, resting on the ground of immutable truth and justice, we cannot be diverted from our purpose. It ought to be presumed that the explanations which may be given to the minister of Spain will be satisfactory, and produce the desired result. In any event, the delay, for the purpose mentioned, being a further manifestation of the sincere desire to terminate in the most friendly manner all differences with Spain, cannot fail to be duly appreciated by His Catholic Majesty as well as by other Powers. It is submitted, therefore, whether it will not be proper to make the proposed law for carrying the conditions of the treaty into effect, should it be adopted, contingent; to suspend its operation upon the responsibility of the Executive, in such manner as to afford an opportunity for such friendly explanations as may be desired during the present session of Congress.

I communicate to Congress a copy of the treaty, and of the instructions to the minister of the United States at Madrid respecting it; of his correspondence with the minister of Spain; and of such other documents as may be necessary to give a full view of the subject.

In the course which the Spanish Government have on this occasion thought proper to pursue, it is satisfactory to know that they have not been countenanced by any other European Power. On the contrary, the opinion and wishes both of France and Great Britain have not been withheld either from the United States or from Spain, and have been unequivocal in favor of the ratification. There is also reason to believe that the sentiments of the Imperial Government of Russia have been the same, and that they have also been made known to the cabinet of Madrid.

In the civil war existing between Spain and the Spanish provinces in this hemisphere, the greatest care has been taken to enforce the laws intended to preserve an impartial neutrality. Our ports have continued to be equally open to both parties, and on the same conditions; and our citizens have been equally restrained from interfering in favor of either to the prejudice of the other. The progress of the war, however, has operated manifestly in favor of the colonies. Buenos Ayres still maintains unshaken the independence which it declared in 1816, and has enjoyed since 1810. Like success has also lately attended Chili and the provinces north of the La Plata bordering on it, and likewise Venezuela.

This contest has from its commencement been very interesting to other Powers, and to none more so than to the United States. A virtuous people may and will confine themselves within the limits of a strict neutrality; but it is not in their power to behold a conflict so vitally important to their neighbors without the sensibility and sympathy which naturally belong to such a case. It has been the steady purpose of this Government to prevent that feeling leading to excess; and it is very gratifying to have it in my power to state, so strong has been the sense throughout the whole community of what was due to the character and obligations of the nation, that very few examples of a contrary kind have occurred.

The distance of the colonies from the parent country, and the great extent of their population and resources, gave them advantages which it was anticipated at a very early period it would be difficult for Spain to surmount. The steadiness, consistency, and success with which they have pursued their object, as evinced more particularly by the undisturbed sovereignty which Buenos Ayres has so long enjoyed, evidently give them a strong claim to the favorable consideration of other nations. These sentiments on the part of the United States have not been withheld from other Powers with whom it is desirable to act in concert. Should it become manifest to the world that the efforts of Spain to subdue these provinces will be fruitless, it may be presumed that the Spanish Government itself will give up the contest. In producing such a determination, it cannot be doubted that the opinion of friendly Powers, who have taken no part in the controversy, will have their merited influence.

It is of the highest importance to our national character, and indispensable to the morality of our citizens, that all violations of our neutrality should be prevented. No door should be left open for the evasion of our laws; no opportunity afforded to any who may be disposed to take advantage of it, to compromit the interest or the honor of the nation. It is submitted, therefore, to the consideration of Congress, whether it may not be advisable to revise the laws with a view to this desirable result.

It is submitted, also, whether it may not be proper to designate, by law, the several ports or places along the coast at which only foreign ships of war and privateers may be admitted. The difficulty of sustaining the regulations of our commerce and of other important interests from abuse, without such designation, furnishes a strong motive for the measure.

At the time of the negotiation for the renewal of the commercial convention between the United States and Great Britain, a hope had been entertained that an article might have been agreed upon, mutually satisfactory to both countries, regulating, upon principles of justice and reciprocity, the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British possessions, as well in the West Indies as upon the continent of North America. The plenipotentiaries of the two Governments not having been able to come to an agreement on this important interest, those of the United States reserved for the consideration of this Government the proposals which had been presented to them as the ultimate offer on the part of the British Government, and which they were not authorized to accept. On their transmission here, they were examined with due deliberation, the result of which was a new effort to meet the views of the British Government. The minister of the United States was instructed to make a further proposal, which has not been accepted. It was, however, declined in an amicable manner. I recommend to the consideration of Congress whether further prohibitory provisions in the laws relating to this intercourse may not be expedient. It is seen with interest, that, although it has not been practicable as yet to agree in any arrangement of this important branch of their commerce, such is the disposition of the parties, that each will view any regulations which the other may make respecting it in the most friendly light.

By the fifth article of the convention concluded on the 20th of October, 1818, it was stipulated that the differences which had arisen between the two Governments with regard to the true intent and meaning of the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, in relation to the carrying away by British officers of slaves from the United States after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of peace, should be referred to some friendly sovereign or state, to be named for that purpose. The minister of the United States has been instructed to name to the British Government a foreign sovereign, the common friend to both parties, for the decision of this question. The answer of that Government to the proposal, when received, will indicate the further measures to be pursued on the part of the United States.

Although the pecuniary embarrassments which affected various parts of the Union during the latter part of the preceding year have, during the present, been considerably augmented, and still continue to exist, the receipts into the Treasury, to the 30th of September last, have amounted to $19,000,000. After defraying the current expenses of the Government, including the interest and reimbursement of the public debt payable to that period, amounting to $18,200,000, there remained in the Treasury on that day more than $2,500,000, which, with the sums receivable during the remainder of the year, will exceed the current demands upon the Treasury for the same period.

The causes which have tended to diminish the public receipts could not fail to have a corresponding effect upon the revenue which has accrued upon imports and tonnage during the first three quarters of the present year; it is, however, ascertained that the duties which have been secured during that period exceed $18,000,000, and those of the whole year will probably amount to $23,000,000.

For the probable receipts of the next year I refer you to the statements which will be transmitted from the Treasury, which will enable you to judge whether further provision be necessary.

The great reduction in the price of the principal articles of domestic growth, which has occurred during the present year, and the consequent fall in the price of labor, apparently so favorable to the success of domestic manufactures, have not shielded them against other causes adverse to their prosperity. The pecuniary embarrassments which have so deeply affected the commercial interests of the nation have been no less adverse to our manufacturing establishments in several sections of the Union. The great reduction of the currency which the banks have been constrained to make, in order to continue specie payments, and the vitiated character of it where such reductions have not been attempted, instead of placing within the reach of these establishments the pecuniary aid necessary to avail themselves of the advantages resulting from the reduction in the prices of the raw materials and of labor, have compelled the banks to withdraw from them a portion of the capital heretofore advanced to them. That aid which has been refused by the banks has not been obtained from other sources, owing to the loss of individual confidence, from the frequent failures which have recently occurred in some of our principal commercial cities.

An additional cause for the depression of these establishments may probably be found in the pecuniary embarrassments which have recently affected those countries with which our commerce has been principally prosecuted.

Their manufactures, for the want of a ready or profitable market at home, have been shipped by the manufacturers to the United States, and, in many instances, sold at a price below their current value at the place of manufacture. Although this practice may, from its nature, be considered temporary or contingent, it is not on that account less injurious in its effects. Uniformity in the demand and price of an article is highly desirable to the domestic manufacturer.

It is deemed of great importance to encourage our domestic manufactures. In what manner the evils which have been adverted to may be remedied, and how far it may be practicable in other respects to afford them further encouragement, paying due regard to the other great interests of the nation, is submitted to the wisdom of Congress.

The survey of the coast for the establishment of fortifications is now nearly completed, and considerable progress has been made in the collection of materials for the construction of fortifications in the Gulf of Mexico and in the Chesapeake bay. The works on the eastern bank of the Potomac, below Alexandria, and on the Pea Patch, in the Delaware, are much advanced, and it is expected that the fortifications at the Narrows, in the harbor of New York, will be completed the present year. To derive all the advantages contemplated from these fortifications, it was necessary that they should be judiciously posted, and constructed with a view to permanence. The progress hitherto has, therefore, been slow; but as the difficulties in parts heretofore the least explored and known are surmounted, it will, in future, be more rapid. As soon as the survey of the coast is completed, which it is expected will be done early in the next spring, the engineers employed in it will proceed to examine, for like purposes, the northern and northwestern frontiers.

The troops intended to occupy a station at the mouth of the St. Peter's, on the Mississippi, have established themselves there, and those who were ordered to the mouth of the Yellow Stone, on the Missouri, have ascended that river to the Council Bluff, where they will remain until the next spring, when they will proceed to the place of their destination. I have the satisfaction to state that this measure has been executed in amity with the Indian tribes, and that it promises to produce, in regard to them, all the advantages which were contemplated by it.

Much progress has likewise been made in the construction of ships of war, and in the collection of timber and other materials for shipbuilding. It is not doubted that our navy will soon be augmented to the number, and placed, in all respects, on the footing provided for by law.

The board, consisting of engineers and naval officers, have not yet made their final report of sites for two naval depots, as instructed, according to the resolutions of March 18th and April 20th, 1818, but they have examined the coast therein designated, and their report is expected in the next month.

For the protection of our commerce in the Mediterranean, along the southern Atlantic coast, in the Pacific and Indian oceans, it has been found necessary to maintain a strong naval force, which it seems proper for the present to continue. There is much reason to believe that, if any portion of the squadron heretofore stationed in the Mediterranean should be withdrawn, our intercourse with the Powers bordering on that sea would be much interrupted, if not altogether destroyed. Such, too, has been the growth of a spirit of piracy, in the other quarters mentioned, by adventurers from every country, in abuse of the friendly flags which they have assumed, that not to protect our commerce there would be to abandon it as a prey to their rapacity. Due attention has likewise been paid to the suppression of the slave trade, in compliance with a law of the last session. Orders have been given to the commanders of all our public ships to seize all vessels navigated under our flag, engaged in that trade, and to bring them in to be proceeded against in the manner prescribed by that law. It is hoped that these vigorous measures, supported by like acts by other nations, will soon terminate a commerce so disgraceful to the civilized world.

In the execution of the duty imposed by these acts, and of a high trust connected with it, it is with deep regret I have to state the loss which has been sustained by the death of Commodore Perry. His gallantry in a brilliant exploit in the late war added to the renown of his country. His death is deplored as a national misfortune.

15th CONGRESS.] No. 313. [1st SESSION.

DANISH BRIG HENRICK.*

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 28, 1819.

WASHINGTON, December 24, 1819.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

On the 23d of February, 1803, a message from the President of the United States was transmitted to both Houses of Congress, together with the report of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Madison, upon the case of the Danish brigantine Henrick and her cargo, belonging to citizens of Hamburgh, recommending the claim to the favorable consideration of Congress. In February, 1805, it was again presented, by a message from the President, to the consideration of Congress, but has not since been definitively acted upon.

The minister resident† from Denmark and the consul general from Hamburgh having recently renewed applications in behalf of the respective owners of the vessel and cargo, I transmit, herewith, copies of their communications for the further consideration of the Legislature, upon whose files all the documents relating to the claim are still existing.

JAMES MONROE.

From the Consul General of Hamburgh to the Secretary of State.

SIR: HAMBURGH CONSULATE GENERAL, PHILADELPHIA, November 9, 1819.

On behalf of several of the citizens of Hamburgh, I have the honor to solicit your attention to the subject of their interests in the cargo of the Danish brigantine Henrick, Peter Scheelt, master, which was captured by a public armed vessel of the United States in the year 1799, with a request that you will be pleased to lay the case before the President of the United States, that, if he shall see proper, he may submit it to the consideration of Congress.

* See vol. 3, page 344. † The application of the minister was verbal.

This vessel and cargo have been heretofore within the view of the Executive of the United States, and have been the subject of a very favorable representation from the Department of State. It will not, therefore, be necessary that I should enter into a minute detail of the circumstances attending it, as the public records of the Government contain a full and faithful statement of them.

I deem it proper at this time, sir, to present the case before you in this summary way. The vessel in question was Danish property; the cargo on board belonged exclusively to citizens of Hamburgh; and, of course, the whole was neutral in the then existing war. She sailed from Hamburgh, bound to Cape François, on the 3d of October, 1799. She was taken by a French privateer, and on the 8th of the same month was recaptured by the American public vessel called the Pickering, and carried into St. Christopher's. At this British island the vessel and cargo were libelled for salvage; one-half of the gross amount of sales was decreed to the recaptors, and the other half, after deducting costs and expenses, to the owners. Of the value of the cargo, amounting to upwards of thirty-four thousand dollars, nearly the whole was lost, as appears by the documents heretofore exhibited on this subject to the Department of State.

In the past consideration of this affair, it seems to have been plainly conceded that it was the duty of the American commander to have brought the property recaptured under the authority of the United States within their jurisdiction, and that if this duty had been performed the vessel and cargo would have been released either altogether, or upon payment of the most moderate rate of salvage. By a different line of conduct from that which should have been pursued, the property was involved in a sentence proceeding from a palpable misconception and misapplication of a law of the United States, and its almost total loss was the consequence. The owners, thus heavily suffering from the conduct of the American commander of a public vessel, had no remedy for the injury they had sustained but an appeal to the justice of the American Government. This appeal was made on behalf of the whole interest, and its justice was in various departments of the Government distinctly recognised; but the redress suited to the case has never yet been afforded.

It is supposed that the conduct of the Danes towards American property may have had its effect upon the American Government in postponing its just purposes towards the owners of the property in question. But it is respectfully submitted that this consideration, if it has any existence, ought not to affect the interests of the owners of the cargo, who are citizens of Hamburgh, and who now separately make their claim to retribution.

Most respectfully inviting your attention, sir, to the documents in the Department of State in relation to the brigantine Henrick and cargo, and to several reports of committees of the House of Representatives in Congress on the subject of this claim, I do earnestly submit the claim of the owners of the cargo to your consideration, and request that it may be laid before the President of the United States, in order that a just recompense may be had for the heavy injuries which have been thus sustained.

Permit me, sir, to assure you of my particular regard and consideration, wherewith I have the honor to remain,

Sir, your most obedient servant,

C. N. BUCK,

Consul General of Hamburgh to the United States of America.

To the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,

Secretary of State of the United States.

[The following report on the same subject was made February 8, 1820.]

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the 24th of December last, recommending to Congress the consideration of the case of the Danish brigantine Henrick and her cargo, respectfully report:

That they have thought it right to present to the House that view of the circumstances of the case which is contained in the report made by Mr. Madison on the 22d of February, 1803.

"The Secretary of State has the honor to report to the President of th e United States upon the note of the minister of His Danish Majesty, dated on the 9th instant, as follows:

"That it appears that the Danish brigantine Henrick, Captain Peter Scheelt, sailing from Hamburgh, loaded with an assorted cargo, and bound to Cape François, was captured, on the 3d of October, 1799, by a French privateer, and, on the 8th of the same month, she was recaptured by an American public armed vessel called the Pickering, and carried to the British island of St. Christopher, where she arrived on the 10th.

"That, from an authenticated transcript of the proceedings in the case of the said vessel, had before the court of vice-admiralty at the said island, it appears that the said court took cognizance of the case, and awarded one-half of the gross amount of the sales of the brig and her cargo to be paid to the recaptors, and the other half, after deducting costs and expenses, to be restored to the owners. That this rate of salvage appears to have been adopted from the laws of the United States, as then applicable to recaptures of American property, and of such as belonged to belligerant Powers in amity with the United States; but it is believed that these laws had, according to decisions of our own courts, no reference to recaptures of neutral property. That admitting, what has received the sanction of some recent authorities, that, in certain peculiar cases of danger of a neutral being condemned by a belligerant, the recaptors are entitled to a proportionate salvage, there is much reason to believe this is not such a case, as the vessel was bound from a neutral to a French port, the whole of the property being neutral, and, according to the assurance of Mr. Lindemann, the Governor of the Danish West India islands, most of the Danish vessels carried into Guadaloupe, for a year before this capture, were released, and some of them with damages. That the courts of the United States have, in cases much more strongly marked by circumstances indicating a danger of a neutral being condemned, allowed much smaller rates of salvage.

"That the laws of the United States required vessels captured under their authority to be brought within their jurisdiction; and it is conceived that it was the duty of the American officers, in this case, to repel the attempt of the foreign judicatory to take cognizance, much less ought they to have directly submitted their recapture to its decision, which, as it could not be revised or rectified, in case of error, by the tribunals of their own country, might tend to involve it in claims on its responsibility from others.

"That, according to the representation of the agent for the owners of the Danish vessel, of the sum of $44,500, the value of the vessel, freight, and cargo, there remained, after satisfying the decree for salvage and expenses, no more than $8,374 41.

"That, as the policy and interest of the United States lead them, in a special manner, to respect and promote the rights and facilities of neutral commerce; as the sentence in this case was permitted, if not procured, by officers of the United States, to be made in a foreign, and therefore improper tribunal; as there remains no doubt but that a court of the United States, pronouncing thereon, would either have rejected the claim for salvage altogether, or reduced it to the most moderate scale, as the declared basis of the sentence; as the law of the United States was inapplicable to the case; and as it is understood that a remedy is now unattainable, in the ordinary judicial course, it is the opinion of the Secretary of State that, under all the circumstances, the case ought to be referred to the just provisions of Congress thereon.

"All which is respectfully submitted.

"JAMES MADISON.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 22, 1803."

The examination of the subject by the committee has led them to an entirely different conclusion, as to the obligations of the United States, from that which seems to be intimated in the foregoing report. The laws of the United States required that the French vessels of which it authorized the capture should be brought into the ports of the United States for condemnation. They provided for the restoration of American property which might be recaptured from a French captor, upon a salvage to be determined either upon the mutual agreement of the parties, or by a decree of a court of the United States, and they do not seem to have provided at all for the case of the capture from the French of property belonging to a third nation. The proceedings in the court of vice-admiralty in St. Christopher's, by which so large an allowance of salvage and costs was made as to absorb a very great proportion of the amount for which the vessel and cargo were sold, were submitted, in 1800, to three of the most distinguished lawyers of this country, who concluded, from the papers laid before them, that the sentence of the court was in consequence of proceedings exhibited on the part of the owners of the vessel and cargo, and not on the part of the recaptors. In this opinion, (which the committee have subjoined to their report,) it is suggested to be unadvisable for the Danish consul to apply either to the Government of the United States for indemnity, or to institute any suit in the courts of justice here against the captors.

This claim of indemnity against the Government is, indeed, of an unusual character. It is alleged that a foreign court, in a case to which an American officer was a party, awarded an unjust sentence, and that the costs of this legal proceeding were excessive. The claimants have abstained from the natural remedy for correcting the errors of an inferior court, which the justice of civilized nations provides, by constituting tribunals of appeal. They abstain, too, in conformity with sound legal advice, from prosecuting any legal remedy in our own courts against the officers of whose misconduct they complain, and they choose to prefer their claims to indemnity against the Government which, as they say, did not authorize, and whose laws, indeed, according to their construction, forbade the proceeding.

This claim has several times been recommended to the attention of Congress by the Executive. Committees have made reports in its favor, and a bill to provide for it passed the House of Representatives, January, 1804, by a majority of one hundred and eight to fifteen members.

The committee recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient to make provision to indemnify the owners of the Danish brigantine Henrick and her cargo for the injury alleged to have resulted from the sentence of a British court of vice-admiralty in the island of St. Christopher.

A.

Copy of a paper filed in the Navy Department, purporting to be the copy of an opinion given by Edward Tilghman, William Lewis, and Peter S. Duponceau.

On the case of the Danish brig Henrick, taken by a French privateer from Guadaloupe, on her voyage from Hamburgh to Cape François, retaken by the United States brig Pickering, after being more than ninety-six hours in the power of the French, carried into St. Christopher's, and there libelled by Peter Scheelt, master of the said Danish brig, on behalf of the owners, underwriters, and others concerned, in the court of vice-admiralty, who ordered the said brig Henrick and her cargo to be sold, and adjudged one moiety of the gross proceeds to the recaptors, for salvage; as far as we are able to judge from the papers laid before us, which do not contain the whole of the record, it appears to us that the sentence of the judge of the admiralty was in consequence of proceedings exhibited on the part of the owners of, and others concerned in the vessel and cargo, and not on the part of the recaptors; which proceedings, it is reasonable to conclude, were for restitution. Under these circumstances, we do not think it advisable for the Danish consul either to apply to the Government of the United States for indemnity or recompense for the great loss sustained, or to institute any process in the courts of justice here against the captain of the Pickering.

It must, we think, be left to the discretion of the owners, underwriters, and others who may happen to be interested, whether they will or will not prosecute an appeal to the courts in England.

EDWARD TILGHMAN,
WILLIAM LEWIS,
PETER S. DUPONCEAU.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Tingey, the commander of the United States squadron in the West Indies at the time the Danish brig was recaptured.

SIR: NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, January 19, 1820.

In pursuance to your directions, I have endeavored to call to my remembrance as many of the facts as came to my knowledge relative to the recapture of the Danish brigantine Henrick from the French, by the United States brig Pickering, Captain Hiller, in the month of October, 1799, during the period of my having the command of our West India squadron. Captain Hiller, in the brig Pickering, pursuant to orders from the Secretary of the Navy, having joined my command, received my orders relative to what part of the station he should cruise in, so as to have the squadron distributed in such manner as should be most effectual in protecting our defenceless commerce, and annoying the enemy; when, some time in the month of October above mentioned, Captain Hiller fell in with the above-stated brig Henrick, in possession of a prize-master and crew from a French privateer, by which she had been captured some short time before; he, of course, recaptured the Henrick, as it was his duty to do, and carried her to the port of Basseterre, in the island of St. Christopher, which was the general rendezvous of the squadron. At that time I was, as my duty strictly enjoined, cruising in the United States ship Ganges, for the purposes before mentioned. On my next meeting with the Pickering, some few days afterwards, Captain Hiller reported this recapture to me, merely as a part of his transactions, in his general report; but, in an interview with him on board my ship, (the Ganges,) I learned that an adjudication for the salvage (agreeably to the act of Congress) had been given at St. Christopher's, at the instance of the captain or agent of the Henrick, or of a compromise with said captain or agent—my memory, at this distant period, does not enable me to say which. Thus, the whole transaction had commenced and terminated without my having any view or knowledge thereof until it had passed.

From the celerity with which the business was conducted at St. Christopher's, I cannot entertain a doubt that the adjudication or compromise was effected with the assent, or, as more probable, at the instigation of the captain or agent for the Henrick; for Captain Hiller was too correct an officer (scrupulously so in regard to his duty) to have of himself commenced on any decisive measures against the recaptured vessel, until I should have arrived, (as commander-in-chief of the squadron,) to have decided on the most proper mode of procedure, in conformity with my instructions from our Government.

Had the captain or agent of the brig Henrick awaited my arrival at St. Christopher's, he could readily, on a proper representation of his case, have been convoyed to either of the Danish islands to leeward, as the time allotted for the cruise of the Ganges in those seas had expired; Commodore Morris, with the United States ship Adams, had already arrived to relieve me, and had brought my instructions from the Secretary of the Navy to return home; and it being my duty to touch at all the neutral ports in my way, to collect all our homeward-bound merchantmen, and take them under convoy, which duty I did perform; and, consequently, the Henrick could have been protected to either of the Danish islands, St. Croix or St. Thomas; from the latter of which I sailed with a large convoy a very few days afterwards; for, on the 10th of November, I was in the river Delaware, conformably with my instructions from the Secretary of the Navy.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.

THOMAS TINGEY.

The Hon. S. THOMPSON, Secretary of the Navy.

16th CONGRESS.] No. 314. [1st SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 14, 1820.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d of last month, was referred the petition of Jacob and Henry H. Schieffelin, with direction to report to the House what measures have been taken, if any, to obtain redress from the British Government in the case of those petitioners, respectfully reports:

That the statement of the petitioners, and the documents supporting it, show that the property to which they refer was, on the 15th of December, 1813, by a decision of the British court of appeals in prize causes, condemned as prize of war, then belonging to enemies of Great Britain.

At the negotiation of the peace at Ghent, efforts were made by the plenipotentiaries of the United States, in conformity with their instructions, to obtain from the British Government a stipulation for restitution or indemnity for property which had been condemned, as this is understood to have been, contrary to the rules generally observed among civilized nations. When these efforts were found unavailing in regard to the general principle, they were reiterated in behalf of property under circumstances similar to that belonging to the petitioners, namely, of vessels and cargoes which, having accidentally been in British ports at the period when the war broke out, were considered by the United States as exempted, by the customary law of nations, from seizure and condemnation, at least during a period of time sufficient for their removal. The British Government were inflexible upon cases of this description as upon the others, and the discussion was not abandoned on the part of the United States until it became apparent that further perseverance in it could only terminate in the failure of the main object of the negotiation. It was distinctly understood that no retrospect was to be taken on either side of losses occasioned by the hostilities incident to war, and no discrimination admitted between such as had and such as had not been sanctioned by the ordinary usages of that relation. The British Government explicitly avowed their determination to make no restitution in any such case whatever, and declared their acquiescence in the same rule of rigor on the part of the United States. The treaty of peace having been signed with this mutual understanding, it would have been obviously useless to urge, after its conclusion, claims which had been thus unequivocally excluded before; and it is presumed this was the reason which eventually led to the conclusion that it would not be advisable to present to the consideration of the British Government any claim which it had been ascertained could prove to be no otherwise than ineffectual.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JAMES WARREN.

REPORTED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 26, 1820.

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Warren, submit the following report:

The petitioner states that he was a lieutenant on board the Alliance frigate in the revolutionary war, commanded by Captain Peter Landais, which vessel took certain prizes, and carried them into the port of Bergen, in Norway, from whence they were given up to the enemy by the Danish Government. The petitioner prays the payment of his share of said prizes. The annexed report from the Department of State shows that, though the Government has never abandoned the claim on the Danish Government for the value of these prizes, there is no reasonable hope that any thing will be obtained. The committee think it unnecessary to remark further on this subject, and submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 22, 1820.

I have the honor of enclosing, for the information of the committee, copies of a letter from the Secretary of State (Mr. Monroe) to the Danish minister, Mr. Pedersen, dated the 14th of December, 1812, and of his answer, dated the 19th of the same month, since which there has been no further communication with the Danish Government relating to the claim upon which the petition of James Warren, herewith returned, is founded. The impression of this petitioner that the Danish Government ever ordered any part of this claim to be paid to the American claimants appears to be unfounded. It has never been, on the part of the United States, abandoned; but it has long since ceased to be an object upon which negotiation could offer any prospect of success.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JONATHAN ROBERTS, Esq., Chairman Committee of Claims, Senate.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 14, 1812.

It is perhaps known to you that, in the year 1779, the United States frigate Alliance, Captain Landais, took three prizes, which were carried into the port of Bergen, in Norway, and were afterwards delivered up to the captured, upon the demand of the British minister at your court, on the ground that the King of Denmark "had not yet acknowledged the independence of the colonies associated against England."

The legal claimants have never ceased to expect from the Government of Denmark the payment of the value of these prizes, which was computed at fifty thousand pounds sterling, including the cargoes of the three captured vessels, viz: of the ships Betsey, Union, and Charming Polly.

Some of these claimants have lately heard that your Government has directed the payment of that money to them. I shall be glad to know of you whether such an order has been issued, and, in case it has, in what mode it will be executed. This Government takes much interest in obtaining for the parties a sum which is believed to be justly due to them, and I should be happy in being able to confirm to them the report of the favorable disposition of your Government in that respect which has reached them.

Should no step have been already taken, I have to request that you will have the goodness to bring the claim before your sovereign, and to obtain his decision on it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

PETER PEDERSEN, Esq., Chargé d'Affaires from Denmark.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, December 19, 1812.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 14th, and observe that a report had reached you of my Government having directed the payment of the money claimed on account of three prizes, which, in the year 1779, were carried into the port of Bergen, in Norway, but afterwards delivered up to the captured, upon the demand of the British minister, on the ground that the King of Denmark had not acknowledged the independence of the then colonies associated against England.

In reply to your queries relating to this subject, I beg leave to observe that my Government, although perfectly ready at the time to enter into a friendly negotiation on the above-mentioned claim, has never admitted it as a fair and legal one, and it has for many years already considered it as a superannuated and abandoned affair.

When, in the year 1806, Captain Landais petitioned Congress for relief, and the above claim, in consequence thereof, was reported upon and exhibited to Congress, I considered it my duty to protest against it, (as will be seen by reference to my letter addressed to the then Secretary of State, dated February 17, 1806,) particularly so as it appeared to me that the renovation of that ancient pretended claim upon my Government then had, and I fear ever since has had, the unfortunate effect of retarding the favorable final decision of two acknowledged very fair claims upon the Government of the United States for the Danish vessels the Mercator and the Henrick; although these have not the most distant connexion with the above-mentioned, and therefore in equity ought not, and I hope will not much longer, thereby be affected.

In having the honor of submitting to you these observations, I must, however, acknowledge that I am without any late information from my Government. You will, in the mean time, perceive, sir, that the correctness of the rumor above alluded to is not very probable; and, although I regret extremely that the Government of the United States at this time should desire this claim to be renewed and examined into, I shall, in compliance with your request, avail myself of the first opportunity for submitting to my Government a copy of your letter, accompanied with such observations as the occasion may require.

I have the honor to be, with the most distinguished consideration and respect,

Sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

P. PEDERSEN.

GOVERNMENT OF ST. DOMINGO.

COMMUNICATED FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 27, 1820.

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th of February last, the petitions of Samuel G. Perkins and others, merchants of Massachusetts, and of William Patterson and others, merchants of Baltimore, were referred, has the honor of submitting to the House the following report:

In the month of January, 1817, in consequence of a memorial to the President of the United States from sundry persons interested in the claims set forth in these petitions, Septimus Tyler was appointed an agent to proceed to the island of St. Domingo, for the purpose of claiming the indemnity which appears to be justly due to the petitioners for property so unjustly taken from them. He accordingly proceeded thither, but was denied access to the Government of Christophe upon the alleged ground of informality in the style of his powers. Mr. Tyler did not live to return to the United States.

In the spring of the year 1818, a second attempt was made to send an agent to make the demand, and authority was given him to present himself in a manner which there was reason to expect would have discarded every question of form. The result, however, was a refusal again to receive him. A formal recognition of the kingdom of Hayti not being deemed expedient, no further measures have been found practicable on the part of the Executive in the case; those suggested by the memorialists being within the exclusive authority of the Legislature.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Department of State, Washington, March 20, 1820.

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled: The petition of Samuel G. Perkins, Ezra Davis, Ebenezer Francis, Jonathan Low, Benjamin Smith, and others, whose names are undersigned, merchants dwelling in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and citizens of the United States, respectfully represents:

That they and those whom they represent, and others, were, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and ten, engaged in a lawful commerce with the ports and places in the island of St. Domingo under the dominion of Henry Christophe; that, during that year, they shipped a large amount of property to Cape Henry and Gonaives, in the expectation of procuring return cargoes of the produce of the island, but, owing to the scarcity of crops that season, it was impracticable to procure return cargoes immediately; and, by the then existing laws of that Government, they were prohibited from reshipping the cargoes they had landed there, or from bringing away specie; that some of the persons having the charge of the cargoes thus situated sold the same on a credit, to be paid for in produce at the opening of the ensuing season, and directly returned home with their vessels in ballast, while other persons thus situated preferred to wait for their cargoes; that, during this period of delay, Christophe, perceiving a large amount of American property within his grasp, and tempted by the prospect of great plunder, under pretence of having an unsatisfied claim against certain merchants in Baltimore, in the month of October of the same year forcibly detained all the American vessels then in his ports, some of which had been brought in by his cruisers, and arrested their officers and crews, and held them thus under detention till the month of January following; and on the 3d day of the said month of January, passed a decree, (a copy whereof accompanies this petition, and which he immediately caused to be executed,) by which he seized and confiscated to his own use property belonging to your petitioners and other citizens of the United States, of the value, by his estimate, of one hundred and thirty-two thousand dollars, and upwards—a decree so manifestly wicked and unjust, that even Christophe, while he endeavors to shelter himself under his supposed necessity, acknowledges it to be as much against sound policy and good faith in him as it is arbitrary and contrary to the laws of all civilized nations. And your petitioners further state that, after unavailing attempts to procure a restitution of their property, or of some part thereof, from Christophe, they applied to the President of the United States for redress, setting forth the injuries they had sustained, and the outrage committed upon the Government of the United States itself. That, during the late war, the application of your petitioners was but partly acted upon, amidst the multiplicity of great and important business which then occupied the attention of that high officer of the Government; but that, on the return of peace, the President of the United States, after investigation of the facts, and having satisfied himself of the justice of the claims of your petitioners, sent out to Cape Henry an agent, in the name of the United States of America, and in one of the vessels of war (the Congress frigate) belonging to the United States, to demand restitution in behalf of your petitioners, and other sufferers by the same outrage; which said agent failed to accomplish the object of his mission. That the President of the United States, not unmindful of the great injuries sustained by your petitioners, and of the outrage committed against the Government of the United States, but nevertheless desirous of preserving peaceable dispositions towards Christophe, sent out to Cape Henry another agent of the United States, once more to demand of Christophe to make compensation to the sufferers under his decree aforesaid. That said agent was unable to procure any satisfaction from the said Christophe, and returned conclusively to establish the fact that all demands upon Christophe to do justice to your injured petitioners will continue to prove unavailing, unless such demands are enforced by the strong arm of the Government. And your petitioners would further respectfully state that they have been credibly informed that the commanders of the ships of war of the United States, since their visits to Cape Henry, are clearly of opinion that a blockade of that port by a single frigate even, or a demand of restitution accompanied by a power to enforce such demand, would be attended with the success so much desired by your petitioners, and so much an object heretofore with the head of our Government. In considering this case, your petitioners would respectfully suggest that no questions of doubtful rights present themselves for discussion or compromise, nor do they perceive such points of policy or expediency to arise as will suffer the Government to acquiesce and submit to so great injuries committed upon its faithful citizens. Relying on the energy of our Government and the wisdom of its councils, it cannot be necessary to urge the importance of protecting the rights and interests of every class of men in the community, and especially in times like the present, against every outrage committed by any Power, civilized, piratical, or barbarous; and your petitioners, submitting the remedy for their wrongs, and the mode in which it is to be pursued, to your wisdom, humbly request your aid, and, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

CLAIM AGAINST RUSSIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 18TH OF APRIL, 1820.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 17, 1820.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom, by a resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, was referred the petition of Eliphalet Loud and others, to consider and report thereon, has the honor of reporting:

That the facts relative to the representations made on the part of this Government to that of Russia, in behalf of the petitioners, are correctly stated by them; and that, since the 7th day of July, 1818, the latest date mentioned by them, another memorial has been addressed by the minister of the United States at St. Petersburg to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, a copy of which is herewith submitted. It does not appear, by any of the despatches from Mr. Campbell since received, that any answer to this memorial has been returned.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Campbell, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States to Russia, to Count Nesselrode, Minister of Foreign Affairs at St. Petersburg.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 6, 1819.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to inform his excellency Count de Nesselrode, Secretary of State, that he has it in special charge from his Government to invite the attention of the Government of His Imperial Majesty to two cases of individual claims thereon by citizens of the United States, of long standing.

Of these, one is that of the brigantine Hector, belonging to Israel Thorndike, of Boston, commanded by Captain Luke Thorndike, which was captured by His Imperial Majesty's frigate Venus, carried to the island of Tenedos, and there condemned with her cargo, as lawful prize, in June, 1807, by sentence of a Committee of Prizes, assembled on board His Imperial Majesty's ship of war the Iverday; the other, that of the ship Commerce, belonging to the Weymouth Importing Company, in the State of Massachusetts, commanded by Captain Joseph Penel, which was taken by a privateer under the flag of this empire, carried into Corfu, and there condemned with her cargo, as lawful prize, in ——, 1807, by a decree of the Committee of Prizes of that island.

These vessels with their cargoes belonging to citizens of the United States of high respectability, who were not only conscious of the purity of their own motives in the instructions given respecting their voyages, but also convinced, from the most satisfactory evidence, that in conducting those voyages no violation whatever of the laws and usages of nations had been committed, they applied to their Government, soliciting its aid in making their cases known to that of His Imperial Majesty; feeling entire confidence that to procure the reversal of those condemnatory decrees, and obtain that restitution to which they conceive themselves entitled, it was only necessary to have the circumstances under which those captures and condemnations took place so laid before the view of His Imperial Majesty that the merits and justice of their claims might fairly appear. For this purpose, full statements of those cases were laid before the Imperial Government in October, 1809, by Mr. Levett Harris, then consul general of the United States at St. Petersburg, with ample testimony to prove, it is conceived, the injustice and irregularity of the captures, as well as of the condemnations consequent thereon; and, at the same time, a due claim for indemnity was made in behalf of the respective claimants for the heavy losses they had sustained.

On reviewing these statements, and the evidence accompanying the same, they appear so ample, and to support so conclusively the justice of those claims, that the undersigned forbears entering into new details on the subject, and satisfies himself, for the present, by referring his excellency the Secretary of State to those documents already in possession of the Imperial Government.

He would not, however, fulfil his duty conformably to the instructions of his Government, if he did not bring to the recollection of his excellency on this occasion the length of time that has elapsed since the appeals in those cases were brought before the Imperial Government, being nearly ten years, during which the repeated applications in favor of the claimants, in the name of their Government, have been allowed to remain unanswered, and without procuring for them either that indemnity to which they conceive themselves so justly entitled, or a knowledge of the grounds upon which it has hitherto been considered proper to withhold it; and he is satisfied his excellency will duly appreciate the motives by which he is actuated in urging the revision and final determination of those cases with that zeal and earnestness which their obvious justice, as well as the hardships necessarily resulting from privations so long continued, appear to him imperiously to demand.

With the expression of the high and perfect confidence reposed in the justice, equity, and impartiality of the decisions the tribunals of His Imperial Majesty in the last resort shall pronounce, the undersigned has the honor to renew to his excellency the Secretary of State the assurance of his high and very distinguished consideration.

SWEDEN: INDEMNITY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 21, 1820.

To the Senate of the United States: WASHINGTON, April 18, 1820.

I lay before the Senate, in pursuance of their resolution of the 21st of last month, the accompanying report and documents from the Department of State.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 17, 1820.

The Secretary of State, to whom a resolution of the Senate of the 21st of March has been referred, requesting the President to lay before that House copies of the correspondence between the ministers or other agents of the United States and the ministers or Government of Sweden, relative to the seizures, sequestration, or confiscation of the ships or other property of citizens of the United States, under the authority of Sweden, has the hono respectfully to submit to the President the copies of the papers desired by that resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Russell to Count d'Engestrom, Minister of Foreign Affairs at Stockholm.

STOCKHOLM, September 3, 1816.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acquaint his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, that the instructions which he has received make it his indispensable duty to call the serious attention of his excellency to the claims of American citizens for indemnity for their property sequestered, confiscated, and sold at Stralsund, a few years since, by the order and for the account of the Swedish Government.

It is believed that to present, without comment, a simple statement of the facts belonging to this transaction, such as they appear to have been from the documents left by Mr. Speyer with the American legation, will be quite sufficient to manifest the indubitable justice of these claims, and to prevail on His Swedish Majesty's Government to provide for their immediate liquidation.

The Swedish Government represented itself to have been compelled by the French Government to sequester, in the month of June, 1810, the American property at Stralsund; and afterwards repeatedly expressed its solicitude to obtain the termination of that sequestration, for the avowed purpose of restoring the property which it affected to the rightful owners.

This sequestration was, in fact, raised, with the consent of the French Government, about the beginning of August, 1811, and the property to which it attached placed at the sole disposition of His Swedish Majesty.

Immediately after it thus came within His Majesty's exclusive control, it was, notwithstanding all the assurances previously given, and the rights of the American owners, confiscated and sold by the order and for the sole account of the Swedish Government.

Since that time until the present day no indemnity whatever, although frequently promised, has ever been made by the Swedish Government to the injured citizens of the United States.

Such, according to the archives of the American legation, appear to be the simple facts belonging to this transaction, and with regard to the nature and consequences of which it is believed there can exist no diversity of opinion. These facts alone would have been amply sufficient to have secured the success of the American claims, had not the justice of these claims been already repeatedly acknowledged by the Swedish Government itself.

During the original sequestration by the Swedish Government, at the instance, as is stated, of that of France, the Baron de Wetterstedt, who was then charged with the affairs of Pomerania, assured Mr. Speyer that the participation of Sweden in that proceeding was for the purpose of protection, and not of confiscation; that more than thirty despatches had been transmitted to Paris in order to obtain the release of the sequestered property, or the permission to sell that property, either on Swedish account, or the joint account of Sweden and France; assuring Mr. Speyer, at the same time, that, in case such release or permission were obtained, a just proportion of the property, or its proceeds, should be restored to the rightful American owners.

Even after the confiscation and sale of the property, the Swedish Government, on its part, never urged any right in justification of the proceeding, nor even the pretext of foreign coercion for its palliation. The only question which appears to have been agitated at that time related not to the justice, but to the practicability of the indemnification. There was no controversy as to the principal; and even a proposition to give it effect, by the delivery of iron cannon, was suggested by the Baron de Wetterstedt.

The doctrine that the property of the citizens of a friendly state, lawfully imported into an ultramarine province of Sweden, was not entitled to the same protection from the Swedish Government as when imported into Sweden itself, (which, it seems, his excellency the Count d'Engestrom once permitted himself to intimate,) it is not necessary here to examine. The question now presented is not whether the Swedish Government was bound, in good faith, to protect the American property at Stralsund against the violence and injuries of foreign nations, but whether it was not bound to refrain, itself, from voluntarily confiscating that property, and converting it to its own use, without the form of a trial, or even the pretext of foreign compulsion.

The note which his excellency the Count d'Engestrom addressed to Mr. Speyer on the 22d of May, 1813, and which appears to be the last communication made on the subject, states that the sequestration took place upon the demand of the French Government, and in conformity to the treaty of Paris; but his excellency does not pretend that the final confiscation of this property, and the appropriation of its proceeds, were at the dictation or for the benefit of that Government. Such a pretext, indeed, would have been inconsistent with the previous declaration of his excellency himself; for, on the 12th of August, 1811, he informed Mr. Speyer, as appears from Mr. Speyer's note to his excellency of the 14th of that month, that "the sequestered property at Stralsund was then at the sole disposal of His Swedish Majesty." It is not of the original act of sequestration, whatever might have been its origin, or however unjust and injurious its operation, that the undersigned now specially complains; but it is for the final and voluntary confiscation and sale of the property by the Government of Sweden, for its own account, that he is instructed to demand an indemnity. In the note above referred to, his excellency does not even insinuate a doubt of the justice of such a demand; but, on the contrary, he implicitly admits it when he states that His Swedish Majesty had hoped to have been able to indemnify the American citizens from the revenues of his German provinces. In thus speaking of indemnity, the relative injury is certainly acknowledged: why the funds for this indemnity should have been exclusively sought for in the revenues of the German provinces, it is difficult to determine. The American citizens, who trusted their property in a port of Swedish Pomerania, had a full reliance not on the local authorities and resources only, but on the universal good faith and entire power of the Swedish Government for justice and protection. The impossibility, therefore, which his excellency suggests, on account of the then recent invasion of Pomerania by the French, to accord any indemnity whatever, appears to have been founded on a supposition erroneous and inadmissible. It still proves, however, that, even at that time, it was the ability and not the obligation to accord the indemnity which was wanting in the view of the Swedish Government.

What inference his excellency wished should be drawn from the fact which he stated, that even Swedish subjects had suffered, without indemnity, a participation in the evils of the act of sequestration, has not been discovered. It is not believed that his excellency intended to say that the sovereign of a country has the right to treat alien friends, who are transitorily within his jurisdiction, for the purposes of trade, in the same manner he might think proper to treat his own subjects—to levy on them the same taxes, and to subject them to the same requisitions. Were such a doctrine to prevail, there would be an end to all international commerce. Whatever the sovereign of a state may deem fit to do, within his own jurisdiction, in relation to those who are within his allegiance, cannot, indeed, be found to be wrong by any other Government; but there certainly cannot be deduced from this principle a right to extend oppressive measures to the citizens of other independent states, nor can these citizens be supposed to find any alleviation of their own sufferings in the mere knowledge of the fact that they do not suffer alone.

If, contrary to all reason and usage, it could be admitted that the revenues and resources of Pomerania were alone to be regarded as responsible to the American claimants for the property there confiscated by Sweden, and the invasion by the French destroyed, at that time, those means of making indemnity, yet that invasion was of brief duration, and that province has since become an ample source of wealth and empire to the Swedish Government, in having not only furnished an equivalent at the treaty of Kiel for the acquisition of Norway, but, subsequently, a sufficient consideration for three millions and a half of dollars received from Prussia. It is, indeed, to be regretted that, while the Government of Sweden applied much of these funds to objects in no way connected with Pomerania, it should have totally neglected all satisfaction of the American claims, which it had before affected to consider as the special debt of that province.

The circumstance that the duties had been paid on the merchandise previous to its confiscation, and never returned, not only proves the lawfulness of the importation, but singularly aggravates the injury inflicted on the American proprietors.

From this view of the subject, it is believed that His Swedish Majesty's Government will no longer hesitate to afford that indemnity which the admitted justice of the case demands, and which the Government of the United States confidently expects from the known integrity and good faith of His Majesty. The inability of the Swedish Government, at any moment, to provide this indemnity, cannot be admitted; and, after its recent success and aggrandizement, it would be offensive to suggest the possibility of such a pretext being again urged on its part.

The value of the property, at the current price, when it was first sequestered, and which would furnish the just rule to measure the indemnity, is not precisely known to the undersigned. It was, however, considerably greater than that at which this property was afterwards either estimated or sold.

This property was estimated, when it came to the free disposal of the Swedish Government, at one hundred and ninety-two thousand rix-dollars, Pomeranian currency; and was actually sold to a single merchant for one hundred and fifty-one thousand dollars of the same money.

According to an estimate communicated by Mr. Speyer to the Baron de Wetterstedt on the 5th of October, 1811, the first cost of the property, in the United States, was one hundred and ten thousand Spanish dollars.

In whatever way, therefore, this property be valued, the amount is too small to embarrass the Swedish Government for an instant in providing the requisite funds for the indemnification of the American claimants. Small, however, as this amount may be, and little as it is calculated to justify a refusal of indemnity under the pretext of inability, it has, unfortunately, been found sufficient seriously to injure the American owners, and to reduce some of them to insolvency and ruin.

The undersigned believes it unnecessary to say more; and he confidently trusts that what he has said will not have been in vain. He trusts that, while the relations of the two countries are placed on so liberal a basis with respect to the future, the prospect they open may not be overshadowed by any disagreeable recollection of the past, which might perplex either party with doubts of the justice and good faith of the other.

The undersigned prays his excellency the Count d'Engestrom to accept the assurances of his highest consideration.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Count d'Engestrom to Mr. Russell.

STOCKHOLM, September 6, 1816.

The undersigned, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to him by Mr. Russell, minister plenipotentiary of the United States, claiming an indemnity for certain property sequestered, confiscated, and sold some years back at Stralsund, by order and for the account of the Swedish Government.

Before giving a positive answer to that note, the undersigned considers it indispensably necessary to apply to the former Department of the Affairs of Pomerania for the required information on the subject in question. He will not fail, on receiving it, to lay the affair before the King, and to communicate immediately His Majesty's answer to the Government of the United States, either through Mr. De Kantzow, or by addressing it directly to Mr. Russell.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to Mr. Russell the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

THE COUNT D'ENGESTROM.

Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State.

SIR: STOCKHOLM, October 16, 1818.

Before making any further communication in relation to the Stralsund claims, I believed it to be proper to prepare the Swedish minister for its reception. I availed myself accordingly for this purpose of the interview which I obtained on the 3d instant.

Count d'Engestrom, as usual, approached the subject with much repugnance, and was evidently embarrassed in finding an apology for his extraordinary silence in relation to it. He did remind me, indeed, that the business was not originally of his department, but appeared to be aware that this circumstance could no longer account for his perseverance in avoiding all discussion. He therefore abandoned this ground, confessed himself in fault, and assured me of his prompt attention to any communication which I might now think expedient to make on the subject. With regard to the merits of the claims, he observed that the Swedish Government had much to say in its defence, but he acknowledged that he found great difficulty in getting over a sort of promise that had been given to accord an indemnity.

In reflecting on this conversation, I conceived it might be useful still to make one effort more, before I took leave of the subject, by communicating the declaration which you had prescribed to me in your last instructions. The expressions of the King, at the time I presented my credentials, were, as I have already informed you, more precise against the justice of the claims than any I had before heard from him; and I had reason to believe that Count d'Engestrom had been instructed to take, in the conversation which I have mentioned above, that ground. To prevent, if possible, such a course, I believed it might be useful to anticipate the contemplated movement, and to interpret the silence in respect to our claims into a recognition of their justice, and to profit of the confession of Count d'Engestrom, "that there had been a sort of promise of indemnity." In this view, a strong and rather spirited note appeared to me alone calculated to have the desired effect. I therefore, on the 5th instant, presented to the Count d'Engestrom a note, of which the enclosed (A) is a copy.

I did not hear any thing in reply from the count until the 13th instant, when I received from him a note inviting me to repair to the Foreign Office on the day following.

When I waited on him, on the 14th, agreeably to his appointment, he began the conversation by observing that he had not yet been able to obtain a definitive decision on my propositions relative to commerce, although he was in daily expectation of being authorized to communicate to me such a decision. He then stated that he had been commanded to invite me to dine with the King the next day, as His Majesty desired to converse with me concerning the Stralsund claims; but he added, with evident embarrassment and much hesitation, "I dare not present your note to His Majesty, and I hope you do not wish to quarrel with us." I could not but be surprised at his alarm, and I assured him that if my note had been well translated he could have found nothing in it of a hostile character; on the contrary, it had been dictated by the most unqualified confidence in the justice and friendship of his sovereign. He rejoined, that it had caused him great affliction, and he hoped that I would not insist on his communicating that note to the King, as it would be the most disagreeable act that he had ever performed during the long period that he had been in office. He entreated me to allow him to return it, and to consent to address to him another, which should simply remind him of my previous communications, which, he remarked, had been quite strong enough, and he engaged that such a note should have a full and early answer. I replied that, as the note already delivered appeared entirely fitted to the occasion, I could not consent to withdraw it, nor abandon the ground that had been taken. If he found, contrary to what had been intended or expected, any thing harsh in that note, still it might be well for him to retain it, as a memorial of the feelings that had been excited by the conduct of the Swedish Government. Willing, however, to place him at his ease, I consented to write another note, in the manner he had requested. He acceded to these proposals, and agreed to keep the note which had occasioned so much inquietude. On my part, I addressed to him, on the same day, another note, of which the enclosed (B) is a copy.

It has appeared necessary to trouble you with these details, in order to explain to you the successive delivery of two notes, so different in character, in so short an interval of time.

My views in writing the first, and the circumstances under which the second was delivered, have been already stated; but I cannot forbear to acquaint you with the real reasons for my proceedings in relation to the latter.

It was not from any deference to the sensibilities of Count d'Engestrom, or to those of the King, (however reluctant I might be unnecessarily to wound them,) that induced me to acquiesce in the wishes which the minister had expressed to be saved from the painful necessity of acting on my note of the 5th instant. Notwithstanding his declarations, I was fully persuaded that the contents of that note had actually been communicated to the King. This persuasion was induced, not only by the time which had elapsed (a period of seven days) between the receipt of that note by Count d'Engestrom, and his discovery that he dared not deliver it to the King, but by the invitation for me to dine with the King the next day, in order to converse concerning these claims; for this invitation must have resulted from a knowledge of that note. From this fact, I was reluctantly obliged to infer that my note had failed in its main object—that of obtaining indemnity without further discussion. I was now reduced to the alternative of either delivering a new note, and listening to a tardy attempt at justification, or of running the risk, by pressing that already delivered, of furnishing a pretext for an abrupt termination of all discussion, and, perhaps, for a categorical rejection of the claims. The interest of the claimants appeared to recommend the former course, and I accordingly adopted it. And this I did the more willingly, as the stimulus already given had produced all the excitement of a favorable tendency that could be expected from it, and it seemed prudent to administer a palliative, in order to prevent consequences more violent than had originally been contemplated.

Agreeably to the invitation above mentioned, I dined yesterday with the King at his country palace of Rosendala. Immediately after dinner, he desired me and Count d'Engestrom to accompany him into his private apartments. He there at once introduced the subject of the claims, and expressed a regret that all the circumstances connected with that transaction had not hitherto been communicated to the American Government. He observed that these circumstances, he believed, would palliate, if not justify, the conduct of Sweden in that transaction, and that they should be immediately addressed to me. He then gave directions to Count d'Engestrom, in conformity with this declaration, and, in doing so, he alluded to an order of the French Government, designating the objects to which the proceeds of the American property were to be applied. He added that he was still disposed to do all he could for the relief of the American sufferers; but that, as he had nothing excepting military stores at his disposal for this object, he could furnish this relief in articles of that description only. I simply replied that we could not have expected that new facts would have been brought forward at this late day, after the earnest manner in which we had so long urged these claims; and that I could hardly believe—I might say hope—that these facts were of a nature to justify the Swedish Government, and exempt it from all responsibility. I was, however, entirely disposed to give to these facts, whatever they might be, a candid consideration.

I am now waiting, with much solicitude, for the communication which has been promised, and, until it be received, I must refrain from giving an opinion in relation to the final issue of this business.

After what I have written above, I ought to add, that the manner of the King, always gracious, was peculiarly so on this occasion; and, so far from his betraying any signs of displeasure at any thing I had done, he was unusually prodigal of his professions of friendship for the American Government and people, and of his attentions to their minister. There were several other topics introduced into this conversation, which, as they have no relation to the subject of this letter, I shall reserve for another communication.

I have the honor to be, with very great consideration and respect, sir, your faithful and obedient servant,

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

STOCKHOLM, October 5, 1818.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acquaint his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, that it is not without surprise and pain that the American Government has learned that all the representations which have hitherto been made to the Government of Sweden concerning its voluntary seizure and sale of the bona fide property of citizens of the United States, at Stralsund, in 1811, have not only remained without effect in obtaining a just indemnity, but have not even been noticed with the common courtesy of an answer.

Reluctantly, indeed, would the Government of the United States be persuaded that this ungracious silence was intended to add indignity to injustice. The character of both Governments forbids such a construction; for it is believed that they are both equally incapable of offering or suffering an injury of this description.

It is now more than two years since the undersigned had the honor to present to his excellency, on the 3d of September, 1816, the facts on which the American claims are founded. If the interference of a private agent of the American claimants furnished good cause for suspending all communication between the two Governments on the subject, yet, when that interference had terminated without effect, (and it did so terminate more than a year since, as appears by a letter of that agent to the Baron de Wetterstedt, of the 3d of October, 1817,) the fitness of such communication between the two Governments was necessarily restored. It was in this conviction that the undersigned addressed a note to his excellency on the 16th of February last, referring to that above mentioned, of the 3d of September, 1816, and again urging an early attention to the American claims. It was not until the 27th of April that the undersigned was favored with even an acknowledgment of the bare receipt of this note of the preceding February, and since that time he has not heard further from his excellency in respect to these claims. The only inference, consistent with the friendly and honorable feelings of both Governments, which it is now permitted to draw from this persevering though tacit refusal on the part of the Swedish Government to enter into all discussion of the merits of the question, is, that the evident and frequently acknowledged justice of the claims has not only left little room for such a discussion, but has, added to the repeated declarations and overtures of the Swedish Government, prevented, with that Government, to recognise the obligation of more than an implied promise to accord satisfactory indemnity. It is, therefore, from a confidence in the good faith as well as in the justice of His Swedish Majesty's Government that such an inference is drawn, and that the undersigned feels not only authorized, but rejoiced to be able, under the instructions which he has just received, to abstain from entering further at this time into a disagreeable discussion of right, and to confine himself to desiring his excellency to state, with precision, the utmost amount which His Majesty may, in his generosity and commiseration of the individuals immediately concerned, as well as in his regard for equity, and his consideration and friendship for the Government of the United States, be willing to accord for the relief and indemnity of the sufferers, and the mode in which it may be proposed to furnish that amount.

The undersigned takes leave to remind his excellency that to the value of the merchandise should be added the amount of the duties which were paid by the proprietors, and the accumulated interest of more than seven years, in order to constitute an adequate indemnity.

The pure and lofty principles which the American Government never ceases to cherish and to practise in its intercourse with all nations, and the confident expectation which it entertains that the monarch who has been elevated to the throne by his virtues will be distinguished for the moral dignity of his reign, forbid all distrust or apprehension that the request which the undersigned has now stated to his excellency will not be answered by a prompt and satisfactory compliance.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurance of his highest consideration.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Mr. Russell to Count d'Engestrom.

STOCKHOLM, October 14, 1818.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acquaint his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, that the instructions which he has received make it his duty to call the attention of the Swedish Government once more to the claims of American citizens for indemnity for their property sequestered at Stralsund in the year 1810, and there sold the year following, by the order and for the sole account of His Swedish Majesty's Government.

From a confidence in the justice and liberality of His Majesty, the undersigned forbears at this time from acting on his instructions in their full spirit and extent, and confines himself to requesting his excellency to cause this matter to be taken into immediate consideration, and to obtain thereon an early and equitable decision.

The undersigned trusts that the representations which he has already made on this subject, particularly in his note of the 3d of September, 1816, hitherto unanswered, render it now unnecessary for him to enter into a further discussion.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurance of his highest consideration.

JONA. RUSSELL.

SIR: FLORENCE, February 22, 1819.

I have the honor to transmit to you, enclosed, a note received at Berlin, from the Count d'Engestrom, in reply to that which I had addressed to him, on the 14th of October last, in relation to the Stralsund claims. This reply was not only unsatisfactory, but it was entirely at variance with the spirit of the verbal assurances which had been made to me. To have left it without a comment would, I believe, have given it a weight to which it was not entitled, and might have been construed into an admission, on my part, that the facts and arguments which it contained were incontrovertible and unanswerable. To prevent such a construction, and to fulfil your last instructions, which I had hitherto deferred communicating, in hopes that an equitable decision of the Swedish Government might have rendered my so doing unnecessary, I addressed to Count d'Engestrom, from Vienna, a note, of which you will also find a copy enclosed. I hope that the reasons here stated, and the peculiarity of my situation, may rescue the course which I have pursued from censure.

To avoid repetition, I referred the Swedish minister generally to my note of the 6th of September, 1816. In that note he will find that he himself informed Mr. Speyer that the American merchandise was, on the 12th of August, 1811, at the sole disposition of the Swedish Government.

This is the first opportunity that I have had of communicating with the United States since I left Vienna, which, I trust, will satisfactorily account for my not having sooner transmitted to you the enclosed papers.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect and consideration, sir, your faithful, obedient servant,

JONA. RUSSELL.

[TRANSLATION.]

Count d'Engestrom to Mr. Russell.

STOCKHOLM, October 27, 1818.

The undersigned, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, has laid before the King, his august sovereign, the note which Mr. Russell, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, did him the honor to address to him, for the purpose of renewing his claim, in behalf of certain citizens of the United States, of indemnity for losses sustained by them in Swedish Pomerania, by the confiscation of certain vessels and cargoes, their property.

The undersigned thinks it unnecessary to recapitulate the details of an affair, all the material circumstances of which are already known to Mr. Russell. It occurred at an unfortunate period, when a despotic sway, embracing all parts of the globe, exercised its disastrous influence alike on friends and foes; and when France, the ally of America, was equally regardless of her interests as those of other Powers.

It is an undisputed fact that the American vessels in question entered the ports of Pomerania whilst that province was still under the dominion of Sweden; but scarcely was the French Government informed of it, when it gave orders to its agent in Pomerania to demand the seizure and confiscation of these vessels to the benefit of France; alleging, in justification of this violent pretension, the system called continental, under which France then cloaked her projects of progressive encroachment, menacing all Europe, but which had, notwithstanding, been admitted by it, and was acceded to by all the European Powers at peace with the French empire. The imposing force at that time kept up by France in those countries left no alternative to the Swedish Government, which was reluctantly compelled to acquiesce in her demands. The steps then taken by Sweden with the French Government, to obtain a transfer to her of the property thus confiscated, were prompted by a desire to restore it to the lawful owners; but they proved ineffectual, France having agreed to the transfer on certain conditions only, expressly stipulating that the proceeds of these cargoes should be immediately employed in placing Pomerania in a state of defence against the English naval force, which then threatened all the shores of the Baltic.

To this object, wholly foreign to the particular interests of Sweden, they were applied; and the Swedish Government was thereby disappointed in its hopes of procuring the restitution to the American citizens, the original owners of the ships and cargoes now under consideration. But, as an incontestable proof of its sincere desire to alleviate their losses as far as depended on it, an inquiry was instituted in concert with Mr. Eckie, agent for the claimants; and the proposals then made to him for the attainment of the object just alluded to, with his rejection of them, are well known to Mr. Russell.

It was cause of regret to the Swedish Government that the course suggested by it was not adopted, as it seemed to be the only one adapted to meet the views of Mr. Eckie. His Majesty feels assured, however, of the disposition of the United States to do justice to the desire manifested by His Majesty on this, as on every other occasion, of doing every thing possible to evince his high esteem for a Power with which it is his constant wish to maintain the most amicable relations.

In pursuance of these sentiments, the undersigned has received the King's commands to renew to Mr. Russell the assurance, which His Majesty has already given to him in person, of the satisfaction with which he would discover any practicable mode of alleviating the losses sustained by the American citizens alluded to, through the confiscation of their property in Pomerania in 1811. His Majesty has a particular satisfaction in recollecting that, about the same period, the Swedish Government restored to the citizens of the United States thirty-three vessels, with valuable cargoes, then under detention in Sweden, in consequence of a formal requisition of the mission of France at Stockholm. His Majesty availed himself, on that occasion, of the force under the control of his Government in Sweden; but he saw, with deep concern, the impossibility of taking corresponding measures in his Pomeranian territories, they being, besides, as well in virtue of their particular compacts with France, as by the presence of the French armies, completely under the influence of the continental system, to which Prussia, Denmark, and the other Governments on the shores of the Baltic, had declared their adherence.

The undersigned, in conforming to these orders of the King, his august sovereign, avails himself, with pleasure, of this occasion to renew to Mr. Russell the assurance of his high consideration.

THE COUNT D'ENGESTROM.

VIENNA, December 12, 1818.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, addressed to him at Berlin, under date of the 27th October last. His excellency will not be surprised to learn that the undersigned has been able to discover nothing in that note calculated to discharge the Swedish Government from its obligation of providing an adequate indemnity to the citizens of the United States for the confiscation of their merchandise, in 1811, at Stralsund, then under the dominion of Sweden.

The undersigned had confidently expected, from the conversations with which he had so recently been honored by His Majesty the King, and by his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, that, whatever objections might have been entertained to the justice of the American claims, they would, in this tardy communication, have been distinctly and definitely stated, and supported by documents of an authentic and unimpeachable character. His Majesty, at the very last interview which he accorded to the undersigned, and at which his excellency was present, expressly called the attention of his excellency to a particular note of the French minister, which he intimated to be in point, and which he offered to furnish to his excellency, if not already in his department, for the avowed purpose of being communicated to the undersigned. But even that note has not been so communicated, nor does the despatch of his excellency contain the most remote allusion to it. From a silence so extraordinary, the undersigned is compelled to infer that the note of the French minister was found, on examination, not to be of a nature to justify or to palliate the proceedings of the Swedish Government. It is not without extreme disappointment and regret, after having thus been encouraged to expect an explanation, at least precise, if not satisfactory, that he finds himself referred by his excellency, in a most vague and general manner, for a vindication of the conduct of that Government, exclusively to the coercive measures of France under the system commonly denominated continental, without the faintest intimation of any specific provision of that system which could apply to this case, or the slightest proof of its actual application. The undersigned feels not the smallest hesitation in declaring his entire conviction that there was no such provision and no such application. It is in vain that he has sought in the imperial decrees promulgated at Berlin, Milan, Rambouillet, or elsewhere, on which that system was founded, for the discovery of such a provision; and it is not permitted him to presume that any Government, however subservient at the time to the views of the French monarch, could have gratuitously consented to extend the evils of those arbitrary mandates by a constructive application; and still less is it to be presumed that a pretext, from interested motives, could have been sought in that unrighteous system to mask the violence, or to sanction the injustice, which it did not most explicitly and imperiously impose. The demand which his excellency states to have been made by the agent of the French Government in Pomerania for the seizure and confiscation, under the continental system, of the American merchandise for the account of France, must have been too degrading and unjust to have obtained an unqualified compliance on the part of Sweden; and that it did not obtain such a compliance is incontrovertible, from the notorious fact that this merchandise, although seized by the Swedish authorities on the 10th of June, 1810, was not confiscated, but held in a state of sequestration only, until the French minister at Stockholm, by his note of the 12th of July, 1811, announced the consent of his sovereign to the termination of that sequestration, on the sole condition that the colonial produce which it affected should not be introduced into France, or into the states of the Confederation of the Rhine. The extraordinary demand of the French agent in Pomerania, founded, as his excellency states, on the continental system, produced, therefore, a temporary sequester only, and furnished no pretext for the subsequent and final confiscation of the merchandise to which it applied, and no extenuation of its injustice. The undersigned is not disposed now to deny that a demand of this kind was made, as the note of the French minister just mentioned implies the previous participation of France in the act of sequestration; yet, that demand having never been communicated to the American Government in the shape in which it was preferred, as courtesy, if not right, appeared to require, it may be permitted to entertain some doubt in respect to its precise import and extent, particularly as it was allowed to have but a partial and transitory effect. It necessarily follows, from the facts which the undersigned has now had the honor to present, that the continental system, or any demand of the French agent in Pomerania, whatever influence they might unduly have had in causing the original seizure, could have had none in producing the final sale of the merchandise, and the appropriation of its proceeds by the Government of Sweden.

The undersigned is far from being disposed to vindicate the continental system, or the acquiescence of any nation in its iniquitous requisitions; but his excellency appears to have formed an erroneous estimate of the extent of both. None of the nations whose dominions border on the Baltic ever committed, in relation to the United States, nor, is it believed, in relation to other friendly nations, any act similar to that for which the undersigned has been instructed to ask indemnity from Sweden. Of the conduct of Russia and Prussia during the continental system, the United States have no cause to complain; and if Denmark imposed a sequestration, towards the close of the year 1809, on American vessels and their cargoes in her ports, that sequestration continued for a few months only, and the American property subjected to it was restored, without exception, to the lawful owners. If the United States have now claims on Denmark, it is for the lawless depredations of her privateers, and the unjust decision of her tribunals, and not for the confiscation, without the form of a trial, of property acknowledged to be American, and fairly and regularly entered at her custom-houses. Of all the nations bordering on the Baltic, it was left for Sweden alone to receive the duties, and summarily and peremptorily to confiscate the merchandise, without suggesting a doubt of its origin or ownership. Such are the facts; and they save the undersigned from the necessity of protesting against the doctrine that the violence or injustice of one Government can be drawn into precedent, and cited as authority to sanction the wrongs of another.

Waiving at this time all further consideration of the original act of sequestration at Stralsund in 1810, whatever might have been its source, or the injuries which it inflicted on the unoffending and confiding citizens of the United States, the undersigned cannot refrain from repeating distinctly to his excellency the facts on which the American Government founds its claims for indemnity for the ultimate sale and appropriation of the sequestered property by the Government of Sweden. The note above mentioned of the Baron Alquier, the French minister at Stockholm, of the 12th of July, 1811, left that property at the free disposal of the Swedish Government, on the sole condition already stated; and that Government, instead of availing itself of the liberty thus accorded to terminate the sequester, and to restore the property to the American owners, profited by the accidental possession acquired by the sequester to sell that property on its own account.

The Swedish Government, forgetting its previous assurances, and disregarding the incontrovertible rights of the citizens of the United States, and the friendly relations which had not ceased to subsist between the two countries, advertised that property for sale at Stralsund on the 2d day of August, 1811, actually sold it on the 14th day of the same month, and caused the proceeds thereof to be paid into the Swedish royal treasury in Pomerania. These facts, it is believed, will not be contested, for they are supported by documents of acknowledged authenticity. Between the 12th of July, 1811, the day on which this property was placed at the disposal of the Swedish Government, and the 2d day of the following month, on which it was advertised for sale, there elapsed twenty-one days only—a period barely sufficient for deciding on the royal order at Stockholm, and for its transmission to Stralsund, and for the preparation and publication of the advertisement. The undersigned is ignorant of the date of that order; but, from the considerations just suggested, it could not well have been issued at a later day than the 20th of the same month of July, and consequently not more than eight days after the note of the Baron Alquier had announced the complete liberation, on the part of France, of the sequestered property. Whatever might have been the extravagance and versatility of the predominant despotism of the time, it will not be presumed that the Government of the United States will volunteer a belief of a total change of policy in so brief a period; and that, instead of consenting to raise the sequester, as so formally and recently announced, it had been capriciously resolved to proceed to immediate confiscation. His excellency must be aware that the precise orders received from the French Government during that period should be produced, and communicated to the American Government, to obtain its faith in the existence of an inconsistency in its nature so incredible. But neither his excellency, nor any other Swedish functionary, has attempted to show that any such orders were so received; and the undersigned will now dare to trouble his excellency with proof, not merely presumptive, that they were not. A declaration of the Swedish authorities in Pomerania renders it certain that they at least acted in complete ignorance of such orders, as well as of all French interference on the occasion, and in the full conviction that the Swedish Government at Stockholm had the exclusive control of the transaction. This declaration is contained in the reply of those authorities, on the 9th of August, 1811, to a memorial presented to them on the 6th of that month, by certain merchants of Stralsund, on behalf of themselves and of their American constituents. This reply clearly manifests the opinion which the Swedish regency in Pomerania entertained of the justice of the object of the memorial, and of the competency of their sovereign to decide definitively in relation to it. It is likewise evident, from their engagement to place provisionally the proceeds of the merchandise claimed in the royal chamber, that they acted independently of all French interference, and that there was no agent of France in their vicinity whom they felt themselves obliged to consult or to obey in this proceeding.

The undersigned presents herewith to his excellency a copy of the translation, by a sworn interpreter, of this reply, as well as of the memorial itself, as they are both in perfect accordance with the statement of facts now submitted.

But the evidence which irresistibly carries with it conviction that the royal orders issued at Stockholm for the sale of the sequestered merchandise at Stralsund could not have been in consequence of any requisition of the French Government received subsequently to the note above mentioned of the Baron Alquier, of the 12th of July, 1811, is collected from another note from that minister, addressed to His Royal Highness the Prince Royal, on the 13th of August of the same year. In this note, the baron refers, with sufficient precision, to that which he had addressed to the Swedish minister on the 12th of the preceding month, and clearly admits, by the manner in which he refers to it, that, since that time, he had neither received from his Government, nor communicated to that of Sweden, any instructions whatever on the subject of the merchandise which had been sequestered in Swedish Pomerania. The royal order, therefore, which was despatched from Stockholm in sufficient season to cause the advertisement of that merchandise at Stralsund on the 2d day of August, must have been the free and spontaneous act of the Swedish Government, uninfluenced by any requisition of France.

The undersigned dares to present herein to his excellency copies of the two notes of the French minister already mentioned, as it is possible, from the apparent unacquaintance of his excellency with their contents, that they may not readily be found in the archives of his Department.

There is one part of the note of the 12th of July on which it may still be proper to make a few observations. The duties which appear to have been sequestered and claimed by France, as well as the merchandise, were here expressly allowed to be received for the account of the Swedish Government, while, in consenting to free the merchandise, there is no intimation of its ulterior appropriation. The duties undoubtedly belonged to Sweden, and the merchandise, at least that part of it of which there is here a question, to citizens of the United States; and if the French Government had for a time claimed both, it was now obviously its intention to abandon both to their lawful owners respectively. Common sense and common usage can sanction no other construction; for the right of Sweden being expressly recognised to the duties only, necessarily implied a denial of her right to the merchandise, which was not so recognised. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. On raising the sequester, the parties concerned were to be reinstated in their respective rights; the Swedish Government, therefore, in its subsequent conduct relative to the merchandise, appears to have acted not only without the coercion of the French Emperor, but in opposition to his intentions.

The note of the 12th of July is certainly at variance, both in its tone and object, with that of the 13th of August; but whether this variance is to be ascribed to the temper and error of the French minister, or to a change in the sentiments and policy of his Government, it is not necessary for the undersigned to inquire: it is sufficient, for the justification of the views which he has now presented, that the note of the 12th of July was clear and explicit in its terms, and that it unequivocally placed the American merchandise at the sole and unrestricted disposal of Sweden. Nor does it belong to him to reconcile the new proofs of the constant friendship given by the French monarch to that of Sweden in consenting, on the 12th of July, to raise the sequester on the colonial produce at Stralsund with the ungracious demand, made on the 13th of the following month, to cause that produce to be sold under the inspection of the French vice-consul, and the proceeds thereof to be deposited in the French vice-consular chest. This demand, made at Stockholm on the 13th of August, could not have had any influence on the sale of the merchandise which took place at Stralsund on the very next day; and it is certainly unnecessary to intimate the impossibility of imputing to that demand the previous order issued at Stockholm, or the advertisement published at Stralsund, in conformity to which that sale was effected; besides, the fact is notorious, as already stated, that the French vice-consul was not allowed to interfere, and that the proceeds of the merchandise were paid, not into the French vice-consular chest, but into the Swedish royal chamber in Pomerania.

Were any proofs, in addition to that contained in the reply to the memorial above mentioned, necessary to establish the entire independence of the Swedish regency at Stralsund of all French authority, and that they acted solely on the orders of their own sovereign, this proof would be conclusively furnished by the note of the French minister of the 13th of August, which expressly states that they refused to act in conjunction with the French vice-consul without first consulting their Government and asking its instructions. It is, therefore, evident that neither the presence of the French troops in Pomerania, nor the treaties of Sweden with France, had induced even the Swedish local authorities to the necessity of submitting to the undefined exactions of the continental system, or of obeying the commands of a French vice-consul. These authorities still had the spirit, surrounded as they might have been by troops and by treaties, to act in conformity to the orders of their own sovereign only; and it is inconceivable that His Majesty, aloof from all the danger, at Stockholm, could have been advised to pursue a less dignified and independent course. That he did not, indeed, pursue such a course, is apparent, not only from the facts already stated, but from the circumstance which his excellency has been pleased to communicate, that His Majesty, at that time, caused thirty-three American vessels, richly laden, to be delivered to their lawful owners in the ports of Sweden, in defiance of the formal requisition of the mission of France. This circumstance, instead of justifying or extenuating the sale of the American merchandise at Stralsund, as his excellency appears to believe, demonstrates that sale to have been unnecessary, either from a respect to existing treaties, or from a fear of offending the Government of France. It is difficult to perceive how his excellency could attempt to sanction an act of injustice and violence, which he affects to excuse from a deference existing, and from the necessity of yielding to foreign force by a simultaneous act of justice, which he considers to be the more meritorious because it was performed in defiance of both.

As to the presence of French troops in Pomerania, it does not appear to have had any influence on the transaction. There was no military requisition made with respect to the American property at Stralsund; but all the demands of France, in relation to that property, as far as they are known to the undersigned, emanated from the civil department at Paris, and were communicated to the Swedish Government through diplomatic or consular functionaries only, unawed by any allusion to the possible intervention of an armed force.

With the actual employment of the proceeds of the confiscated American property, the Government of the United States considers itself as having no concern. It is the loss of that property by citizens of the United States, through an arbitrary act of Sweden, and not any advantage which Sweden did or did not derive from that act, which constitutes the ground of the present claim for compensation. To whatever object those proceeds were applied, the injury sustained by the American citizens remains the same. Still, however, the American Government might be inclined to regard the violence with less painful feelings, had it been required for the promotion of some object essential to Sweden, and not gratuitously committed for an object, as his excellency asserts, entirely foreign to her particular interests.

If, contrary to all the evidence and argument which the undersigned has now presented, there should, as his excellency states, have been certain express conditions imposed by France, in raising the sequester, (or in making the transfer, as his excellency is pleased to call it,) requiring that the sums produced by the sale of the merchandise should be applied in placing Pomerania in a state of defence, his excellency will, it is presumed, feel the propriety of communicating these conditions to the American Government, in the terms in which they were originally expressed. Such a communication might, at least, have an effect in diminishing the impression which now exists, that the sale of merchandise was the spontaneous act of Sweden. But even these conditions, however formal and categorical they might have been, which are relied on as an apology for the proceedings of the Swedish Government, could not be allowed to discharge that Government from its obligation to provide an indemnity to the American citizens whom these proceedings injured. If Sweden had, in fact, only a choice of evils, and elected the less in order to avoid the greater, she was certainly bound, in consequence of this election, to repair the wrong she inflicted on others for her own safety or accommodation. No necessity can be admitted of a nature sufficiently imperious to exonerate her from this responsibility, excepting that which resulted from the actual exercise of a foreign force, which she could not resist, and which, in fact, wrested from her the possession and control of the property which had been placed under the safeguard of her power and good faith. The incontrovertible facts that the orders for the sale were issued at Stockholm, and that the Government of Sweden was at least the unresisting agent, if not the principal, in this transaction, forbid a belief in even the possibility of such a necessity. If, indeed, those orders were not entirely voluntary on the part of Sweden, they could only have been constrained by an attention to her own interests, and by the conviction of the expediency of making a partial and minor sacrifice for the preservation of an object of more general and vital importance; and her honor could never have permitted her to suppose that such a sacrifice for such an object could be made at the expense of others, and not at her own. It was her obvious duty to make an adequate compensation to those who had suffered by the sacrifice as soon as she possessed the means—and she has long possessed them.

Where his excellency obtained his information that France was the ally of America in 1810 and 1811, the unhappy epoch of the seizure and sale of the American merchandise at Stralsund, the undersigned is at a loss to conjecture. The United States never disguise or conceal their relations with foreign Powers; they have no secret treaties for the purpose of eluding a distrustful enemy, or of surprising a confiding friend. Their whole history is open to the world, and, had his excellency consulted it, he would have known that America never was the ally of imperial France. If the United States were, unfortunately, as his excellency intimates, either directly or indirectly, sometimes the victim of the disastrous influence of France, they never were, for a moment, the agents of her vexatious domination.

The undersigned has now had the honor to present to his excellency, concisely, a transaction, with the essential circumstances of which his excellency acknowledges him to be acquainted. It belongs to his excellency, should the statement of these circumstances be erroneous, to furnish the facts necessary for its correction. It is impossible for the Government of the United States, with all the information which it now possesses, to believe that such facts can be furnished; and, if they cannot, his excellency himself must admit that the plea of necessity, founded on French compulsion, for the sale of the American merchandise at Stralsund, is without even a plausible pretext to support it.

On the 12th of July, 1811, that merchandise was, by the consent of France, to terminate the sequester, placed at the exclusive disposition of Sweden, and an unqualified power thus given of restoring it to the rightful owners. This power remained unimpaired by any new demand of the French Government for more than a month—a period amply sufficient to have reinstated the citizens of the United States in the full possession of their property, and to have enabled them to rescue it from any future danger with which it might have been menaced by the arbitrary and capricious policy of France. To have merely neglected, for a single day, thus to have exercised that power, would, it is believed, have justly made the Government of Sweden responsible for all the consequences; but not merely to have neglected, during more than an entire month, to restore the property, but to have employed that period and abused that power exclusively for the conversion of that property to its own use, exhibits a course of conduct on the part of that Government for which the mere pecuniary indemnity now demanded would appear to afford but an inadequate satisfaction.

The undersigned has confined himself in this note principally to those topics which it appeared to him proper to discuss, in reply to the communication of his excellency of the 27th of October. He takes the liberty, however, in order to avoid repetition, to refer his excellency to the note of the undersigned, of the 6th of September, 1816, which has hitherto remained without an answer, and of which his excellency, in his communication just mentioned, has not taken the slightest notice.

The undersigned has felt it to be his duty to state to his excellency the views of the Government of the United States on this subject, with perspicuity and frankness, and unrestrained by any repugnance to differ, in fact or inference, from his excellency; and this course he has pursued with the less hesitation, as he confidently believed that it would not be ascribed to a want of becoming decorum, but to a regard to truth, and especially to the frequent declarations of his excellency that this transaction was not originally of his cognizance, and that he was, therefore, unacquainted with its details.

It is, indeed, to be regretted that the propositions made by the Swedish Government to the special agent of the claimants had not been of so satisfactory a nature as to have rendered this correspondence unnecessary. The undersigned had been encouraged to hope, from the conversations which he had lately had the honor to hold with His Majesty, that the note of his excellency would have contained some specific offer, dictated either by a regard to justice, or by some other honorable and friendly feeling, which should have put this subject of altercation at rest. The Government of the United States would still regard with complacency any arrangement with the claimants which should prevent the necessity of all further official discussion, and leave the harmony between the two nations without the smallest circumstance to disturb it. But his excellency must be aware that, should the Government of the United States, in the absence of such an arrangement, and in the full contemplation of the real state of the question, as here presented, desist from its demand for indemnity, it would fail in its duty to those who have a right to its protection. The undersigned has been, therefore, specially instructed to urge this demand, and, "while reminding the Swedish Government of its unquestioned justice, and of its amount, so insignificant to the interest of Sweden, yet so distressing to the sufferers, to give notice that, in forbearing to press it in a more peremptory manner, it is by no means the intention of the Government of the United States to abandon it."

The undersigned has prevailed on himself to reply from Vienna to a note which his excellency addressed to him at Berlin; but, as this course is justified on the present occasion by peculiar considerations only, it will not be hereafter pursued. His excellency is, therefore, requested to address his future communications for the Government of the United States to Christopher Hughes, Esquire, who is charged with the affairs of its legation at Stockholm, during the absence of the minister.

The undersigned has the honor to repeat to his excellency the assurance of his highest consideration.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Copy of a memorial of the merchants of Stralsund to the Swedish Royal Regency.

The humble memorial of sundry within-named merchants of Stralsund, for themselves and their constituents, concerning the restoration of the colonial merchandises which were under sequestration, and the stopping the public sale thereof.

Informed, partly by public report, but especially by the publication of your excellency and the honorable Royal Regency, of the 2d of August, current year, that the colonial merchandises which are lying in the royal warehouses under sequestration are to be publicly sold, we find ourselves obliged most humbly to lay before your excellency and the honorable Royal Regency our reasons why we hope that you will be pleased, with respect to the colonial merchandises belonging to us and our constituents, which have been hitherto under sequestration, to let an exception take place from your measure announced in the newspapers.

Nothing agrees better with the principles of a sound political economy than liberty and security of commerce. Justice requires, unconditionally, that nobody shall be punished for an action which was hitherto permitted, and the prohibition whereof has never been published. Confiding in these principles, we and our commercial friends have ordered hither a quantity of colonial merchandises, which, after their arrival, were put under sequestration. Hard as this measure in itself already is, we could quietly look at it, as the same was only provisional, and we fully confided in the justice of our cause; but, as it now seems the actual confiscation of the merchandises and the sale thereof are intended, then our and our constituents' interests will be too much injured that we should be able to remain quiet at that too.

All these merchandises have arrived here either from Sweden, under the authorization of the Swedish public authorities, or direct from North America, a state friendly connected with Sweden.

All the papers which concern them, as well as the ships which brought them hither, have been examined by the royal licent here, and have been found blameless; and your excellency, and the honorable Royal Regency yourselves, have granted the permission to enter and unload. Every thing herein has been done on our part publicly and legally. No prohibition opposed us herein; for the better security, we procured yet the special permission of the highest authority of the country, and we have paid, even already, part of the duties on these merchandises; and should now these merchandises nevertheless be confiscated and publicly sold for the benefit of the fiscus?

If we were yet in the hands of an enemy, such a measure would certainly not appear so very extraordinary to us, for an enemy only observes his own interest, and not that of the conquered country; but, in a state of peace, when the force of armies gives place to the power of the laws again, we cannot make ourselves familiar with the idea that the state itself should proceed in this manner against its own subjects, and against friends, who, under the protection of the laws, and in confidence upon the legality and publicity of their actions, thought themselves secure.

The Swedish Government, whose steps are always guided by mildness and justice, will certainly, when the matter is once put in a proper light, remain faithful to their mode of proceeding hitherto observed; and the just sentiments of your excellency and of the honorable Royal Regency are known to us by too many instances that we should not hope, with full confidence, that you will make use of all means to avert a measure so detrimental to us and our constituents; and we therefore venture, with the fullest confidence of a happy result, to pray your excellency and the honorable Royal Regency most humbly and most earnestly not to suffer the sale of the colonial merchandises belonging to us and our constituents, which have been hitherto under sequestration, to take place, but put the same to our own free disposition; or, at least, by your gracious interposition with the higher instance, to procure the same.

STRALSUND, August 6, 1811.

I conform with the original.

J. A. IKE,
Royal Assessor and Archivarian to the honorable Royal Regency.

Copy of the reply to the foregoing.

Upon the petition of the commercial counsellor, Mr. Barnstedt, the alderman Evenhagen Schluter, the alderman Ineal, for himself, and attorney for the merchant Isleremond, and the merchants Wewetzen, widow Glasser Beurniss, and J. C. Muggenberg, for themselves and their constituents, for the restitution of the colonial merchandises put under sequestration, and the prevention of the public sale thereof, it is decreed:

Whereas, according to the newest strict orders from His Royal Majesty, there shall be proceeded immediately with the sale of all the colonial merchandises which have been sequestrated here, their petition cannot be granted, but the Royal Regency will make report to the Royal Majesty of the reclamation entered by the memorialists, and the money received from the sale of the now claimed merchandises shall be lodged with the royal chamber until his determination, in order that, in case the same shall be favorable for them, it may immediately be paid over to them.

STRALSUND, August 9, 1811.

Decree for the above-mentioned merchants is conformable with the original.

16th CONGRESS.] No. 319. [2d SESSION.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE SIXTEENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

COMMUNICATED, NOVEMBER 15, 1820.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In communicating to you a just view of public affairs, at the commencement of your present labors, I do it with great satisfaction, because, taking all circumstances into consideration which claim attention, I see much cause to rejoice in the felicity of our situation. In making this remark, I do not wish to be understood to imply that an unvaried prosperity is to be seen in every interest of this great community. In the progress of a nation inhabiting a territory of such vast extent and great variety of climate, every portion of which is engaged in foreign commerce, and liable to be affected in some degree by the changes which occur in the condition and regulations of foreign countries, it would be strange if the produce of our soil, and the industry and enterprise of our fellow-citizens, received, at all times, and in every quarter, a uniform and equal encouragement. This would be more than we would have a right to expect under circumstances the most favorable. Pressures on certain interests, it is admitted, have been felt: but, allowing to these their greatest extent, they detract but little from the force of the remark already made. In forming a just estimate of our present situation, it is proper to look at the whole—in the outline as well as in the detail. A free, virtuous, and enlightened people know well the great principles and causes on which their happiness depends; and even those who suffer most, occasionally, in their transitory concerns, find great relief under their sufferings from the blessings which they otherwise enjoy, and in the consoling and animating hope which they administer. From whence do these pressures come? Not from a Government which is founded by, administered for, and supported by, the people; we trace them to the peculiar character of the epoch in which we live, and to the extraordinary occurrences which have signalized it. The convulsions with which several of the Powers of Europe have been shaken, and the long and destructive wars in which all were engaged, with their sudden transition to a state of peace, presenting, in the first instance, unusual encouragement to our commerce, and withdrawing it, in the second, even within its wonted limit, could not fail to be sensibly felt here. The station, too, which we had to support through this long conflict, compelled, as we were, finally, to become a party to it with a principal Power, and to make great exertions suffer heavy losses, and to contract considerable debts disturbing the ordinary course of affairs, by augmenting to a vast amount the circulating medium, and thereby elevating at one time the price of every article above a just standard, and depressing it at another below it, had likewise its due effect.

It is manifest that the pressures of which we complain have proceeded, in a great measure, from these causes. When, then, we take into view the prosperous and happy condition of our country, in all the great circumstances which constitute the felicity of a nation—every individual in the full enjoyment of all his rights; the Union blessed with plenty, and rapidly rising to greatness, under a National Government which operates with complete effect in every part, without being felt in any, except by the ample protection which it affords; and under State Governments, which perform their equal share, according to a wise distribution of power between them, in promoting the public happiness, it is impossible to behold so gratifying, so glorious a spectacle, without being penetrated with the most profound and grateful acknowledgments to the Supreme Author of all good for such manifold and inestimable blessings. Deeply impressed with these sentiments, I cannot regard the pressures to which I have adverted otherwise than in the light of mild and instructive admonitions, warning us of dangers to be shunned in future; teaching us lessons of economy, corresponding with the simplicity and purity of our institutions, and best adapted to their support; evincing the connexion and dependance which the various parts of our happy Union have on each other, thereby augmenting daily our social incorporation, and adding, by its strong ties, new strength and vigor to the political; opening a wider range, and with new encouragement, to the industry and enterprise of our fellow-citizens at home and abroad; and more especially by the multiplied proofs which it has accumulated of the great perfection of our most excellent system of government, the powerful instrument, in the hands of an all-merciful Creator, in securing to us these blessings.

Happy as our situation is, it does not exempt us from solicitude and care for the future; on the contrary, as the blessings which we enjoy are great, proportionably great should be our vigilance, zeal, and activity to preserve them. Foreign wars may again expose us to new wrongs, which would impose on us new duties, for which we ought to be prepared. The state of Europe is unsettled, and how long peace may be preserved is altogether uncertain. In addition to which, we have interests of our own to adjust, which will require particular attention. A correct view of our relations with each Power will enable you to form a just idea of existing difficulties, and of the measures of precaution best adapted to them.

Respecting our relations with Spain, nothing explicit can now be communicated. On the adjournment of Congress, in May last, the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid was instructed to inform the Government of Spain that, if His Catholic Majesty should then ratify the treaty, this Government would accept the ratification so far as to submit to the decision of the Senate the question whether such ratification should be received in exchange for that of the United States heretofore given. By letters from the minister of the United States to the Secretary of State, it appears that a communication, in conformity with his instructions, had been made to the Government of Spain, and that the Cortes had the subject under consideration. The result of the deliberation of that body, which is daily expected, will be made known to Congress as soon as it is received. The friendly sentiment which was expressed on the part of the United States in the message of the 9th of May last is still entertained for Spain. Among the causes of regret, however, which are inseparable from the delay attending this transaction, it is proper to state that satisfactory information has been received that measures have been recently adopted by designing persons to convert certain parts of the province of East Florida into depots for the reception of foreign goods, from whence to smuggle them into the United States. By opening a port within the limits of Florida, immediately on our boundary, where there was no settlement, the object could not be misunderstood. An early accommodation of differences will, it is hoped, prevent all such fraudulent and pernicious practices, and place the relations of the two countries on a very amicable and permanent basis.

The commercial relations between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies and on this continent have undergone no change; the British Government still preferring to leave that commerce under the restriction heretofore imposed on it on each side. It is satisfactory to recollect that the restraints resorted to by the United States were defensive only, intended to prevent a monopoly, under British regulations, in favor of Great Britain; as it likewise is to know that the experiment is advancing in a spirit of amity between the parties.

The question depending between the United States and Great Britain respecting the construction of the first article of the treaty of Ghent has been referred by both Governments to the decision of the Emperor of Russia, who has accepted the umpirage.

An attempt has been made with the Government of France to regulate, by treaty, the commerce between the two countries, on the principle of reciprocity and equality. By the last communication from the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, to whom full power had been given, we learn that the negotiation had been commenced there; but serious difficulties having occurred, the French Government had resolved to transfer it to the United States; for which purpose the minister plenipotentiary of France had been ordered to repair to this city, and whose arrival might soon be expected. It is hoped that this important interest may be arranged on just conditions, and in a manner equally satisfactory to both parties. It is submitted to Congress to decide, until such arrangement is made, how far it may be proper, on the principle of the act of the last session, which augmented the tonnage duty on French vessels, to adopt other measures for carrying more completely into effect the policy of that act.

The act referred to, which imposed new tonnage on French vessels, having been in force from and after the 1st day of July, it has happened that several vessels of that nation, which had been despatched from France before its existence was known, have entered the ports of the United States, and been subject to its operation without that previous notice which the general spirit of our laws gives to individuals in similar cases. The object of that law having been merely to countervail the inequalities which existed to the disadvantage of the United States in their commercial intercourse with France, it is submitted, also, to the consideration of Congress, whether, in the spirit of amity and conciliation which it is no less the inclination than the policy of the United States to preserve in their intercourse with other Powers, it may not be proper to extend relief to the individuals interested in those cases, by exempting from the operation of the law all those vessels which have entered our ports without having had the means of previously knowing the existence of the additional duty.

The contest between Spain and the colonies, according to the most authentic information, is maintained by the latter with improved success. The unfortunate divisions which were known to exist some time since at Buenos Ayres, it is understood, still prevail. In no part of South America has Spain made any impression on the colonies, while in many parts, and particularly in Venezuela and New Granada, the colonies have gained strength, and acquired reputation, both for the management of the war, in which they have been successful, and for the order of the internal administration. The late change in the Government of Spain, by the re-establishment of the constitution of 1812, is an event which promises to be favorable to the revolution. Under the authority of the Cortes, the Congress of Angostura was invited to open a negotiation for the settlement of differences between the parties; to which it was replied that they would willingly open the negotiation, provided the acknowledgment of their independence was made its basis, but not otherwise. Of further proceedings between them we are uninformed. No facts are known to this Government to warrant the belief that any of the Powers of Europe will take part in the contest; whence it may be inferred, considering all circumstances which must have weight in producing the result, that an adjustment will finally take place on the basis proposed by the colonies. To promote that result by friendly counsels with other Powers, including Spain herself, has been the uniform policy of this Government.

In looking to the internal concerns of our country, you will, I am persuaded, derive much satisfaction from a view of the several objects to which, in the discharge of your official duties, your attention will be drawn. Among these, none holds a more important place than the public revenue, from the direct operation of the power by which it is raised on the people, and by its influence in giving effect to every other power of the Government. The revenue depends on the resources of the country, and the facility by which the amount required is raised is a strong proof of the extent of the resources and of the efficiency of the Government. A few prominent facts will place this great interest in a just light before you. On the 30th of September, 1815, the funded and floating debt of the United States was estimated at $119,635,558. If to this sum be added the amount of five per cent. stock subscribed to the Bank of the United States, the amount of Mississippi stock, and of the stock which was issued subsequently to that date, the balances ascertained to be due to certain States for military services, and to individuals for supplies furnished and services rendered during the late war, the public debt may be estimated as amounting, at that date, and as afterwards liquidated, to $158,713,049. On the 30th September, 1820, it amounted to $91,993,883, having been reduced in that interval, by payments, $66,879,165. During this term, the expenses of the Government of the United States were likewise defrayed in every branch of the civil, military, and naval establishments; the public edifices in this city have been rebuilt, with considerable additions; extensive fortifications have been commenced, and are in a train of execution; permanent arsenals and magazines have been erected in various parts of the Union; our navy has been considerably augmented; and the ordnance, munitions of war, and stores of the army and navy, which were much exhausted during the war, have been replenished. By the discharge of so large a proportion of the public debt, and the execution of such extensive and important operations, in so short a time, a just estimate may be formed of the great extent of our national resources. The demonstration is the more complete and gratifying when it is recollected that the direct tax and excise were repealed soon after the termination of the late war, and that the revenue applied to these purposes has been derived almost wholly from other sources.

The receipts into the Treasury from every source to 30th of September last have amounted to $16,794,107 66, whilst the public expenditures to the same period amounted to $16,871,534 72, leaving in the Treasury on that day a sum estimated at $1,950,000. For the probable receipts of the following year, I refer you to the statement which will be transmitted from the Treasury.

The sum of $3,000,000, authorized to be raised by loan, by an act of the last session of Congress, has been obtained upon terms advantageous to the Government, indicating not only an increased confidence in the faith of the nation, but the existence of a large amount of capital seeking that mode of investment at a rate of interest not exceeding five per cent. per annum.

It is proper to add that there is now due to the Treasury, for the sale of public lands, $22,996,545. In bringing this subject to view, I consider it my duty to submit to Congress whether it may not be advisable to extend to the purchasers of these lands, in consideration of the unfavorable change which has occurred since the sales, a reasonable indulgence. It is known that the purchases were made when the price of every article had risen to its greatest height, and that the instalments are becoming due at a period of great depression. It is presumed that some plan may be devised by the wisdom of Congress, compatible with the public interest, which would afford great relief to these purchasers.

Considerable progress has been made during the present season in examining the coast and its various bays and other inlets, in the collection of materials, and in the construction of fortifications for the defence of the Union, at several of the positions at which it has been decided to erect such works. At Mobile Point and Dauphin island, and at the Rigolets, leading to Lake Pontchartrain, materials to a considerable amount have been collected, and all the necessary preparations made for the commencement of the works. At Old Point Comfort, at the mouth of James river, and at the Rip Raps, on the opposite shore, in the Chesapeake bay, materials to a vast amount have been collected, and at Old Point some progress has been made in the construction of the fortification, which is on a very extensive scale. The work at Fort Washington, on this river, will be completed early in the next spring; and that on the Pea Patch, in the Delaware, in the course of the next season. Fort Diamond, at the Narrows, in the harbor of New York, will be finished this year. The works at Boston, New York, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, and Niagara, have been, in part, repaired; and the coast of North Carolina, extending south to Cape Fear, has been examined, as have likewise other parts of the coast eastward of Boston. Great exertions have been made to push forward these works with the utmost despatch possible; but when their extent is considered, with the important purposes for which they are intended—the defence of the whole coast, and, in consequence, of the whole interior, and that they are to last for ages—it will be manifest that a well-digested plan, founded on military principles, connecting the whole together, combining security with economy, could not be prepared without repeated examinations of the most exposed and difficult parts, and that it would also take considerable time to collect the materials at the several points where they would be required. From all the light that has been shed on this subject, I am satisfied that every favorable anticipation which has been formed of this great undertaking will be verified; and that, when completed, it will afford very great, if not complete protection to our Atlantic frontier, in the event of another war—a protection sufficient to counterbalance, in a single campaign, with an enemy powerful at sea, the expense of all these works, without taking into the estimate the saving of the lives of so many of our citizens, the protection of our towns and other property, or the tendency of such works to prevent war.

Our military positions have been maintained at Belle Point, on the Arkansas, at Council Bluff, on the Missouri, at St. Peter's, on the Mississippi, and at Green bay, on the Upper Lakes. Commodious barracks have already been erected at most of these posts, with such works as were necessary for their defence. Progress has also been made in opening communications between them, and in raising supplies at each, for the support of the troops by their own labor, particularly those most remote. With the Indians peace has been preserved, and a progress made in carrying into effect the act of Congress making an appropriation for their civilization, with the prospect of favorable results. As connected equally with both these objects, our trade with those tribes is thought to merit the attention of Congress. In their original state, game is their sustenance and war their occupation; and, if they find no employment from civilized Powers, they destroy each other. Left to themselves, their extirpation is inevitable. By a judicious regulation of our trade with them, we supply their wants, administer to their comforts, and gradually, as the game retires, draw them to us. By maintaining posts far in the interior, we acquire a more thorough and direct control over them, without which it is confidently believed that a complete change in their manners can never be accomplished. By such posts, aided by a proper regulation of our trade with them, and a judicious civil administration over them, to be provided for by law, we shall, it is presumed, be enabled, not only to protect our own settlements from their savage incursions, and preserve peace among the several tribes, but accomplish, also, the great purpose of their civilization.

Considerable progress has also been made in the construction of ships of war, some of which have been launched in the course of the present year.

Our peace with the Powers on the coast of Barbary has been preserved, but we owe it altogether to the presence of our squadron in the Mediterranean. It has been found equally necessary to employ some of our vessels for the protection of our commerce in the Indian sea, the Pacific, and along the Atlantic coast. The interests which we have depending in those quarters, which have been much improved of late, are of great extent, and of high importance to the nation, as well as to the parties concerned, and would undoubtedly suffer if such protection were not extended to them. In execution of the law of the last session for the suppression of the slave trade, some of our public ships have also been employed on the coast of Africa, where several captures have already been made of vessels engaged in that disgraceful traffic.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, November 14, 1820.

16th CONGRESS.] No. 320. [2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN: EXECUTION OF THE TREATY OF GHENT.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 3, 1821.

The select committee, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States respecting the progress and expenditures of the commissioners under the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent, respectfully submit the following report:

The fifth article of the treaty of Ghent provides for ascertaining the boundary from the source of the St. Croix to the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, and also from that corner, westwardly, between the United States and Canada, until the line strikes the Iroquois, now called the St. Lawrence, in latitude forty-five degrees north.

Mr. Van Ness is the commissioner of the United States for this section of the boundary line.

The sixth article of the treaty of Ghent provides for ascertaining the boundary line, westwardly, from the above-mentioned point on the St. Lawrence, through Lakes Ontario, Erie, and Huron, and their water communications to Lake Superior.

Mr. Porter, of New York, is the commissioner on the part of the United States assigned to this section.

By the seventh article of that treaty, it is stipulated that when the commissioners appointed under the sixth article shall have performed the duties required by that article, then they are authorized to determine the boundary line from the water communication between Lakes Huron and Superior to the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods: the whole boundary to be established agreeably to the provisions of the treaty of 1783.

Mr. Porter will, of course, become the American commissioner, when he shall have finished the duties required by the sixth article of the treaty of Ghent.

By their resolution of the 21st of November last, the House requested the President of the United States to lay before them information respecting the progress made by the commissioners in establishing the boundary above mentioned, and the expenses already incurred. With his message of the 14th of December last, the President transmitted a report of the Secretary of State, containing all the information in the possession of that Department requested by that resolution.

So far as relates to the boundary from the head of the St. Croix to the St. Lawrence, it seems that no information had been afforded to the Government at the date of the President's message. Mr. Van Ness, in his letter of the 25th of November last, observes, "with respect to the progress which has been made by the commission, I understand the agent has already given to the Government all the information which it would be in my power to communicate." He also mentions that "the commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty have held two sessions the present year;" but there is no disclosure of past exertions or future prospects in the discharge of the duties assigned to him.

Since that time, the committee have been furnished with a communication from Mr. Van Ness, (marked No. 18 in the manuscript documents attending this report,) dated January 6, 1821, in which he observes that the next meeting is to be held on the 14th of next May, and that the commissioners intend at that meeting to continue in session until they have decided upon all questions submitted to them by the treaty. To this letter the committee would call the attention of the House, as containing much information of the progress which the commissioners under the fifth article have made. No satisfactory reason, however, is assigned why earlier information has not been given to the Government. The committee have not seen any occasion for secrecy on the part of the commissioners. They were appointed to ascertain certain facts which were supposed to exist. A disclosure of their proceedings would neither change the position of the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, nor alter the forty-fifth degree of north latitude.

The information of the progress of the commissioners under the sixth article of the treaty of Ghent is found in the letters of Mr. Delafield, dated October 13th and November 1st, and in one from Mr. Porter, of December 2d, 1820, which are among the printed documents. These gentlemen express a belief that the surveys under the last mentioned article will be completed during the next season. But it appears that no part of the boundary is finally settled. Whether it will be done next season, must depend on the termination of the surveys and the agreement of the commissioners. Any event which should prevent the agent or commissioner on either side from attending to his duties would probably delay a decision for another year; and should the calculations of the American commissioner and agent prove correct, they will have devoted about six years to the performance of this part of their duty.

After this they will be ready to turn their attention to the boundary from the water communication between Huron and Superior to the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods, according to the seventh article of the treaty.

It is observed in the letter of Mr. Porter, above referred to, that "the seventh article of the treaty relates to a country which is comparatively of little importance, and a system of operations is proposed to be adopted for designating the boundary, which will greatly reduce both the time and expense of its execution." What this system of operations may be is not disclosed. It is presumed, however, to be such a system as will not endanger the rights of the nation, while it is a subject of regret that it had not been sooner applied.

From an examination of the printed documents, it appears that the sum of $194,137 63 has been drawn from the Treasury on account of the two commissions under the treaty which have been mentioned.

Mr. Van Ness, as commissioner under the fifth article, has received - - -	$82,444 00
Mr. Bradley, as agent, - - - - - - - -	16,655 10

Of this sum, $35,666 13 has been expended by the agent, and the accounts adjusted by the American and British commissioners; but the statements afforded are in such general terms that explanation is required to determine how far they could be approved by this Government. The remainder of the sum drawn under the fifth article remains without evidence of its disbursement, except what may be retained for the commissioner's salary.

Mr. Porter, the commissioner under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty, has drawn from the Treasury $65,315 95. No part has been accounted for. He has transmitted statements of expenditures to the amount of $47,263 09, exclusive of his salary. He informs the Secretary of State that "the vouchers will be transmitted to Washington on the closing of the sixth article."

Mr. Hawkins, the late agent under the sixth and seventh articles, has drawn from the Treasury, -	$28,891 80
Received from Mr. Porter, - - - - - - - -	1,815 95
Amounting to the sum of - -	30,707 75
Statements of expenditures, which yet are not adjusted, are furnished, including salary while employed, amounting to - - - - - - - -	18,548 97
Balance against Mr. Hawkins, - -	$12,158 78

It has not been explained to the committee why the persons employed under the treaty have not accounted for the moneys which have been drawn from the Treasury. The nation is as deeply interested in the proper application of its funds expended under a treaty as under any other law. It is important, also, that the Government should have a knowledge of past expenditures, that it may properly provide for future wants.

Agreeably to the resolution of the House of January 3, the committee have considered the expediency of fixing, by law, the salaries of the commissioners and agents under the treaty of Ghent.

In order to come to a conclusion on the subject of that resolution, recurrence must be had to the provisions of that treaty. By the eighth article it is stipulated "that the said commissioners shall, respectively, be paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the contracting parties, such agreement being to be settled at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; and all other expenses attending the said commission shall be defrayed equally by the two parties." It is clear that the treaty does not fix the amount of compensation which those officers are to receive. It declares that the commissioners shall be paid in such manner as shall be agreed upon by the two contracting parties. The contracting parties must be understood to be the Governments of the United States and Great Britain. If this opinion of the committee be correct, it would seem to require an exercise of the same power, on the part of this Government at least, to agree upon the manner in which the commissioners should be paid, as was required to form the treaty itself.

The committee requested the Secretary of State to inform them whether any agreement had been made between the two Governments at the time of the ratification of the treaty, or since, as to the salaries of the commissioners, and whether any communication had taken place between the two Governments on the subject of that or any other expense attending the commission.

The answer to these and to other inquiries, deemed material by the committee, is contained in the manuscript documents attending this report. No. 8, to which the committee would call the attention of the House, is a paper signed by Mr. Baker, containing the evidence of an exchange of the ratifications of the treaty. This paper contains the following expressions, viz: "At the same time Mr. Monroe (acting Secretary of State) expressed the willingness of the Government of the United States to arrange the payment of the commissioners to be appointed in pursuance of the treaty on the same principles as were observed in carrying into execution the treaty of 1794 between the same Powers, that is, the expense to be equally borne by the two Governments; to which arrangement the undersigned consented."

This is the only document relating to this subject which the committee have received. It appears, therefore, to the committee, that the two contracting parties have not settled the salaries nor amount of compensation which the commissioners or agents shall receive for their respective services.

It would seem, therefore, that each Government was at liberty to make such allowance to those of its own officers as should be equitable and just.

By the letter of the Secretary of State (No. 1 of the manuscript documents) the House will be fully informed what compensation has been allowed heretofore by the Executive Government to the commissioners and agents. That letter contains a full explanation of the principles by which the Executive has been governed in regulating such compensation.

Congress having made general appropriations for carrying into execution the provisions of the treaty of Ghent, without designating the amount for any particular service, the expenditure was left, in a great measure, to the discretion of the Executive. Such salaries were then authorized as had been allowed under the treaty of 1794 for similar services, which had received the approbation of Congress. But, as this Government is under no obligation, by any provisions of the treaty, to allow any definite compensation to those officers, they cannot derive their present salaries from any higher authority than a law of Congress. It is considered by the committee that Congress has the same power to increase or diminish any future allowances in this as in ordinary cases, where salaries are regulated by its laws.

The salaries of the commissioners under the treaty of 1794 were a subject of negotiation. The arrangements then made are referred to, as has been noticed, as principles for the execution of the treaty of Ghent in this particular point, after having received the sanction of Congress.

Mr. Van Ness, in his letter of the 25th November, (contained among the printed papers,) observes that the British commissioners receive £1,200 sterling; and he considers it is in accordance with the treaty that the American commissioners should receive the same salary, as they are the joint officers of the two Governments.

The committee consider the opinion of Lord Grenville is correct, as expressed in No. 3 of the manuscript papers. He observed to our minister, when in the discussion of this point, that "the clause in the treaty of 1794 did not imply that the payment of all the commissioners should be the same." It is considered that equality of salaries in this case is no more necessary than that American and British ministers should receive an equal compensation. The same may be said of the agents. This is the opinion of one of the American commissioners, Mr. Porter. In his letter of December 2d, (among the printed documents,) with great propriety he observes, in relation to the compensation of Mr. Delafield, the acting agent under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty, that "I believe the board of which I am a member has heretofore considered that neither considerations of justice nor national etiquette required that the compensation of the two agents should be the same."

It is observed in the statements of expenditures exhibited by Mr. Porter and Mr. Hawkins that charges are made for personal expenses, exclusive of their salaries. By recurring to the laws which have been mentioned by the Secretary of State, and considered by him as the basis of present allowances, it is provided that the compensation of commissioners who shall serve in the United States shall not exceed the rate of $4,444 per annum. It would seem as just that the judges of the Supreme Court, or the officers of the Departments of Government, should charge their personal expenses while discharging their respective duties, as that this privilege should be allowed to commissioners and agents.

Nos. 9 and 15 of the manuscript documents contain the sentiments of the Executive respecting the expense and dilatory progress of the several commissions. No. 11 expresses the feelings of the British Government on the same subject. It is believed that these papers speak the language of this nation, while they afford satisfactory evidence that the Executive has exerted all the power he possesses in urging forward a prompt and faithful execution of the treaty.

The committee, however, are of opinion that, had particular instructions, as far as practicable, been issued to the commissioners and agents respecting the proper objects and amount of expenditure, and required a frequent adjustment of their accounts, their proceedings would have been rendered less expensive.

It is considered that the salaries now allowed are far greater, in proportion to the services performed, than those which are usually given to any officers of Government; that they are subject to the authority and control of Congress, and ought to be reduced.

It is also considered that the commissioners and agents should be required to render an account for the public moneys they may have received without delay; and while they were allowed, as a salary, the sum of $4,444, it should be in full of all personal expenses.

For these purposes the committee ask leave to report a bill.

SIR: BURLINGTON, January 6, 1821.

Having just received a copy of the message of the President of the United States to the House of Representatives, on the subject of the boundary lines to be settled under the treaty of Ghent, and finding nothing in it that relates to the progress made by the commission under the fifth article of the treaty, I feel it my duty to trouble you with a further communication.

In the letter which I had the honor to address to you from New York on the 25th November last, I said nothing on that point, because, as I stated therein, I understood the agent had already given to the Government all the information which it would be in my power to communicate. That such was the fact, and that you had been pleased to express yourself entirely satisfied with the course pursued by the officers appointed on the part of the United States, as also had the President, was stated to me by the agent in November last, after a visit made to Washington for the express purpose of giving information and making explanations in relation to the proceedings of the commission.

I had, therefore, no reason to doubt that the President was in possession of sufficient information to state to the House of Representatives the progress which had been made in the execution of the fifth article of the treaty. But, it now appearing that the President could not have so considered it, I hasten to inform you that all the surveys and explorations relating to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, as designated in the treaty of 1783, and to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, which are essential to the discussion and decision of these two contested and important points, and the observations on the parallel of latitude between Connecticut river and the Iroquois river, which are necessary to a determination of that line, have been completed.

The obstacles to be encountered in making these surveys have been great and numerous. The whole extent of country from the source of the river St. Croix, north, to the river St. Lawrence, and between that line and the head of Connecticut river, is one vast and entire wilderness, inhabited by no human being, except a few savages, and, in one spot, a few Frenchmen. The services performed have been extremely arduous, and the difficulty and expense of transportation, and of subsisting the persons engaged in the work, have necessarily been very considerable.

That a knowledge of the different ranges of high lands, and of the sources and destination of the principal streams of water in the tract of country alluded to, derived from actual and proper observations and surveys, is indispensable to a just execution of the fifth article of the treaty, will not, I think, be questioned; particularly as the claims of the respective parties are much at variance, and in view of a possibility that the case may be ultimately referred to a foreign Power.

All the reports and plans of the last season's work will soon be completed and delivered to the agents, so as to enable them to be prepared to submit their arguments to the board at its next meeting on the 14th day of May next—a period as early as it will be practicable for the agent of His Britannic Majesty to come from St. John's, in New Brunswick, the place of his residence, to New York, the place of meeting. The commissioners intend at that meeting to continue in session until they shall have decided upon all questions submitted to them by the treaty. If they agree, there will only remain some running and marking of lines at a very diminished expense. But, if they should differ in their opinions, they will make separate reports, and the commission will be at an end in that way.

As to the contingent expenses, it may be remarked that they have thus far been enhanced in consequence of the performance of two distinct services at the same time—the surveys to the eastward of Connecticut river, and the astronomical operations on the parallel of latitude. But by this there will, in the end, be a saving, as, in hastening the completion of the whole business, the salary offices will the sooner expire.

I cannot close this letter without an expression of my confidence that it will not escape the observation of any person that, in a case like this, many things may not be fully understood and approved by those not immediately acquainted with all the proceedings of the commission, which, if the individuals concerned were on the spot, might be susceptible of explanations perfectly satisfactory, but which cannot be anticipated by those individuals.

I rely upon your kindness, sir, to transmit to the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States a copy of this communication as soon after its receipt as shall be convenient.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, your most obedient servant,

C. P. VAN. NESS.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

16th CONGRESS.] No. 321. [2d SESSION.

SPAIN: FINAL RATIFICATION OF THE TREATY OF 1819.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 14, 1821.

To the Senate of the United States: WASHINGTON, February 13, 1821.

The ratification by the Spanish Government of the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States and Spain, signed on the 22d of February, 1819, and on the 24th of that month ratified on the part of the United States, has been received by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of that Power at this place, who has given notice that he is ready to exchange the ratifications.

By the sixteenth article of that treaty, it was stipulated that the ratifications should be exchanged within six months from the day of its signature; which time having elapsed before the ratification of Spain was given, a copy and translation thereof are now transmitted to the Senate for their advice and consent, to receive it in exchange for the ratification of the United States, heretofore executed.

The treaty was submitted to the consideration of the Cortes of that kingdom before its ratification, which was finally given with their assent and sanction. The correspondence between the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs and the minister of the United States at Madrid, on that occasion, is also herewith communicated to the Senate;* together with a memorandum by the Secretary of State of his conference with the Spanish envoy here, yesterday, when that minister gave notice of his readiness to exchange the ratifications.

The return of the original papers now transmitted, to avoid the delay necessary to the making of copies, is requested.

JAMES MONROE.

General instructions to Mr. Forsyth, Minister Plenipotentiary to Spain.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 8, 1819.

The treaty of amity, settlement, and limits between the United States and Spain, concluded on the 22d ultimo, and ratified on the part of the United States, having provided for the adjustment of all important subjects of difference between the two nations, the first object of your mission will be to obtain the ratification of the Spanish Government, and receive it in exchange for ours, the authentic instrument of which is committed to your charge. The United States ship Hornet, Captain Read, is in readiness at Boston, and orders have been despatched, under which you will take passage in her for Cadiz. It is desirable that you should embark without delay. On your arrival in Spain, the Hornet will remain at Cadiz, subject to your orders, until the exchange of the ratifications can be effected; and if, as is anticipated, no obstacle should intervene to delay that transaction, you will, upon receiving the Spanish ratified copy, immediately forward it to Captain Read, with directions to bring it immediately to the United States. As the ulterior destination of the Hornet will be the Gulf of Mexico, the port to which it will be advisable for him to come will be New York.

On exchanging the ratifications, certificates of the fact will be mutually executed and delivered by you and the Spanish minister with whom you will make the exchange. Copies of that which passed in both languages on the exchange of the ratifications of the convention of the 11th of August, 1802, are now furnished you, and will serve as forms to be used in the performance of this ceremony. On this occasion, as upon all others upon which you may have occasion to execute any document, joint or reciprocal, with a foreign Minister of State, you will be careful to preserve the right of the United States to the alternative of being first named, and your own right, as their representative, to sign first in the papers executed; while, in the counterparts, the other contracting party will be named first, and the foreign minister will first sign and seal. A rigid adherence to this practice has become necessary, because it is strictly adhered to by all the European sovereigns in their compacts with one another; and because the United States having heretofore sometimes forborne to claim this conventional indication of equal dignity, some appearance of a disposition to allege the precedent against them, as affecting their right to it, was manifested by the British plenipotentiaries on executing the convention of 3d July, 1815, and by Mr. De Onis at the drawing up and signing of this treaty. The scruple was, however, in both cases abandoned, and the right of the United States to the alternative was conceded. It is not expected that it will hereafter be questioned, and you will consider it as a standing instruction to abide by it in the execution of any instrument of compact which, as a public minister of the United States, you may be called to sign.

After the exchange of the ratifications, your attention will be directed to the object of carrying the provisions of the treaty into effect. The orders for the evacuation by the Spanish officers and troops of the places occupied by them in the Floridas will no doubt be immediately issued; and, as the transports and escort for conveying them to the Havana are to be furnished by the United States, it is hoped you will obtain copies of the orders, and transmit them here with the ratification of the treaty. You will think it advisable to keep the Spanish Government reminded of the necessity to include, in the orders for the delivery of possession, that of all the archives and documents relating to the dominion and sovereignty. The appointment of a commissioner and surveyor for running the line of the western boundary must also be kept in remembrance, and notice given to us as soon as possible after their appointment. You will collect from the archives of the legation at Madrid all the documents relating to the claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, which have been deposited there, and which come within the description of claims to be exhibited to the commissioners under the eleventh article of the treaty. You will send all these documents, together with the ratified treaty, to this Department, retaining descriptive lists of them, and, if necessary, copies of such papers for which no equivalent substitute could be produced in case of their being lost. Should you have reason to believe that any documents, which you should be able to specify, were in possession of the Spanish Government, tending to elucidate any of these claims, you will endeavor to obtain them. The treaty provides that they shall be furnished at the demand of the commissioners; but, as much time may be saved if they can be sent here to be ready when the commission will be organized and commence the exercise of its functions, you will, should the occasion present itself, use your endeavors to that effect.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

To JOHN FORSYTH.

Certificate of exchange of ratifications, referred to in the preceding instructions.

We, John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States of America, and Don Luis de Onis Gonzales Lopes y Vara, lord of the towns of Rayaces, Macadina, and Lagartera, member of different academies and societies, both national and foreign, perpetual regidor of the corporation of the city of Salamanca, knight grand cross of the royal American order of Isabella the Catholic, decorated with the lys of La Vendée, knight-pensioner of the royal and distinguished Spanish order of Charles III., member of the supreme assembly of the said royal order, of the council of His Catholic Majesty, his secretary, with exercise of decrees, and his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near the United States of America, certify that the ratifications of the convention between the said United States of America and his said Majesty, concluded on the 11th day of August, 1802, accompanied with all suitable solemnities, and after due comparison each with the other, and with the original examples of the convention, have been exchanged by us this day.

In witness whereof, we have signed this act in triplicates, and have sealed the same with our respective seals, at the city of Washington, this 21st day of December, 1818.

LUIS DE ONIS. [L. S.]

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 10, 1819.

By the eighth article of the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, signed by us on the 22d of last month, all grants of land in the Floridas, made by His Catholic Majesty, or his legitimate authorities in those provinces, subsequent to the 24th of January, 1818, are declared to be null and void. This date, as you will recollect, was agreed to on the part of the United States, with a full and clear understanding between us that it included the grants alleged to have been made in the course of the preceding winter by the King to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas. As these grants, however, are known to the Government of the United States only from rumor, without the knowledge of their dates, it is proper that, on exchanging the ratifications, your Government should know that, whatever the date of those grants may have been, it was fully understood by us that they are all annulled by the treaty, as much as if they had been specifically named, and that they will be so held by the United States. To avoid any possible misconception, your answer to this statement is requested; and the exchange of the ratifications will be made, under the explicit declaration and understanding that all the abovementioned grants, and all others derived from them, are null and void.

I pray you to accept the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Don LUIS DE ONIS, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

[TRANSLATION.]

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, March 10, 1819.

I have received the note you were pleased to address to me of this day's date, in which you state that, by the eighth article of the treaty signed by us on the 22d of last month, it was agreed, on the part of the United States, that all grants of land in the Floridas, made by His Catholic Majesty, or his legitimate authorities, subsequent to the 24th January, 1818, are declared to be null and void, with a full understanding that it included the grants alleged to have been made in the course of the preceding winter, by the King, to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas; and that, therefore, you request of me a declaration that, whatever the date of those grants may have been, it was fully understood by us that they are annulled by the treaty, as much as if they had been specifically named.

With the frankness and good faith which have uniformly actuated my conduct, and which distinguish the character of the Spanish nation, I have to declare to you, sir, that, when I proposed the revocation of all the grants made subsequent to the date above mentioned, it was with the full belief that it comprehended those made to the Duke of Alagon, as well as any others which had been stipulated at that period.

But, at the same time that I offer you this frank, simple, and ingenuous declaration, I have to express to you that, if my conception had been different, or if it had appeared to me that any of those grants were prior to the date above mentioned, I would have insisted upon their recognition, as the honor of the King, my master, and the unquestionable rights of his sovereignty of his possessions, and the disposal of them, obviously required.

I will hasten to transmit to my Government due information of the whole; and, impressed as I am with the conviction of His Majesty's most earnest desire to meet the wishes of the President, I persuade myself that he will, with pleasure, participate in that sentiment, by admitting the explicit declaration which you have requested of me. In the mean time, I beg you will favor me with your answer to the explanations I requested yesterday, in relation to the late act of Congress concerning piracy.

Be pleased to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration. God preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 10, 1819.

By the eighth article of the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States and Spain, signed on the 22d of last month, all the grants of lands made by His Catholic Majesty, or by his lawful authorities, since the 24th of January, 1818, in the territories ceded by His Catholic Majesty to the United States, in the Floridas, are declared and agreed to be null and void. This date was proposed by Mr. Onis, and acceded to on the part of the United States, with a full and clear understanding, on both sides, that the grants made, or alleged to have been made, in the course of the preceding winter, to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, were among those agreed and declared to be null and void. Copies of the grants to the Count of Punon Rostro and to Mr. Vargas, in the form of orders to the Governor General of the island of Cuba and to the Governor of the Floridas, had been transmitted to this Department by Mr. Erving; the first of which bears date the 6th of February, and the second the 11th of March, 1818; but no copy has been received of that to the Duke of Alagon. As, however, the authenticity of these documents might be denied, and the grants have never been made public, it is proper that the possibility of any future question, with regard to those grants, should be guarded against; for which purpose, the form of a declaration is enclosed, which it will be proper for you to deliver, on exchanging the ratifications of the treaty, to the Spanish minister with whom you will make the exchange. The fact of the mutual understanding, that those grants were annulled by the treaty, is fully and explicitly admitted by Mr. Onis, in his answer, dated this day, to a note from me on this subject; copies of which, with a translation of his answer, are herewith enclosed. It is not anticipated that any objection will be made to receiving the declaration; if, however, there should be, you will, nevertheless, exchange the ratifications; it being sufficient to give the notice and the proof of the understanding, on both sides, of the operation of the article, and of the effect which will be given to it on the part of the United States.

I am, with much respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JOHN FORSYTH, Minister Plenipotentiary to Spain.

Form of the declaration referred to in the preceding letter.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America at the court of His Catholic Majesty, is commanded by the President of the United States to explain and declare, upon the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, signed by the respective plenipotentiaries at Washington, on the 22d day of February last, that, in agreeing upon the 24th day of January, 1818, as the date subsequent to which all grants of land made by His Catholic Majesty, or by his legitimate authorities in the Floridas, were declared to be null and void, it was with a full and clear understanding between the plenipotentiaries of both the high contracting parties, that, among the grants thus declared null and void, were all those made, or alleged to have been made, in the course of the preceding winter, by His Catholic Majesty, to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, and all others derived from them; and the ratifications of the treaty are exchanged under the explicit declaration and understanding that all the said grants are null and void, and will be so held by the United States.

MADRID, —— —, 1819.

The Secretary of State to the Minister of France.

SIR: WASHINGTON, March 17, 1819.

By the eighth article of the treaty lately concluded between the United States and Spain, all grants of land made by the King of Spain, or by his legitimate authorities in Florida, before the 24th of January, 1818, are confirmed, on certain conditions; all those made after that date are declared null and void.

Since the conclusion of the treaty, a rumor has been circulated that certain grants made by the King of Spain, in the course of the preceding winter, to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, were made on the 23d of January, 1818. Mr. Forsyth has therefore been instructed, on exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, to declare that it was fully and explicitly understood on both sides, at its signature, that all those grants, and all others derived from them, were, by the treaty, included among those declared to be absolutely null and void. Mr. De Onis himself, in answer to a note from me, has readily declared that such was his understanding. From the friendly part taken by you, in concert with Mr. De Onis, in this negotiation, you were apprized of all the circumstances attending it; and I have to request that you would have the goodness to state your impressions on the subject, particularly in relation to the absolute nullity of those grants, and, as far as you think proper, the facts in connexion with this transaction which you have mentioned to me in conversation.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. HYDE DE NEUVILLE,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Minister of France to the Secretary of State.

LEGATION OF FRANCE IN THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, March 18, 1819.

SIR:

I was very sure, and you were of the same opinion, that, to destroy the rumor which had been spread, it would suffice to inform the minister of Spain of it. The loyalty which characterizes him did not permit the smallest uneasiness on the subject. After the declaration of Mr. Onis, mine can be of no importance; however, as you desire (in case the mistake of date should be real) that the fact resulting from the treaty should be well established, and by all those persons who took part, directly or indirectly, in the transaction, I have the honor, sir, to declare to you, in the most formal manner, that it has been understood—always understood, by you, by the minister of Spain, and, I will add, by myself—that the three great grants of land made to the Duke of Alagon, to the Count of Punon Rostro, and to Mr. Vargas, were of the number of those annulled.

The date of 24th January was proposed and accepted in the complete persuasion, on one part and the other, that these three great grants were subsequent to it.

I will add, sir, because it is the exact and pure truth, that, having been charged by Mr. Onis, during his illness, to discuss with you several articles of the treaty, particularly the eighth article, you consented to the drawing up of this article more in conformity with the desire of the Spanish minister, only on the admission, as a fact beyond doubt, that the three principal grants were and remained null, and as not having taken place. Mr. Onis has not ceased thus to understand it. He has explained himself upon it frankly and loyally as well since as before the treaty. The mistake of date, if it exists, can, then, give birth to no difficulty whatever at Madrid. The good faith of Mr. Onis, and that of his Government, are guaranties too strong to render any other explanations necessary. Between Governments, as between individuals, the same laws of honor and probity govern transactions. The convention exists only by the convention; therefore, sir, in this case the simple statement of the fact will be sufficient to rectify the mistake.

In answering, sir, immediately the letter which you did me the honor to write to me, I embrace with much pleasure this new opportunity to assure you of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

Hon. Mr. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Observations on the eighth article of the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, between the United States and Spain, submitted to Mr. De Neuville July 14, 1819.

It will be recollected by Mr. De Neuville that, on the 15th of February last, Mr. De Onis being confined to his house by indisposition, Mr. De Neuville, at his request, had a conversation with Mr. Adams, in which were discussed the projet of a treaty which had been delivered on the 9th of February by Mr. De Onis to Mr. Adams, and the counter-projet sent by Mr. Adams to Mr. De Onis on the 13th of the same month.

The ninth article of the projet of Mr. Onis was in these words:

"All the grants of land made by His Catholic Majesty, or by his legitimate authorities, in the aforesaid territories of the two Floridas, and others which His Majesty cedes to the United States, shall be confirmed and acknowledged as valid, excepting those grants which may have been made after the 24th January of last year, the date that the first proposals were made for the cession of those provinces, which shall be held null in consideration of the grantees not having complied with the conditions of the cession."

The eighth article of the counter-projet sent by Mr. Adams was as follows:

"All grants of land made by or in the name of His Catholic Majesty, in the aforesaid territories, after the 24th January, 1818, shall be held null, the conditions of the said grants not having been performed by the grantees. All grants made before that date by His Majesty, or by his legitimate authorities, the conditions of which shall have been performed by the grantees according to the tenor of the respective grants, and none other, shall be confirmed and acknowledged as valid."

Mr. De Neuville's particular attention is requested to the difference between the two projected articles, because it will recall particularly to his remembrance the point upon which the discussion concerning this article turned. By turning to the written memorandum drawn up by Mr. De Neuville himself of this discussion, he will perceive he has noted that Mr. De Onis insisted "that this article could not be varied from what was contained in the chevalier's projet, as the object of the last clause therein was merely to save the honor and dignity of the sovereignty of His Catholic Majesty."

It was then observed by Mr. Adams that the honor and dignity of His Catholic Majesty would be saved by recognising the grants prior to the 24th of January as "valid to the same extent as they were binding on His Catholic Majesty," and he agreed to accept the article as drawn by Mr. Onis, with this explanation; (see Mr. De Neuville's memorandum.) It was on this occasion that Mr. De Neuville observed that, if the grants prior to January 24, 1818, were confirmed only to the same extent that they were binding on the King of Spain, there were many bona fide grantees, of long standing, in actual possession of their grants, and having actually made partial settlements upon them, but who had been prevented, by the extraordinary circumstances in which Spain had been situated, and the revolutions in Europe, from fulfilling all the conditions of the grants; that it would be very harsh to leave these persons liable to a forfeiture, which might, indeed, in rigor be exacted from them, but which very certainly never would be if they had remained under the Spanish dominion. It will be well remembered by Mr. De Neuville how earnestly he insisted upon this equitable suggestion, and how strongly he disclaimed for Mr. Onis every wish or intention to cover, by a provision for such persons, any fraudulent grants. And it was then observed by Mr. De Neuville that the date assumed, of 24th January, 1818, was not sufficient for guarding against fraudulent grants, because they might be easily antedated. It was with reference to these suggestions of Mr. De Neuville, afterwards again strenuously urged by Mr. De Onis, that the article was finally modified as it now stands in the treaty, declaring all grants subsequent to 24th January, 1818, absolutely null, and those of a prior date valid to the same extent only that they would have been binding upon the King; but allowing to bona fide grantees, in actual possession, and having commenced settlements, but who had been prevented, by the late circumstances of the Spanish nation and the revolutions in Europe, from fulfilling all the conditions of their grants, time to complete them. It is needless to observe that, as these incidents do not apply to either of the grants to Alagon, Punon Rostro, or Vargas, neither of those grants is confirmed by the tenor of the article as it stands; and that it is perfectly immaterial in that respect whether they were dated before or after the 24th January, 1818, it being admitted on all sides that these grants were not binding upon the King conformably to the Spanish laws. The terms of the article accord precisely with the intentions of all the parties to the negotiation and the signature of the treaty. If the dates of the grants are subsequent to 24th January, 1818, they are annulled by the date; if prior to that date, they are null, because not included among the prior grants confirmed.

Mr. Forsyth to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo.

SIR: MADRID, May 18, 1819.

The treaty concluded on the 22d of February, 1819, at Washington, by Mr. Adams on the part of the Government of the United States, and the Chevalier de Onis on the part of His Catholic Majesty, has been intrusted to me by the President of the United States, duly ratified; and I am prepared to exchange the ratifications of this instrument at any moment it may suit the convenience of your excellency. From the nature of the engagement, it is desirable that the earliest exchange should be made; and this would be particularly convenient, as an opportunity is afforded of sending this important document to my Government by the American ship of war Hornet, now in the harbor of Cadiz, and destined in a few days to the United States.

I seize with avidity every opportunity to present to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Forsyth to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo.

SIR: MADRID, June 4, 1819.

On the 18th of May last I addressed to your excellency an official note to inform you "that I was ready to exchange the ratifications of the convention, &c., concluded at Washington by Mr. Adams and the Chevalier de Onis on the 22d February, 1819; that it was desirable, from the nature of that instrument, that an immediate exchange of ratifications should be made, the more especially so as I had an opportunity of sending it, when ratified by the King, to the United States, by the American sloop of war Hornet, then and now lying in the harbor of Cadiz." The time at which it will be necessary for that vessel (by the return of which the American Government expects to receive the treaty ratified by His Majesty) to sail for the United States has so nearly arrived, that it is my indispensable duty to call your excellency's attention again to the subject of that note. It would be painful for me to see this vessel depart without the treaty. The Government of the United States had a just and well-founded expectation that no unreasonable delay would take place, and therefore looked to the return of this vessel for the instrument, executed with due formalities. Her arrival without it will not fail to make the most unfavorable impressions. To obviate such an effect is beyond my power, as I can perceive no adequate motive to prevent His Majesty's Government from acting on this subject prior to her departure from Spain. Your excellency will not deem me unnecessarily importunate or unreasonable when I ask an immediate attention to this business, and express my conviction that an answer will be given to this and to my note of the 18th of May, already alluded to, on the earliest day that the convenience of His Majesty's Government will permit.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurances of my distinguished respect and consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: PALACE, June 19, 1819.

The King, my august master, has informed himself of the contents of your two notes of the 18th of May last and 4th instant, in both of which you state that you are ready to exchange the ratifications of the treaty concluded at Washington, on the 23d of February last, by Don Luis de Onis and Mr. Adams, and that, from the nature of that treaty, and the favorable opportunity of transmitting it to the United States, by the Hornet sloop of war, you are desirous that the said exchange may be made as expeditiously as may be.

I have also submitted to His Majesty the purport of your verbal communications to me on this subject, and I again brought to his view your observations thereon in the two several conferences I have had the honor to hold with you.

His Majesty has, in consequence, commanded me to inform you, in reply, that, on reflecting on the great importance and interest of the treaty in question, he is under the indispensable necessity of examining it with the greatest caution and deliberation before he proceeds to ratify it.

This being all I am enabled to communicate to you on this point, for the present, I avail myself, with pleasure, of the renewed occasion it affords me to offer you my respects, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

MANUEL GONZALES SALMON.

Mr. Forsyth to Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon.

SIR: MADRID, June 21, 1819.

The determination of His Catholic Majesty to delay the exchange of ratifications of the treaty signed on the 22d February, at Washington, by Mr. Adams and the Chevalier de Onis, as communicated by your excellency's note of the 19th instant, in reply to my notes of the 18th May and the 4th of the current month, fills me with regret. As the subject-matter of that treaty has been for years before the two Governments, both of whom have, no doubt, long since discussed and deliberately determined upon what they would respectively claim and yield, I took it for granted no motive for delay could exist. Your excellency's note, while it states to me the fact that a longer delay is contemplated, does not enlighten me as to the cause. The measure is, no doubt, important and interesting to His Majesty's kingdom, but no new light can have broken in upon the subject since the instructions were given to the Chevalier de Onis, upon which the treaty is founded, on the part of Spain—no change of the circumstances of the parties to it has occurred—no new causes of difficulty or complaint are known to exist. Although the words of the treaty allow six months to elapse before the instrument is annulled, if the exchange of ratifications is not previously made, I must represent to your excellency that every hour's delay is at variance with the spirit of the instrument. The time stipulated was, to guard against accidents, extended to the longest period which, under any circumstances, could be required to effect the exchange. Had the distance of our respective Governments permitted, the time fixed would not have been extended beyond a single day. If the Government of the United States had not gratuitously offered the exchange here, His Majesty would have been compelled, ere this, to have transmitted the treaty ratified on the part of Spain to America, or have lost the benefit of the convention. You will recollect that no place is fixed at which the exchange is to be made. It is to the confidence of the American Government in the good disposition of Spain that the King, your master, is indebted for the opportunity thus to delay acting upon the subject. The ill consequences which will ensue from this postponement, and the impression likely to be made by it, can be easily foreseen. Your excellency may correctly estimate the conjectures to which it will give birth in the United States from what is passing here. You, perhaps, are yet to learn that the delay of the last month has given rise, at the seat of His Majesty's Government, among his own subjects, to the most monstrous and absurd suppositions. Among the subjects of Spain, those who best know the integrity of the King, and the purity of his councils, it is asserted that an act required by the policy of this Government, essential to the interests of this kingdom, and demanded by the honor of the King, will not be performed. Yes, sir; the King is calumniated in his very capital by a most unjust surmise that there will be a refusal to do that which the reputation of Spain requires—that which Spain dare not refuse to do. Your excellency will not understand this as threatening His Majesty's Government with the consequences which might ensue from the resentment of the United States, if it were possible for Spain to act in this business with bad faith. Threats are used by conscious weakness, not by conscious strength. I know too well the abundant resources, the expanding power, the youthful vigor of my country, to degrade her character by using language unworthy of it; if not by my respect for Spain, I should be prevented by the fear of the deserved resentment of my own country; I should not be easily forgiven for condescending to say how she would punish an act of perfidy. It is by her acts, and not by the railings of her ministers, that she will be known to those who violate the faith pledged to her. But there is this, which a just Government will more cautiously avoid than even the well-founded resentment of a powerful nation—the degradation of conscious baseness. No wise King will dare to do an act which would deprive him of the respect of all nations, sully the reputation of his kingdom in the eyes of the civilized world, and deprive his people of the strongest incentive to virtuous exertions, under every dispensation of Heaven—the confidence in the integrity of their Government. If, even in Spain, unjust surmises and unfounded mistrusts are entertained, your excellency, recollecting the lately subsided irritations of long-continued disputes with the Government of His Majesty, will not be surprised that, in the United States, the same cause should produce, not suspicions, but firm convictions of the intention of this Government to disappoint the expectations reposed in its good faith. I know full well that, in two months, the act of the exchange of ratifications will prove that these harsh convictions have been hastily and incorrectly formed; but the impression of them may remain, and the motive for the delayed exchange may be misunderstood. I have used every effort to avert it, but in vain. If my apprehensions should not be realized, I shall heartily rejoice.

It only remains for me to say, in this last note that I shall address to your excellency on this subject, that whenever His Majesty directs you to exchange the ratification of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, I am prepared, at any period before the 22d of August, on the part of my Government, to perform that ceremony.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the full assurance of my perfect respect.

JOHN FORSYTH.

[TRANSLATION.]

Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: MADRID, August 10, 1819.

I duly received the note you were pleased to address to me, dated the 21st of June last, in answer to that which I had the honor to write to you on the 19th of the same month, being my reply to your notes of the 8th of May and 4th of June, requesting the speedy ratification and exchange of the treaty lately concluded at Washington, on the 22d of February of the present year, between His Majesty the King, my master, and your Government.

In my said reply, I confined myself to stating to you that His Majesty, having taken that important subject into his most serious consideration, had found it indispensably necessary to examine the treaty with the utmost caution and reflection before he proceeded to ratify it.

In your answer you express your surprise at the delay attending a transaction which, having been already thoroughly discussed, could require no renewed examination of its final and definitive decision; and the more so, as the circumstances which led to it had experienced no change with either party. You proceed to develop, at length, the injurious effect that, in your opinion, must be produced by the delay of the Spanish Government in concluding this affair, and also of the disagreeable consequences that you foresee must result from that delay; and you conclude by stating that, whenever His Catholic Majesty shall please to authorize me to exchange the ratifications of the treaty of 22d of February, 1819, you are ready to execute that act on behalf of your Government at any time prior to the date of the 22d of August.

It would have been desirable if you had confined yourself, in your said note, to expressing your surprise and that of your Government at the delay on the part of Spain in terminating, by her ratification, an affair which, according to the intention of both, was to be considered as concluded, and to earnestly requesting the exchange of the same, by which the wishes of your Government, and one of the principal objects of your arrival at this court, would be accomplished.

Thus, it is to be supposed that you would have only conformed to the instructions which you will probably receive from your Government; and, therefore, other expressions and phrases you have used in your note cannot fail to appear very extraordinary, which your ardent zeal for the interests of your nation has doubtless prompted you to employ, but in which you have been carried farther than really could have been wished.

The expressions and phrases alluded to, which I refrain from otherwise specifying, are, to say the least, entirely superfluous, and consequently foreign to the subject in question; they have, therefore, surprised the more, as in no possible case can they be applicable to the Spanish Government or to its agents. Convinced of the rectitude and justice of its rights, and of those ever prescribed by the bounds of moderation, it never has, in its communications, permitted itself to go to such extremes as would justify the proceeding now adverted to.

There would be much to remark upon a style so unusual in diplomatic communications, and still less conformable to the sentiments of mutual friendship and harmony which should exist between the two Governments of Spain and the United States of America, as well as of those which, as its representative, you are in a situation to express; but I shall abstain from any particular detail or comment upon your expressions, and confine myself merely to declare to you, as I have already done, the extreme surprise produced by that part of the contents of your note.

I am, at the same time, authorized by the King, my master, to inform you that, having deliberately weighed the important subject which forms the principal object of your communication, he is of opinion that a final decision cannot be taken thereupon without previously entering into several explanations with the Government of the United States, to some of which your Government has given rise.

His Majesty has, therefore, been pleased to charge with his full confidence a person possessing all the qualifications necessary for bringing this interesting trust to a happy conclusion, who will forthwith make known to the United States His Majesty's intentions on this point, in order that, all obstacles being removed on the one side, and cleared up on the other, all the doubts which have arisen may be done away, and a full and satisfactory accomplishment given to the earnest desire which has animated the King, my master, on this subject, which certainly has uniformly been to see the friendship and good understanding subsisting between both Governments established on he most solid basis, and secured against future chances of interruption.

His Catholic Majesty persuades himself that the Government of the United States, in accordance with these principles and sentiments, far from refusing to admit these new explanations, will cheerfully receive them as a proof of the good faith and frankness of the conduct of Spain; and that they will accede to her views, by promoting also, on their part, the speedy conclusion of an affair productive of the mutual advantage of both Powers.

I offer, &c.

MANUEL GONZALES SALMON.

Mr. Forsyth to Señor Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon, acting Secretary of State, &c.

SIR: MADRID, August 12, 1819.

I received, this morning, your official note of the 10th instant. Some of the expressions of the note which I had the honor to present to His Majesty's Government on the 21st of June last appear to have given offence. As you have not specified the particular phrases or expressions which are considered censurable, I can only say that it was far either from my wish or intention to treat His Majesty's Government with disrespect, or to use terms calculated to interrupt the harmony and good understanding which ought to exist between it and the United States. I came here instructed by the President, and animated by the warmest wishes to strengthen, not to weaken, the almost broken bands of amity by which the two nations are still united. I can but regret that, in my zeal to promote this great object, I have used language capable of being misunderstood. You will consider that this regret does not spring from a conviction that the construction put upon my note is just. So far from admitting this, I must insist that there is nothing contained in it which, if rightly interpreted, could be deemed objectionable; and I cannot but indulge the belief that the language has been held offensive, not from its genuine and original import, but from some fatality in its application. As to the remarks you have been pleased to make, that these unusual expressions were idle, (ociosos,) not pertinent to the business in question, and not common in diplomatic communications, they are not sufficiently important to merit a distinct reply. The first two it is not the province of His Majesty's Government to reprove; to my own Government I look for approbation or censure. There is no doubt that the pertinency of the matters referred to will not escape its penetration. Should I be convicted of the offence of departing from the ordinary diplomatic style, I shall find abundant consolation in the consciousness of having expressed just sentiments in simple terms. The course pursued by the Government of His Catholic Majesty, and intended to be persisted in, as indicated by your note, is much more likely to disturb the harmony of the two nations than the intemperate zeal of the representatives or agents of either. On the 22d of February, the convention was signed at Washington, by Mr. Adams and the Chevalier de Onis. In April, a copy of it was received in Spain from the messenger sent by the Spanish minister from America. It is not necessary to remind you that the satisfaction of this Government in the termination of this important business was marked by the distribution of honors in the gift of the Crown to persons very remotely connected with the transaction. What has produced the very surprising change in the opinions then entertained on this subject, is for you, sir, to explain, if you think proper, but is what I cannot imagine. On the 18th of May, immediately after my introduction to His Majesty, the note of that date was delivered. It was therein stated that the treaty ratified by the United States was in Madrid, and an immediate exchange of ratifications was asked, that this important document might be sent to my Government by a vessel of war bound in a short time from Cadiz to America: to this no reply was given. Under the expectation entertained from several conversations with the Marquis de Casa Yrujo, the substance of which has been verbally stated to you, the vessel was detained in the port of Cadiz until the 2d of July. In this interval, the only communication received on this important subject was your note of the 19th June, the purport of which was, that His Majesty found it necessary to proceed with the deliberation and slowness demanded by its importance, to consider the subject of the treaty. On the 12th day of August, His Majesty's Government gives notice, by your note of the 10th, of its determination—to ratify? no, sir, to send a person to Washington, possessing the confidence of the King, and having the necessary qualifications to terminate happily this affair. Can it have escaped the observation of this Government that this affair must terminate in ten days? While a failure to resolve finishes the business in a few days, this Government thinks that a definitive resolution cannot be taken without first entering into various explanations with the United States, to some of which the Government of the said States has given occasion. What circumstance in the history of this affair sustains the assurances that His Majesty finds himself animated by the most vehement desires to preserve a good understanding with, and the friendship of, the United States? Is it the disappointment of the rational anticipation, indulged in America, that the treaty ratified by Spain would be carried there in the ship of war Hornet? The determination to send a messenger to the United States for explanations, at this period, when his voyage, as it regards the convention, must be useless; and the only hope which can be entertained from it is, that a new negotiation may be commenced—a circumstance of especial weight, when it is recollected that this messenger might have been sent to Washington, the desired explanations might have been asked, and given there prior to the 22d of August, if the King, your master, had decided promptly on this course. Or is it in the inexplicable and studious avoidance of the natural order of proceeding in a case of this kind—an application to the minister of the United States near the court of His Majesty for these necessary explanations, when they might have been, possibly, long since given, and still may be given before the period arrives when the convention of the 22d February ceases to be obligatory upon the parties to it? You will forgive me, sir, if I perceive in none of these circumstances indications of those vehement desires by which His Majesty's Government is animated, to establish, on a solid basis, a good understanding with the United States, to which, in the usual style of diplomatic communications, you refer. Since, however, I am bound and most willing to believe their existence, although the conduct of Spain has a tendency to force a different conviction upon the mind, allow me to suggest the only mode in which they can now be fully manifested and gratified: with that frankness and openness so honorable to all nations, and by which the Castilian character has been distinguished, disclose the difficulties that appear to interpose themselves to prevent the immediate conclusion of this affair. I am fully instructed by the Government of my country upon the only point on which it can have given a motive for explanations; and while I cannot imagine what others are wished for, I persuade myself that I am so well possessed of its wishes and intentions as to be able to give full satisfaction to His Majesty upon any part of the treaty, the elucidation of which may be desired.

I renew to you, sir, the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

The Secretary of State to Mr. John Forsyth.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, August 18, 1819.

Captain Read, of the Hornet, has delivered to me your despatches of the 10th, 17th, and 22d of June, which have been submitted to the consideration of the President.

However extraordinary the conduct of the Spanish Government, in relation to the treaty signed on the 22d of February last, has been, the President is unwilling to abandon the hope that, within the period of six months allowed for the exchange of the ratifications, a sense of justice, and of decent regard for the public faith of the King and nation, solemnly pledged by the treaty, will prevail over the individual intrigues and lurking influence which prompted the delay that has taken place. Should this expectation, however, be disappointed, and should the treaty remain unratified by Spain at the time when you shall receive this despatch, you will immediately make an official communication to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, stating that the ratification of Spain, with the explicit understanding, on her part, that the alleged grants to the Duke of Alagon, Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, and all others which may have been made under the same circumstances, are, by the eighth article of the treaty, null and void, and will be so held by the United States, will be accepted as valid; and that you are authorized to receive the Spanish ratification in exchange for that of the United States, though after the lapse of the stipulated six months, provided the exchange shall be immediate, and in such time that you can despatch the ratified treaty by the messenger who will be the bearer of this in season to arrive here before the meeting of Congress, on the first Monday in December; that, if the ratified treaty should not arrive here at that time, a full communication will be made by the President to Congress of all the transactions relating to the treaty, and such measures will be adopted by that body as they shall think required by the exigency of the case; that, whatever their determination may be, the Spanish Government will be responsible to the United States for all damages and expenses which may arise from the delay or refusal of Spain to ratify, and from the measures to which the United States may resort to give efficacy to their rights; and that, for the indemnities to which they will be justly entitled for this violation of faith by Spain, the United States will look to the territory west of the Sabine river.

The only reason assigned by the Minister of State ad interim, Salmon, for the postponement of the Spanish ratification was, the determination of the King, founded upon the great importance of the treaty, to act upon it with full deliberation. This may have been sufficient to justify delay within the period stipulated by the treaty, but, after the expiration of that period, can no longer be alleged. Delay beyond that period will be a breach of faith; for the treaty, in all its parts, from the moment of its signature by Mr. Onis, and the ratification of the United States, was as binding upon the honor and good faith of the Spanish King and nation as it would be after the ratification. It is scarcely supposable that Spain will contest this position, or that it should be necessary to present it to her view in the following terms of the full power of Mr. Onis, the original of which, signed by the King of Spain, was delivered to me before the signature of the treaty. The words of His Catholic Majesty are, after authorizing Mr. Onis to treat, negotiate, and conclude a treaty, whereby past differences may be adjusted, and a firm and lasting peace established between the two Governments: "Obliging ourselves, as we do hereby oblige ourselves and promise, on the faith and word of a King, to approve, ratify, and fulfil, and to cause to be inviolably observed and fulfilled, whatsoever may be stipulated and signed by you; to which intent and purpose, I grant you all authority and full power, in the most ample form, thereby as of right required."* If language so explicit and unqualified were, in regard to its import, susceptible of any doubt, founded on the usage which requires the ratification of the sovereign for the full consummation of a treaty, there is nothing dubious or uncertain in the extent of obligation resting upon him, by the signature of his minister, vested with such a full power. The following passages from Vattel and Martens are decisive authorities upon the principle:

"Sovereigns treat together by the agency of their attorneys or mandatories, clothed with sufficient powers; they are commonly called plenipotentiaries. All the rules of the law of nature, concerning things performed by commission, are here applicable. The rights of the agent are defined by the authority given him. From this he must not depart; but whatever he promises within the terms of his commission, and according to the extent of his powers, is binding upon his constituent."

"At this time, to avoid all danger and difficulty, princes reserve to themselves the right of ratifying that which has been concluded by their minister in their name. The full power is merely a commission, cum libera. If this commission were to have its full effect, it should be given with the utmost circumspection; but, as princes can be constrained to fulfil their obligations only by force of arms, the custom has arisen of relying upon their treaties only after they have sanctioned and ratified them. Whatever the minister has concluded remaining ineffectual until the ratification of the prince, there is less danger of giving him a full power. But to refuse, with honor, to ratify that which has been concluded in virtue of a full power, the sovereign must have strong and solid reasons for it, and, particularly, he must show that his minister transcended his instructions."—Vattel, book 2, chapter 12, § 156.

* "Obligandonos y prometemos, en fe y palabra de Rey, que aprobaremos, ratificaremos, cumpliremos, y haremos observar y cumplir inviolablemente quanto por vos fuere estipulado y firmado; para lo qual os concedo todas las facultades y plenos poderes en la forma mas amplia que de derecho se requieren."

"Every thing that has been stipulated by an agent, in conformity to his full powers, ought to become obligatory for the state, from the moment of signing, without even waiting for the ratification. However, not to expose a state to the errors of a single person, it is now become a general maxim that public conventions do not become obligatory till ratified. The motive of this custom clearly proves that the ratification can never be refused with justice, except when he who is charged with the negotiation, keeping within compass with respect to his public full powers, has gone beyond his secret instructions, and consequently has rendered himself liable to punishment, or when the other party refuses to ratify."—Martens's Summary, book 2, chapter 1, § 3.

The obligation of the King of Spain, therefore, in honor and in justice, to ratify the treaty signed by his minister, is as perfect and unqualified as his royal promise in the full power; and it gives to the United States the right, equally perfect, to compel the performance of that promise.

Should it be suggested that the United States themselves have, on more than one occasion, withheld or annexed conditions to the ratification of treaties signed by their plenipotentiaries in Europe, it will readily occur to you that, by the nature of our constitution, the full powers of our ministers never are or can be unlimited; that whatever they conclude must be, and by the other contracting party is always known and understood to be, subject to the deliberation and determination of the Senate, to whose consideration it must be submitted before its ratification; that our full powers never contain the solemn promise of the nation to ratify whatever the minister shall conclude, but reserve, expressly, not only the usual right of ratification, but the constitutional privilege of the Senate, to give or withhold their assent to the ratification; without which assent, by a majority of two-thirds of the members present at the vote taken after consideration of the treaty, the President has no authority to ratify. In withholding or refusing the ratification, therefore, no promise or engagement of the state is violated. But neither the same reason nor the same principle applies to the King of Spain, who possesses the sole, entire, and exclusive power of ratifying treaties made by his ministers, and who, therefore, by the promise, on the faith and word of a King, to ratify whatever his minister shall sign, commits his own honor and that of his nation to the fulfilment of his promise. This distinction is well known and clearly recognised by the law of nations.*

The Spanish Government cannot allege either that Mr. Onis transcended his secret instructions, or that the ratification of the United States has been refused, or that any unfair advantage was taken on the part of the United States in the negotiation, or that Spain was not fully aware beforehand of the full extent of the engagements contracted by Mr. Onis. It is too well known, and they will not dare to deny it, that Mr. Onis's last instructions authorized him to concede much more than he did; that those instructions had been prepared by Mr. Pizarro; that, after the appointment of the Marquis de Casa Yrujo to the ministry, they were by him submitted to the King's council, and, with their full sanction, were transmitted to Mr. Onis; that, both in relation to the grants of lands in Florida, and to the western boundary, the terms which he obtained were far within the limits of his instructions; that it was known to and understood by him that the grants to Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas were annulled by the treaty; that, so fully was this his understanding, that, in his despatches to his Government, he pointed out to them means of indemnifying those grantees for their disappointment from other lands. The Government of the United States, indeed, considered the moderation and generosity of the terms to which they had acceded as a pledge that they would be received with pride and joy by the Spanish Government; and so, it will not be denied, they were in the first instance received by the King of Spain and his cabinet. If, afterwards, from the unexpected extent of sacrifices which the United States made, for the purposes of conciliation and of sincere amity, Spain has drawn the inference that this temper may be trifled with and abused, it is proper, and will be just, that she should be effectually undeceived.

Should the ratification be withheld, it is to be presumed that some other reason than the importance of the treaty will ultimately be assigned by Spain for withholding it. What that will be, can at present only be conjectured. If the grants to the Duke of Alagon and Count Punon Rostro should be assigned as forming the objection, you will explicitly declare that the United States have no compromise to make, and will listen to none on that subject. The insinuation of the Marquis of Casa Yrujo that those grants, by the letter of the eighth article, would be confirmed if dated before the 24th of January, 1818, was totally unfounded. Mr. Onis knows that the whole of the eighth article was finally drawn up as it stands, with the express intention, declared by me, and agreed to by him, to exclude them from confirmation, whatever might be their dates. Mr. Onis, on the first projet of a treaty, delivered on the 9th of February, had drawn the article in such terms as to confirm all grants made before the 24th of January, 1818. If the article had even been accepted by us in those terms, it could only by an unworthy deception be pretended that it covered the grants of Alagon and Punon Rostro, because it had been explicitly agreed, on both sides, that they should be annulled, and because Mr. Onis, who always spoke of them as fraudulent grants, of which he was ashamed for his country, has repeatedly declared to me that he signed the treaty without knowing their dates, but fully believing them to be subsequent to the 24th of January. If, then, the confirmation of the grants prior to that date had been, as it was first proposed by Mr. Onis, positive and unqualified, and if the grants had been completely made before that date, there might be some pretence that they were covered by the letter of the article, though by a mistake common to both parties, of which a just and honorable Government would disdain to take any other advantage than that of manifesting its good faith by its cheerfulness and promptitude in rectifying the error, and fulfilling the intention instead of the letter of the engagement. But the article was not accepted in this form. In the counter-projet, delivered by me on the 13th of February, the grants prior to the 24th of January, 1818, the conditions of which should have been performed by the grantees, and none other, were declared to be confirmed. At the time that the counter-projet was received by Mr. Onis, he was confined to his house by indisposition; at his request, the communications between him and me were made by the friendly interposition of the French minister, M. Hyde de Neuville. Mr. Onis insisted on the article concerning the grants as drawn up by him, not for the purpose of covering these grants, for he professed an earnest desire that they should be annulled, for the vindication of his own character from the aspersion which had been circulated here, that he had a personal interest in them; but he had drawn the article in these terms merely to save the honor of the King. It was then observed that the honor of the King could be saved by declaring the grants prior to the 24th January, 1818, binding to the same extent as they would have been upon the Spanish Government if the cession to the United States had not been made. It was known and admitted that neither of those grants would, in that case, have been valid, because the conditions, by the laws of the Indies, indispensable to their validity, neither had been, nor could be, fulfilled by the grantees; and their non-performance had been formally assigned by Mr. Onis, in his letter to me of November 16, 1818, as his reason for agreeing to their being annulled. But he observed that there were grants of old standing, made bona fide to persons in actual possession of the lands, and having made improvements and settlements upon them, but who, by the late revolutions in Europe, and the convulsed state of Spain, had been prevented from completing all the conditions of their grants; that it would be but equitable to allow them time from the date of the treaty to fulfil them. To this a ready assent was given, and the article was thus agreed to—limiting to such grants alone the confirmation prior to the 24th of January, 1818.

* The sovereign who possesses full and absolute power has undoubtedly the right to treat in the name of the state which he represents, and his engagements bind the whole nation. But the rulers of nations have not all the exclusive power of making public treaties; some are under the restriction of taking the advice of the Senate, or of the representatives of the nation. It is in the fundamental laws of each state that we must look for the power capable of contracting valid engagements in the name of the state.—Vattel, book 2, chapter 12, § 154.

Minutes of the discussion upon this article were drawn up in writing, at the time, by Mr. De Neuville, copies of which were furnished both to Mr. Onis and to me prior to the signature, and recognised by us both to be correct. An abstract from them of all that relates to this article, together with the draught of the article as first proposed by Mr. Onis, of that in our counter-projet, and of the article as finally agreed to, is herewith enclosed. They will show that the confirmation of the grants to Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas, is as effectually excluded by the limitations in the first part of the article, if their date is prior to the 24th of January, 1818, as by the date itself if made subsequent to that time. They were not excluded by name, for two reasons: First, conformably to the desire of Mr. Onis to save the honor of the King. You will see this distinctly noted in the minutes of Mr. De Neuville. Secondly, because, from the despatches of Mr. Erving, it was supposed there were other grants of the same kind, and made under similar circumstances. To have named them might have left room for a presumptive inference in favor of others. The determination was to exclude them all.

No reliance was placed upon the exclusion by the date, because the grants having been secretly made, and without the usual formalities, the copies of them received from Mr. Erving might be unauthentic; because no copy of the grant to Alagon had been received; and because, if fraud was to be guarded against, it was well known that antedating was one of its most familiar and favorite expedients. When, shortly after the signature of the treaty, a rumor was circulated here that the date of the grants was one day prior to the 24th of January, 1818, and that this last date had been assumed with the intention, at least on the part of Mr. Onis, that they should be confirmed, without admitting the suspicion that he had attempted a deception for which the language of decency has no name, it was yet thought advisable that no shadow of a pretence should by any possibility be raised after the ratification of the treaty, by Spain or the grantees, that those grants were confirmed, or that either party of the compact had understood that they would be by the article as it stood. You were therefore instructed, on exchanging the ratifications, to deliver a declaration of this construction, which it had been the avowed intention of both parties at the signature that the eighth article should bear in relation to the grants in question, and the only one which the United States would ever admit. Mr. Onis, by his answer to my note of the 10th March, unequivocally recognised that such had been his understanding of the import of the article when he signed it. He added, indeed, that, if he had known that the grants were of a prior date, he should have insisted upon their being confirmed. But, without remarking that his ignorance of their dates could have no possible effect to render valid that which he had agreed and understood to be null and void, it had escaped his recollection that, in his note to me of the 16th November, 1818, he had agreed that these grants should all be annulled, because their conditions had not been fulfilled by the grantees. The President of the United States is yet willing to accept of the ratification of that treaty by Spain. It settles important interests; it secures pacific and harmonious relations with Spain; it provides indemnities to many of our citizens for injuries which Spain acknowledges they have suffered from her; and it gives us Florida, a land useless and expensive to Spain, though, chiefly by its position, valuable to us. But, for all these advantages, we know that we have given in the same treaty ample and generous equivalents to Spain, and she will find herself much deceived if, in the hope of making hereafter a better bargain, she now disdains them. To possess Florida, with the full and fair consent of Spain, is undoubtedly an object of interest to the American Government; but an object of infinitely deeper and dearer interest to them is to observe towards Spain, and all other nations, a just and candid and single-hearted course of conduct, free from fraud, artifice, or disguise; and that which they observe, they demand in return. They will neither themselves practise, nor from others submit to, a disingenuous, double-dealing system of treachery, paltering with its own engagements, and spreading snares for the generous confidence of good faith.

You will, therefore, on no consideration, exchange the ratifications without delivering the declaration prescribed by your instructions when you took charge of the treaty; and you will not fail, if the ratification be withheld, to address an earnest remonstrance to the Spanish Government against the grants themselves, and the circumstances under which they were issued.

The proposal of Mr. Onis's letter to this Department, of 31st October, 1818, was as follows: "That the late grants made by His Majesty in the Floridas, since the 24th of January last, the date of my first note announcing His Majesty's willingness to cede them to the United States, (the said grants having been made with a view to promote population, cultivation, and industry, and not with that of alienating them,) shall be declared null and void, in consideration of the grantees not having complied with the essential conditions of the cessions, as has been the fact." And in his letter of the 10th March, referring to this proposal, he says: "With the frankness and good faith which have uniformly actuated my conduct, and which distinguish the character of the Spanish nation, I have to declare to you, sir, that, when I proposed the revocation of all the grants made subsequently to the date above mentioned, it was with the full belief that it comprehended those made to the Duke of Alagon, as well as any others which had been stipulated at that period."

Here, then, is the express declaration of the Spanish negotiator of that treaty: 1st. That the grants in question were all, in his full belief when he made the proposal, included among those positively annulled by the date; 2d. That these grants had been made by the King, with a view of promoting population, cultivation, and industry, and not with that of alienating the territory; and 3d. That the grants were all null and void, because the grantees had not complied with the essential conditions of the grants.

Now, what shall be said after these plain and positive declarations, when Spain advances, as the only ground of pretence, that these grants were confirmed by the treaty; that they were dated before the 24th January, 1818, indeed, but after the instructions by which Mr. Onis was authorized to make his proposal of that date for the cession of the Floridas had been despatched to him from Madrid? What becomes of his positive assurance that these grants were made for the population and improvement of the territory, and not with a view of alienation? And what was the meaning of Spain in stipulating that an acknowledged debt of indemnities from her to citizens of the United States, at least to the amount of $5,000,000, should be paid from the proceeds of public lands in Florida, when she now comes and says that even while her minister was signing this compact on her part, his sovereign, by a secret and irregular alienation of the lands, had made its accomplishment impossible? In whatever other light it is to be considered, it is an injury to the United States, for which they are entitled to demand and obtain satisfaction. When the Government of a nation degrades itself by flagrant and notorious perfidy, those who are constrained to entertain political relations of neighborhood with them are justified by the law of nature, and it is their duty to themselves, in subsequent transactions with such a state, to take pledges of security for the performance of its engagements more effectual than confidence in its good faith. Such pledges are amply within the reach of the United States, in their intercourse hereafter with Spain; nor is it to be presumed that those who are intrusted with the maintenance of the rights and interests of this nation will overlook or neglect the duty which may be devolved upon them, of taking them.

This despatch will be delivered to you by Captain Read, of the Hornet. If the ultimate decision of the Spanish Government upon the treaty should be still pending on his arrival at Madrid, you will demand it immediately, giving notice that a delay of more than one week after your communication will be taken as a refusal. At the expiration of that time, or sooner if the decision be made known sooner to you, you will despatch Captain Read, that his return to this place may, with all confidence, be expected by the 20th of November. Should the ratifications be exchanged, your leave of absence, contemplated when you left this country, may be used at your discretion; but, if not, the President thinks it best that you should remain at Madrid, to await the contingency of events upon the meeting of Congress.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient and very humble servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JOHN FORSYTH, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, Madrid.

[TRANSLATION.]

Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: PALACE, August 19, 1819.

I have received the note you were pleased to address to me of the 12th instant, in answer to that which I had the honor to write to you on the 10th, announcing the decision which the King, my master, had judged proper to adopt in relation to the treaty concluded at Washington between the Governments of Spain and the United States.

In that note you begin by endeavoring to justify the meaning of the expressions contained in yours of the 21st June, which, however, appear not the less extraordinary and surprising, as I have already intimated to you. But, on this head, I refer to what I have had the honor to express to you in my said note, by which the question will be considered as put at rest, and that on no account will it be agreeable to revive it.

I therefore proceed at once to reply to the leading object of your note; and I flatter myself that my answer will convince you, on the one hand, that the Government of His Catholic Majesty could not observe a course different from that which it has taken on this occasion; and, on the other, that the determination of His Majesty to adopt that course is founded upon his earnest wish, as I have already stated to you, to establish the amicable relations of both our Governments upon a secure and permanent basis.

It is a fact of general notoriety, and must, therefore, be well known to you, that, as soon as the treaty concluded between His Catholic Majesty and the Government of the United States was received here, and its stipulations became known, this important subject was taken into the most serious consideration by the King, my master, as well to examine its provisions minutely as to investigate the consequences to which it might give rise in relation to your Government. From that time, this important business has almost exclusively occupied the attention of the Spanish cabinet; and it was not until after it had received the most mature deliberation that His Catholic Majesty resolved that no final decision could be taken upon it, without previously entering into various explanations and eclaircissemens with the Government of the United States of America.

Any other determination which might have been taken previous to this step would have been, to say the least, precipitate, and exposed to the inconveniences which it is wished to avoid; and especially not to leave the relations of good understanding re-established between both nations liable to interpretations, but to place them on solid and stable principles, as permanent as the sincere and perfect friendship and harmony which it is desired to establish between the two Governments.

The explanations and eclaircissemens desired by His Majesty before a definitive resolution could be taken by him on the affair in question, are not of a nature to be obtained by the means of a messenger despatched to the United States, and the answer to which could arrive here before the 22d of the present month; and still less by reason of the retreat of the minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, who, having made the treaty, and being thoroughly possessed of the whole course of the negotiation, was best qualified to demand the explanations desired. Besides, it having been the uniform wish of His Catholic Majesty to proceed with all possible care and circumspection in an affair of such moment, and having thus investigated it, as I have before stated to you, this circumstance could not have given occasion for the despatch of the messenger as intimated by you.

Nor could the explanations alluded to be entered into here under existing circumstances, on account of the want of time in the short space proposed by you. His Majesty has, therefore, resolved to appoint a confidential person to proceed to the Government of the United States for the purpose of obtaining them; thereby giving a new proof of his deference for the American Government, by his desire to be thoroughly informed of every thing which has passed in relation to the treaty.

It is true that, when this determination which the King, my master, has been pleased to take in relation to this affair will come to the knowledge of your Government, the epoch of the 22d August will have elapsed; but this circumstance need prove no obstacle to the obtaining the requisite explanations and eclaircissemens on the treaty, as it is to be supposed that the American Government would readily have afforded them at an earlier period if the circumstances before pointed out had not prevented their being required immediately.

The communication which I had the honor to make to you on the 10th instant, and which could not have been made sooner, has been realized in due time; and certainly the Government of the United States cannot fail to receive it favorably, if their desires, in conformity with those of His Catholic Majesty, are directed to the auspicious object of seeing the differences which existed between both Governments at once terminated, and their amicable relations consolidated upon a firm and permanent basis.

This being the sole object proposed by His Catholic Majesty, he has judged that, in order to attain it, there was no mode more fit and suitable than to investigate and explain before he gave his sanction to an agreement which is to serve as a basis of the future relations between the two Powers, whatever doubts and elucidations it might have given rise to. He has, therefore, determined to despatch to the seat of the American Government a person charged with stating to it frankly and candidly the wishes of the King, my master, which he flatters himself will be fully accomplished if he is met by similar dispositions, which it appears must be the case if your Government cherish the same sentiments by which His Majesty is animated.

In consequence of what I have herein stated, I trust that you will agree with me that the Government of the King, my master, has proceeded in this affair with all prudence and circumspection; that it has not been possible for it to take a decision upon it until it had previously instituted a full investigation, without being exposed to the hazards of a precipitate determination; and, finally, that the resolution of His Catholic Majesty, far from being liable to an unfavorable interpretation, is the most conducive to promote the principle connected with this affair, and the most likely to regulate in a satisfactory manner, while it, at the same time, reconciles, the interests of both nations.

In this persuasion, I cannot but flatter myself that your communications to your Government will accord with this sentiment, and that they will tend to remove any doubtful interpretation that it might give to the determination adopted by His Catholic Majesty, and which I have already had the honor to communicate to you.

I avail myself with pleasure of this renewed occasion to offer you the assurances of my high and particular consideration. God preserve you many years.

MANUEL GONZALES SALMON.

Mr. Forsyth to Don Manuel G. Salmon.

MADRID, August 21, 1819.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States near His Catholic Majesty, perceives with regret, but without surprise, from Sr. Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon's note of the 19th instant, that the determination made by the Government of Spain not to ratify the convention of the 22d February, signed at Washington by Mr. Adams and the Chevalier de Onis, will not be changed. The undersigned will not waste his own time, nor encroach upon that of His Majesty's Government, by any observations on the said note, but will proceed to discharge the only duty which, on this subject, remains for him to perform. He has the honor formally to announce that, after the 22d day of the present month, as the ratifications of the convention of the 22d February will not have been exchanged, all the claims and pretensions of the United States, which, with the spirit of moderation, the love of peace, and the delusive expectation that all causes of difference and dispute with Spain would be thereby adjusted and settled, they consented to modify or waive, will stand in the same situation as if that convention had never been made; that the United States will hold themselves free to press and enforce them in any and every mode consistent with honor that their interest may require. On the extraordinary steps taken by His Majesty's Government in this affair, the undersigned will not remark, lest he should forget that respect which is due to the Government near which, as the representative of another, he is sent to reside. Of the rumors that prevailed on this subject before the decision of His Majesty's Government was known, (a decision he could not anticipate,) the minister of the United States expressed himself in terms sufficiently strong. As the recent determination has proved that there was but too much truth in what he believed to be unfounded reports and gross calumnies, the undersigned must leave it to His Majesty's Government, upon whom that obligation rests, to show upon what grounds that determination is reconcileable to honor and good faith. The undersigned laments that, while communicating to his own country this unexpected result, it is not in his power to unfold the train of reasoning by which His Majesty's Government has been deluded into a belief that the course taken could be followed without serious injury to the reputation of Spain. The United States, after waiting more than twenty years, with a patience and forbearance unexampled, the operations of reason and justice upon the councils of Spain, will see with astonishment this new instance of her apparent disregard to both. The minister of the United States, when transmitting his correspondence with His Majesty's Government to his own country, will not omit to state the assurances verbally given to him of His Catholic Majesty's earnest desire to cultivate the good-will of the United States—unfruitful professions, that cannot but produce all the effect they deserve, and all that could be rationally expected from them.

The undersigned renews to Sr. Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon the assurances of his perfect consideration and respect.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Sr. Don MANUEL GONZALES SALMON, Acting First Minister of State, &c.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Forsyth (marked private) to Mr. Adams, dated

The duplicates of my despatches by the Hornet not having been forwarded before this, I deem it unnecessary to send you the extract of that part of my private journal, a copy of which was transmitted with my former letters. To the information contained in my official letter of this day's date, I have little to add of much importance. The most interesting fact I am able to communicate is, that the affair of the grants is not the sole or the principal difficulty with this Government. After receiving Mr. Salmon's note of the 10th instant, and ascertaining from Duke Laval that this Government expected me to insist on the King's agreeing to receive Mr. Onis's declaration, or to make one of his own, I gave information to the duke, with the expectation and belief that he would communicate to the Government, and to the parties interested, that this was a mistake. I had no instructions to insist upon either. We expected the King might offer it; but if he did not, the treaty was already ratified by the United States, and the act could not be recalled. To produce a good effect, I said, also, that the mistake about the grants must be corrected, if the business should be (what was altogether improbable) settled amicably in the United States. The only hope of the grantees was, to have the exchange of ratifications made here. Relying upon the correctness of the information received here of the date of Punon Rostro's and Alagon's grant, and the opinion that the cedula was the first valid act of the concession, and, of course, the date of the grant must be the date of the cedula, I intimated to Mr. Salmon that the difficulty in regard to the donations could be obviated here. His reply was, that there were other points upon which the King wished explanations. What these are, I have collected from other sources. The first and great object in view is to procure an assurance that we will not recognise Buenos Ayres, &c. The extreme pertinacity and anxiety on this subject has its origin in the disclosure made by Great Britain of the conversations between Mr. Rush and Lord Castlereagh on the contemplated reception of a consul general, to reside officially in the United States, from the provinces of La Plata. This disclosure has done us no good. Sir Henry Wellesley, to whom, on his stating that he was endeavoring to promote our objects here, I remarked that I considered much of the difficulty of our affair was imputable to this cause, gave a very plausible answer; of its truth I am sceptical. He said the object was to show to Spain the absolute necessity of a settlement of our differences with her. Whatever was the motive, the effect has not been happy. The instructions to Onis were given before this disclosure was made; it was not useful in producing those instructions; and it is equally clear, from the conduct of Spain, that it has not had the effect of inducing her to ratify what her minister, under these instructions, promised in her name. Sir Henry Wellesley has at all times held very reasonable language, and friendly, in relation to this affair; and, since the above conversation, he has certainly taken some pains to promote our wishes. He tells me that he sent a message by a confidential agent to the Duke of Infantado, who had urged the argument that Great Britain ought not to be irritated by the cession of Florida to us; that he was entirely mistaken in supposing Great Britain adverse to the ratification of the convention, and that he had directions from the British ministry to press the ratification. He told Salmon that Spain would hazard much by refusing it, and that the objects he had in view could be better accomplished by ratifying immediately. After the determination of this Government was know, (and it was known immediately,) he conversed with me, and wished me to believe that it was all imputable to the dispute about the grants. I said this could not be, as the Government must know that the King having it in his power to accept or reject Onis's declaration, he could throw upon us the burden of refusing the exchange of ratifications. He then asked if the affair of the grants could be got over here. For the reasons stated in the first part of this letter for my disclosures to Laval and Salmon, and believing myself justified by my instructions after the receipt of the letter of the 10th of August, I replied I was confident they could be. He proposed to me to permit him to engage Tatischeff, the Russian minister, whose influence and means of communicating with the Government are said to be superior to all the rest of the corps diplomatique, to have this suggestion communicated to the King. To this I consented; but as I thought it would be better, if Tatischeff did any thing, to procure his good offices by an immediate application, I apprized him of this conversation. He was very friendly in his expressions, personally believed the ratification necessary and proper for Spain, and certainly the policy of Europe required it to be done. Sir Henry and Tatischeff had a similar conversation, and the suggestion was made. The next time I saw the Russian minister, he said, If you can give assurances that there will be no recognition of the South American Governments, the treaty will be ratified. I replied, if that is the case, there will be no ratification. I had previously furnished Duke Laval with a memorandum on this topic, which, after keeping twenty-four hours, and, I have no doubt, showing it to Lozano Torres, who is supreme here, he returned it to me. The substance of it was, that the system of the Government was an impartial neutrality; it had been adhered to when we had, in our differences with Spain, the most powerful inducements to abandon it; that, when these differences were settled, there could be no inducement to change it. If Spain desired us to remain stationary in the dispute with her colonies, the first step to secure her object was to ratify our treaty, then to consult our wishes, and so to shape her policy as to inspire a sentiment of good-will powerful enough to counteract the prepossessions naturally entertained for the people of South America by the people of the United States. This was the rational mode, and, in fact, the only mode of reaching her point. To refuse our treaty, and ask, as a condition of it, that we would not recognise, was the certain way to disappoint their wishes. The Government would not consider such a proposition. This memorandum I showed to Tatischeff. He said, what it contained was true and just, but there was no reasoning with ignorance and presumption. I did not hold any of these conversations until after the note of the 10th was received; and I was careful to express the desire that these gentlemen should do what was done, not with a view to our interest, but to prevent Spain from injuring herself, and endangering what is termed the pacific policy of Europe.

On the whole, I am impressed with a belief that they will propose to exchange ratifications in Washington, with the insertion of a promise not to recognise the Patriot Governments, and to preserve the grants. The latter will be as a dernier resort, given up as the price of the first. Without this, or something equivalent, we may do ourselves justice; they will not.

Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando.

SIR: MADRID, October 2, 1819.

The Government of the United States, having been prepared to expect the possibility of a failure on the part of Spain to ratify the convention of the 22d of February last, by the extraordinary delay to decide upon this subject, and the determination of the King further to postpone that decision, as communicated in the note of Mr. Salmon to me of the 19th of June, have instructed me, should the final decision on it by the King not be made prior to this time, to inform the Government of His Catholic Majesty that, although the six months stipulated in the treaty, within which the ratifications were to be exchanged, have expired, the ratification of Spain, made with the explicit understanding that the large grants of land in Florida to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, and all others made under similar circumstances, are, by the eighth article of that convention, null and void, and will be so held by the United States, will be accepted as valid; and I am authorized to receive the Spanish ratification for that of the United States, provided this exchange shall be immediate. This exchange must take place soon enough to enable me to send the ratified treaty to the United States by Captain Read, of the sloop of war Hornet, of the navy of the United States, who will remain in Madrid ten days to carry to the President the final determination of Spain on this important subject. Having received from your excellency's predecessors in office no explanation of the particular causes of the delay that has taken place, it is in my power only to explain the reasons which induce the Government of the United States to insist upon an explicit understanding of the force and obligation of the eighth article of the treaty prior to the exchange of ratifications—an understanding which will be fully shown by a declaration I am instructed to present at the time of the exchange, should it ever take place, a copy of which is enclosed. It was rumored in the United States, and, since my residence in Madrid, I have been informed, that the large grantees declare that their grants are valid under the eighth article. It has been asserted, with the strongest appearances of truth, that the determination of the Government of the United States to hold them void, as expressed in the letter of Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, to Mr. Onis, of the 10th of March, 1819, has been one of the chief causes of the extraordinary delay to decide upon the ratification of the instrument in Spain. It is necessary to the honor and the interest of the United States, whose conduct to Spain and to all nations is governed by frankness and justice, free from fraud, artifice, and disguise, which they will never practise, nor from others submit to a disingenuous, double-dealing system of treachery, paltering with its own engagements, and spreading snares for the generous confidence of good faith, to place this subject beyond the reach of difficulty or doubt. Without knowing, therefore, the dates of the respective grants alluded to, and supposing it barely possible that there is a foundation for a pretension of the grantees under the eighth article, the Government directs me to present the declaration in question, not less essential to its own interest than to the honor of the King of Spain, since His Majesty would be subjected to the most unworthy imputations if, under the circumstances, a claim should be made by his subjects, or those holding under them, founded upon the alleged validity of these grants.

To suppose that your excellency is not in possession of all the facts in relation to this subject, would be a reflection on the zeal and fidelity of the representative of Spain in the United States, which I would be unwilling to cast upon any officer of His Majesty's Government. I do not, therefore, send you copies of those documents, which show explicitly that, prior and subsequent to the signature of the treaty, it was expressly understood by the negotiators of that instrument that the eighth article, written by the Spanish minister himself, excluded these grants. In fact, when the lands of Florida were ceded, with an express stipulation that the claims of the citizens of the United States upon Spain were to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of them, to suppose that the Spanish Government had disposed of the whole or the greater part of them in gifts to its subjects, and will insist upon the validity of those gifts, is to suppose it capable of an act of notorious and deliberate perfidy. The Government of my country considered that the treaty became, from the moment of its signature by the Chevalier de Onis, and the ratification of the United States, as binding upon the honor and good faith of the Spanish King and nation as it would be after the ratification. Although I do not understand that this position is, or will be, contested by Spain, it may not be useless to show its strength fully to the view of your excellency. The words of His Catholic Majesty, in the full power given to Mr. Onis, the original of which was delivered to the American Government before the signature of the treaty, are, after authorizing Mr. Onis to treat, negotiate, and conclude a treaty, whereby past differences may be adjusted, and a firm and lasting peace established between the two Governments: "Obligandonos y prometemos, en fé y palabra de Rey, que aprobaremos, ratificaremos, cumpliremos, y haremos observar y cumplir inviolablemente quanto por vos fuere estipulado y firmado; para lo qual os concedo todas las facultades y plenos poderes en la forma mas amplia que de derecho se requieren." If the usage of nations, which requires the ratification of the sovereign for the full confirmation of a treaty, could create any doubt of the import of language so unqualified and explicit, there is nothing dubious or uncertain in the extent of the obligation resting upon him by the signature of his minister, vested with such full powers. Upon this principle, the following quotations from Vattel and Martens are decisive authorities: "Sovereigns treat together by the agency of their attorneys or their mandatories, clothed with sufficient powers; they are commonly called plenipotentiaries. All the rules of the law of nature, concerning things performed by commission, are here applicable. The rights of the agent are defined by the authority given to him. From this he must not depart; but whatever he promises within the terms of his commission, and according to the extent of his powers, is binding upon his constituent." "At this time, to avoid all danger and difficulty, princes reserve to themselves the right of ratifying that which has been concluded by their ministers in their name. The full power is merely a commission, cum libera. If this commission were to have its full effect, it should be given with the utmost circumspection; but, as princes can be constrained to fulfil their obligations only by force of arms, the custom has arisen of relying upon their treaties only after they have sanctioned and ratified them. Whatever the minister has concluded remaining ineffectual until the ratification of the prince, there is less danger in giving him a full power. But to refuse, with honor, to ratify that which has been concluded in virtue of a full power, the sovereign must have strong and solid reasons for it, and, particularly, he must show that his minister transcended his instructions."—Vattel, book 2, chap. 12, § 156.

"Every thing that has been stipulated by an agent, in conformity to his full powers, ought to become obligatory for the state from the moment of signing, without ever waiting for the ratification. However, not to expose a state to the errors of a single person, it is now become a general maxim that public conventions do not become obligatory until ratified. The motive of this custom clearly proves that the ratification can never be refused with justice, except when he who is charged with the negotiation, keeping within the extent of his public full powers, has gone beyond his secret instructions, and consequently rendered himself liable to punishment, or when the other party refuses to ratify."—Martens's Summary, book 2, chap. 3. But why should quotations be made to prove a principle so familiar to every man in public or private life, that what is promised in his name, by his authority, and according to his directions, is as binding in honor and conscience as if he had pledged himself in person? The obligation of the King of Spain, therefore, in honor and in justice, to ratify the treaty signed by his minister, is as perfect and unqualified as his royal promise in the full power, and it gives to the United States the right, equally perfect, to compel the performance of that promise. It is well known to my Government that the Spanish Government cannot allege that its minister transcended his secret instructions, or that the ratification of the United States has been refused, or that any unfair advantage was taken by the United States in the negotiation, or that Spain was not well aware beforehand of the full extent of the engagements contracted by Mr. Onis. It is too well known to be denied that the last instructions of Mr. Onis authorized him to concede much more than he did. The Government of the United States, indeed, considered the generosity and moderation of the terms to which they had acceded as a pledge that they would be received, as in the first instance they were received, by His Catholic Majesty and his royal council with pride and joy. If, from the unexpected extent of the sacrifices the United States made for the purposes of conciliation, the conclusion has been drawn that their conciliatory temper may be trifled with and abused, it is just and proper that Spain should be effectually undeceived. I am, therefore, instructed further to inform your excellency that, if the ratified copy of the treaty should not arrive in the United States before the first day on which the Congress of the United States meets, the President will lay before that body all the transactions relating to the treaty, and such measures will be adopted by the competent authority as the exigency of the case may require. Whatever may be determined upon, Spain will be responsible to the United States for all damages and expenses which may arise from the delay to ratify, and from the measures to which the United States may resort to give efficacy to their rights, and that, for the indemnities to which they will be justly entitled by this violation of faith by Spain, the United States will look to the territory west of their present western boundary on the Gulf of Mexico.

To this proposal, made in the spirit of moderation, of generous forbearance, and with the earnest desire of sincere amity with Spain, I am instructed to require an immediate, explicit, and unequivocal reply. Should this reply not be made before the 10th of the current month, I give formal notice to your excellency that the proposal will be considered as rejected, and the proper communication will be made to the President of the United States.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, First Minister of State, &c.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga to Mr. Forsyth.

Sir: Palace, October 8, 1819.

Having had the honor to lay before the King, my master, the contents of the note which you addressed to me on the 2d instant, His Majesty, whose justice and impartiality are so universally known, having examined the principal points embraced therein, has commanded me to answer you as follows:

The official communications addressed to you by Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon might exempt me, it would seem, from all further discussion of the subject in question; inasmuch as His Majesty, actuated as well by the claims of his honor and duty as by a uniform spirit of justice and conciliation towards the United States, and pursuing the example of his august predecessors, who, at an early period, and to promote the very establishment of the American Government, gave such abundant proofs of similar dispositions, had determined, upon mature reflection and deliberation, to send a minister to that Government, who, after requiring and giving the necessary explanations, might terminate this affair; and as neither the actual state of the question, nor what you have been pleased to communicate to me, presents any motive for changing a resolution so deliberate and so just, and which the honor of His Majesty also forbids, there appears to be a still more urgent motive to confirm it.

With this answer I might leave you completely satisfied; but I especially take leave, with the permission of the King, my lord, to reply to some of the points treated of in your note with the brevity and precision which charac-terize me; and because you state that you have not yet received an explanation of the delay in ratifying the treaty, and attribute it to the difficulties arising out of its eighth article. You will permit me to remark to you that this delay does not manifest that want of good faith, or the artifice which is indirectly insinuated; it is rather the declaration now demanded by you, and previously announced by your Government, after having signed and ratified the treaty—a declaration which, by annulling one of its most clear, express, and conclusive articles, seemed much more likely to give room for a similar charge in opposition to yours.

If your Government, as you are pleased to state to me, really believed that the treaty, from the moment it was signed, became equally obligatory on Spain as it was on the United States, under whose immediate inspection it was formed, signed, and ratified, you will permit me to remark that, whether we consider that point, or weigh the authority of authors cited by you in support of your opinion, the deductions from them, and the weight of many others I now forbear to adduce, as it might seem to offend your illustration, militate against you. But even fancying them for a moment, without ever admitting them, the very authorities which you deem conclusive in relation to a treaty signed but not ratified, are opposed to you, or require still more forcibly that an agreement concluded, signed, and solemnly ratified, as the present one has been by your Government, should be subjected to a due investigation. And if, notwithstanding this, declarations are required at the moment of its solemn conclusion, and before its ratification by the other party, which totally annul one of its most clear, precise, and conclusive articles, without the sanction of a secret agreement authorizing the same, how should it appear strange that His Majesty, while yet unfettered by its stipulations, might and should demand explanations rendered necessary by so unlooked-for a proceeding? In the transaction of settlements or agreements between nation and nation, the solemn act which consummates them, namely, the ratification, would become wholly illusory, if the principles which it is now in vain attempted to establish were to be admitted. I again repeat, that the very authorities cited by you literally declare, as I have already remarked, that the sovereign, for strong and solid reasons, or if his minister has exceeded his instructions, may refuse his ratification, [Vattel, lib. 2, cap. 12,] and that public treaties are not obligatory until ratified. [Martens, lib. 2, cap. 3. See note.]

No less erroneous, and even unprecedented, is the judgment or consequence you draw from the instructions which you suppose to have been given to His Majesty's minister for the conclusion of this treaty. Truly it would be the first time that a diplomatic communication, professing to be thoroughly and minutely acquainted with these instructions, should cite them as being perfectly well known. The respect due to the King's negotiators will not for a moment allow me to believe they have failed in their obligations, by violating secrecy; nor will the high consideration I entertain for your Government permit me to think it capable of having employed the oblique and vitious means that such information must imply. It is, therefore, wholly impossible for me to admit your assertion on this point.

But, dismissing so unpleasant a discussion, and desiring to express to you anew the spirit of conciliation and friendship which prompts the King, my master, to put an end to these differences, as I declared to you in the beginning of this note, I am enabled to assure you that it is a subject of great regret to His Majesty that such weighty considerations should have hitherto obliged him to defer the ratification of the treaty concluded by his minister to the Federal Government. These considerations, already stated by Don Manuel Gonzales Salmon on communicating to you His Majesty's determination, acquire additional force when we find that intelligence has been received, through the medium of general information, newspapers, and correspondence, that an expedition directed against the province of Texas has been tolerated or protected, and other acts committed within the limited but unexpired term assigned for the ratification, which, as you will be duly informed, have justly called for the remonstrances of His Majesty's chargé d'affaires to your Government. Notwithstanding His Majesty has uniformly evinced a desire to maintain a perfect union and amity with the American Government, yet, to render these stable and permanent between two nations who, under favor of a state of amity, are endeavoring to settle their differences, it is necessary they should be based upon reciprocal utility and confidence. In the indulgence of these noble and generous sentiments, His Majesty confidently looks to the attainment of this desirable result. This was the object of the treaty—an object unfortunately not attained, notwithstanding the enormous sacrifices which the King, my master, condescended to make. In these feelings and dispositions His Majesty still perseveres, by adopting a measure judged indispensable—that of sending to the Government of the United States, as will promptly be done, a person possessing his entire confidence, and who, by smoothing the obstacles or removing the difficulties which have hitherto opposed the accomplishment of his beneficent intentions, may fully convince the Federal Government of the frankness and loyalty, as well as of the honor and dignity, which it is His Majesty's desire to maintain in his relations of amity and union with that Government.

Whereupon, I renew to you my sincere respects; and I pray God to preserve you many years.

THE DUKE OF SAN FERNANDO AND QUIROGA.

To the MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY of the United States of America.

Extract of a letter of Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, October 10, 1819.

Captain Read reached Cadiz on the 17th instant. The condition of that dreadfully afflicted place, and the neighboring towns, obliged him, after remaining some hours in the bay, to go to Gibraltar. From Gibraltar he made his way, with some difficulty, to Santa Cruz, one hundred miles from Madrid. From Santa Cruz, I received information that he was stopped there. I applied immediately to the Secretary of State for permission for him to pursue his journey. I directed Mr. Brent, who went to see the Duke of San Fernando, to say that if the permission to Captain Read could not be given, I must request a passport for myself to ride that far to confer with him. While in a very uneasy state of suspense, Captain Read arrived, and delivered me your letter of the 18th August, with duplicate of your No. 6, with the documents. Two or three hours after he reached Madrid, I was informed by the Secretary of State that he must perform at Santa Cruz a quarantine of eight or ten days. The correspondence between us will show in what manner the captain was enabled to continue his journey; copies are enclosed, marked Nos. 6, 7, 8. On the night of the 3d, I had, preparatory to the offer to exchange the ratifications according to my instructions, a long conversation with the Duke of San Fernando. I did not discover in this interview any reasonable prospect of the immediate acceptance of the treaty. The duke professed to be anxious to preserve a good understanding with the United States—that the King wished explanations, &c. On my asking him what would be the conduct of Spain? would the treaty be ratified if these explanations were not satisfactory? he replied, that was a point upon which his royal master had not expressed his pleasure. In the course of the conversation, he expressed the hope that my note would be couched in respectful terms; that, if it was not, I must not be surprised if it was returned to me. I told him that the note was prepared by, and according to the instructions of my Government, and, if returned to me, I should not consider the offence as personal, but as offered to the United States.

To avoid the very disagreeable consequences which must ensue, I suggested that if he found any thing harsh in the note, I would change it, if it could be done without altering its meaning or impairing its strength; but that no term could be touched which was essential to convey, substantially, what the note contained. After a very long interview, not at all satisfactory, except as it proved the good dispositions and politeness of the Secretary of State, I delivered my official note, copy marked No. 9,* with the proposal in Spanish, marked P, that the minister might be immediately master of what was asked and expected of the King. The answer of the minister was delivered this afternoon. The copy of it is marked No. 10. The Spanish Government will persist in the plan of sending a minister to ask explanations at Washington. The note of the Duke of San Fernando confirms the information already given of the points on which these explanations will be asked. I cannot venture to conjecture what will be the conduct of this Government, should it not receive what it wishes to procure from us. In the mean time, although it is said that General Vives is named to go to Washington, it is not certain. To-morrow I shall ask for copies of the grants to Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas, preparatory to the remonstrance I am directed to make, and to my reply to the note of the duke. I hope to send you copies of the grants, and of my reply; but shall not detain Captain Read if they are not ready before he is prepared for his journey. He will leave this on Tuesday morning for Malaga, to which place the Hornet must go from Gibraltar, to take him on board, all travelling from Spain being interdicted by the governor of that fortress.

Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga.

SIR: MADRID, September 30, 1819.

Captain Read, commanding the sloop of war Hornet, of the navy of the United States, bearing despatches to me from the American Government, has been stopped on his way from Gibraltar to this place. I have the honor to apply to your excellency for an order to the proper authority to permit him to pursue his journey. Captain Read arrived at Gibraltar on the 20th instant, his crew in good health, from the port of New York. Although the quarantine regulations at Gibraltar are at this time particularly severe, his vessel was immediately admitted to pratique. At St. Roque the captain received assurances from the director of posts that he would meet no difficulty in proceeding to this city. The Hornet was anchored for a few hours in the bay of Cadiz. The enclosed correspondence between the American consul and the junta de sanidad will show that she had no communication with any vessel in the harbor during her short stay in the bay. Under these circumstances, I trust the order for which this application is made will be immediately given.

I seize every occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my very distinguished respect.

SIR: PALACE, September 30, 1819.

Having received information from the supreme board of health, in consequence of your note of this day's date relating to the detention of Captain Read at Santa Cruz, conformably with the opinion given by the aforesaid board, and founded upon the laws enacted for the preservation of health, it is my duty to inform you that the said captain and his crew are respectively subjected to a quarantine of eight or ten days, with the requisite purification of all effects susceptible of contagion; and that, if it be your determination to go and confer with him, you may proceed to do so, on subjecting yourself to the same conditions.

I hope, therefore, that you will inform me of your intentions on this point, that I may transmit the necessary orders by to-morrow's mail.

I reiterate the assurances of my high consideration, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

THE DUKE OF SAN FERNANDO AND QUIROGA.

To the MINISTER of the United States.

No. 8.

Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, First Minister of State, &c.

SIR: MADRID.

Captain Read, of the navy of the United States, with despatches from my Government, whose detention at Santa Cruz caused me to address your excellency on the 30th September, arrived in Madrid a few hours before I had the honor to receive a reply. A short time after he was stopped at Santa Cruz he learned that the order of the junta de sanidad was directed only to the director of the posts, and prohibited only travelling with post-horses from Andalusia. As he came from Gibraltar with regular passports, there was nothing to prevent him from pursuing his journey in the private or hired conveyance in which he prosecuted it to this place. In performing his own duty, he had neither inclination nor intention to violate any of the ordinances of any of the authorities of the kingdom, nor, as far as he was informed, did he infringe upon the established regulations. I should not have thought it necessary to mention his arrival, except incidentally, had not the answer of your excellency to my official note, in his behalf, been written under the expectation that he would be detained in quarantine eight or ten days, and had it not given also the very extraordinary intimation that I should be subjected to a similar restriction if I went to confer with him at the place to which he was restricted.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Proposal (in Spanish) transmitted by Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, in his note dated October 10, 1819.

Although the six months stipulated for the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty concluded between the Government of the United States and Spain, at Washington, on the 22d of February last, have expired, I am authorized by the President to make known to His Catholic Majesty that the ratification by Spain will be received as valid on the precise and express condition that the grants of lands in the Floridas, made to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, and, in like manner, any others which shall have been made under similar circumstances, shall, in conformity with the eighth article of the said convention or treaty, be null and void, and shall never be admitted by the United States. The force and effect of the said article shall be shown by a declaration to be presented on the exchange of the ratifications by the American minister, unless His Catholic Majesty should prefer the declaration to be made by the Spanish Government. I am authorized to make the exchange immediately when this is done. It is essentially necessary that the exchange be made in season, so as to enable me to transmit the ratified treaty to the United States by Captain Read, of the national sloop of war Hornet, who will remain ten days at Madrid for the purpose of being the bearer to the President of the final decision of His Catholic Majesty on this important concern.

* Communicated to Congress with the message of 7th December, 1819.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, October 10, 1819.

The arrival of the Hornet produced a great deal of anxiety here. As soon as it was known that Captain Read was in Madrid, the Duke Laval paid me a visit to learn for what she was sent back. Anxious to apprize the Government as early as possible what we required of it, I told him what I should immediately propose, and gave him permission to communicate it to the Secretary of State if he thought proper. Before my official letter was copied, Duke Laval paid me another visit. He had seen the Secretary of State, and had promised to engage me to have a conversation with the Secretary before my note was sent in; seeing no objection to this, I kept back my note, to be delivered at our interview, which took place the ensuing night. I was led to believe that the Government might be induced to agree to the proposal I was directed to make, but was apprehensive that the manner of presenting it would form an insurmountable obstacle. With this view, I prepared the Spanish note sent with my despatch of to-day, intending to say to the Duke of San Fernando, if the proposal was accepted, that that might be considered the official note, and the other would be received again from his hands. Finding no just grounds in his conversation to believe the proposal would be acceded to, I determined to present it, as I did, as an unofficial paper for the convenience of the Minister of State. The subsequent observation that my note would be returned, if not respectfully written, satisfied me that this determination was more than judicious. This suggestion was made with as much delicacy as it could be made, and seemed to arise from the apprehension that their dignity would compel them to a step it was very obvious they would have taken with great reluctance. Indeed, when the duke informed me that the courtesy of nations did not permit one Power to prescribe to another the time within which a thing required must be granted or refused, I began to imagine that, according to their ideas of respectful treatment, the return of the note was certain. Had it been returned, I should have had the honor of making this communication to you in person. The present Secretary of State is sincerely disposed to preserve good terms with us. The influence of the grantees is still predominant, and will, I apprehend, continue until something stronger than words is used to bring our disputes to an end. Onis has been in Madrid since the last of August, a private man; it is understood that the King does not impute blame to him, yet he has never been consulted in any of the several councils that have been called on the subject. The present minister has had some informal conversations with him, but he has given neither explanation nor advice to the Government, because he has not been asked for either.

It will surprise you to be informed that there are persons about this court who want a war with the United States. There are very many individuals who have licenses to fit out privateers; these are looking with eagerness to the chance of enriching themselves at our expense. As to the effect upon their country, that is another affair, about which they are indifferent. The maxim is almost universal here—if I am enriched, it is of no consequence how much the country is distressed.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated

"By the return of the Hornet, which sailed from Malaga on the 20th, you have been informed that I applied, on the 10th instant, to the Spanish Government for copies of the large grants to Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas. Receiving no answer to this application before Captain Read left Madrid, I addressed a second note on the 15th. On the 16th, I received from the Duke of San Fernando the refusal to furnish them. The whole correspondence on this subject is enclosed, marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4. This refusal was as unexpected to me as it no doubt will be to you." "The best information I could procure of these donations was immediately obtained." "You will perceive that, in the remonstrance made, (according to your instructions received by the Hornet,) a copy of which is enclosed, marked No. 5, I have not made any distinction between the three grants, but examined the questions between the two Governments as if they stood on the same footing. If my idea is correct, that the royal order conveys no title, they are alike, the cedulas of the three being subsequent to the 24th January, 1818; and, as it regards the conduct of the United States, the stipulation was perfect for the exclusion of all. In addition to this, as the Spanish Government has not explained itself fully, I was not bound to know that they made any distinction between them. It may, for aught that appears, insist that Vargas's grant is valid, either from the date being different from what I suppose it to be, or on some other ground. As to the conduct of Spain, the difference of the dates of the grants, and the accidental difference of a day between the date fixed by the treaty and that of the donation of Vargas, cannot affect the conclusion drawn; while the peculiar nature of the last donation was important to show the character of the whole transaction. By the extract of your letter to Mr. Onis of the 31st October, 1818, it appears that some remonstrances were made by Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro about the time these donations were made. No trace of these remonstrances [is] to be found in this legation, except a letter, marked private, from Mr. Pizarro, of the 19th July, 1818, in which he requests Mr. Erving not to give himself any uneasiness on the subject of these donations.

"I have already, in my No. 7, informed you that there is no copy here of Mr. Erving's correspondence with the Department of State. Not knowing the extent of his communications on that subject, I am not aware that any benefit could have been derived from them. I am told here that the proceedings in these donations were suspended for some time; that Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas were required to give up, and did surrender, their grants to the Crown; and that Punon Rostro was preparing, if he did not actually make a memorial to the King, for certain commercial privileges, as a remuneration for his loss. This information, although it came from such a quarter that I could place perfect reliance on its correctness, did not come to me in such a shape that I could use it in addressing the Spanish Government. The court has been so fully occupied with the marriage of the King, and the distribution of the gracias usually bestowed on these occasions, that our affair seems to be forgotten. General Vives, who is still said to be destined for the United States as minister plenipotentiary, has not yet arrived in Madrid. He had a command within the limits of the country, between which and the capital intercourse was prohibited on account of the yellow fever; and it is said that he is performing quarantine, preparatory to coming to this place. I use the impersonal, for no part of the information respecting Vives, his appointment or movements, comes to me, directly or indirectly, from this Government.

"A report has been industriously circulated here that some arrangement had been made by Spain and Britain, in consequence of the probability of a war between Spain and the United States. So much was said about it, that, without giving any credit to it, I deemed it prudent to inquire into its truth. My first application was made to Sir Henry Wellesley, to whom I spoke of it jestingly, as a proof of the extravagance and folly of the suppositions and surmises of the Puerta del Sol; (the place where the news of the day is discussed by Spanish politicians.) He spoke of it in the same strain; but our conversation concluded by a most solemn assurance given, on his honor, that there was not the slightest foundation for such a report; that the only arrangement lately made with Spain related to the terms of an old contract for permission to the British Government to purchase specie in Spanish America."

The minister plenipotentiary of the United States presents his compliments to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, and had the honor to request of his excellency, on the 10th instant, copies of the grants made to the Duke of Alagon, to the Count of Punon Rostro, and to Mr. Vargas, which it is very important for him to have.

The minister trusts that these copies will be furnished as expeditiously as possible, and renews the assurance of his distinguished respect.

The Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga to Mr. Forsyth.

PALACE, October 15, 1819.

The Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga presents his compliments to Mr. John Forsyth, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, and has the honor to inform him that, having made known to the King, his lord, the wish of Mr. Forsyth to obtain authentic copies of the grants of land made to the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, His Majesty has declared that it is not possible for him to comply with this wish without being wanting in what is due to his dignity; as he conceives that his word, alone, in the matter of the grants, is, in addition to their publicity, the most authentic certificate that can or ought to be given.

The duke renews to the minister plenipotentiary his wish to be entirely devoted to him, and that God may long preserve his life.

No. 4.

Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga.

MADRID, October 16, 1819.

John Forsyth, the minister plenipotentiary of the United States of North America, presents his respects to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, and acknowledges the receipt of his note of the 15th October.

The American minister considers the refusal to furnish the copies of the grants of the Duke of Alagon, Count Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, for which he applied, as singular as the reason that is assigned for it. These donations having unfortunately produced new differences between the United States and Spain, he believed that he had a right to expect copies of them whenever an application was made to procure them. He is not aware that the royal word has been given in this business, and would now request to be informed where it is to be found, if he was confident it could be done without offending the royal dignity—a dignity so refined and ethereal as to be above the comprehension of an American minister. His excellency the Secretary of State and Despatch has said, individually, and by permission of the King, that the declaration intended to be presented by the American minister, if the exchange of the ratification of the convention of the 22d February took place, contradicted the eighth article of that instrument. From this assertion an inference was to be drawn that the above-mentioned grants, or some of them, were of a date prior to the 24th January, 1818, the day named in that article of the treaty. Without failing in the respect due to the Secretary of State, and which the American minister desires at all times to exhibit, it was important for him to ascertain whether all or a part of these grants were considered valid by Spain; whether made prior to, at the time of, or subsequent to the authority given to Mr. Onis to offer a cession of Florida to the United States; whether the whole, or only a part, and, if a part, what part of the lands in that territory was included in them—information necessary to the formation of a correct judgment of the character of this transaction. His excellency the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga must be sensible that copies of these grants can be obtained only from the persons owning them, or from the archives of the Indies; and that the minister of the United States, having no right to believe that the owners would submit the original papers to his inspection, or suffer copies to be taken of them, had no resource but an application to the Government.

Not having procured the desired information from the most authentic source, he will be under the necessity of seeking it wherever it can be found; and if, in presenting this subject hereafter to His Majesty's Government, any error should be communicated, the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga will not forget the application made for correct information, and the refusal to give it.

John Forsyth, the American minister, reiterates to his excellency the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga the assurances of his profound consideration.

No. 5.

Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga.

SIR: MADRID, October 18, 1819.

I have had the honor to receive your excellency's answer of the 8th instant to my official note of the 2d.

It is not with a vain hope of producing any effect upon the opinions of this Government that I refer again to this subject; a determination being deliberately made, and comporting, as your excellency says, with the honor of the King, it will no doubt be adhered to. Time and experience are the correctors of the errors of states and kingdoms; and the hour comes when the wisdom or imprudence of this determination will be sufficiently apparent.

Having communicated to my Government the correspondence between us, the business is at rest; but I avail myself of the opportunity offered by the performance of another duty to make some observations called for by your excellency's note. That His Majesty should recur to the example of his predecessor in considering the subject of the convention, is perfectly natural; since, to the friendship existing between the United States and his ancestor, His Majesty is indebted for the possession of that territory of Florida proposed to be ceded by it; but the King is deceived and misled when he believes that the United States or any other Power can see in the recent or previous conduct of his Government the spirit of conciliation and good-will. The stubborn integrity of reason rejects all the professions that are contradicted by the actions of princes and states. Knowing his own intentions, your excellency's royal master may consider the opinions already formed as harsh and injurious; but it is the unfortunate peculiarity of this negotiation that every thing done and left undone by Spain serves to justify them. I will not recapitulate what has been previously urged, but content myself with reminding your excellency that two months have elapsed since I was informed by Mr. Salmon that explanations would be asked at Washington; I am still to learn to whom this duty is to be intrusted. Judging from this delay, I might, did I consider it important, ask your excellency, Will the person in whom the King confides see the United States in the beginning or towards the end of the ensuing year?

Your excellency has misconceived the purport of what has been urged in regard to the obligation imposed by the signature of his minister to the treaty on the King. You suppose it to be directed to the obligation to execute the treaty; it was directed to the obligation to ratify it. Nothing is more clear than the obligation imposed in this case by justice and honor. What is extraordinary in your excellency's answer is, the supposition that the United States are bound by the treaty, while Spain is at liberty, and according to circumstances, to bind herself or not. The United States were bound until the 22d of August last; beyond that period the question of the treaty is as open to my Government as to that of your excellency's royal master. The offer made to accept the ratification of Spain as valid since that period was altogether gratuitous, and sprung from motives, it would appear, not duly appreciated or understood. It is true the Government of the United States has an alternative to choose: the treaty may be considered as binding on both the parties to it, and an attempt made to compel a performance; or a resort may be had to the original claims, and an exertion made to enforce them.

Your excellency supposes it impossible that the assertion that Mr. Onis did not exceed his secret instructions can be made good. If the production of a copy of those instructions were necessary to show the correctness of such an assertion, certainly it could not be shown; but there is a species of moral demonstration of the terms of secret instructions which is sufficiently strong to satisfy the judgments of men, without the necessity of calling in question the integrity of negotiators or the purity of Governments. Abundant materials for the demonstration of this assertion exist, and will be used whenever it shall be necessary. To the number of these your excellency has furnished an additional one, of conclusive force, by resting your observation not upon the fact that the secret instructions were violated, but upon the impossibility of producing proof that they were not.

Your excellency errs in supposing me acquainted with the reclamations made by His Majesty's chargé d'affaires in America, or with the incursions into the territory of Texas—incursions neither protected nor tolerated by my Government; and, if they have been made, were secretly prepared and executed before it was practicable for it to interfere. As they could have no possible connexion with the question of ratification, they have not been communicated to me by the Government of the United States. Neither of these, however, can justify the delay that has taken place, since the power of His Majesty to require, and the inclination and ability of the United States to make, reparation for any injuries done to Spain would not have been affected by the ratification of the treaty. It may not, however, be useless to suggest to His Majesty's Government that the failure to ratify by Spain has deprived her of the right to expect reparation for any incursion into Texas, as a large portion of what is termed the province of Texas is within the limit claimed by the United States—a claim yet existing, since the convention of the 22d of February is not ratified by Spain, whose best title to the said territory was contained in that instrument.

Your excellency is not happy in supposing there is any justification for the delay to ratify, and the determination to ask explanations, in the example of my Government in relation to the eighth article of the treaty. The United States have not asked, nor do they ask, any explanation of the article in question. They understand it to impose a certain obligation entered into according to the intention of the parties. They were informed that their intention was not fairly or fully expressed, and, as justice and good faith required, they gave notice to the Spanish Government of their resolution to execute the article according to its spirit and intention. The address to Mr. Onis was to procure, in the simplest form, the evidence to show what that intention was. Your excellency will pardon me for saying that I am shocked at the assertion now made, that the declaration intended to be presented at the exchange of ratifications annuls the said article, as it obliges me to conclude that the grants to the Duke of Alagon, the Count Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, are, in the opinion of this Government, of a date prior to the 24th of January, 1818, the date named in that article of the treaty; and that the Government of Spain believes itself authorized to insist that they would be valid under it. This disclosure compels me, from the duty I owe to my country, and in obedience to the instructions I have received, earnestly to remonstrate against the conduct of Spain in relation to these grants—a conduct towards the United States injurious, unjust, and deceptious, and which cannot fail, when made known, to excite the resentment of all nations who prize honorable dealing and love good faith.

The history of these donations, and of the stipulation in regard to them, will show that the determination of the United States to consider them void under the treaty was justifiable, proper, and necessary to the honest fulfilment of the engagement into which they had entered; and that a denial of this position would fix upon the Spanish Government a charge of an attempt to commit a deception, for which the language of decorum has no appropriate name. The possession of Florida has long been an object of interest to the United States—a land useless and expensive to His Catholic Majesty, and chiefly valuable by its position to them. Ever since the restoration of His Majesty to the throne of Spain, the question of the cession of that territory has been agitated. In the summer or autumn of 1817, after the determination to negotiate all matters in dispute at Washington, it is to be presumed authority was given to Mr. Onis to offer the Floridas for an equivalent to the United States. In July, 1817, Mr. Pizarro informed Mr. Erving that the instructions for Mr. Onis were preparing. Comparing the date of the offer of cession made by that minister, of the 24th January, 1818, with the time necessary for transmitting the instructions under which it was made, the conclusion is, that, prior to November, 1817, the authority was given to Mr. Onis to offer Florida to the United States, according to the instructions preparing by Mr. Pizarro at the date of his communication to Mr. Erving, of the 27th July, 1817. (See No. 1.) In November following, the prospect of a cession to the United States having made property in that territory valuable, petitions were presented to His Majesty for grants of land in Florida by the Duke of Alagon and Count Punon Rostro. In December, 1817, the King decided, by royal orders, that these petitions should be allowed; in February, 1818, the royal letters patent were issued to the petitioners in the Council of Indies.

The donation to Duke Alagon included all the uncultivated land in East Florida, not previously ceded, between the margins of the rivers St. John and St. Lucia, to their entrances into the sea, and the coast of the Gulf of Florida and the adjacent islands, the mouth of the river Hijuelos from the twenty-sixth degree of latitude, following its left bank to its source; thence, by a line drawn to the lake of Macao; thence, by the way of the river St. John, to the lake Valdes; thence, by a line, cutting the extreme north of that lake, as far as the source of that river, and by the coast of the sea, with all adjacent islands, to the mouth of the river Hijuelos.

To the Count Punon Rostro was granted all the uncultivated lands not before ceded, in East Florida, which are situated between the Rio Perdido, to the west of the Gulf of Mexico, and the rivers Amasuca and St. John, from Popa to its mouth, and the southern boundary line of the United States and the Gulf of Mexico, with all the uninhabited islands near the coast.

About the close of 1817, or beginning of 1818, Mr. Vargas petitioned for lands in Florida. On the 25th January, 1818, a royal order allowed his petition; and the cedula is of the date of the 9th April, 1818.

The donation to Mr. Vargas was,

1st. All uncultivated and not before ceded lands between the bay of Mobile, the river Perdido, the boundary line of the United States, and the Gulf of Mexico.

2d. All the lands lying south of Alagon's grant, from the mouth of Hijuelos, on the Gulf of Mexico, and the mouth of St. Lucia, on the Gulf of Florida, to Tancha point, or Cape Florida, with all the islands, &c.

3d. All lands in West Florida to which Spain was entitled, and all lands in dispute with the United States.

While these extraordinary and enormous donations were making in Spain, Florida had been offered to the United States, and the terms of cession were in the course of adjustment. After great labor and delay, the negotiation terminated by the convention of 1819. To provide an indemnity for the claims of American citizens upon Spain, some of which were acknowledged in 1804 to be just, although the treaty providing for their adjustment and payment, made in that year, had been but just ratified by Spain, was one of the causes of the cession of Florida in full property to the United States, who engaged to pay their own citizens out of the vacant lands in that territory, but it was previously necessary to ascertain that the fund provided was sufficient for that purpose. Mr. Onis insisted, in his note of the 24th October, 1818, that all grants made prior to that date should be held valid. The answer of the Secretary of State, of the 31st October, is, that the United States cannot renounce their claims upon Spain, and those of their citizens, and at the same time recognise all grants as valid. He says to Mr. Onis, "Notice had been given by the minister of the United States in Spain to your Government, that all the grants of land lately alleged to have been made by your Government within those territories must be cancelled, unless your Government should provide some other adequate fund from which the claims above referred to, of the United States and their citizens, may be satisfied."

On the 16th of November, Mr. Onis proposes that the late grants, made since the date of this note offering a cession, should be declared null and void, in consideration of the grantees not having complied with the essential conditions of the cession, as had been the fact. The late grants, as was explicitly understood by both the negotiators, and can only be so understood, referred to the large grants of land to Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas, respecting which notice had been given by Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro. To remove all possible doubt, Mr. Onis states to have been the inducement to the grants the same causes which are stated in the royal orders respecting them—a desire to promote population, cultivation, and industry—causes assigned for no other modern donations. It being perfectly understood by the parties that these grants were to be annulled by the convention, all that remained was to reduce the intention of the parties to a formal article. Mr. Onis, who had expressly agreed to exclude them, whatever might be their dates, in the first projet of the treaty delivered on the 9th February, had drawn the article in such terms as to confirm all grants made before January 24, 1818. The article was not accepted in that form. In the counter-projet of the Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, on the 13th February, the grants prior to the 24th January, 1818, the conditions of which should have been performed by the grantees, and none others, were declared to be confirmed. Mr. Onis was at this time confined to his house by indisposition, and, by his request, the communications between the negotiators were made through the friendly interposition of Mr. Hyde de Neuville; Mr. Onis insisted upon the article as drawn up by him, not for the purpose of covering these grants, but merely to save the honor of the King. As it was obvious that the honor of the King would not be affected by declaring the grants made prior to January, 1818, binding to the same extent as they would have been on Spain if a cession had not taken place, Mr. Onis yielded to a modification proposed by the Secretary of State to that effect, but at the same time observed that these were grants of old dates, made bona fide to persons in actual possession of the lands, and who had improvements and settlements on them, but who, by the revolutions in Europe, and the convulsed state of Spain, had been prevented from completing all the conditions of their grant; that it would be equitable to allow them time from the date of the treaty to fulfil them. This was readily assented to, and the article, as presented by Mr. Onis, was thus modified: "do exclude, absolutely, all grants made subsequent to the 24th January, 1818."

2d. To confirm all grants prior to that period, to the same extent that they would have been valid had the territory ceded remained under the dominion of His Majesty.

3d. To allow all whose titles were imperfect, and who had been prevented, by the recent circumstances of the Spanish empire, and the revolutions in Europe, from fulfilling the conditions of their grants, a limited time to complete them. When, after the signature of the treaty, a rumor prevailed that the grants to Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas were valid under the treaty, being dated but a short time before the 24th of January, 1818, and that this date was assumed with the intention that they should be confirmed; without admitting the suspicion of any unfair dealing in the conduct of the negotiator of Spain, that no pretence should, by any possibility, be raised after the ratification of the treaty that these grants were confirmed, or that either party to the compact had understood that they would be confirmed, I was instructed to deliver, on the exchange of ratifications, the declaration of the construction it was the avowed intention of both parties at the signature that the eighth article should bear in relation to the grants in question, and the only one the United States would ever admit. In a correspondence of March, 1819, between Mr. Adams and Mr. Onis, the Spanish minister unequivocally admits that such had been his understanding of the article when he signed it—a fact fully confirmed by the declaration of Mr. Hyde de Neuville.

Such, sir, is the history of these grants, and the negotiation in relation to them. It would not be difficult to prove that the declaration of the American Government (a copy of which I had the honor to transmit to your excellency, as it is in strict conformity with the intention of the parties) is also in unison with the very letter of the compact. Without entering into a minute discussion of the difference in the force and obligation of the royal order, made prior, and the royal cedula, made subsequent, to the 24th January, 1818, I may venture to assert that no title was vested in the several grantees until the royal cedula given in the Council of Indies. Even if I should err in this position, of the solidity of which I have the most perfect conviction, these grants would not be valid under the treaty, as the conditions of them have not been complied with; nor could the grantees claim the benefit of the stipulation to give time to the old claimants to perfect their titles, since they could not pretend that they were prevented from fulfilling the essential conditions of their donations by the recent circumstances of the Spanish monarchy, or by the late revolutions in Europe. The declaration presented by me to your excellency might have been safely withheld, had not the Government of the United States determined not to be embarrassed by any pretended claims under these grants, either on the part of Spain, her subjects, or the persons holding under them. The course pursued has been justifiable as it relates to Spain, proper as regards the character of the American Government, and necessary to the honest discharge of the obligation of the convention, by which it bound itself to pay to its own citizens, out of the fund of the Florida lands, their claims upon Spain, to the amount of five millions of dollars.

Having thus vindicated the character of the United States, by showing that they have made no attempt to alter, in any degree, the obligations of the convention, it remains for me to establish the position laid down in regard to Spain. With infinite reluctance I approach the execution of this painful but not difficult task. The convictions of its truth arise so forcibly out of the circumstances of this transaction, as already detailed, that a bare reference to particular portions of them will be sufficient for my purpose. I must call your excellency's attention to the period at which these donations were made; the departure from the ordinary regulations of the Spanish Government in the quantity of land given away to the grantees; the reasons assigned for making the donations; to the conduct of the Spanish minister in the United States in arranging the eighth article of the convention; and to the malignant influence these donations seem to have had in preventing the ratification of that convention. The idea of making these grants was not entertained until Spain had determined to cede the Floridas to the United States. Authority was given to offer a cession of that country: between the grants and the execution of that authority the resolution is formed, and partially carried into effect, to render the thing to be ceded, as far as it was in the power of Spain to render it so, worthless. It may be suggested that the sovereignty of the territory was all that the Spanish Government proposed to cede; and that this was, of itself, sufficiently important to the United States to render unnecessary any attention to the property in the soil. The force of such a suggestion is destroyed by the fact that Spain proposed to provide for the payment of the claims of the United States, and of their citizens upon her, out of the vacant lands of the territory to be ceded. What was the meaning of this proposal, and the stipulation made in consequence of it, when, by secret and irregular donations of all the vacant lands, His Catholic Majesty had rendered its fulfilment impossible; and this, too, while the Spanish minister was in the very act of discussing it? Was it made in mockery, to add insult to the injuries of which the American Government had so long complained, and satisfaction for which they had generously forborne to take? By reference to the archives of the Indies, your excellency will find that the donations to the Duke of Alagon, Count Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, include all the vacant land, not only in that part of the Floridas possessed by Spain, but also that possessed by the United States under the cession of Louisiana from France. I make this reference from a belief that the description of the different grants herein contained is nearly if not entirely correct.

The colonial regulations of Spain, made for Louisiana and Florida, expressly forbid the alienation of more than a named or small portion of land to the same person. This, it is true, is a restriction upon the governors and authorities of those territories, and was not obligatory upon the King; but it shows the general policy of the Government widely departed from, in the donations to two favorite officers of the Crown and a Spanish subject, between whom, in a sweeping transfer, a few millions of acres were liberally granted by the King; and what, sir, were the reasons assigned for these liberal gifts? "For the increase of population in the territory of Florida;" "for the fulfilment of His Majesty's beneficent wishes in favor of the agriculture and commerce of his said possessions, which were very much in want of a population adequate to the fertility of the land and the defence of the coast." At the moment of determining to pass away the territory to the dominion of a foreign Power, the anxiety is discovered to render it populous, to foster its agriculture and commerce, to furnish an adequate defence for its coasts. That individuals, who sought the acquisition of wealth at the expense of the moral character of their country, should attempt to conceal the real, the selfish motive of their application for gifts, under the pretence of being actuated by a desire of promoting the interest of the state, is not surprising, since the history of the world affords so many unhappy examples of it; but it is both wonderful and lamentable that Governments should be deluded to adopt such hollow pretences, and assign them as the motives of their conduct. In the present case, how are these reasons of state reconcileable with the proposed cession of the territory? Either Spain offered a cession, intending never to make it, or these were not the real inducements to these donations.

A territory which had been almost abandoned for years by the Government of Spain, alternately used by the British troops, the Indians, and the blacks, for the annoyance of the United States, which had been left to be preyed upon by every adventurer who could command a pilot boat and a musket, becomes, at the moment it is to be ceded away, an object of parental solicitude—a solicitude discovered by giving monopolies of its lands to three persons, who affected the intention to cultivate and improve them; an intention established by the notorious fact of these lands having been frequently offered for sale by the claimants in Spain and in the United States. It is somewhat singular that the Spanish minister in the United States, who, in the whole of the negotiation, professed the most perfect readiness to stipulate that they should be given up, should yet be ignorant of the dates of these donations, and should have arranged an article in respect to grants so as to leave room for a pretence that the large donations were valid. How happened it that he was thus ignoran—the, upon whose knowledge of these instruments the United States relied—and they could rely upon no other? How did it occur that, in the short space of twelve days after the signature of the treaty, the information was given to satisfy him that he might have been mistaken in the belief with regard to their dates? I reject the supposition that all this was diplomatic finesse, intended to secure the large donations to the claimants of them, but refer to this circumstance to prove still more clearly how injuriously Spain has acted to the United States in this business. The allegation that the American Government ought not to have relied upon information derived from the minister with whom they were negotiating will never be urged by Spain.

The American Government could not procure authentic information from any other source; and, if a mistake had been made, from a reliance upon that which was procured, a just and honorable Government would disdain to take any other advantage of it than that of manifesting its good faith, by its cheerfulness and promptitude in correcting the error; fulfilling the intention, instead of the letter of its engagement. In fine, sir, the injustice of this transaction has been perfected by the influence these donations appear to have had in preventing the ratification of the convention of 22d February, 1819—a convention which settled important interests; secured the pacific and harmonious relations between the United States and Spain; provided indemnities for injuries Spain acknowledged American citizens had suffered from her; removed all causes of future dispute and difficulty, and laid deep and broad the foundation of a permanent good understanding between the two Powers. Such, sir, has been the conduct of Spain. She offered a cession, and endeavored to render it worthless; she proposed indemnities, and attempted to destroy the fund out of which they were to be made. To do this, she abandoned her ancient territorial policy, and assigned reasons for her conduct which could not have regulated it. Her negotiator acted as if he knew of facts of which he subsequently professed himself to have been ignorant, and, in consequence, made an arrangement which laid the foundation of new embarrassments between this Government and that of the United States; and, because the United States frankly avow their resolution to do what they engaged to do, I am told that their example justifies Spain in an indefinite delay of a determination to accept or reject that arrangement. In whatever light this transaction is viewed, grievous injury has been done to the United States, for which they have a right to demand and obtain satisfaction. Having thus experienced its necessity and propriety, your excellency must not be surprised if the United States, in future, take pledges of security for the performance of any engagements they may enter into with Spain, more effectual than confidence in her good faith.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency the DUKE OF SAN FERNANDO AND QUIROGA, First Minister of State, &c.

And no time shall be lost in preparing the instructions of which Don Luis Noeli will be the bearer to the minister Onis, it being His Majesty's intention that no step or measure shall be omitted which may promote the settlement upon terms consistent with the welfare of his subjects and the honor of his crown.

MADRID, November 16, 1819.

Since my official letter, by way of Gibraltar, numbered 9, nothing important in relation to our affairs has occurred here. General Vives has not yet found his way to Madrid.

It is now said Vives will go by the way of England. The expedition of Cadiz is again the subject of interest with Spain. It is contemplated to send it out in February, and the force is to be 15,000 men.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State.

MADRID, November 27, 1819.

Late in the evening of the 16th of the present month, after my letter to you of that date had been sent to the post office, I was very much surprised to receive from the Duke of San Fernando the remonstrance addressed to him on the 18th of October last. The causes assigned for this step you will find in the copy of the duke's note of the 12th November, marked No. 1. After mature deliberation, it appeared to me that the only course which I could pursue was to insist upon the reception of the remonstrance, and, if that was refused, to leave Madrid; believing that, in doing this, I should only anticipate the wishes of the President. It is possible that this determination will gratify the wishes of this Government, whose good-will has been lost to me ever since the delivery of my official note of the 21st of June to Mr. Salmon. The truth of this supposition will be ascertained by the effect of my note of the 20th; a copy of which, marked No. 2, is enclosed. If they wish me to remain, they will either receive the remonstrance, or give me such assurances with respect to the grants as will justify me in withholding it altogether. I shall give you the earliest possible information of what is done. At all events, I shall not quit Madrid until the 1st of January, and will, if I am obliged to leave it, remain in France until the beginning of March, with the hope of hearing before that period what direction Congress will give to our affairs with Spain. General Vives was in Madrid at the date of my last letter. I did not hear of his arrival until the 17th, although he arrived on the 15th. I have been told that his appointment has been made known to him officially, and that he has, with great reluctance, accepted it. From the Government of Spain I know nothing about him, either formally or informally.

The Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: PALACE, November 12, 1819.

I have perused with due attention your note of the 18th ultimo; and although I wished, on reflecting on the friendly sentiments entertained by the King, my master, for your Government, and on those which, on my part, I have for it and for yourself personally, to have found them reciprocated in your note, since I had every reason to be persuaded, from what had passed in our conference on the 3d of the same month, that they really existed, I have, notwithstanding, to regret that my expectations have unfortunately been disappointed. So far, indeed, is your note from exhibiting those feelings, that it gives me extreme concern only to discover in it ideas which seem wholly incompatible with the principles professed by your Government, and expressed in terms (since I am compelled to say so) equally unprecedented, and repugnant to the delicacy and attention which are peculiar to, and are invariably observed in, all diplomatic communications. I should have failed in the very high consideration I owe to the American Government, in the due respect I entertain for you, and especially in my duty as the principal secretary of His Majesty the King, my lord, by communicating to him the contents of a note which attacks the honor of His Majesty, without tending in the least to elucidate the subject in question. Upon it the King will, in a direct course, demand of, and give to, the Federal Government the requisite explanations, as I have already had the honor more than once to inform you. It is therefore with the greatest concern that it becomes my indispensable duty to return to you such a note, with the assurance that I will, with as great pleasure, promptitude, and eagerness, submit to His Majesty such communications as you may address to me which are conceived in fit and becoming terms, as I am wholly averse to laying before him those which cannot fail to prove offensive to his exalted character and sovereign dignity.

In repeating to you the keen regrets I feel on this occasion, I have to renew the assurance of my perfect readiness to receive from you such communications as you may be pleased to make to me, and as are conformable to the received usage and custom of European diplomacy. God preserve you many years!

THE DUKE OF SAN FERNANDO AND QUIROGA.

To the MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY of the United States.

No. 2.

Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga.

SIR: MADRID, November 20, 1819.

Your excellency's note of the 12th was delivered to me on the 16th. The official remonstrance of the 18th October, which your excellency has felt yourself reluctantly compelled to return to me, was prepared and sent by the instructions of the Government of the United States. It must be obvious to your excellency that, if representations to His Catholic Majesty which I am directed to make are not received, my further residence near His Majesty's court would be worse than useless to my country. I should have preferred that your excellency would either have pointed out precisely what you deemed inadmissible, and requested an alteration, or have desired me to recall the remonstrance, for the purpose, if possible, of putting it in terms more acceptable. I need not, after our conversation of the 3d ultimo, assure your excellency that I should have done every thing consistent with the obligations of duty to meet your wishes. No doubt it occurred to the enlightened understanding of your excellency that, from the nature of the subject, but few sacrifices could be made to diplomatic courtesy.

I regret that the censure bestowed upon the remonstrance had not been made with more precision. As your excellency has remarked upon it in very general terms, I am compelled to follow the example. The objections are, that the remonstrance does not contain the friendly sentiments which ought to animate the United States towards Spain, as such sentiments animate His Catholic Majesty towards the United States; that it contains ideas which are not, and cannot be, analogous to the principles which ought to govern the United States, and terms disused and foreign to the delicacy and attention always so much observed, and so peculiar to diplomatic communications; that you cannot place it before His Majesty, because it attacks the honor of the King, without serving as any illustration of the matter discussed in it, which His Majesty will know how to ask and give directly to the Federal Government. Objections, in terms so general, might with safety be made to any embarrassing official document on an important subject of dispute. Upon which of these does your excellency rely to justify the return of the remonstrance? To secure the reception of an official note, is it necessary that the sentiments of it should be friendly? that the ideas it contains should, in the opinion of the organ of the Government to whom it is addressed, be analogous to the principles which ought to govern the Power from whom it is sent? that the terms of it should be well chosen, courteous, and delicate, according to the usages of diplomacy? or even that it should not attack the character of the Government? Your excellency's candor, enlightened by the history of the intercourse of nations, must admit that few diplomatic notes would be received, if these were prerequisites. The sentiments, ideas, and terms of diplomatic, like all other correspondence, change according to the situation and determination of the parties, and the nature of the subject of it. The correspondence is courtly and delicate while the parties can rely upon the good dispositions of each other. Sometimes, indeed, the language of courtesy is continued to conceal intentions of deadly hostility—to blind an adversary to preparations which are making for his destruction. This dishonorable artifice has become, by frequent use, too well known to deceive. But in every controversy which terminates in a serious misunderstanding, a period arrives when delicacy and attention give place to plainness and truth. All that can be required is, that the head of the Government shall not be treated with personal disrespect. In many instances the subject-matter is of a character so peculiar that it cannot be touched without calling in question the honor of the Government whose conduct is examined. In reclamations made for the violation of treaties, for outrages upon the rights of humanity, for fraudulent designs, so soon as the Government refuses to give the reparation required, the charge of bad faith, of inhumanity, or fraud, is fixed upon it, if not by direct assertion, by necessary implication.

Every remonstrance supposes some wrong committed, and, of necessity, questions the conduct of the Government, which has given occasion to it. There is this difference between remonstrances made before and after the Government itself declares its approbation of the act complained of. The first are made with a professed belief that the act will be disavowed, and reparation will be made; the last cannot contain such a courteous admission. Strange, indeed, would it be if nations should suffer injury from fraud, injustice, or violence, and should be restrained from the expression of their sentiments, by the danger of sinning against the high character and dignity of the offending Power. I claim the right, as the representative of my country, of placing any remonstrance I may deem necessary to the interest and honor of the United States, before the King, your excellency's royal master, that is not couched in terms personally disrespectful to the sovereign of Spain; and even were I capable of forgetting the obligations of personal respect to the King himself, I should question your excellency's right to refuse to receive the representations I should make. If your excellency proposes to be governed by the usages of European diplomacy, the usual course in such case would be, either to direct the minister who forgets the respect due to the person of the sovereign near whom he resides to withdraw, or to request his recall from the Government he represents.

But to come to a more particular examination of the several causes of complaint against the note of the 18th October, 1819. "It does not contain the friendly sentiments which should animate the United States to Spain." Allow me to refer your excellency to all the official correspondence of the United States with foreign nations: you will find that we do not deal in professions; we know they are worthless, and, therefore, leave all nations with whom we have intercourse to judge of our disposition by our conduct. What meaning your excellency proposes to convey when you state that my note contains ideas which are not, and cannot be, analogous to the principles which ought to govern the United States, I do not comprehend. Whether your excellency refers to the principles of morality, of national law, or of municipal policy, I trust and believe there is nothing in it which is not consistent with the purest morality, and justified by the soundest maxims of national law. If your excellency refers to the principles of municipal policy, I must be allowed to say that your excellency's judgment has deceived you upon a subject on which it was not competent for you to decide. Your excellency may hope that the principles that are not consonant with those entertained here do not govern the United States; but when your excellency proceeds to say what should or should not govern my country, your excellency volunteers an opinion on a subject upon which we do not admit of foreign interference. We know full well that our principles, not of morality, or of national law, (for on these points it is to be hoped there is but little difference of opinion in all quarters of the world,) but of government, could scarcely be approved by a politician of Spain. With all my respect for your excellency, and knowledge of your excellent character, I cannot suppose you sufficiently well acquainted with the principles of free government to decide correctly upon this subject, since it is a species of knowledge not fashionable in Spain, or particularly calculated to render the possessor of it useful in the high departments of His Majesty's Government.

But the terms of my note are unusual, and not consistent with delicacy, &c. Let me entreat your excellency to re-examine the offending paper. I venture to say that there are no unusual terms in it, or terms inconsistent with the most scrupulous delicacy. It is true that the subject is one of the most unpleasant nature. The facts, and the reasoning upon them, go to fix a serious charge upon the Government of Spain. If the facts are undisputed, and no unfair conclusions are drawn from them, your excellency must be satisfied that the fault lies not upon its author, or upon those by whose command it was prepared, but upon those who made it necessary—upon those whose misconduct or evil counsel has made it necessary for a foreign Government to make such representations to the King. That it is necessary for the United States to remonstrate on this subject, I will not attempt to demonstrate. That question has been decided by them, and your excellency appears to be satisfied of its propriety, when you suggest that the King will know how to ask and give an illustration of this matter directly to the Federal Government. The Federal Government, however, prefers to have this illustration indirectly through its minister at the court of Spain; the more especially as it appears there is but little prospect of its being speedily afforded in the direct mode. I think more than a month has elapsed since your excellency spoke of the intention of sending a minister to the United States, not then appointed. I have yet to learn from your excellency if that appointment has been made. To this representation I will add that, if my official note of the 18th October contains any thing personally offensive to His Majesty, it was not inserted with such a design. I desire to treat the sovereign of Spain with every possible respect and decorum. The intentions of the head of this Government I always suppose to be correct; the King may be deceived by false representations, misled by evil counsel, while his own intentions are pure and honorable. This the decorum of diplomacy always takes for granted; and if I have violated this rule, as soon as I am made sensible of it, I will hasten to correct the error. Your excellency thinks that I ought to have remained satisfied with the conversation of the 3d of October, on the subject of the difference between our two Governments. I appeal confidently to your excellency duly to estimate the value of the assurances received from you. They did not differ from those previously received from your excellency's predecessor in office. They were, indeed, given more sparingly, and with greater caution. With every portion of your excellency's deportment I had reason to be satisfied; but on the important matter of our interview I had but too much cause to apprehend what subsequently occurred—a new refusal on the part of His Majesty's Government to do what we think justice and honor require. If reliance is to be placed on the information given by the public journals, (and your excellency has quoted them as authority, even since that interview,) an instructive commentary has been furnished upon the designs of Spain. On the 18th of July last, in consequence of orders for preparation, which must have issued simultaneously with Mr. Salmon's note to me of the 19th June, a portion of the force collected at Cadiz was hurried off under General Cagigal. The conjecture entertained was, that it was intended to strengthen the royal forces in some portion of the dominions of Spain in revolt against the authority of the King. It appears by recent notices that a moiety of this expedition has been sent to Florida. This fact, in addition to the numerous circumstances already brought to the view of this Government in my previous correspondence, will certainly be considered sufficiently marked, to excuse, if not to justify, a little incredulity.

As the business of the remonstrance is likely to produce very unpleasant consequences, I propose, out of a prudent but possibly useless caution, to direct the note of the 18th to be carefully translated by the person attached to this legation. It will then be sent to your excellency for re-examination, unless I should previously receive some formal assurances on the subject of the grants which have occasioned it, which will justify me in withholding it altogether—an occurrence which would afford me the liveliest sensations of pleasure.

If, on the re-examination of this document, your excellency's determination should remain the same, you will do your duty, and I shall do mine.

May God preserve your excellency many years. I renew the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, First Minister of State, &c.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Lowndes.

Sir: Department of State, Washington, December 16, 1819.

With reference to the question proposed by the committee, "whether the Executive considers the Florida treaty as a subsisting one, valid according to national law, and giving the same perfect rights, and imposing the same perfect obligations, as if it had been ratified," I have the honor to state that the President considers the treaty of 22d February last as obligatory upon the honor and good faith of Spain, not as a perfect treaty, (ratification being an essential formality to that,) but as a compact which Spain was bound to ratify; as an adjustment of the differences between the two nations, which the King of Spain, by his full power to his minister, had solemnly promised to approve, ratify, and fulfil. This adjustment is assumed as the measure of what the United States had a right to obtain from Spain, from the signature of the treaty. The principle may be illustrated by reference to rules of municipal law relative to transactions between individuals. The difference between the treaty unratified and ratified may be likened to the difference between a covenant to convey lands and the deed of conveyance itself. Upon a breach of the covenant to convey, courts of equity decree that the party who has broken his covenant shall convey, and, further, shall make good to the other party all damages which he has sustained by the breach of contract.

As there is no court of chancery between nations, their differences can be settled only by agreement or by force. The resort to force is justifiable only when justice cannot be obtained by negotiation; and the resort to force is limited to the attainment of justice. The wrong received marks the boundaries of the right to be obtained.

The King of Spain was bound to ratify the treaty; bound by the principles of the law of nations applicable to the case; and further bound by the solemn promise in the full power. He refusing to perform this promise and obligation, the United States have a perfect right to do what a court of chancery would do in a transaction of a similar character between individuals, namely, to compel the performance of the engagement as far as compulsion can accomplish it, and to indemnify themselves for all the damages and charges incident to the necessity of using compulsion. They cannot compel the King of Spain to sign the act of ratification, and, therefore, cannot make the instrument a perfect treaty; but they can, and are justifiable in so doing, take that which the treaty, if perfect, would have bound Spain to deliver up to them; and they are further entitled to indemnity for all the expenses and damages which they may sustain by consequence of the refusal of Spain to ratify. The refusal to ratify gives them the same right to do justice to themselves as the refusal to fulfil would have given them if Spain had ratified, and then ordered the Governor of Florida not to deliver over the province.

By considering the treaty as the term beyond which the United States will not look back in their controversial relations with Spain, they not only will manifest a continued respect for the sanctity of their own engagements, but they avoid the inconvenience of re-entering upon a field of mutual complaint and crimination so extensive that it would be scarcely possible to decide where or when negotiation should cease, or at what point force should be stayed for satisfied right; and by resorting to force only so far as the treaty had acknowledged their right, they offer an inducement to Spain to complete the transaction on her part, without proceeding to general hostility. But Spain must be responsible to the United States for every wrong done by her after the signature of the treaty by her minister; and the refusal to ratify his act is the first wrong for which they are entitled to redress.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WILLIAM LOWNDES, Esq., Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Lowndes.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 21, 1819.

In answer to the questions contained in your letter of the 10th instant, I have the honor to state for the information of the committee—

1st. That information has been received by the Government of the United States, though not through a direct channel, nor in authentic form, that another motive besides those alleged in the letter of the Duke of San Fernando to Mr. Forsyth did operate upon the Spanish cabinet to induce the withholding of the ratification of the treaty, namely, the apprehension that the ratification would be immediately followed by the recognition by the United States of the independence of one or more of the South American provinces. It has been suggested that, probably, the most important of the explanations which the minister to be sent by Spain will be instructed to ask, will consist of an explicit declaration of the intentions of this Government in that respect. There is reason, also, to believe that the impunity with which privateers fitted out, manned, and officered, in one or more of our ports, have committed hostilities upon the Spanish commerce, will be alleged among the reasons for delay, and perhaps some pledge may be required of the effectual execution against these practices of laws which appear to exist in the statute book.

It may be proper to remark that, during the negotiation of the Florida treaty, repeated and very earnest efforts were made, both by Mr. Pizarro at Madrid, and by Mr. Onis here, to obtain from the Government of the United States either a positive stipulation or a tacit promise that the United States would not recognise any of the South American revolutionary Governments; and that the Spanish negotiators were distinctly and explicitly informed that this Government would not assent to any such engagement, either express or implied.

2d. By all the information which has been obtained of the prospective views of the French and Russian Governments in relation to the course which it was by them thought probable would be pursued by the United States, it is apparent that they strongly apprehended the immediate forcible occupation of Florida by the United States, on the non-ratification by Spain of the treaty within the stipulated time. France and Russia both have most earnestly dissuaded us from that course, not by any regular official communication, but by informal friendly advice, deprecating immediate hostility, on account of its tendency to kindle a general war, which they fear would be the consequence of a war between the United States and Spain. It was alleged that, in the present state of our controversy with Spain, the opinion of all Europe on the point at issue was in our favor, and against her; that, by exercising patience a little longer, by waiting, at least, to hear the minister who was announced as coming to give and receive explanations, we could not fail of obtaining, ultimately, without resort to force, the right to which it was admitted we were entitled; but that precipitate measures of violence might not only provoke Spain to war, but would change the state of the question between us, would exhibit us to the world as the aggressors, and would indispose against us those now the most decided in our favor.

It is not expected that, in the event of a war with Spain, any European Power will openly take a part in it against the United States; but there is no doubt that the principal reliance of Spain will be upon the employment of privateers in France and England as well as in the East and West India seas and upon our own coast, under the Spanish flag, but manned from all nations, including citizens of our own, expatriated into Spanish subjects for the purpose.

3d. The enclosed copies of letters from Mr. Fromentin contain the most particular information possessed by the Executive with regard to the subjects mentioned in your third inquiry. In the month of September, a corps of three thousand men arrived at the Havana from Spain, one-third of whom are said to have already fallen victims to the diseases of that climate. By advices from the Havana, as recent as the 4th of this month, we are assured that no part of this force is intended to be, in any event, employed in Florida.

4th. A communication from the Secretary of War, also herewith enclosed, contains the information requested by the committee upon this inquiry.

5th. At the time when Captain Read left Madrid, (13th October,) Mr. Forsyth had no positive information even of the appointment of the person who is to come out as the minister. Indirectly, we have been assured that he might be expected to arrive here in the course of the present month.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WILLIAM LOWNDES, Esq., Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, January 3, 1820.

A few days after the date of my last, numbered 10, I had a visit from the Count Bulgary, the Russian chargé d'affaires. He came to see me in consequence of a conversation he had just had with the Duke of San Fernando respecting my official letter of the 18th of October, and the subsequent correspondence in relation to it. He stated to me that the duke regretted the necessity of sending back the letter, but that it was so harsh in its terms he could not place it before the King. To this were added a great many assurances of personal kindness and good-will, not necessary to be repeated. I replied that it was very mortifying to me to be obliged to send the letter in the first instance, and not less so to insist on its being received; that the duke had put it out of my power to act otherwise than I had done; but that there was no difficulty in avoiding the unpleasant consequences likely to ensue. The duke had nothing to do but to give me such assurances in regard to the grants as would render it superfluous for me to say any thing about them. His answer was at once curious and dissatisfactory; he said that the duke could not give me any assurances, such was the predominating influence of the grantees with the King. He was sincerely disposed to settle all the differences with the United States, and hoped in a short time to have power to effect it; had authorized Count Bulgary to say to the Russian Government that General Vives was going immediately to the United States, and would have competent powers; and that every thing would be amicably arranged. I made the Russian chargé d'affaires sensible that one part of this statement contradicted the other. General Vives could not receive powers competent to the purpose of amicable settlement, if the Secretary of State's despatch was unable, from the influence of the grantees, to say any thing about the large donations. This was a subject upon which the American Government would listen to no terms, friendly arrangement was out of the question, and General Vives's visit to the United States useless, unless the Spanish Government was prepared to abandon their pretensions in favor of the grantees. On the subject of the mission of General Vives, I desired the count to remind the duke that I knew nothing of it. The general and loose declaration made months before, that the King would authorize some person to ask explanations at Washington, was all that the Spanish Government had chosen to communicate to me. The count assured me of the personal anxiety of the minister to arrange every thing satisfactorily between the two countries; that his hopes were strong of being able to effect it; that this business of the returned note was embarrassing, and that, if I went away in consequence of its not being received, what he believed to be the wish of the United States and of his Government, and almost all other Powers, might be frustrated. Matters were in a bad state at present, and this would make them worse. To this I answered, in general terms, that matters must become worse before they become better; that the Government of the United States had every disposition to be friendly with Spain, and had evinced it in a variety of modes; for myself, I had personally every wish to be the instrument of promoting good-will between the two nations. He said this Government had a different impression. I was very sorry for it; unfortunately, the conduct of the Spanish Government had compelled me to speak with a plainness and openness which was disagreeable, as they were not accustomed to it. In the course of a long conversation, it occurred to me that this dispute about the note might be made useful, as I found the Spanish Government anxious to avoid receiving it, and, contrary to my expectations, desirous that I should remain here. I believed it practicable to accelerate their movements in our affairs without yielding the point in dispute. With this belief, I stated to Count Bulgary that, if the Duke of San Fernando would officially say to me at once that General Vives was going immediately to the United States, with ample authority to arrange the business of the convention, and that it was the particular wish of His Majesty's Government that the letter of the 18th should be withheld, and that all matters relating to the convention should be discussed in Washington, notwithstanding I had positive instructions to remonstrate on the subject of the grants, and the conduct of Spain in relation to them, I would take the responsibility of retaining the obnoxious paper in my hands until compelled by events to deliver it, or until I should receive further advices from the President. The duke must understand that this was done with a perfect understanding that I insisted upon the right of returning the paper, and should exercise that right whenever I deemed it necessary. The count left me with the expectation of making this arrangement. A few days afterwards we had another interview; he told me that the duke would write to tell me of the appointment of General Vives, and of the intention of sending him immediately to Washington; that he would have full powers, &c., but that the duke thought he could not advert particularly to the remonstrance, or the correspondence in relation to it, without commenting upon it, and this he desired to avoid. I answered, that I could not tell how I should act until I saw the duke's note. If I found in it a sufficient justification for retaining the remonstrance, I would do so, and would look at it with a view to find that justification. The duke knew, from me, that I was instructed to remonstrate earnestly on the subject of the grants, and might judge, from my manner of performing that duty, of the sentiments of the American Government. A week elapsed after this last conversation without my hearing from the Secretary of State. I called on the Russian chargé d'affaires to say that I was surprised at this delay, and that I should certainly return the remonstrance if I did not hear from the duke in a few days. He saw the Secretary of State in consequence of this visit, who assured him that his personal indisposition had prevented him from sending me the intended note. On the 18th December I received the duke's note, a copy of which is enclosed, marked No. 1; you will see that it is not what I had reason to expect. He does not request a suspension of any correspondence, or say that it is the wish of the Spanish Government that every thing should be left to the negotiation of General Vives. He merely states that, in his view, to continue discussion here would be superfluous, and likely to embarrass the direct negotiation. Perhaps, considering their peculiar mode of doing business, I had no right to calculate upon any thing more: nevertheless, I am not at all satisfied with it; and had I consulted my own inclinations only, I should immediately have sent back the note of the 18th of October, with the translation. What has occasioned me to delay and deliberate, and still keeps me uncertain how to act, is the apprehension that my judgment of what is proper might be involuntarily influenced by my own wishes. I need not conceal from you that my situation here is unpleasant, and that I find no sufficient consolation for my personal mortification in the consciousness of being useful to the United States, feeling, as I do, that I am almost, if not altogether, useless. The very awkward state of my private affairs in Georgia, in consequence of my unlooked-for detention here, increases my anxiety to leave Spain. What I fear (and I hope it is not an unworthy apprehension) is, that these circumstances may unconsciously induce me to believe that the more energetic course is the best. What I have at last resolved upon is, to delay my answer until I see the President's message. It will then be sent before General Vives leaves Europe. He is still in Madrid; goes in a coach and colleras to Bayonne, a journey of twelve or fifteen days; thence to Paris; from Paris to England; and from England to the United States. His rapid journey to Washington will probably be finished in May. My answer will be regulated by the advices I hope soon to receive from Washington. I shall certainly not go further, in any event, than to say that I shall retain the letter of the 18th October for a short time, under the hope that His Majesty will render it unnecessary to make any remonstrance on the subject of it.

No. 1.

The Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: PALACE, December 16, 1819.

In consequence of the decision of the King, my master, and in conformity with the communications which my predecessor and I have had the honor to make to you, the moment has arrived when the person of whom His Majesty had made choice is about to proceed to America, for the purpose of asking of your Government the explanations which His Majesty has judged to be indispensable, previous to the ratification by His Majesty of the treaty concluded and signed by Don Luis de Onis.

The plenipotentiary appointed is the mariscal-del-campo Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, a distinguished person, in whom the King, my master, has the fullest confidence, and to whom he has given the most ample powers to settle all the difficulties he so earnestly wishes to see removed, and succeeded by the establishment, on a solid basis, of that harmony between Spain and the United States to which their mutual interests so strongly invite them.

As Don Francisco D. Vives will set out immediately on his journey, and proceed expeditiously, I consider the measure now communicated to you, and which you will be pleased to make known to your Government, as dispensing with any further discussion here of the points which form the object of the above-named gentleman's present mission; as a continuance of it would only tend to embarrass the course of the direct negotiation about to be established.

I renew to you, sir, the assurances of my distinguished respect, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

THE DUKE OF SAN FERNANDO AND QUIROGA.

To the MINISTER of the United States.

[TRANSLATION.]

Extract of a despatch from Count Nesselrode to Mr. Poletica, Minister of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia in the United States, dated NOVEMBER 27, [DECEMBER 9,] 1819.

You have doubtless been able to obtain information how far the President's last instructions to Mr. Forsyth were positive. The Emperor will not now take it upon him to justify Spain; but he charges you to plead with the Government at Washington the cause of peace and concord. That Government is too enlightened to take hasty steps, and its rights appear to be too solid not to be weakened by a violent course of proceeding; and, on the other hand, such is the character of the considerations which command the ratification by Spain of the arrangement relative to the Floridas, that it is to be hoped she will at length yield to the force of evidence. The United States will then have added to the reputation of an able that of a moderate policy, and will gather with security the fruits of their wisdom.

His Imperial Majesty therefore wishes that, if there be yet time, you would engage the Government at Washington to give to the Spanish ministry a proof of patience which its circumstances might, indeed, seem to suggest. Nevertheless, the Emperor does not interpose in this discussion. He makes, above all, no pretension to exercise an influence in the councils of a foreign Power. He merely expresses a wish dictated by his concern for the general welfare, and worthy of the generous good faith which characterizes the Government of the United States.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, May 9, 1820.

I communicate to Congress a correspondence which has taken place between the Secretary of State and the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, since the message of the 27th March last, respecting the treaty which was concluded between the United States and Spain on the 22d February, 1819.

After the failure of His Catholic Majesty for so long a time to ratify the treaty, it was expected that this minister would have brought with him the ratification, or that he would have been authorized to give an order for the delivery of the territory ceded by it to the United States. It appears, however, that the treaty is still unratified, and that the minister has no authority to surrender the territory. The object of his mission has been to make complaints, and to demand explanations, respecting an imputed system of hostility, on the part of citizens of the United States, against the subjects and dominions of Spain, and an unfriendly policy in their Government, and to obtain new stipulations against these alleged injuries, as the condition on which the treaty should be ratified.

Unexpected as such complaints and such a demand were, under existing circumstances, it was thought proper, without compromitting the Government as to the course to be pursued, to meet them promptly, and to give the explanations that were desired on every subject with the utmost candor. The result has proved, what was sufficiently well known before, that the charge of a systematic hostility being adopted and pursued by citizens of the United States against the dominions and subjects of Spain is utterly destitute of foundation; and that their Government, in all its branches, has maintained with the utmost rigor that neutrality in the civil war between Spain and the colonies which they were the first to declare. No force has been collected, nor incursions made, from within the United States, against the dominions of Spain; nor have any naval equipments been permitted in favor of either party against the other. Their citizens have been warned of the obligations incident to the neutral condition of their country; the public officers have been instructed to see that the laws were faithfully executed, and severe examples have been made of some who violated them.

In regard to the stipulation proposed as the condition of the ratification of the treaty, that the United States shall abandon the right to recognise the revolutionary colonies in South America, or to form other relations with them, when, in their judgment, it may be just and expedient so to do, it is manifestly so repugnant to the honor and even to the independence of the United States that it has been impossible to discuss it. In making this proposal, it is perceived that His Catholic Majesty has entirely misconceived the principles on which this Government has acted in being a party to a negotiation so long protracted for claims so well-founded and reasonable, as he likewise has the sacrifices which the United States have made, comparatively with Spain, in the treaty, to which it is proposed to annex so extraordinary and improper a condition.

Had the minister of Spain offered an unqualified pledge that the treaty should be ratified by his sovereign on being made acquainted with the explanations which had been given by this Government, there would have been a strong motive for accepting and submitting it to the Senate for their advice and consent, rather than to resort to other measures for redress, however justifiable and proper. But he gives no such pledge; on the contrary, he declares explicitly that the refusal of this Government to relinquish the right of judging and acting for itself hereafter, according to circumstances, in regard to the Spanish colonies—a right common to all nations—has rendered it impossible for him, under his instructions, to make such engagement. He thinks that his sovereign will be induced by his communications to ratify the treaty; but still he leaves him free either to adopt that measure or to decline it. He admits that the other objections are essentially removed, and will not in themselves prevent the ratification, provided the difficulty on the third point is surmounted. The result, therefore, is, that the treaty is declared to have no obligation whatever; that its ratification is made to depend, not on the considerations which led to its adoption, and the conditions which it contains, but on a new article, unconnected with it, respecting which a new negotiation must be opened of indefinite duration and doubtful issue.

Under this view of the subject, the course to be pursued would appear to be direct and obvious, if the affairs of Spain had remained in the state in which they were when this minister sailed. But it is known that an important change has since taken place in the Government of that country, which cannot fail to be sensibly felt in its intercourse with other nations. The minister of Spain has essentially declared his inability to act, in consequence of that change. With him, however, under his present powers, nothing could be done. The attitude of the United States must now be assumed, on full consideration of what is due to their rights, their interest, and honor, without regard to the powers or incidents of the late mission. We may, at pleasure, occupy the territory which was intended and provided by the late treaty as an indemnity for losses so long since sustained by our citizens; but still nothing could be settled definitively without a treaty between the two nations. Is this the time to make the pressure? If the United States were governed by views of ambition and aggrandizement, many strong reasons might be given in its favor. But they have no objects of that kind to accomplish; none which are not founded in justice, and which can be injured by forbearance. Great hope is entertained that this change will promote the happiness of the Spanish nation. The good order, moderation, and humanity which have characterized the movement are the best guaranties of its success. The United States would not be justified in their own estimation should they take any step to disturb its harmony. When the Spanish Government is completely organized, on the principles of this change, as it is expected it soon will be, there is just ground to presume that our differences with Spain will be speedily and satisfactorily settled.

With these remarks, I submit it to the wisdom of Congress whether it will not still be advisable to postpone any decision on this subject until the next session.

JAMES MONROE.

GREAT AND GOOD FRIENDS:

It having been represented to us by Don Luis de Onis, our envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to you, that he is desirous to return to Europe, for the recovery of his health, we have thought fit to grant him the necessary permission for that purpose. We have, therefore, authorized him to take his leave of you, and have charged him, in so doing, to assure you of our constant friendship and desire to maintain and strengthen the ties of amity now happily subsisting between us. On his faithful execution of these our commands, we rely with confidence, as we do that you will receive with satisfaction these renewed assurances.

We conclude by commending you to God; and we pray that he would have you in his safe and holy keeping.

Your good friend,

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MADRID, January 27, 1820.

Having received from my sovereign an appointment to other duties, and being thereby deprived of the satisfaction of presenting to the President the letters of re-credence of the King, my master, I am under the necessity of transmitting them to you, with my request that you would be pleased to lay them before his excellency the President, to whom you will also make it known that His Majesty, on deciding to terminate my mission to your Government, has commanded me to express to it the assurance of his unalterable desire to maintain the strict friendship now happily subsisting between both Powers.

In fulfilling these orders of my sovereign, permit me, sir, also to express to you the deep sense I entertain of the personal attentions with which I was honored by the President, by yourself in particular, and by the citizens of the Union in general; and to add the assurance that it will ever be to me a subject of the most grateful reflection, if, in the discharge of my duties, and in the execution of the orders of my Government, whose object it always has been to establish the most perfect harmony between the two countries, I shall have been so fortunate as to have acquired the esteem of the President, together with yours.

I pray you, sir, to receive the further assurance of my distinguished sentiments, and my wish that God may preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Credential letter delivered by General Vives to the President of the United States.

Don FERDINAND THE SEVENTH, King, by the grace of God, of Castile, Leon, and Arragon, of the Two Sicilies, Jerusalem, Navarre, Granada, Toledo, Valencia, Galicia, Majorca, Seville, Sardinia, Cordova, Corsica, Murcia, Jaen, the Algarves, Algesiras, Gibraltar, the Canary islands; of the two Indies, and of the islands of the ocean sea; Archduke of Austria; Duke of Burgundy, of Brabant, and Milan; Count of Hapsburg, Flanders, Tyrol, and Barcelona; Lord of Biscay and of Molina: To my great and good friends the United States of America.

GREAT AND GOOD FRIENDS:

Being animated by the most sincere desire to maintain the friendship and good understanding happily subsisting between both countries, and it being necessary, to that end, that another person, possessing our entire confidence, should forthwith be deputed to you as a successor to our late envoy and minister plenipotentiary, Don Luis de Onis, to whom we have granted leave to return to Europe for the re-establishment of his health, we have thought fit to confer the said appointment on Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, a major general of our armies, knight of the third class of the royal and military order of Saint Ferdinand, and a member of the supreme council of the said order; knight of the royal and military order of St. Hermenegildo; twice honored by decrees of thanks for patriotic services; decorated with the north star and crosses of honor for distinguished conduct and valor at the battles of Albuera, Sqrauren, Lugo, Tamanes, and Medina del Campo, also at the surrender of Villa Franca to the army of the left; he uniting the requisite qualifications for the due discharge of the said trust:

We therefore hope that, on his presenting to you this our letter of credence, you will grant him a kind and favorable reception, giving all faith and credit to what he shall say to you on our behalf. Done at Madrid, this 15th day of December, 1819.

FERDINAND.

JANUARY 28, 1820.

General Vives left this place on the 25th for Paris, on his way to Washington. He went post to France, and I am informed is directed to remain as short a time as possible in Paris. He goes to England to embark for the United States. The alteration in his mode of travelling, and the directions he has received not to delay, give me some hope that he will arrive in America time enough to prevent the necessity of doing that without the consent of Spain which the American Government prefers to do with her consent.

I send this by the way of Gibraltar, that the earliest notice may be had of General Vives's movements. In the course of the coming week I shall write officially, and enclose a copy of my answer to the Duke of San Fernando's last note, written to inform me of General Vives's appointment.

[Referred to in Mr. Forsyth's despatch of January 28.]

Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, First Minister of State, dated

SIR: MADRID, January 27, 1820.

I have had the honor to receive your excellency's official of the 16th December, giving me notice of the appointment of the mariscal-del-campo Don Francisco Dionisio Vives as minister plenipotentiary of the United States. According to the request of your excellency, I communicated, by the first convenient opportunity that occurred, a copy of your note to the American Government.

The appointment of the minister plenipotentiary has been so long delayed, his departure so much procrastinated, his route to the United States is so circuitous, and his movements are so deliberate, that I very much apprehend he will find, on his arrival, the determination, before now taken by the American Government, executed. His Catholic Majesty may be assured by your excellency that, should this be the case, the American Government will nevertheless, governed by that temper of conciliation which has at all times marked its policy, give any explanations which may, in the spirit of amity, be asked in the name of the King.

Your excellency views it as superfluous to continue discussions here of the points of the transaction with which His Majesty's minister goes charged, and as likely to embarrass the course of the direct negotiation. As to the future, I have to inform your excellency that I have no directions to discuss any of those points; and certainly I have received here very slender encouragement voluntarily to encounter them. My duty, in regard to the convention, was terminated when I had the honor to send you the remonstrance of the 18th of October, which has given rise to an unpleasant question between us. From circumstances well known to your excellency, I understand that the observations quoted have reference also to that question. With this understanding, I give you the strongest proof in my power of my anxious desire to promote harmony between the two nations, by taking upon myself the responsibility of having so long withheld the return of the remonstrance, and in determining still longer to retain it in my hands. I do this with the confident expectation that the justice of His Catholic Majesty has, in the powers given to General Vives, rendered a further recurrence to that unhappy affair altogether unnecessary. While I give to your excellency this proof of my wishes to conciliate, I must repeat that I hold it as unquestionably my right to have that paper, or any other I may deem it necessary to send, laid before your excellency's royal master for his perusal and consideration; holding myself responsible to my own Government only for the language in which it may be expressed, or the sentiments it may contain.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my profound consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency the DUKE OF SAN FERNANDO AND QUIROGA, First Minister of State, &c.

Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PARIS, February 15, 1820.

General Vives, the new minister of Spain to the United States, arrived at Paris on the 11th instant, and left it on the 14th for London, with the intention to embark at Liverpool in the New York packet which will sail on the 1st day of March.

Mr. Pasquier, after having seen him, invited me to an interview on the 12th, and said that he was in hopes that the differences might still be adjusted. General Vives had told him that the principal points with Spain were, that the honor of the Crown should be saved (mis à couvert) in the business of the grants, and to receive satisfactory evidence of our intention to preserve a fair neutrality in the colonial war. Mr. Pasquier had observed to him that it would be a matter of deep regret that private interest should prevent the conclusion of such an important arrangement; and that, when it was clear that there had been at least a misunderstanding on the subject, the King's dignity could not be injured by a resumption of the grants, or by an exchange for other lands. He seemed to think that this would be arranged, and asked me what I thought we could do respecting the other point. I answered that the fullest reliance might be placed on the fairness of our neutrality, and that I was really at a loss to know what could be added to the measures the United States had already adopted to enforce it. Mr. Pasquier gave me to understand that, if there was any defect, however trifling, in our laws, and that was amended, it would probably be sufficient to satisfy the pride of Spain, as there now appeared a real desire to ratify, provided it could be done without betraying a glaring inconsistency. He had expressed to General Vives his opinion of the impropriety of asking from the United States any promise not to recognise the independence of the insurgent colonies, and had told him that on that subject Spain could only rely on the moral effect which a solemn treaty, accommodating all her differences with the United States, would have on their future proceedings.

I expressed my hope that the explanations which General Vives was instructed to give on the subject of the grants, and to ask on that of our neutrality, might be such as to remove all the existing difficulties. But it was most important that he should arrive in the United States before the adjournment of Congress, and that he should be the bearer of the King's ratification of the treaty, so that, if every thing was arranged, those ratifications might be at once exchanged at Washington. If that was not done, the President would have no more security that the King would ratify General Vives's than Mr. Onis's acts; and it was impossible to suppose that he would run the risk of a second disappointment. This observation forcibly struck Mr. Pasquier, who said that he would make further inquiries on that point.

I saw, the same evening, the Spanish ambassador at this court, and, in the course of a short conversation, he suggested that the grants in dispute might be set aside, the grantees not having fulfilled certain conditions or formalities; and, after acknowledging that General Vives was not the bearer of the King's ratification, he hinted that he was authorized to give the United States satisfactory security that Spain would fulfil her engagements.

On the 13th I dined at the Minister of Foreign Affairs' with General Vives, who repeated to me in substance what he had said to Mr. Pasquier. I told him that the President would judge of the explanations he had to give on the subject of the grants; that he might rely on the determination of the United States to preserve their neutrality, and not less on the manner in which the laws for enforcing it were executed, than on the tenor of those laws, which, I observed, were, and had always been, more full and efficient than those of either England or France on the same subject; that I could not say whether the question of recognising the independence of the insurgent colonies would be agitated during the present session of Congress, but that, if it was, the decision would probably have taken place before his arrival.

I then repeated what I had said to Mr. Pasquier respecting the importance of his being authorized to exchange the ratifications of the treaty. He answered that, although he was not, he could, in case of an arrangement, give satisfactory security to the United States, and that it would consist in consenting that they should take immediate possession of Florida, without waiting for the ratification of the treaty.

General Vives repeated, in the course of the evening, the same thing to Mr. Pasquier, with whom I had afterwards a short conversation on the subject. He seemed extremely astonished that the Spanish Government should have adopted that course rather than to authorize their minister to exchange at once the ratifications. Since, however, the measure they proposed coincided with the views of the President as stated in his message, and would, at all events, prevent a rupture, we both agreed that no time should be lost in communicating to you General Vives's declarations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in Spain, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, February 15, 1820.

By the return of Lieutenant Weaver, who came to this place yesterday, with a letter from Captain Stewart, I have a convenient opportunity of sending, enclosed, a copy of my last note to the Duke of San Fernando, (No. 1,) dated the day after General Vives left Madrid. It was written in conformity to what I believe, from the message at the opening of Congress, to be the wishes of the President. If in this I should unhappily be mistaken, the affair stands in such a state that I can at any moment correct the error. Having informed this Government that I only detain the remonstrance, I can at any moment present it if directed so to do, or if I shall be satisfied that the King has not given such authority to General Vives as will render unnecessary a recurrence to this disgraceful business.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams.

MARCH 30, 1820.

Soon after the change of Government was officially made known to me, I determined to see the Duke of San Fernando respecting our affairs, to learn if the powers given to Vives were such that no bad effect would be produced by the recent events upon the relations of Spain with the United States, and to endeavor to procure, in this season of generous feelings, the release of the Americans in confinement. Waiting a few days for the first bustle to be over, the duke was removed from office, and a further delay unexpectedly occurred. As the new secretary was not expected for some time, on the 27th I asked, by a written note, for an interview with Mr. Jabat, who had charge of the office; it was appointed for the 29th. I saw him at the time fixed, and had a very long conversation with him. I stated the objects I had in view; he answered with great frankness. The substance of what I learned from him is, that General Vives did not carry the treaty ratified by the United States; that the King, having taken the oath to observe the constitution, could not now ratify; that instructions had been just prepared for General Vives to apprize him of the change that had taken place, and of the want of power in the King to act further in the business; the whole matter would be laid before the Cortes, and the minister had no doubt it would be arranged to the mutual satisfaction of the two Governments, as the Cortes would probably be composed of the most liberal and enlightened men of the nation—men who had the disposition, the ability, and the courage to give and to act upon good counsel. He spoke of the resemblance of the institutions of the two nations, and of his anxious wish to see them on the best terms. Of the American prisoners he professed a desire to do what would be agreeable to us, and would bring the subject before the King. For this object it was agreed upon between us that I should address him an official note; a copy of it (marked No. 6) is enclosed. It was prepared immediately after the interview, and sent on the 30th. Mr. Jabat asked me, in turn, what would be the determination of our Government in this new state of things. I replied that I was exceedingly disappointed to learn that General Vives had not the ratified treaty to exchange in the United States; that I apprehended his going without it would produce a very bad effect; and that I had no doubt there would be an immediate occupation of Florida, as recommended by the President to Congress; that we had always the strongest desire to be friendly with Spain—a desire which recent circumstances would increase. I was perfectly aware that the King had now no power to ratify, and trusted, with him, that every thing would be arranged satisfactorily when the Cortes assembled. In the mean time, I hoped that no unpropitious effect on the dispositions of this Government would be produced by the measures we should have been reluctantly compelled to take. I expressed the greatest satisfaction at the prospect of a favorable answer to the application in favor of the confined Americans, and assured him it would be considered as a conclusive proof, on the part of Spain, of a desire to do us justice and kindness in all things. The revolution will produce the best effects for us, if a judgment is to be formed from the language of the people in office and of those out of office. The Government of the United States is considered, with reason, more friendly to them than any other. The European Governments, without exception, see, in the change which has been produced here, a dangerous example to their people, and speculate with dread upon its probable effect. I had supposed that the influence of Great Britain would be very great under the new order of things; at present, there is a very wholesome jealousy and prejudice against that Government existing among the people, and carefully cherished by the ruling men. It is to be traced, in part, to the conduct of the English on the return of the King from his captivity; they were supposed to have had some agency in preventing at that time the King's acceptance of the constitution. The language used here is, there are but two free nations—the Spaniards and the people of the United States; the English were free, but have been recently enslaved by their ministry and Parliament. I hope that, before General Vives receives and communicates to the President the change in the Government, Florida will be occupied by us, or at least that Congress will have passed a law in such terms as to render it obligatory upon the President to take it. Delaying to take it until the news is received of the establishment of a free Government and liberal institutions here, might be injurious; at present, every body here expects it will be seized, and the event will have no bad effect unless it can, by misrepresentation, be made to appear the consequence of the recent events in Spain. It is important that Florida should be in our possession when the Cortes deliberate on the treaty. The defect of granted authority in that body to cede territory was not adverted to by Mr. Jabat, and has probably escaped notice. The general assertion, that the sovereignty resides essentially in the nation, which is represented by the Cortes, would no doubt be considered sufficient when the territory was held by us; it might admit of dispute if it was not. You will perceive that two deputies from Cuba and the Floridas are to be in the Cortes. Before July I hope to receive from you particular and special instructions on this and all other subjects connected with our interests. During the Cortes would be the most favorable time for a commercial arrangement, if one is to be made here; and I indulge the belief that, should, as is probable, the business of Florida be amicably arranged, an advantageous commercial treaty may be formed. I look with anxiety for directions from you, formed upon the determination Congress may have made.

General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 14, 1820.

In conformity with the orders of my Government, which were communicated to Mr. Forsyth on the 16th of December last by his excellency the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, and with the earnest desire of the King, my master, to see a speedy adjustment of the existing difficulties which obstruct the establishment, on a permanent basis, of the good understanding so obviously required by the interests of both Powers, I have the honor to address you, and frankly to state to you that my august sovereign, after a mature and deliberate examination, in full council, of the treaty of 22d February of the last year, saw, with great regret, that, in its tenor, it was very far from embracing all the measures indispensably requisite to that degree of stability which, from his sense of justice, he was anxious to see established in the settlement of the existing differences between the two nations.

The system of hostility which appears to be pursued in so many parts of the Union against the Spanish dominions, as well as against the property of all their inhabitants, is so public and notorious, that to enter into detail would only serve to increase the causes of dissatisfaction. I may be allowed, however, to remark that they have been justly denounced to the public of the United States even by some of their own fellow-citizens.

Such a state of things, therefore, in which individuals may be considered as being at war while their Governments are at peace with each other, is diametrically opposed to the mutual and sincere friendship and to the good understanding which it was the object of the treaty (though the attempt has failed) to establish, and of the immense sacrifices consented to by His Majesty to promote.

These alone were motives of sufficient weight imperiously to dictate the propriety of suspending the ratification of the treaty, even although the American envoy had not at first announced, in the name of his Government, and subsequently required of that of Spain, a declaration which tended directly to annul one of its most clear, precise, and conclusive articles, even after the signature and ratification of the treaty.

The King, my master, influenced by considerations so powerful as to carry with them the fullest evidence, has therefore judged it necessary and indispensable, in the exercise of his duties as a sovereign, to request certain explanations of your Government; and he has, in consequence, given me his commands to propose to it the following points, in the discussion and final arrangement of which it seems proper that the relative state of the two nations should be taken into full consideration:

That the United States, taking into due consideration the scandalous system of piracy established in and carried on from several of their ports, will adopt measures, satisfactory and effectual, to repress the barbarous excesses and unexampled depredations daily committed upon Spain, her possessions, and properties, so as to satisfy what is due to international rights, and is equally claimed by the honor of the American people.

That, in order to put a total stop to any future armaments, and to prevent all aid whatsoever being afforded from any part of the Union, which may be intended to be directed against and employed in the invasion of His Catholic Majesty's possessions in North America, the United States will agree to offer a pledge (á dar una seguridad) that their integrity shall be respected.

And, finally, that they will form no relations with the pretended Governments of the revolted provinces of Spain situate beyond sea, and will conform to the course of proceeding adopted, in this respect, by other Powers in amity with Spain.

In submitting to you these just and natural demands, I have received the orders of the King, my master, to make known to the President that they would have been regularly communicated to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, if, in the excess of his zeal, he had not, at an early period, been induced to express himself in terms disrespectful to the dignity of His Majesty; and I am, at the same time, commanded to give the assurance that, in alluding to an incident of so unpleasant a nature, it is not intended to make the conduct of Mr. Forsyth a subject of complaint, but merely to make your Government fully acquainted with the motives of my august sovereign in adopting the resolution as already stated.

I flatter myself that the President, on an attentive examination of the contents of this note, entirely dictated by sentiments of justice, will see a decisive evidence of the sincere desire of the King, my master, to attain with promptitude the definitive settlement of a transaction no less important in itself than it is essential to the mutual interests of the two countries.

I eagerly avail myself of this occasion to assure you of my perfect respect and highest consideration. I pray that God may long preserve you.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

The Secretary of State to General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, April 18, 1820.

Before replying to the letter which I have had the honor of receiving from you, dated the 14th instant, I am directed by the President of the United States to request a copy of your full powers, and to be informed whether you are the bearer of the ratification by His Catholic Majesty of the treaty signed on the 22d of February, 1819, by Don Luis de Onis; and are ready, in the event of suitable explanations being given upon the points mentioned in your letter, to exchange the same for the ratification on the part of the United States, if the Senate should advise and consent that such exchange of ratifications should now be accepted.

Please to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 19, 1820.

In answer to your note of yesterday's date, and in compliance with the request stated in its first point, I have the honor to enclose a copy of my full powers.

I have at the same time to inform you that I am not the bearer of the ratification of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, signed by Don Luis de Onis; nor does it seem agreeable to the natural course of things, and to established usage, that a treaty should be ratified previous to a removal of the obstacles which have expressly caused the suspension of its ratification; but I am enabled to assure you that I am fully authorized to offer a solemn promise, in the name of the King, my master, that, if the result of the proposals presented in my first note be satisfactory, the ratification of the treaty will be attended with no further delay than the time indispensably necessary for the arrival at Madrid of one of the gentlemen attached to my legation, who has accompanied me for that especial purpose.

I renew to you, sir, the assurance of my distinguished consideration, and I pray God long to preserve you.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

Full Power of General Vives.

DON FERDINAND THE SEVENTH, King, by the grace of God, of Castile, Leon, and Arragon, of the Two Sicilies, Jerusalem, Navarre, Granada, Toledo, Valencia, Galicia, Majorca, Seville, Sardinia, Cordova, Corsica, Murcia, Jaen, the Algarves, Gibraltar, the Canary islands, of both Indies, and of the isles of the ocean, Archduke of Austria; Duke of Burgundy, Brabant, and Milan; Count of Hapsburg, Flanders, Tyrol, and Barcelona; Lord of Biscay and of Molina, &c.

The state of peace, amity, and good understanding, now happily subsisting between us and the United States of North America, being favorable to the mutual and amicable adjustment and settlement of all existing differences between the two Governments; and it being expedient to that end to authorize a person having our confidence, and possessed of the requisite information, experience, and political knowledge for so important a trust, which qualities uniting in you, Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, a major general in our service, a knight of the royal and military order of San Fernando, and member of the supreme council of the said order, a knight of the royal and military order of San Hermenegildo, twice honored by decrees of thanks for public services, decorated with the order of the north star and crosses of honor for distinguished conduct and valor at the battles of Albuera, Sorauren, Lugo, Tamanes, and Medina del Campo, the surrender of Villa Franca del Vierzo, in the operations of the army of the left at the sieges of Pampeluna and Bayonne, and our envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the above-named States:

We have authorized, and by these presents we do authorize you, granting you full power, in the most ample form, to meet and confer with such person or persons as may be duly authorized by the Government of the United States, and with him or them to settle, conclude, and sign whatsoever you may judge necessary to the best arrangement of all points depending between the two Governments; promising, as we do hereby promise upon the faith and word of a King, to approve, ratify, and fulfil such articles or agreements as you may conclude and sign.

In testimony whereof, I have commanded the present to be issued, signed by us, sealed with our privy seal, and countersigned by the undersigned, our principal Secretary of State and of Universal Despatch. Given at Madrid, the 15th of December, 1819.

I, THE KING.

JOAQUIM JOSE MELGAREIJO DE RUIZ DEVALOS.

The Secretary of State to General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, April 21, 1820.

I am directed by the President of the United States to express to you the surprise and concern with which he has learned that you are not the bearer of the ratification by His Catholic Majesty of the treaty signed on the 22d February, 1819, by Don Luis de Onis, by virtue of a full power equally comprehensive with that which you have now produced—a full power, by which His Catholic Majesty promised, "on the faith and word of a King, to approve, ratify, and fulfil whatsoever might be stipulated and signed by him."

By the universal usage of nations, nothing can release a sovereign from the obligation of a promise thus made, except the proof that his minister, so impowered, has been faithless to his trust, by transcending his instructions.

Your sovereign has not proved, nor even alleged, that Mr. Onis had transcended his instructions; on the contrary, with the credential letter which you have delivered, the President has learned that he has been relieved from the mission to the United States only to receive a new proof of the continued confidence of His Catholic Majesty, in the appointment to another mission of equal dignity and importance.

On the faith of this promise of the King, the treaty was signed and ratified on the part of the United States; and it contained a stipulation that it should also be ratified by His Catholic Majesty, so that the ratifications should, within six months from the date of its signature, be exchanged.

In withholding this promised ratification beyond the stipulated period, His Catholic Majesty made known to the President that he should forthwith despatch a person possessing entirely his confidence to ask certain explanations which were deemed by him necessary previous to the performance of his promise to execute the ratification.

The minister of the United States at Madrid was enabled, and offered, to give all the explanations which could justly be required in relation to the treaty. Your Government declined even to make known to him their character; and they are now, after the lapse of more than a year, first officially disclosed by you.

I am directed by the President to inform you that explanations which ought to be satisfactory to your Government will readily be given upon all the points mentioned in your letter of the 14th instant; but that he considers none of them, in the present state of the relations between the two countries, as points for discussion. It is indispensable that, before entering into any new negotiation between the United States and Spain, that relating to the treaty already signed should be closed. If, upon receiving the explanations which your Government has asked, and which I am prepared to give, you are authorized to issue orders to the Spanish officers commanding in Florida to deliver up to those of the United States who may be authorized to receive it, immediate possession of the province, conformably to the stipulations of the treaty, the President, if such shall be the advice and consent of the Senate, will wait (with such possession given) for the ratification of His Catholic Majesty till your messenger shall have time to proceed to Madrid; but if you have no such authority, the President considers it would be at once an unprofitable waste of time, and a course incompatible with the dignity of this nation, to give explanations which are to lead to no satisfactory result, and to resume a negotiation the conclusion of which can no longer be deferred.

Be pleased to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 24, 1820.

In acknowledging the receipt of your note of the 21st instant, I have the honor to remark, in the first place, that you appear to have misconceived a material part of my letter of the 14th, by reproducing arguments which have been already sufficiently refuted by my Government. You will, therefore, excuse me from reviving them here, in so far as they relate to the question whether a sovereign is or is not bound to ratify what may have been signed by his negotiator, it being well known that various instances may be cited of cases in which the ratification of a treaty has been justly suspended, without alleging, as the motive for so doing, that the negotiator had transcended his powers or instructions. There may, unquestionably, be other reasons sufficiently valid to exonerate him from the obligation of ratifying, supposing that to have been the case.

It is evident that the scandalous proceedings of a number of American citizens, the decisions of several of the courts of the Union, and the criminal expedition set on foot within it for the invasion of His Majesty's possessions in North America, at the very period when the ratification was still pending, were diametrically opposite to the most sacred principles of amity, and to the nature and essence of the treaty itself. These hostile proceedings were, notwithstanding, tolerated by the Federal Government, and thus the evil was daily aggravated; so that the belief generally prevailed throughout Europe that the ratification of the treaty by Spain, and the acknowledgment of the independence of her rebellious transatlantic colonies by the United States, would be simultaneous acts. The pretensions advanced by Mr. Forsyth, in relation to the eighth article, were also evidently calculated to render the treaty illusory. It is, therefore, not possible to assign reasons more powerful, or more completely justificatory of the sovereign resolution of the King, my master, to suspend his ratification of that instrument.

In my first note, I also hinted at the offensive terms employed by the American minister at Madrid, from the very outset; which you notice no further than by taking up the second point, upon which the one which I now have the honor to contest essentially turns. Although His Majesty might certainly have kept aloof from a deportment so void of moderation, and so derogatory to his dignity, it is obvious that any discussions commenced with the minister so situated were only likely to produce unprofitable results—his correspondence tending more powerfully to disunite than to reconcile the contracting parties. It was indeed a subject of great regret that the incident just referred to, the distance of Spain from the new world, which, from the obstructions to correspondence, produced unavoidable delay in receiving correct information of the events passing here, and which to His Majesty appeared incredible, and, in fine, his wish to avoid whatever had the appearance of an unfounded complaint and an unpleasant difference between the two Governments, should have retarded my arrival, and the happy conclusion of the transaction now pending.

I have further to state to you that I am not authorized by His Majesty to give the necessary orders to the Spanish authorities in the Floridas to deliver up those possessions to the United States; nor was this to be presumed, since, if it appeared contrary to the natural order of things and to established usage that the treaty should be ratified previous to receiving the explanations which necessitated its suspension, it would consequently seem the more so that it should receive its due accomplishment before it was finally ratified.

It is with equal surprise and concern that I observe, in the conclusion of your note, that you intimate the intention to decline any discussion of my proposals previous to the possession of the Floridas, since it appears to me that such discussion could not be long, in the event of your Government being ready to accede to them; (in which case I repeat that I am authorized solemnly to promise, in the name of His Majesty, that the ratification of the treaty shall be no longer delayed;) nor that the delay unavoidably produced by that particular cause, in the occupation of the territories in question, could be considered as derogatory to the dignity of the United States; and the more so as, until then, His Catholic Majesty would not be in the full possession of his rights.

I flatter myself that, on a consideration of the contents of this note, you will favor me with an answer more agreeable to my wishes.

In the mean time, I reiterate the assurance of my distinguished consideration and respect, praying God to preserve you many years.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Thomas L. L. Brent, acting as Chargé d'Affaires at Madrid, containing the substance of a conversation between him and Mr. Jabat, 27th April, 1820, to Mr. Adams.

He [Mr. Jabat] then adverted to the bill reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations to the House of Representatives, for the occupation of Florida, and asked me if I had received instructions to give any explanations on the subject. He intimated that, if we did not extend our views farther than its occupation, every effort would be made to preserve amicable relations with the United States—every sacrifice, consistent with a due self-respect; but that the United States ought not to expect Spain would go any farther. Now that this had become a representative Government, they would be under the necessity of examining, with more scrupulous attention than ever, every act of theirs which could, in any degree, compromit the just pride and dignity of the nation. I told Mr. Jabat that I had no instructions on the subject; I only knew, I said, from the public papers, that such a bill was before Congress, and, consequently, did not feel authorized to give any explanations; that, as soon as I received, I would make them known to him. I begged him to tranquillize himself; I said I hoped, with such dispositions as were manifested by the new Government, and the corresponding sentiments of mine, that every thing would finally be amicably arranged, and that matters might be so managed as that the steps which the United States may have thought it necessary to take for the assertion of their rights might be made reconcileable with the pride of his Government—steps which they will have been compelled to resort to, from the conduct of the former administration of his Government, and the measures of the old system. It may be proper to notice that this minister was evidently under an apprehension that the United States might not limit themselves to the occupation of the territory of Florida alone. In the course of the conversation, Mr. Jabat said that, as there would be opposition, blood might be spilt in the occupation of Florida; and the idea of it seemed to give him great pain. Mr. Jabat's manner during the whole of this interview was mild and friendly, and mine corresponded to his.

The Secretary of State to General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 3, 1820.

The explanations upon the points mentioned in your letter of the 14th ultimo, which I had the honor of giving you at large in the conference between us on Saturday last, and the frankness of the assurances which I had the pleasure of receiving from you, of your conviction that they would prove satisfactory to your Government, will relieve me from the necessity of recurring to circumstances which might tend to irritating discussions. In the confident expectation that, upon the arrival of your messenger at Madrid, His Catholic Majesty will give his immediate ratification to the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, I readily forbear all reference to the delays which have hitherto retarded that event, and all disquisition upon the perfect right which the United States have had to that ratification.

I am now instructed to repeat the assurance which has already been given you, that the representations which appear to have been made to your Government of a system of hostility, in various parts of this Union, against the Spanish dominions and the property of Spanish subjects, of decisions marked with such hostility by any of the courts of the United States, and of the toleration in any case of it by this Government, are unfounded. In the existing unfortunate civil war between Spain and the South American provinces, the United States have constantly avowed, and faithfully maintained, an impartial neutrality. No violation of that neutrality by any citizen of the United States has ever received sanction or countenance from this Government. Whenever the laws previously enacted for the preservation of neutrality have been found, by experience, in any manner defective, they have been strengthened by new provisions and severe penalties. Spanish property, illegally captured, has been constantly restored by the decisions of the tribunals of the United States; nor has the life itself been spared of individuals guilty of piracy committed upon Spanish property on the high seas.

Should the treaty be ratified by Spain, and the ratification be accepted by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the boundary line recognised by it will be respected by the United States, and due care will be taken to prevent any transgression of it. No new law or engagement will be necessary for that purpose. The existing laws are adequate to the suppression of such disorders, and they will be, as they have been, faithfully carried into effect. The miserable disorderly movement of a number of (not exceeding seventy) lawless individual stragglers, who never assembled within the jurisdiction of the United States, into a territory to which His Catholic Majesty has no acknowledged right other than the yet unratified treaty, was so far from receiving countenance or support from the Government of the United States, that every measure necessary for its suppression was promptly taken under their authority; and, from the misrepresentations which have been made of this very insignificant transaction to the Spanish Government, there is reason to believe that the pretended expedition itself, as well as the gross exaggerations which have been used to swell its importance, proceed from the same sources, equally unfriendly to the United States and to Spain.

As a necessary consequence of the neutrality between Spain and the South American provinces, the United States can contract no engagement not to form any relations with those provinces. This has explicitly and repeatedly been avowed and made known to your Government, both at Madrid and at this place. The demand was resisted both in conference and written correspondence between Mr. Erving and Mr. Pizarro. Mr. Onis had long and constantly been informed that a persistance in it would put an end to the possible conclusion of any treaty whatever. Your sovereign will perceive that, as such an engagement cannot be contracted by the United States, consistently with their obligations of neutrality, it cannot be justly required of them; nor have any of the European nations ever bound themselves to Spain by such an engagement.

With regard to your proposals, it is proper to observe that His Catholic Majesty, in announcing his purpose of asking explanations of the United States, gave no intimation of an intention to require new articles to the treaty. You are aware that the United States cannot, consistently with what is due to themselves, stipulate new engagements as the price of obtaining the ratification of the old. The declaration which Mr. Forsyth was instructed to deliver at the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, with regard to the eighth article, was not intended to annul, or in the slightest degree to alter or impair, the stipulations of that article; its only object was to guard your Government, and all persons who might have had an interest in any of the annulled grants, against the possible expectation or pretence that those grants would be made valid by the treaty. All grants subsequent to the 24th January, 1818, were declared to be positively null and void; and Mr. Onis always declared that he signed the treaty, fully believing that the grants to the Duke of Alagon, Count Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, were subsequent to that date. But he had, in his letter to me of 16th November, 1818, declared that those grants were null and void, because the essential conditions of the grants had not been fulfilled by the grantees. It was distinctly understood by us both that no grant, of whatever date, should be made valid by the treaty, which would not have been valid by the laws of Spain and the Indies if the treaty had not been made. It was therefore stipulated that grants prior to the 24th January, 1818, should be confirmed only "to the same extent that the same grants would be valid if the territories had remained under the dominion of His Catholic Majesty." This, of course, excluded the three grants above mentioned, which Mr. Onis had declared invalid for want of the fulfilment of their essential conditions—a fact which is now explicitly admitted by you. A single exception to the principle that the treaty should give no confirmation to any imperfect title was admitted; which exception was, that owners in possession of lands, who, by reason of the recent circumstances of the Spanish nation, and the revolutions in Europe, had been prevented from fulfilling all the conditions of their grants, should complete them within the terms limited in the same from the date of the treaty. This had obviously no reference to the above-mentioned grants, the grantees of which were not in possession of the lands, who had fulfilled none of their conditions, and who had not been prevented from fulfilling any of them by the circumstances of Spain or the revolutions of Europe. The article was drawn up by me, and, before assenting to it, Mr. Onis inquired what was understood by me as the import of the terms "shall complete them." I told him that, in connexion with the terms "all the conditions," they necessarily implied that the indulgence would be limited to grantees who had performed some of the conditions, and who had commenced settlements, which it would allow them to complete. These were precisely the cases for which Mr. Onis had urged the equity of making a provision, and he agreed to the article, fully understanding that it would be applicable only to them. When, after the signature of the treaty, there appeared to be some reason for supposing that Mr. Onis had been mistaken in believing that the grants to the Duke of Alagon, Count Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas, were subsequent to the 24th of January, 1818, candor required that Spain and the grantees should never have a shadow of ground to expect or allege that this circumstance was at all material in relation to the bearing of the treaty upon those grants. Mr. Onis had not been mistaken in declaring that they were invalid, because their conditions were not fulfilled. He had not been mistaken in agreeing to the principle that no grant invalid as to Spain should, by the treaty, be made valid against the United States. He had not been mistaken in the knowledge that those grantees had neither commenced settlements, nor been prevented from completing them by the circumstances of Spain or the revolutions in Europe. The declaration which Mr. Forsyth was instructed to deliver was merely to caution all whom it might concern not to infer, from an unimportant mistake of Mr. Onis as to the date of the grants, other important mistakes which he had not made, and which the United States would not permit to be made by any one. It was not, therefore, to annul or to alter, but to fulfil the eighth article as it stands, that the declaration was to be delivered; and it is for the same purpose that this explanation is now given. It was with much satisfaction, therefore, that I learned from you the determination of your Government to assent to the total nullity of the above-mentioned grants.

As I flatter myself that these explanations will remove every obstacle to the ratification of the treaty by His Catholic Majesty, it is much to be regretted that you have not that ratification to exchange, nor the power to give a pledge which would be equivalent to the ratification. The six months within which the exchange of the ratifications were stipulated by the treaty having elapsed, by the principles of our constitution the question whether it shall now be accepted must be laid before the Senate for their advice and consent. To give a last and signal proof of the earnest wish of this Government to bring to a conclusion these long-standing and unhappy differences with Spain, the President will so far receive that solemn promise of immediate ratification, upon the arrival of your messenger at Madrid, which, in your note of the 19th ultimo, you declare yourself authorized, in the name of your sovereign, to give, as to submit it to the Senate of the United States whether they will advise and consent to accept it for the ratification of the United States heretofore given.

But it is proper to apprize you that, if this offer be not accepted, the United States, besides being entitled to resume all the rights, claims, and pretensions which they had renounced by the treaty, can no longer consent to relinquish their claims of indemnity, and those of their citizens, from Spain, for all the injuries which they have suffered, and are suffering, by the delay of His Catholic Majesty to ratify the treaty. The amount of claims of the citizens of the United States, which existed at the time when the treaty was signed, far exceeded that which the United States consented to accept as indemnity. Their right of territory was, and yet is, to the Rio del Norte. I am instructed to declare that, if any further delay to the ratification by His Catholic Majesty of the treaty should occur, the United States could not hereafter accept either of $5,000,000 for the indemnities due to their citizens by Spain, nor of the Sabine for the boundary between the United States and the Spanish territories.

Please to accept the renewed assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, May 5, 1820.

In answer to your note of the 3d instant, and in pursuance of what I expressed to you in both our late conferences, I have to state to you that I am satisfied upon the first point of the proposals contained in my note of the 14th ultimo, and am persuaded that, if the existing laws enacted for the suppression of piracy should prove inadequate, more effectual measures will be adopted by your Government for the attainment of that important object.

I also admit as satisfactory the answer given to the second point, but I cannot assent to your assertion that the laws of this country have always been competent to the prevention of the excesses complained of, it being quite notorious that the expedition alluded to has not been the only one set on foot for the invasion of His Majesty's dominions; and it is, therefore, not surprising that the King, my lord, should give credit to the information received in relation to that expedition, or that he should now require of your Government a pledge that the integrity of the Spanish possessions in North America shall be respected.

I mentioned to you, in conference, and I now repeat it, that the answer to the third point was not such as I could, agreeably to the nature of my instructions, accept as being satisfactory; and that, although His Majesty might not have required of any of the European Governments the declaration which he has required of yours, yet that ought not to be considered as unreasonable, it being well known to the King, my master, that those Governments, so far from being disposed to wish to recognise the insurgent Governments of the Spanish colonies, had declined the invitation intimated to them some time past by yours, to acknowledge the pretended republic of Buenos Ayres. I notwithstanding renew to you the assurance that I will submit to His Majesty the verbal discussion we have had upon this point, and accompany it with such additional arguments as will, in my judgment, probably determine His Majesty to declare himself to be satisfied therewith.

In the event of the King's receiving as satisfactory the answer of your Government to the third point of my proposals, the abrogation of the grants will be attended with no difficulty; nor has that ever been the chief motive for suspending the ratification of the treaty; for the thorough comprehension of which I waive at present any reply to the remarks which you are pleased to offer on that topic. I cannot, however, refrain from stating to you that, in discussing with you the validity or the nullity of the grants above mentioned, I merely said that, "in my private opinion, they were null and void, through the inability of the grantees to comply with the terms of the law."

It is to me a matter of great regret that I have it not in my power to repeat the solemn promise that His Majesty will ratify the treaty; inasmuch as I cannot, agreeably to my instructions, accept as satisfactory the answer given to the third point of my proposals. I am, however, persuaded that His Majesty, upon consideration of the representation which I shall have the honor to lay before him, and of the reasons assigned by your Government for withholding its assent to the third point, will consider himself as satisfied, and ratify the treaty.

I further conceive it my duty to state to you that, at the time when I communicated to your Government the substance of my present answer, I mentioned, speaking in my individual capacity, that, although I had no official information of it, yet I consider as authentic the current intelligence of an important change said to have taken place in the Government of Spain; and that this circumstance alone would impose on me the obligation of giving no greater latitude to my promise previous to my receiving new instructions.

I therefore hope that your Government, upon consideration of what I have now submitted to you, and of the contents of my former notes, will agree to await the final decision of the King, my master, upon the only point still pending, and the adjustment of which is not within my competency; so that the past differences may be satisfactorily terminated, and the treaty receive its final accomplishment; thereby securing and perpetuating a perfect harmony and good understanding between the two Governments.

Be pleased to accept the assurances of my distinguished consideration. I pray God to preserve you many years.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

The Secretary of State to General Vives.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 6, 1820.

In the letter which I have had the honor of receiving from you, dated yesterday, you observe that you renew the assurance that you will submit to His Majesty the verbal discussion we have had on the third point, concerning which you were instructed to ask for explanations. I have to request of you to state specifically the representation which you propose to make to His Majesty of what passed between us in conference on this subject.

I pray you to accept the renewed assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

General VIVES, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Spain.

[TRANSLATION.]

General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, May 7, 1820.

I have received the note you were pleased to address to me of yesterday's date, and, in answer thereto, I have to state that the verbal discussion between us upon the third point of my proposals is comprised in your note of the 3d, and in my reply of the 5th instant; and that, consequently, the statement of it which I shall transmit for His Majesty's information will be in strict accordance with the tenor of the said notes.

I renew to you the assurance of my high esteem, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

The Secretary of State to General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Spain.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 8, 1820.

In the letter which I had the honor of writing to you on the 3d instant, it was observed that all reference would readily be waived to the delays which have retarded the ratification by His Catholic Majesty of the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, and all disquisition upon the perfect right of the United States to that ratification, in the confident expectation that it would be immediately given upon the arrival of your messenger at Madrid, and subject to your compliance with the proposal offered you in the same note, as the last proof which the President could give of his reliance upon the termination of the differences between the United States and Spain by the ratification of the treaty.

This proposal was, that, upon the explanations given you on all the points noticed in your instructions, and with which you had admitted yourself to be personally satisfied, you should give the solemn promise, in the name of your sovereign, which, by your note of the 19th ultimo, you had declared yourself authorized to pledge, that the ratification should be given immediately upon the arrival of your messenger at Madrid; which promise the President consented so far to receive as to submit the question for the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, whether the ratification of Spain should, under these circumstances, be accepted in exchange for that of the United States heretofore given. But the President has, with great regret, perceived by your note of the 5th instant that you decline giving even that unconditional promise, upon two allegations: one, that, although the explanations given you on one of the points mentioned in your note of the 14th ultimo are satisfactory to yourself, and you hope and believe will prove so to your sovereign, they still were not such as you were authorized by your instructions to accept; and the other, that you are informed a great change has recently occurred in the Government of Spain, which circumstance alone would prevent you from giving a further latitude to your promise previous to your receiving new instructions.

It becomes, therefore, indispensably necessary to show the absolute obligation by which His Catholic Majesty was bound to ratify the treaty within the term stipulated by one of its articles, that the reasons alleged for his withholding the ratification are altogether insufficient for the justification of that measure, and that the United States have suffered by it the violation of a perfect right, for which they are justly entitled to indemnity and satisfaction—a right further corroborated by the consideration that the refusal of ratification necessarily included the non-fulfilment of another compact between the parties which had been ratified—the convention of August, 1802.

While regretting the necessity of producing this proof, I willingly repeat the expression of my satisfaction at being relieved from that of enlarging upon other topics of an unpleasant character. I shall allude to none of those upon which you have admitted the explanations given to be satisfactory, considering them as no longer subjects of discussion between us or our Governments. I shall with pleasure forbear noticing any remarks in your notes concerning them, which might otherwise require animadversion.

With the view of confining this letter to the only point upon which further observation is necessary, it will be proper to state the present aspect of the relations between the contracting parties.

The treaty of 22d February, 1819, was signed after a succession of negotiations of nearly twenty years' duration, in which all the causes of difference between the two nations had been thoroughly discussed, and with a final admission on the part of Spain that there were existing just claims on her Government, at least to the amount of five millions of dollars, due to citizens of the United States, and for the payment of which provision was made by the treaty. It was signed by a minister who had been several years residing in the United States in constant and unremitted exertions to maintain the interests and pretensions of Spain involved in the negotiation—signed after producing a full power, by which, in terms as solemn and as sacred as the hand of a sovereign can subscribe, His Catholic Majesty had promised to approve, ratify, and fulfil whatever should be stipulated and signed by him.

You will permit me to repeat that, by every principle of natural right, and by the universal assent of civilized nations, nothing can release the honor of a sovereign from the obligation of a promise thus unqualified, without the proof that his minister has signed stipulations unwarranted by his instructions. The express authority of two of the most eminent writers upon national law to this point were cited in Mr. Forsyth's letter of 2d October, 1819, to the Duke of San Fernando. The words of Vattel are: "But to refuse with honor to ratify that which has been concluded in virtue of a full power, the sovereign must have strong and solid reasons for it; and, particularly, he must show that his minister transcended his instructions."* The words of Martens are: "Every thing that has been stipulated by an agent, in conformity to his full powers, ought to become obligatory on the state from the moment of signing, without ever waiting for the ratification. However, not to expose a state to the errors of a single person, it is now become a general maxim that public conventions do not become obligatory until ratified. The motive of this custom clearly proves that the ratification can never be refused with justice, except when he who is charged with the negotiation, keeping within the extent of his public full powers, has gone beyond his secret instructions, and consequently rendered himself liable to punishment, or when the other party refuses to ratify."† In your letter of the 24th ultimo, you observe that these positions have already been refuted by your Government, which makes it necessary to inquire, as I with great reluctance do, how they have been refuted.

The Duke of San Fernando, in his reply to this letter of Mr. Forsyth, says, maintains, and repeats "that the very authorities cited by Mr. Forsyth literally declare that the sovereign, for strong and solid reasons, or if his minister has exceeded his instructions, may refuse his ratification; (Vattel, book 2, chap. 12,) and that public treaties are not obligatory until ratified."—Martens, book 2, chap. 3. See note. In these citations the Duke of San Fernando has substituted for the connective term and, in Vattel, which makes the proof of instructions transcended indispensable to justify the refusal of ratification, the disjunctive term or, which presents it as an alternative, and unnecessary on the contingency of other existing and solid reasons. Vattel says the sovereign must have strong and solid reasons, and particularly must show that the minister transcended his instructions. The Duke of San Fernando makes him say the sovereign must have strong and solid reasons, or if his minister has exceeded his instructions. Vattel not only makes the breach of instructions indispensable, but puts upon the sovereign the obligation of proving it. The Duke of San Fernando cites Vattel not only as admitting that other reasons, without a breach of instructions, may justify a refusal of ratification, but that the mere fact of such a breach would also justify the refusal, without requiring that the sovereign alleging should prove it.

Is this refutation?

The only observation that I shall permit myself to make upon it is, to mark how conclusive the authority of the passage in Vattel must have been to the mind of him who thus transformed it to the purpose for which he was contending. The citation from Martens receives the same treatment. The Duke of San Fernando takes by itself a part of a sentence—"that public treaties are not obligatory until ratified." He omits the preceding sentence, by which Martens asserts that a treaty signed in conformity to full powers is in rigor obligatory from the moment of signature, without waiting for the ratification. He omits the part of the sentence cited, which ascribes the necessity of a ratification to a usage founded upon the danger of exposing a state to the errors of its minister. He omits the following sentence, which explicitly asserts that this usage can never be resorted to in justification of a refusal to ratify, unless when the minister has exceeded his secret instructions; and thus, with this half of a sentence, stripped of all its qualifying context, the duke brings Martens to assert that which he most explicitly denies.

Is this refutation?

While upon this subject, permit me to refer you to another passage of Vattel, which I the more readily cite, because, independent of its weight as authority, it places this obligation of sovereigns upon its immoveable foundation of eternal justice in the law of nature. "It is shown by the law of nature that he who has made a promise to any one has conferred upon him a true right to require the thing promised; and that, consequently, not to keep a perfect promise is to violate the right of another, and is as manifest an injustice as that of depriving a person of his property. All the tranquillity, the happiness, and security of the human race rest on justice, on the obligation of paying a regard to the rights of others. The respect of others for our rights of domain and property constitutes the security of our actual possessions. The faith of promises is our security for the things that cannot be delivered or executed on the spot. There would be no more security, no longer any commerce between mankind, did they not believe themselves obliged to preserve their faith and keep their word. This obligation is then as necessary as it is natural and indubitable between nations that live together in a state of nature, and acknowledge no superior upon earth, to maintain order and peace in their society. Nations and their conductors ought, then, to keep their promises and their treaties inviolable. This great truth, though too often neglected in practice, is generally acknowledged by all nations."*

* "Mais pour refuser avec honneur de ratifier ce qui a été conclué en vertu d'un plein-pouvoir, il faut que le souverain en ait de fortes et solides raisons, et qu'il fasse voir, en particulier, que son ministre s'est écarté de ses instructions.—Liv. 2, ch. 12, § 156.

The melancholy allusion to the frequent practical neglect of this unquestionable principle would afford a sufficient reply to your assertion that the ratification of treaties has often been refused, though signed by ministers with unqualified full powers, and without breach of their instructions. No case can be cited by you in which such a refusal has been justly given; and the fact of refusal, separate from the justice of the case, amounts to no more than the assertion that sovereigns have often violated their engagements and their duties: the obligation of His Catholic Majesty to ratify the treaty signed by Mr. Onis is therefore complete.

The sixteenth and last article of this treaty is in the following words: "The present treaty shall be ratified, in due form, by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible." On the faith of His Catholic Majesty's promise, the treaty was, immediately after its signature, ratified on the part of the United States, and, on the 18th of May following, Mr. Forsyth, by an official note, informed the Marquis of Casa Yrujo, then Minister of Foreign Affairs at Madrid, that the treaty, duly ratified by the United States, had been intrusted to him by the President, and that he was prepared to exchange it for the ratification of Spain. He added that, from the nature of the engagement, it was desirable that the earliest exchange should be made, and that the American ship of war Hornet was waiting in the harbor of Cadiz, destined in a few days to the United States, and affording an opportunity peculiarly convenient of transmitting the ratified treaty to the United States.

No answer having been returned to this note, on the 4th of June Mr. Forsyth addressed to the same minister a second, urging, in the most respectful terms, the necessity of the departure of the Hornet, the just expectation of the United States that the ratified treaty would be transmitted by that vessel, and the disappointment which could not fail to ensue should she return without it.

After fifteen days of further delay, on the 19th of June, Mr. Forsyth was informed by a note from Mr. Salmon, successor to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo, that "His Majesty, on reflecting on the great importance and interest of the treaty in question, was under the indispensable necessity of examining it with the greatest caution and deliberation before he proceeded to ratify it, and that this was all he was enabled to communicate to Mr. Forsyth on that point."

Thus, after the lapse of more than a month from the time of Mr. Forsyth's first note, and of more than two months from the time when your Government had received the treaty, with knowledge that it had been ratified by the United States, the ratification of a treaty which His Catholic Majesty had solemnly promised, so that it might be exchanged within six months from the date of its signature, or sooner if possible, was withheld merely to give time to His Catholic Majesty to examine it; and this treaty was the result of a twenty years' negotiation, in which every article and subject contained in it had been debated and sifted to the utmost satiety between the parties, both at Washington and Madrid—a treaty in which the stipulations by the Spanish minister had been sanctioned by successive references of every point to his own Government, and were, by the formal admission of your own note, fully within the compass of his instructions.

If, under the feeling of such a procedure on the part of the Spanish Government, the minister of the United States appealed to the just rights of his country in expressions suited more to the sense of its wrongs than to the courtesies of European diplomacy, nothing had till then occurred which could have restrained your Government from asking of him any explanation which could be necessary for fixing its determination upon the ratification. No explanation was asked of him.

Nearly two months afterwards, on the 10th of August, Mr. Forsyth was informed that the King would not come to a final decision upon the ratification without previously entering into several explanations with the Government of the United States, to some of which that Government had given rise, and that His Majesty had charged a person possessed of his full confidence, who would forthwith make known to the United States His Majesty's intentions. Mr. Forsyth offered himself to give every explanation which could be justly required; but your Government declined receiving them from him, assigning to him the shortness of the time—a reason altogether different from that which you now allege, of the disrespectful character of his communications.

From the 10th of August till the 14th of last month, a period of more than eight months, passed over, during which no information was given by your Government of the nature of the explanations which would be required. The Government of the United States, by a forbearance perhaps unexampled in human history, has patiently waited for your arrival, always ready to give, in candor and sincerity, every explanation that could with any propriety be demanded. What, then, must have been the sentiments of the President upon finding, by your note of the 14th ultimo, that, instead of explanations, His Catholic Majesty has instructed you to demand the negotiation of another treaty, and to call upon the United States for stipulations derogatory to their honor, and incompatible with their duties as an independent nation? What must be the feelings of this nation to learn that, when called upon to state whether you were the bearer of His Catholic Majesty's ratification of the treaty to be exchanged upon the explanations demanded being given, you explicitly answered that you were not? and, when required to say whether you are authorized, as a substitute for the ratification, to give the pledge of immediate possession of the territory from which the acknowledged just claims of the citizens of the United States were stipulated to be indemnified, you still answer that you are not; but refer us back to a solemn promise of the King, already pledged before in the full power to your predecessor, and to a ratification as soon as possible, already stipulated in vain by the treaty which he, in full conformity to his instructions, had signed?

The ratification of that treaty can now no longer be accepted by this Government without the concurrence of a constitutional majority of the Senate of the United States, to whom it must be again referred. Yet even this promise you were, by my letter of the 3d instant, informed that, rather than abandon the last hope of obtaining the fulfilment of His Catholic Majesty's promise already given, the President would, so far as was constitutionally within his power, yet accept.

The assurances which you had given me, in the first personal conference between us, of your own entire satisfaction with the explanations given you upon all the points on which you had been instructed to ask them, would naturally have led to the expectation that the promise which you was authorized to give would, at least, not be withheld. From your letter of the 5th instant, however, it appears that no discretion has been left you to pledge even His Majesty's promise of ratification in the event of your being yourself satisfied with the explanations upon all the points desired; that the only promise you can give is conditional, and the condition a point upon which your Government, when they prescribed it, could not but know it was impossible that the United States should comply—a condition incompatible with their independence, their neutrality, their justice, and their honor.

* "On demontre en droit naturel, que celui qui promet à quelqu'un a lui conféré un véritable droit d'exiger la chose promisée; et que, par conséquent, ne point garder une promesse parfaite, c'est violer le droit d'autrui, c'est une injustice aussi manifeste que celle de dépouiller quelqu'un de son bien. Toute la tranquillité, le bonheur, et la sûreté du genre humain reposent sur la justice, sur l'obligation de respecter les droits d'autrui. Le respect des autres pour nos droits de domaine et de propriété fait la sûreté de nos possessions actuelles; la foi des promesses est notre garant pour les choses qui ne peuvent être livrées ou exécutées sur-le-champ. Plus de sûreté, plus de commerce, entre les hommes, s'ils ne se croient point obligés de garder la foi, de tenir leur parole. Cette obligation est, donc, aussi nécessaire qu'elle est naturelle et indubitable entre les nations qui vivent ensemble dans l'état de nature, et qui ne connaissent point de supérieur sur la terre, pour maintenir l'ordre et la paix dans leur société. Les nations et leurs conducteurs doivent, donc, garder inviolablement leurs promesses et leurs traités. Cette grande vérité, quoique trop souvent negligée dans la pratique, est généralement reconnue de toutes les nations."—Liv. 2, ch. 12, § 163.

It was also a condition which His Catholic Majesty had not the shadow of a right to prescribe. The treaty had been signed by Mr. Onis with a full knowledge that no such engagement as that contemplated by it would ever be acceded to by the American Government, and after long and unwearied efforts to obtain it. The differences between the United States and Spain had no connexion with the war between Spain and South America. The object of the treaty was to settle the boundaries, and adjust and provide for the claims between your nation and ours; and Spain, at no time, could have a right to require that any stipulation concerning the contest between her and her colonies should be connected with it. As His Catholic Majesty could not justly require it during the negotiation of that treaty, still less could it afford a justification for withholding his promised ratification after it was concluded.

The proposal which, at a prior period, had been made by the Government of the United States to some of the principal Powers of Europe for a recognition, in concert, of the independence of Buenos Ayres, was founded, as I have observed to you, upon an opinion then and still entertained that this recognition must, and would at no very remote period, be made by Spain herself; that the joint acknowledgment by several of the principal Powers of the world at the same time might probably induce Spain the sooner to accede to that necessity, in which she must ultimately acquiesce, and would thereby hasten an event propitious to her own interests, by terminating a struggle in which she is wasting her strength and resources without a possibility of success—an event ardently to be desired by every friend of humanity afflicted by the continual horrors of a war, cruel and sanguinary almost beyond example; an event, not only desirable to the unhappy people who are suffering the complicated distresses and calamities of this war, but to all the nations having relations of amity and of commerce with them. This proposal, founded upon such motives, far from giving to Spain the right to claim of the United States an engagement not to recognise the South American Governments, ought to have been considered by Spain as a proof at once of the moderation and discretion of the United States; as evidence of their disposition to discard all selfish or exclusive views in the adoption of a measure which they deemed wise and just in itself, but most likely to prove efficacious by a common adoption of it, in a spirit entirely pacific, in concert with other nations, rather than by a precipitate resort to it on the part of the United States alone.

The conditional promise, therefore, now offered by you, instead of the positive one which you have declared yourself authorized to give, cannot be accepted by the President; and I am constrained to observe that he can consider the procedure of your Government, in thus providing you with powers and instructions utterly inefficient for the conclusion of the negotiation with which you are charged, in no other light than as proceeding from a determination on its part still to protract and baffle its final successful issue. Under these circumstances, he deems it his duty to submit the correspondence which has passed between us, since your arrival, to the consideration of the Congress of the United States, to whom it will belong to decide how far the United States can yet, consistently with their duties to themselves, and the rights of their citizens, authorize the further delay requested in your note of the 5th instant.

In the conclusion of that note, you have remarked, alluding to a great change which appears to have taken place since your departure from Madrid in the Government of Spain, that this circumstance alone would impose on you the obligation of giving no greater latitude to your promise previous to your receiving new instructions. If I have understood you right, your intention is to remark that this circumstance alone would restrain you, in any event, from giving, without new instructions, the unconditional promise of ratification, which, in a former note, you had declared yourself authorized, in the name of your sovereign, to give. This seems to be equivalent to a declaration that you consider your powers themselves, in the extent to which they were intrusted to you, as suspended by the events to which you thus refer. If I am mistaken in taking this as your meaning, will you have the goodness to inform me how far you do consider your powers affected by the present state of your information from Spain?

Please to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

General Vives to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, May 9, 1820.

In answer to your note of yesterday's date, I have, in the first place, to give you the explanation requested of me, of the import of my last proposal; and, in so doing, to repeat, in other words, that I am authorized solemnly to promise to this Government the ratification of the treaty by His Majesty only in case the third point of my proposals be satisfied; but as the answer given to this point has not been such as I could, agreeably to my instructions, receive as satisfactory, I can by no means commit myself by giving a greater extension to my promise than that expressed in my note.

My object in intimating to you that, although I knew nothing officially, yet I considered as authentic the information circulating of an important change in the Government of Spain—a circumstance which would, of itself, effectually prevent me from giving greater latitude to my promise—was, to apprize your Government that as, by the adoption of the constitution of 1812 in Spain, the powers of the King would be limited, it would no longer depend on His Majesty alone to fulfil my solemn promise, admitting that my instructions had impowered me to give such a promise; so that my sole motive for offering a remark upon that topic was to strengthen the grounds on which my proposal was founded, and, further, to enable your Government so to appreciate as no longer to decline assenting to it.

I shall, on this occasion, waive all reply to the arguments again advanced by you, in extenso, upon the question of His Majesty's obligation to ratify the treaty, and confine myself to a single remark, namely, that all the authorities cited by you lay down the peace and happiness of mankind in general, and of states and their respective people in particular, as a fundamental principle. And having, in my first note, shown the notoriously hostile disposition prevailing throughout the Union towards the interests of the Spanish monarchy, it necessarily follows that, when the objects of treaties are not obtained, the ratification of that of 22d February, 1819, would, in like manner, become illusory; and, therefore, that His Majesty's motives for suspending it were founded upon a competent view of evident facts.

I shall also leave it to the general sense of the reflecting part of mankind to decide whether the reasoning you rely on, in stating the motives of the American Government for proposing to other Powers to acknowledge the revolted provinces of Spanish America, and in exhibiting them as favorable, not only to suffering humanity, but to the interests of Spain herself, be not, in the highest degree, specious; for if such maxims were to be adopted, nations could no longer count upon the integrity of their possessions, or upon the maintenance of that mutual amity and good understanding which it is equally their duty and their interest to cultivate in their relations with each other.

I have the honor to offer you anew the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and I pray God long to preserve you.

SIR: WASHINGTON, May 10, 1820.

In conformity with the orders I have this moment received from my Government, I have the honor to inform you that His Catholic Majesty hath sworn to the political constitution of the Spanish monarchy as sanctioned by the extraordinary Cortes in 1812, and to enclose a printed copy of His Majesty's manifest to the nation, for the purpose of giving the President a just view of the noble and generous sentiments which actuate the august mind of the King.

Please to accept the renewed assurances of my perfect consideration, and my wish that God may preserve you many years.

GAZETTE EXTRAORDINARY OF MADRID, SUNDAY, March 12, 1820.

Proclamation of the King to the nation.

SPANIARDS:

When, by your heroic efforts, you succeeded in terminating a captivity in which I was detained by the most unheard-of perfidy, every thing I saw and was informed of, on my entering into my native land, conspired to persuade me that the nation wished to see revived its ancient form of government; and this persuasion must have decided me to conform myself with the general wish of a magnanimous people, who, vanquisher of a foreign enemy, feared the still more dreadful evils of intestine divisions.

I was, however, well aware that the rapid progress of civilization in Europe; the universal diffusion of knowledge, even among the lower classes; the most frequent intercourse with the different parts of the globe; and the wonderful events of the present era, have given rise to ideas and desires unknown to our forefathers, which imperiously demand the most energetic measures in the Government. I also knew well that it was indispensable that the political institutions should agree with such principles, thereby to obtain that harmony between the people and the laws on which the stability and peace of society so much depend.

But, while I was maturely planning, with the solicitude of my paternal heart, the changes to be effected in our fundamental administration, more suitable to the national character and to the present state of the different provinces of the Spanish monarchy, and also more analogous to an enlightened nation, you have let me know your wishes for the re-establishment of the constitution proclaimed at Cadiz, in the year 1812, amidst the bustle of arms, and while, to the astonishment of the world, you were fighting for the liberty of your country. I have listened to your desires, and, as a loving father, I have condescended to grant what my children thought most conducive to their happiness. I have sworn to that constitution for which you longed, and I will always be its firmest supporter. I have already taken the most effectual measures for the immediate convocation of the Cortes. In them, and united to your representatives, I will make it my glory to concur in the great work of national prosperity.

Spaniards! Your glory is my only ambition. The desire of my heart is to see you all united and happy around my throne. Trust, then, to your King, who addresses you with that sincere effusion of his soul which the circumstances in which you are, and a sense of the high duty imposed upon him by Providence, inspire him with. Your happiness will henceforth depend, in a great measure, upon yourselves. Do not suffer yourselves to be seduced by the deceitful appearances of a chimerical happiness, which often prevents the attaining of real bliss. Allow not your passions to be exalted, as they are wont to make enemies of those who ought always to live as brothers, and be as unanimous in their wishes as they are in the possession of one religion, the speaking of one language, and the conforming to the same manners and customs. Repel the perfidious insinuations so artfully disguised by your enemies. Let us conform ourselves strictly to the constitution, as I myself will be the first to do; and let us show to Europe a pattern of wisdom, order, and perfect moderation, in a crisis which, in other nations, has been accompanied by scenes of bloodshed and havoc. Let us make the Spanish name admired and respected, at the same time that we establish forever our happiness and our glory.

FERDINAND.

General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, May 11, 1820.

Among the documents transmitted with the President's message to both Houses of Congress, and published in this day's National Intelligencer, I have seen with surprise the letter of Mr. Gallatin, stating that I positively told him that "I could, in case of an arrangement, give satisfactory security to the United States, and that it would consist in consenting that they should take immediate possession of Florida without waiting for the ratification of the treaty." Although I have with all frankness proved, in my correspondence with you, that I had no such authority, and that it will not, under any view which may be taken, appear presumable that I made so doubtful, so useless, and inconsiderate a disclosure, I request, however, that you will be pleased to communicate this to the President, in order that, by giving publicity to this document, it may be understood that I made no such proposal, either to Mr. Gallatin or to Baron Pasquier. I renew, &c.

FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES.

[The following report on the same subject was made to the House of Representatives, March 9, 1820.]

The committee, to whom has been referred so much of the President's message at the commencement of the session as relates to foreign affairs, respectfully report:

That their attention was directed, immediately upon their appointment, to the state of the relations of the United States with Spain, and that their delay in making a report on them must be attributed to their wish "to afford an opportunity for such friendly communications during the present session of Congress" as the Government of Spain had authorized us to expect. They thought it better that Congress should postpone its determination until events might enable it to make that determination definitive, than that it should pass a contingent act for authorizing measures which it was not proposed immediately to execute; that it should found its determination upon relations ascertained to exist, than upon a calculation of events which might be expected to occur during its sitting.

But more than a year has passed since the signature of the treaty by which it was proposed to terminate the long differences between the United States and Spain; more than six months since the appointment of a new minister from Spain, who was "forthwith" to make known to the United States the intentions of his Government; and we have advanced so far in the session as to make it necessary to propose, without further delay, any measure on which it is expected that Congress shall act before its adjournment.

The committee will not attempt to add any thing to the exposition of the rights of the United States and the obligations of Spain which is contained in the correspondence between the two Governments. We can hardly expect from continued negotiation the redress which has been claimed for twenty years, and promised for eighteen; which has been a second time promised, and a second time withheld. In such a negotiation, the signature of a treaty seems to be a mere incident, and not its term.

For the spoliations which have been committed upon the property of our citizens, for the invasion of our soil, for the weakness or partiality which has made a Spanish territory the place of rendezvous and encampment of an enemy, and which has, still more lately, permitted the Indian inhabitants of that territory (whom Spain was bound by treaty to restrain) to engage in savage hostilities against us—for all these acts of war, a people less attached to peace would seek redress only by war. To capture and confiscate the ships and property of the wrong-doer would be admitted to be a policy of mildness and forbearance. But, by such reprisals, the Government that does the wrong suffers less than the unoffending subject. It seems a more just reprisal to occupy the province which has been made an instrument of injury, which has been designated by Spain herself as the fund for our indemnity, and whose occupation by the United States will stop the accumulation of those claims for compensation and redress which the misgovernment of that neglected colony continually produces. The committee submit to the House a bill to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary Government therein.

There appears too much reason to believe, from the mistake of the Spanish negotiator as to the dates of the Spanish grants which it was intended to annul if the projected treaty had been ratified, that the crown lands in Florida may be insufficient to provide the expected indemnity for our losses. But these may be applied, as far as they will go, to the compensation of our citizens; and for the excess of our claim, Spain, by whose act the domain of Florida has been rendered inadequate, must expect us to look westward. Perhaps, when our attention is thus forced to a direction more interesting to Spain, her Government may at last admit that it is as much her interest as ours that the just claims of the United States should be provided for by friendly convention, and we may hope that the next treaty between the two nations may be executed as well as signed.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, (No. 18,) dated

MAY 20, 1820.

By the Gibraltar mail of the — instant, I received the duplicate of your No. 11. You will herewith receive copies of Mr. Jabat's letter, giving notice of the birth and title of the son of the Infante Don Francisco de Paula, and my answer.

On the 12th I paid the minister a visit at the Office of State, and, as I expected, he inquired if I had any recent advices from America. I stated to him very frankly that I had received nothing but the permission from our Government to return to the United States, which, from a belief that it would be most agreeable to the President, I should not use until after the celebration of the Cortes. He professed to be much gratified by this determination, which he thought was calculated to promote that good understanding between our respective Governments, to secure which was the object of our mutual wishes. From this, the conversation naturally turned to the unofficial notices from the United States, and particularly to the report of the committee on the affairs of Florida. He did not appear to apprehend that we should do more than occupy the territory; but he expressed a great deal of dread lest there should be blood shed in effecting that object, and carrying into effect the act proposed by the committee.

As I had been told (as stated in my No. 17) that some uneasiness was felt on the first point, I thought it prudent to show him that, with the dispositions now entertained in Spain, there was no reason to fear that we should be disposed to go beyond the limits of the treaty of February, 1819. He would recollect that the only motives we could have were to procure satisfaction for the injury sustained by the delay of Spain to ratify the treaty, and compensation for any deficiency in the fund for the payment of our citizens occasioned by the mistake of Mr. Onis about the date of the large grants. On the first, I was sure a reasonable explanation would be deemed sufficient; on the second, there could be no difficulty, as the abandonment of all pretension in favor of the grantees was more necessary to the character of Spain than it was important to the interests of the United States.

I did not suppose there was much ground for the fears he seemed to entertain of a formidable resistance to the occupation of Florida; nevertheless, as he was seriously apprehensive, I suggested that the President would no doubt employ a force so powerful that resistance would be hopeless, and I presumed the good sense of the Spanish authorities would prevent them from making a useless sacrifice of the lives of the soldiers committed to their care. It was obvious, from the conversation of Mr. Jabat, that the seizure of the territory was anticipated, and that the only fear really entertained was, that the mode of occupation would impose an obligation on the present rulers to make a noise about it. The interview terminated by a renewal of the assurances formerly given, of the desire of the Government to establish a permanent friendship with us, and with the hope, reciprocally expressed, that nothing might occur to render it difficult. On the 15th, I received a note from Mr. Jabat, (copy enclosed,) inviting me to see him the next day at eleven. I saw him at the hour appointed, and his first question was, "Have you any thing from Washington?" To my reply in the negative, he said, "Then I shall have the pleasure of giving you very recent advices from that place." He showed me a despatch from Mr. Serna, of the 28th of March, enclosing copies of the President's message to the House of Representatives of the 27th, and of the documents accompanying it. Mr. Jabat was highly gratified; said nothing could have occurred more favorable to the future amity of the two nations; that he had shown these papers to the King, who was pleased both with the measure proposed, and the reasons offered for it by the President. Mr. Jabat did not omit to suggest, what I knew perfectly well, that the accomplishment of the expectations of the President would have to be imputed to the recent revolution in Spain. He explained to me what I did not understand in our previous conversation—the foundation of his fears of a formidable resistance in Florida. It seems the ports of the territory had been reinforced from Cuba, and the governor general of that island had given official notice of it to the Secretary of State. Joining with the Spanish secretary in his expressions of satisfaction, I suggested the hope that General Vives would not arrive until after the adjournment of Congress, as it was impossible to foresee what might be the effect produced by his arrival without competent power to meet the just expectations of the American Government. I did not fear any ill consequences if news of the revolution in Spain should reach Washington before a determination was taken. I was confident that, irritating as this want of authority might be, the President would be disposed to give to the King of the Spains proofs of the moderation and good-will which had distinguished the conduct of the United States to the King of Spain. Taking the time at which Congress has usually adjourned as the criterion, I supposed that General Vives would scarcely see Washington before the adjournment of the legislative body. I have since learned from our newspapers that Congress would have continued its session until the beginning of this month, and that General Vives reached New York on the 5th of April. I now hope that Mr. Hackley, who carried my despatches of the 9th March, and who left the Straits of Gibraltar about the 27th March, will be in the United States within a short time after the arrival of the Spanish minister. In the present state of things, nothing could be more auspicious than the proposed delay of acting against Florida, although the President will have perceived, from your first communications with General Vives, that, but for recent events, we should have given another proof of useless forbearance, if the utility of forbearance was to be estimated by the good effect it would have produced on the Government of Spain. Mr. Jabat proposed to me to see the King at the circle that day—a ceremony I have not thought it necessary to observe since the postponement of the ratification of the treaty. Always, however, replying politely to the notes sent on particular occasions, and once calling at the palace when the King was ill, I had resolved to renew these visits of ceremony immediately after the liberation of the Americans, prisoners in Spain, and therefore the more readily acceded to this proposal. I attended the circle with the diplomatic body, and was received, as I had been taught to expect, perfectly well, and as if there had been no interruption in my visits to it.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, (No. 19,) dated

JULY 13, 1820.

A few days after the arrival of the Minister of State, (Perez de Castro,) I called at his office to see him on our affairs. I stated that the time for the meeting of the Cortes was near at hand, and I was desirous to know what was proposed by this Government to be done. He declared himself to be unable to converse on the subject of the negotiation with the United States. He was not master of the correspondence, and that his numerous and pressing engagements had rendered it impossible for him as yet to become so. He was examining, and hoped to speak advisedly on it in a short time. I gave him a translation of the remonstrance of the 18th of October, to apprize him of the state of the dispute in relation to the eighth article of the treaty, not officially, but as a document for his own examination, telling him that I did not conceive it necessary, from the disposition manifested since the revolution, to make an official representation on this subject. He received it very willingly. He had seen, as he stated, in the foreign newspapers, that it was asserted by the American Government that the treaty was obligatory upon Spain, although not ratified: this position he could not consider as founded either in the opinion of the best authorities, or in the usages of nations. I explained to him that we considered the treaty as obligatory in justice and in honor as if ratified by Spain. As no satisfactory reason had been, or, as we believed, could be given for the refusal to ratify, there could be no question as to our right to resort to any measure we deemed proper to obtain satisfaction. The least we could do was to execute the treaty; and when we gave to Spain all the advantages she could derive from it, we should take from her all just cause even to complain of the course pursued. He spoke a good deal at large of the charge of bad faith which was urged against Spain, and said she had no motive of avarice or ambition to gratify in her negotiation with us; and if her policy required her to procrastinate, this was no reason to charge her with ill faith. To all this I answered that the systematic procrastination, although at all times vexatious, had never been urged as a proof of bad faith; it was the non-compliance with engagements actually made by persons duly authorized and impowered by this Government; that, if the avarice or ambition of the Government was not known in the negotiation, that of individuals who had possessed influence in Spain was but too visible. I saw him again after ten days. He had run over the whole correspondence; talked of the treaty of 1802; the proposals of Mr. Pinckney; the guaranty of the Spanish American dominions, as an inducement to cede Florida; in short, of all that had passed prior to the convention of 1819; of the losses Spain had sustained, and of our gains. I listened patiently to all he had to advance; when he had finished, I replied that we had gained nothing from Spain; if her arrangement with another Power was matter of regret, it was not our fault; what we had obtained was purchased and paid for; that I had no instructions from the President since August, 1819, and, therefore, could not speak certainly of what might be the wish of my Government; but that it appeared to me it would be better for Spain, at the present juncture, not to look beyond the treaty of 1819, but to consider what obligations were imposed upon her by it, and by her as yet unexplained refusal to ratify it. He did not seem unwilling to adopt this idea, and entered into a short examination of the conduct of the United States in the dispute between the colonies and Spain; the expeditions fitted out by Miranda, Mina, &c. &c.; of the patriot privateers, &c. I replied that we had done all Spain had a right to expect from us; that, determining to be neutral between the contending parties, we had taken every means necessary to preserve that neutrality. If the laws of the United States had been sometimes violated with impunity, it was what had occurred, and would occur, in all nations, by the escape of persons who had committed offences; that all reclamations founded upon them by causes of complaint were removed by the convention, &c. Previous to this conversation, I had seen in the English newspapers the President's message to Congress of the 9th April, headed by a sort of abstract of your correspondence with General Vives, in which it was stated that this Government had not asked explanations of me relative to the treaty because of my intemperate conduct. I remarked to the minister that this was not the fact. Explanations were not asked of me, because, anticipating what would be required, I had given the ministry to understand that, upon the subject of the dispute with the colonies, I had no explanations to give, and that it was informally made known to me, before the 22d of August, that I could have the convention if I was authorized to promise that the Government of the United States would not recognise the independence of any of the Patriot Governments. He said he had read the note I had given him, and those previously written, and that there were expressions stronger than he had ever met with in diplomatic correspondence, but he supposed they were written when I was a little warm. I questioned whether he had ever met with a similar case in the history of diplomacy, and that I was not a little warm, but indignant at seeing the character of a great nation, and its peace, and that of my own country, put in jeopardy for the sake and by the intrigues of selfish individuals. As the minister had not seen the message, I promised to procure and send it to him. He was not prepared to say what course would be recommended to the Cortes, upon whom every thing depended. I pressed upon him the necessity of doing what was done promptly. He was satisfied of the importance of doing so, and promised to let me know the determination of the ministry as soon as it was made. At parting, he referred to the assistance received from Spain during our revolutionary war, which he said we ought not to forget. The reply was, we never forget when you permit us to remember it. I met the Secretary of State at dinner on the same day at the English ambassador's. He told me he had received that morning, from General Vives, despatches, the President's message, and the correspondence sent with it to Congress. He had not yet had time to read them attentively, but appeared to be pleased with what he had seen in glancing over the papers. On the 4th of July Mr. De Castro dined at my house, and brought with him a copy of the message and correspondence, which he left with me, to be returned, as he had but the one copy. On the 6th, the Cortes was installed; Espiga chosen president, a priest, but one of the most liberal; and Quiroga vice president. I was in the tribune prepared for the diplomatic corps during the votation, and went from it to the office of Mr. De Castro, to restore to him the documents he had loaned me. He was just going to the King, and had but a few moments to converse with me. In these few, he said he thought that the President did not look beyond the ratification of the convention, the grants being set aside, and there could be no difficulty about them. It was his opinion that this should be done. I do not say, he continued, it will be done; that depends on another body; but it is my opinion that it will be. What say you, he asked—will this be satisfactory? I reminded him that I had no instructions—hoped to receive them. I could give him only an opinion in turn. Judging from the correspondence and message, I saw no sufficient reason to change the opinion already given to Mr. Jabat, that the ratification of the treaty, accompanied by satisfaction for the injury caused by the delay, would be accepted by the United States. I was present at the session of the Cortes on the 9th. The oath required by the constitution was taken by the King in due form, and an address made to him by the president. The King said a few words in reply, and then read his speech. Copies furnished by the Department of State are enclosed, as also copies of the answer of the Cortes, prepared by a select committee appointed for that purpose. The answer to that part of the King's speech which refers to the dispute with the United States is marked by the introduction of a very emphatic word. The King says: "Although a complication of various circumstances has not permitted as yet the adjustment of those differences, (with the United States and Portugal,) I hope that the justice and moderation of the principles which direct our diplomatic operations will produce a result decorous to the nation, and agreeable to the pacific system, &c. &c. of Europe." The answer is: "The Cortes only regret that there exist differences with the United States and His Most Faithful Majesty; but the principles of moderation that will direct now our diplomatic negotiations give hope to the Cortes that they will conclude in terms which, being a termination decorous to the nation, may not interrupt the pacific system, &c. &c. of Europe."

On the 11th, the Minister of State read his report to the Cortes, and gave them an account of the state of the dispute with the United States. I was not present. A very imperfect account of it is published in the newspapers. I hope to procure it to send with this despatch, as also a very interesting report of the Minister for the Government of the Peninsula, Augustin Arguelles.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, (marked private,) dated

JULY 30, 1820.

On the 22d I wrote to Mr. De Castro, to say to him that the President would accept the treaty of 1819, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, if immediately ratified by Spain. Had the Secretary of State been in Madrid, after what has occurred in our conversations, I should only have stated to him, verbally, what I had been instructed to say; but, as the time of his stay at Sacedon was uncertain, I thought it better to write than to ask an interview at that place, as the latter might be imputed to an anxiety on the subject which I was instructed not to discover. His answer is of the 25th, and is perfectly satisfactory. He has the commands of the King "to bring the business of the negotiation immediately before the Cortes, and is using all exertions to do so." Mr. Jabat called on me on the 27th, to say that, in consequence of this correspondence, the King would shorten his stay at Sacedon, would come to Madrid on the 10th of August, and that the negotiation would be, by the 12th, before the Cortes. There is, therefore, every reason to hope that all will be finished by the 20th. As so little time is to elapse before I shall have it in my power to say what has been done, I write hastily, intending, immediately after the determination of the Cortes, to forward copies of the correspondence, and a more formal statement of what has occurred and may occur.

Extracts of a letter from the same to the same, (marked private,) dated

AUGUST 27, 1820.

My hopes of seeing the business of the Florida treaty definitively arranged by the 20th of this month have been disappointed. The King did not come from Sacedon until the 12th. I was taught to expect an immediate movement in our affairs, but it was not made. Early last week I had an accidental interview with one of the ministers, (Mr. Jabat,) who told me the necessary papers were prepared, and would be before the Cortes during the week. Yesterday morning, as nothing had been done, I called at the office of Mr. De Castro, to know what was the motive for delaying to present the subject to the Cortes. Mr. De Castro imputed it entirely to the press of important matters at home. He had just sent to ask the Cortes to designate the day and hour when he could lay before them, in the name of the King, the business of the treaty for the cession of Florida. Before I left the office, the Secretary of State was informed that the Cortes would receive him immediately. At one o'clock yesterday, the Cortes had a secret session, and no doubt the proper communication was made. I still refrain, therefore, from sending you copies of the previous correspondence with this Government, believing that within a few days I shall be able to give you the result of the deliberations of the National Cortes.

With the expectation of giving you, in a very short time, the final resolution of this Government on the affairs of the treaty, I am, dear sir, respectfully, your most obedient servant.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, (marked private,) dated

SEPTEMBER 21, 1820.

Apprehensive that the decision of the Cortes on the business of Florida will not be made in time to enable me to give you notice of it before the meeting of Congress, I have thought it prudent to forward to you my despatch of this day's date. You will see the grounds I had for believing that a speedy decision would be made, and that the decision would be what was desired by the President. Although the delay is apparently without motive, I have no reason to doubt that the decision, when made, will be what we have a right to expect. I saw Martinez de la Rosa, appointed to the political commission in place of Count Toreno, who was elected president of the Cortes three days since; he told me the Secretary of State had pressed them to make an early determination, and that the report of the commission would be soon prepared; he acknowledged, at the same time, that he did not know the state of the business. Mr. De Castro on Tuesday expressed the greatest anxiety to have the affair arranged before the meeting of Congress, and had directed General Vives to give you every assurance of the wish of the Government to satisfy us. It is true that the change in the head of the political commission accounts for a portion of this delay, and that the Cortes have been occupied by the consideration of questions apparently more pressing, as they related to the affairs of the peninsula, and were connected with the public tranquillity; still, however, there has been ample time for the adjustment of this business.

Mr. Onis has published a memoir on the negotiation between the United States and Spain, with a statistical notice of our country—a work that does little credit to his penetration or candor. He accuses us of ambition and avarice, and yet endeavors to show that the treaty of cession of Florida ought to be considered as a treaty of exchange of Florida for Texas, a country more extensive, fertile, and valuable. I send you an extract from that part of the work which relates to the correspondence on the subject of the grants after the treaty was signed. In another part of the work he imputes the refusal to ratify prior to August, 1819, to a belief that England would make use of the cession of Florida to us as a pretext to seize the island of Cuba, and to a belief that we would occupy the territory by force, and by this means secure the donations to Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1820.

In a postscript, dated July 20, to my despatch of No. 19, I had the honor to acknowledge your No. 12, of the 25th of May. On the 21st I wrote to Mr. De Castro, who was at Sacedon with the King, a note, (copy marked No. 1.) His answer, (copy marked No. 2,) dated the 25th, was received on the 26th July. On the 27th I had a visit from Mr. Jabat, who called by the desire of Mr. De Castro. Mr. Jabat informed me that the King would shorten his stay at Sacedon; would be in Madrid on the 10th of August; that all the documents relating to the treaty of cession, and the late correspondence, would be presented by the 12th to the Cortes, and he hoped all would be despatched before the 20th. For the reasons explained in my private letter of the 27th August, the necessary communication was not made to the Cortes until the 26th. The subject was referred to the political commission, who have not yet given to the Cortes the result of their examination of it. Mr. De Castro has uniformly assured me of his anxiety to have an immediate decision. He solicited a speedy decision when he presented the papers to the Cortes. Although I look daily for further information of the movements of that body, I am without the means to know certainly when they will be made.

No. 1.

Mr. Forsyth to Don Evaristo Perez de Castro, Secretary of the Despatch of State, &c.

SIR: MADRID, July 21, 1820.

In the several conversations I have had with your excellency on the relations of our respective Governments, arising from the convention of 1819, I have expressed my conviction that, notwithstanding what has occurred, a prompt ratification of that instrument by Spain, accompanied by satisfaction for the injuries sustained by the United States in consequence of its being heretofore withheld, would be accepted by my Government. I have now the instructions of the President, and am authorized to assure you that the immediate ratification by Spain of the convention of February, 1819, will be accepted by the President, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

Relying implicitly upon the assurances received of the desire of this Government to terminate at once, and in the most amicable manner, the dispute with the United States, I with pleasure avoid the unpleasant task of remarking upon the disagreeable occurrences connected with this subject, since my residence near the person of His Catholic Majesty, or upon the surprise and disappointment felt in the United States on the discovery of the object of the mission of General Vives, and the limited power granted to him. Your excellency is already apprized that the Government of my country has been induced to delay acting decisively against Spain by the extraordinary change in the constitution of this monarchy—a revolution without example in the history of the world—the admiration of the present, as it will be of every future age. The expectation that all differences between Spain and the United States would be speedily and satisfactorily adjusted as soon as this Government was completely organized on the principles of the change which had taken place, was the cause of this delay. The moment has arrived which will see this expectation realized or disappointed. His Catholic Majesty now sees in his capital the representatives of the people. The Cortes are in the full and tranquil exercise of the high and important duties confided to them by the constitution of the Spanish monarchy. I refrain from indulging the free expression of my congratulation to the King and to the nation at the interesting events of which I have been the witness. Were I to use the only language I am accustomed to use, that which truly expresses my sentiments, my motives might be misunderstood, or I should be accused of substituting the effusions of enthusiasm for the offerings of diplomatic respect. I content myself, therefore, with the simple expression of my satisfaction at the situation in which this Government finds itself, as it affords the opportunity of bringing to its close the long-protracted negotiation with my own country. The attention of the Cortes has been already called to this subject, and they have been informed by His Majesty that their intervention will be, under the present system, necessary to its final settlement. This intervention cannot be too prompt, considering either the effect to be produced on the future relations between the two countries, or the time which has elapsed, not only since the signature of the convention, but since the expiration of the period at which the ratifications of it were, by express stipulation, to have been exchanged. The only questions presented for decision are of a character that demand but little consideration. The principles which must regulate this decision are so well known as scarcely to admit a difference of opinion respecting them.

What are the obligations imposed upon Spain by the signature of the treaty, and the subsequent failure to ratify it? The obligation to ratify is the inevitable result of the formation of a treaty, and can only be avoided by showing (what, in this case, has never been asserted) that the negotiator who signed it stipulated, in the name of his Government, what he was not authorized to stipulate. Upon the principles universally recognised by the law of nations, it is beyond dispute that the faith of the nation, once pledged by its monarch, having competent power, no change in the internal government can release it. The promise of the King once given to a foreign Government, no subsequent engagement with his own subjects, or with other nations, can impair its strength. If these principles are true, the obligations consequent upon the failure to ratify are unquestionable. The first of these is the prompt ratification of the instrument; the second, an explanation of the causes justifying the postponement, to this time, of the ratification, or an atonement for the injuries resulting from it. In urging an immediate decision, I am specially instructed to add, that it is not the intention of the President to avail himself of the incidents of this negotiation, and of the principles of the laws of nations applicable to them, to fasten a hard and unequal bargain upon Spain. He has always considered, and still views, the treaty as highly advantageous to Spain, and would not now desire its ratification if, in the just and reasonable estimation of Spain herself, it could be viewed in any other light.

The causes which have heretofore delayed this ratification here present themselves for examination; but, for the reason already indicated, and from a desire to avoid all unpleasant and useless recollections, I shall not dwell upon them; it is enough that, however satisfactory they may have been made to appear to His Catholic Majesty, they do not justify, in the eyes of the United States, the course that has been pursued. But even these causes, so far as the judgment of His Majesty's minister in the United States can be relied upon, no longer present obstacles to the immediate and final decision of this affair. But, while the Government of the United States is far from considering the delay which has taken place as justifiable, I am not instructed by the President to insist upon, or even to ask, satisfaction for the injuries occasioned by it. That this satisfaction has not been claimed by the United States, is to be imputed not to any doubt of their right to demand, or of the obligation of Spain to afford it, but has sprung from the desire to manifest more clearly the principles of forbearance and moderation that have governed their march in this negotiation.

That it is not asked now arises from sentiments towards the Spanish nation, no one more truly than your excellency can understand and appreciate.

What follows will, I trust, be found to be altogether unnecessary; nevertheless, it is incumbent upon me to say to your excellency that, if the determination of Spain to ratify the convention of February, 1819, is not immediate, the claim to further satisfaction will be no longer waived; that, upon any future adjustment, the United States will insist upon an indemnity; that an additional provision will be indispensable for the existing claims of their citizens upon the Spanish Government; and that the right of the United States to the western boundary of the Rio del Norte will be reasserted, and never again relinquished.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurances of my perfect respect.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency Don Evaristo Perez de Castro,
Secretary of the Despatch of State, &c.

No. 2.

[translation.]

Don Evaristo Perez de Castro to Mr. Forsyth.

Sir: Sacedon, July 25, 1820.

I have lost no time in laying before the King, my august master, the contents of your excellency's note of the 21st instant. His Majesty has received with the greatest interest and satisfaction the information contained in the communication which you were pleased to make to me concerning the instructions which you had received from your Government, and which are conformable to what has been communicated by the minister of Spain at Washington. You may be firmly persuaded that the desires of this cabinet to see a prompt termination of the business left pending by the non-ratification of the treaty of February, 1819, on the part of the King, are as lively and sincere as its will is decided; and it is full of hope that the decision of this subject will be satisfactory for both states, and apt to be found upon unalterable bases the friendship which His Majesty is desirous of preserving with the United States.

It being indispensable to hear the Cortes of the kingdom, before the King, my master, can take the final step which the President desires, and with which His Majesty flatters himself to see the present dispute happily terminated, he has been pleased to command me to put this business in a state of being presented to the National Congress so speedily as that it may experience no more delay than may be absolutely indispensable to accomplish it. I have received this order with singular pleasure, as being so agreeable to my personal sentiments, and overcoming, by dint of activity, every impediment which might oppose the desired ready despatch of this important subject, through my recent entrance into this ministry, and the imperious necessity of my informing myself of its former and present state. I have the honor to assure you that I hasten, and, if I may be allowed the expression, count the moments, to present myself before the Cortes with this business; it being my solicitude to give every activity to its resolution, and not to delay an instant the desired conclusion of the whole. In the mean time, His Majesty has seen with satisfaction the sentiments which animate the President of the United States, (an estimable proof that he has confidence in those of the King, my august master, and in the punctuality and good faith of the nation, happily regenerated by the new institutions,) which cannot fail to designate in the acts of the Government that firm and loyal march of which the noble Spanish character and the wisdom of their representatives are the guarantees.

I avail myself of this occasion to reiterate to you the demonstrations of my great consideration; and I pray God to preserve you many years.

Your most obedient servant,

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, (marked private.)

Dear Sir: October 5, 1820.

Three days since, the political commission made a report to the Cortes, and this day, in secret session, that body advised the King to cede the Floridas to the United States. They have also declared null and void the cessions of land to Alagon, &c., although the treaty of February, 1819, should not be ratified. I presume I shall receive from the Minister of State early information of the King's ratification of the treaty.

I am, dear sir, sincerely and respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, (No. 21,) dated

SIR: MADRID, October 11, 1820.

On the 5th I had the honor to inform you that the Cortes had authorized the King to cede the Floridas to the United States, according to the convention of February 22, 1819. On the 6th I received from Mr. De Castro an official notice of the determination of the Cortes, and a request to be informed of the wishes of the American Government in regard to the eighth article, as I supposed with a view to have the ratification of the King in such terms as to prevent the necessity of any thing but the mere delivery of the treaty at Washington, where the ratifications are to be exchanged. A copy of his note is enclosed, marked No. 1. I replied on the 7th; a copy of my answer is marked No. 2. This answer I carried with me to the palace, it being court day. In the Secretary of State's office I received a message from Mr. De Castro, who was confined to his bed at home, requesting me to visit him. I went immediately, and carried with me my answer to his note. As he reads English with difficulty, he opened, but did not read it. His object appeared to be to ascertain if I was authorized to make any stipulations about the eighth article of the treaty, or if there was a probability of obtaining any stipulations in Washington favorable to Spanish claimants for injuries suffered from the United States. He said the Cortes had given the King authority to execute the treaty, and to set aside the grants of Alagon and Punon Rostro; that of Vargas was out of the question, being subsequent to the 24th January, 1818. He spoke of the cession of Vargas as a fund for the payment of American claims on Spain; said the treaty was clearly in favor of Alagon and Punon Rostro. The 24th of January was not assumed as an arbitrary date, but fixed upon on principle by Mr. Onis, who, in his letter to Mr. Adams of the 10th March, stated, after acknowledging he believed them to be posterior to the 24th January, that he would have insisted on their being admitted as valid had he known them to be anterior. Mr. De Castro had no desire to procure any thing for such people as Alagon and Punon Rostro, but thought it equitable that the United States should set apart a portion of this fund, increased by Spain's abandoning the literal import of the treaty, for the benefit of Spanish subjects. To all this I answered what was contained in my letter—I had no authority to make any stipulations. So far as regarded the Government of the United States, the question was considered as settled. I begged him not to think of asking any thing at Washington; it could not be granted; might do injury; could not produce any good result. I reminded him that the offer made in October, 1819, to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, the admission of the American declaration against the grant, was a condition upon which alone the ratification of the treaty by Spain could be admitted; and also of the declaration of General Vives, that, upon the subject of the grants, he was satisfied with the explanations given to and received from Mr. Adams, at Washington; and that these donations were never insurmountable obstacles to the ratification of the treaty on the part of Spain. He replied that this admission was on the supposition that the other explanations would be satisfactory. Satisfaction not having been received on the last and most important, the others might again be brought into view. He talked of the guaranty offered by Mr. Pinckney; of there being no provision in the treaty for Spanish claimants, as there was in that of 1802; and how desirable it would be if something could be procured for them on the adjustment of this difficulty in the convention—an adjustment in which Spain gave up what was clearly secured to some of her subjects. I remarked to him that the offer made by the instructions of the President in July last was made on the admission of General Vives that there would be no demur respecting the grants. If these were brought again into question, my Government was not bound by the offer then made. He said it appeared somewhat unequitable and hard to insist upon the alteration or modification of the treaty without any equivalent. To this I answered, that all he had urged might have been plausible if urged before the 22d of August, 1819; but, after the delays which had occurred, and the incidents of the negotiation, we thought we exercised a degree of unexampled moderation in agreeing to take the ratification on the terms originally agreed upon and understood between the two negotiators. We had some conversation on the mode of ratification by the King, to obviate all difficulty at Washington. I stated to him that this, of course, was a matter in which we would do whatever was agreeable to the Spanish Government. The American declaration of the force of the eighth article might be received by Spain; a declaration might be made by the King, declaring the sense in which His Majesty understood it; or a joint declaration might be made. He proposed seeing me again on the following day at twelve, in company with a confidential person, at the office, if he was able to go out, or in his room, if he was not; to which I consented. At parting, I pointed out to him, in the published documents relating to the treaty, which I carried for the purpose, the declaration I was directed to present by my first instructions; the instructions relating to it; the subsequent instructions modified, which came to me by the Hornet; and my offer to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, made in conformity with them. He said he would examine the papers, sketch something to show me in our next interview, would despatch every thing with the greatest possible expedition, and send off a messenger to Washington.

On the 8th I saw him again at his house, at twelve; he had with him the elder Heredia; the conversation was a repetition of that of yesterday. The only new idea expressed was, that it was important to the new Government to gain credit by procuring some advantage in arranging the business of the treaty, and a suggestion that Mr. Onis would not have made the treaty in any terms but those in which the eighth article is expressed. To the first I replied that the new Government would deserve and receive all praise for saving the country from the consequences of the impolitic steps of the old, and preserve the honor of the nation by abandoning pretensions which injured its character; to the last, that this suggestion was altogether at variance with the declaration of Mr. Pizarro, with Mr. Onis's expressed willingness to give up the donations, and with the remark made to me by Mr. Casa Yrujo, "that he regretted that the grants had not been executed by name." Heredia urged, in the conversation, that the United States had, in the treaty, admitted it to be necessary to the King's honor that the grants prior to the 24th of January, 1818, should be preserved. This conclusion I positively denied. In allowing Mr. Onis to shape the eighth article, we did not become parties to the correctness or propriety of his opinions; on the contrary, in our opinion, the honor of the King was concerned to make void all donations made subsequent to the date of his full power to his negotiator to cede the Floridas. The conversation concluded by a formal request from Mr. De Castro to know what my impressions were on this point, and whether they could calculate on my good offices with my Government to procure some advantage to Spain, in consideration of its desire to gratify us in this business, and of the similarity of the institutions of the two Governments. I gave him my thoughts without reserve: "that the ground which must be taken was altogether untenable; that it would injure, could not benefit, the Spanish Government; that the United States would receive any intimations on this point with surprise and regret. As for myself, with the strongest desire to do every thing to gratify this Government, I could not say any thing to my own in favor of pretensions I believed to be altogether unreasonable." Mr. De Castro said that, in presenting the subject, it would be done in such a way as to prevent any bad effect: turning to Heredia, he remarked that it must be attempted at Washington. He concluded by saying that he should pass to me a note, embodying what had been urged in our conversation, which he hoped I would answer in the shortest convenient time, as he was anxious to send off a messenger to the United States. This I promised, stating to him, at the same time, the necessity of despatching his messenger at the earliest hour possible, as Congress would be in session before he could possibly arrive.

On recollection, I find I have omitted a remark made by both Heredia and De Castro, that, according to my first instructions, as contained in the printed documents, I was authorized to exchange the ratifications without insisting upon the declaration of the import of the eighth article being received; that this exchange would have secured to the claimants the large grants, which they might have recovered in the courts of the United States. To this I answered that such were my instructions, bu' they were founded upon the belief that the notice given to the Spanish Government, through Mr. Onis, rendered the declaration unimportant; that, certainly, if the treaty had been ratified by Spain, the question of the grants would have become a judicial in place of a political one. But supposing, what I could not admit, that the tribunals of the United States could have decided in favor of the claimants: this decision would have been the foundation of a demand on Spain for an equivalent or satisfaction. This conversation endured two hours. In this, as well as in that of the 7th, I am unable to give any thing but the substance, without regarding the order of what was said. My impressions are, that, after making all exertions to obtain some advantage, and failing, they will proceed on the business as they ought to have done without having made any exertion. What is most unpleasant is, to perceive that the opinions of Mr. Onis, as expressed in his book, have weight with this Government, and that what is done is rather a sacrifice to policy than founded on a conviction of the justice and equity of our demands, or on a proper sense of our moderation and forbearance.

Late at night on the 9th I received Mr. De Castro's letter of that day's date, the copy of which is marked No. 3, to which I replied on the day succeeding; the copy of the answer is marked No. 4. This reference to the affair of the grants is disagreeable, and will be altogether unexpected. After what has occurred, I cannot suppose the Spanish ministry can hope to succeed in procuring any thing more at our hands; perhaps the sole object is to enhance the value of the ratification on their part. I am endeavoring to procure accurate information of all that occurred in the Cortes. My private letter of the 5th is almost a literal translation of a note from one of the deputies; and I have been since informed that the Cortes would not hear a petition from Punon Rostro in relation to his claim, considering the whole affair at an end by their previous decision on the treaty.

Shortly after the publication of Mr. Onis's book, I conceived that some of its statements were so injurious to us as to require examination, and proposed to publish a review of it, to be distributed among the members of the Cortes. The affair of the treaty came so soon under the consideration of that body after I had procured a copy of the book, that it was impossible to do more than to make a few hasty remarks upon it, and to have distributed five or six copies of a translation of them among the principal members. A copy of this translation is sent to you, marked No. 5. No. 6 is the copy of an original paper received from ———, an extract from which, in cipher, was forwarded to you some time ago.

The Cortes have resolved, according to the constitutional provision, to continue their session until November.

AT NIGHT.

At 5, this afternoon, I received Mr. De Castro's letter of this day's date, which I answered immediately. The copies of the letter and answer are marked Nos. 7 and 8.

This last letter confirms the conjecture I have made that the object is to enhance the value of what will be called the concession of Spain to the American construction of the eighth article of the treaty. I regret extremely that any thing has been said by the ministers of this Government on this topic, as it will have the effect of weakening, in some degree, the confidence, not so much in the uprightness of their intentions as in the frankness of their mode of proceeding. No doubt something will be said by General Vives on this point, or, at least, he will formally communicate the letter of Mr. De Castro of the 9th. I shall send triplicates of this communication—one by Bordeaux, one by Gibraltar, and one by the Spanish courier who carries the ratified treaty to the Spanish minister at Washington.

As soon as he is fairly out of Madrid, I shall think of using the permission of the President to return to the United States; before I leave this, however, I shall have occasion to write to you again.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your humble servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

JOHN Q. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

No. 1.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. De Castro, Minister of Foreign Despatch, to Mr. Forsyth, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

SIR: MADRID, October 6, 1820.

I have the honor to acquaint your excellency that the Cortes of the nation, in secret session, have authorized His Majesty's Government to ratify the cession of the territory situated east of the Mississippi, which is known by the name of East and West Florida, to the United States, and that, consequently, there is no inconvenience in proceeding, on the part of the King, to the ratification of the treaty concluded at Washington on the 22d day of February, 1819.

His Majesty would have immediately proceeded to command the ratification of the treaty to be extended, had it not been for the interference of the circumstance that your excellency's Government, after confirming and ratifying, on its part, the said instrument, as the plenipotentiaries duly authorized by the high contracting parties had extended it, manifested its desire to have some explanations or modifications in the text of the eighth article, which relates to the property of certain unoccupied and royal lands in both Floridas. This incident, or proposal of modification, made by the Government of the United States, which has contributed, in a great part, to the delay and difficulties which have occurred, might have rendered improper, at that time, and an event little agreeable to the American Government, a ratification extended in the usual form, which, relapsing upon the said instrument with all and each of its clauses and articles, would, consequently, embrace those of the eighth article, referred to in the form in which it had been conceived. This being the case, and His Majesty being desirous, conformably to the intention of the Cortes, that the ratification of the treaty should terminate at once all the differences which have for so many years existed between two Governments whose interest in a reciprocal good understanding has been increased by the nature of their political institutions, has thought it necessary that, for extending the ratification, an explanation should precede, limited and circumscribed to the point of the modifications which your excellency's Government requires to be in the text of the eighth article, since all the other articles present no difficulty, nor need any further explanation in order to be ratified, on the part of His Majesty, according to their literal tenor. Your excellency's Government has indicated a desire of having a modification in the context of the said article; and as, for determining what ought to be and what is agreeable to the interest of both countries, it may be necessary to proceed by common consent, I am desirous of knowing if your excellency is authorized to point out the modification and explanation, as I also am by His Majesty for the same purpose. If your excellency be so, we might, in a very few days, have this point settled in a manner reciprocally satisfactory; and, in case of your not being so, I could desire at least that we had a conference for the purpose of agreeing on the means by which this only obstacle may be removed, which might present itself to the exchange of the ratifications in Washington, if it should be remitted by His Majesty, extended in the usual form, embracing all and each of the clauses of the sixteen articles of the treaty confirmed at Washington on the 22d of February of the past year, 1819.

I therefore renew to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished esteem, and pray God that you may live many years.

I am your excellency's most obedient, faithful servant,

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

No. 2.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. De Castro, dated

SIR: MADRID, October 7, 1820.

I had the honor to receive yesterday your excellency's official, announcing to me that the Cortes had authorized the Government of His Majesty to ratify the cession of the Floridas to the United States. In reply to the inquiry contained in it, I must refer your excellency to my letter of the 21st of July, in which I stated, by the instructions of the President, that, under the constitution of the United States, it would be necessary that the advice and consent of the Senate should again be given, before the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, could take place, inasmuch as the six months within which it should have been made had expired. I am not, therefore, authorized to do more than has already been done. Perfectly possessed, however, of the opinions and wishes of my Government in relation to the eighth article of the treaty, I can give your excellency all the information that can be desired to prevent the possibility of any difficulty in the exchange of ratifications at Washington. In my official communication of the 2d of October, 1819, to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, accompanied by the copy of a declaration to be delivered on the exchange of ratifications, should it be made, your excellency will probably find all that it may be important to know. If these should not be sufficient, it will give me pleasure to confer with your excellency at any hour it may be convenient for you to appoint. In expressing to your excellency the very great satisfaction I have received from the near prospect of a most friendly termination of the disputes which have so long unhappily agitated our respective Governments, I must take leave to add that the United States have never desired to change or modify any part of the treaty of 1819; their sole object has been, and still is, to have it ratified upon the well-known terms, and according to the acknowledged intentions of the respective negotiators of it.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurances of my most respectful consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Secretary of the Despatch of State, &c.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. De Castro, Minister of Foreign Despatch, to Mr. Forsyth, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, dated at

SIR: MADRID, October 9, 1820.

On the 6th current I had the honor to communicate to your excellency that the Cortes had authorized His Majesty's Government to cede the Floridas to the United States; and that, in consequence of that act, no other obstacle presented itself against proceeding, on the part of the King, to the ratification of the treaty confirmed at Washington the 22d February, 1819, except that which arose from the modification or explanation of the eighth article of the same treaty, solicited by the American Government after the confirmation, and even the ratification, on its part, of the said agreement; adding that, if your excellency were authorized, we could proceed to make the desired explanation, with regard to the object of said eighth article, in terms agreeable to the interests of both countries; that we could terminate this business very soon; and that, by all means, I was desirous of a conference between us, in order to the removal of this only obstacle which could oppose the exchange of the ratifications in Washington. Your excellency has had the goodness to reply to me, dated the 7th, complimenting me on the proximity of an order that went to terminate the differences that had existed for so long a time between the two Governments, but manifesting to me at the same time that, in consequence of the period fixed for the ratification of the treaty by that instrument having been overrun, it ought again to be presented to the Senate of the United States, agreeably to the constitution; by which circumstance your excellency had not power to act in the negotiation further than you had done, although, being perfectly instructed in the intentions of your Government upon the said article of the treaty, you could furnish me with the necessary dates in regard to them in the conference which we might have, and which we actually had on that day.

Both yesterday and before, I had the honor to point out to your excellency the difficulties which opposed the explanation or modification demanded by the American Government of the context of the eighth article, since, according to the literal and very explicit tenor of it, every donation or grant of lands in the Floridas made by authority of His Majesty, prior to the 24th January, 1818, was declared valid or firm, at the same time that every grant made after the said 24th of January was annulled. It appeared, at the same time, that the determining of that date was not a casual occurrence, unpremeditated, and directed solely to mark one day or epoch; since then nothing could have been more obvious and natural than to have designated the 1st day of the same month of January, 1818, which was the beginning of the year; and it was distinctly considered that the intention of the plenipotentiaries was to establish a principle legal and justly expressed in the text of the same article, in continuance from the date, which it was to give for a foundation—that His Majesty's plenipotentiary on that day solemnly offered the cession of the Floridas to the United States, in order to denote that it was then, and not before, when His Majesty, by said offer, tied up his hands from making innovations in those territories, and when, by the same offer, the indisputable right, which, without that, enabled him to dispose of the absolute property of any lands belonging to his crown, was suspended. The tenor of this article was already not only admitted and confirmed by the plenipotentiaries, but was also ratified by the American Government, jointly, with all the other articles which the treaty embraced, when the Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, thought fit to ask of Mr. Onis an explanation about the grants of land made by His Majesty at the end of the year 1817, the validity of which appeared to have been recognised by the letter of the treaty, they being anterior to the 24th January, 1818, and upon which both plenipotentiaries were supposed to have proceeded with a certain equivocation of the fact, having believed them posterior to the epoch mentioned. Mr. Onis, notwithstanding that all his functions and powers upon the subject had expired with the conclusion and confirmation of the treaty, did not refuse to give a firm proof of the good faith of his Government, and of his own, by frankly confessing that in fact he had understood that the grants of land referred to were posterior to the 24th January, 1818, but added at the same time a circumstance worthy of notice, and perfectly conformable to the tenor of the eighth article; and it was that, as the fixing of that epoch had been founded upon the principle that the 24th January, and not before, was the day on which, by means of the solemn offer of the Floridas, the indisputable power which His Majesty before had of disposing of those lands remained suspended, if he had known that all or any of said grants were anterior to the 24th January, he would have insisted upon the acknowledgment of such as were so, and would not have consented to their being annulled. Taking the first part of this declaration of Mr. Onis as a foundation, and feigning ignorance of the second, the American Government solicited, by means of your excellency at this court, that, to the ratification of the treaty on the part of His Majesty, an explanation should be added, which was fundamentally a real revocation of the literal context of the eighth article. The scrupulous good faith of His Majesty's Government restrained it from entering upon a question about what wrong the equivocation, or, to speak more properly, the want of exact knowledge of a fact, authentic, solemn, and of more than a year's notoriety and publicity in a supreme council and chancery of the nation, could do to one who had the means, and, in a certain degree, the necessity of being informed of it with evidence. But two essential points did not cease to call the attention of His Majesty: 1st. That if any equivocation could have happened about the date of the grants, in order to their being a pure deed, it never could have been, nor was it, in the recognition of the principle which served as a basis, and was the real foundation of the eighth article—that is, that the Spanish Government did not consider itself bound, nor did the American Government consider it bound, in the use of its right as absolute lord of the lands of Florida, unless by means of the offer made on the 24th January, 1818, and only from that epoch; that an essential equivocation could have been in this date, it was necessary to prove that it was not that of the said solemn offer, since that was the module or symbol to which all the dates of the grants ought to be adjusted, and with which they ought to be compared, in order to decide upon their validity or nullity, and not to pretend, as had been pretended, to accommodate it to the others, by altering that date inversely. 2d. That if the American Government availed itself of, and founded its desires of an explanation upon, the former part of Mr. Onis's declaration, which in any way favored it, neither could it in honor and good faith reject the second part of that declaration, to constitute the whole one self-same act and a single document. If Mr. Onis confessed the equivocation about the date of the grants, he also confessed that he would not have, for his part, subscribed to annul that which had taken place anterior to the 24th January. What will be inferred, then, in reality and sound logic, from that declaration, taken conjointly? Will it be an accident which had expressed the real, or at least the intentional, connivance of both the plenipotentiaries concerning the annulling of the grants referred to, which were anterior to the 24th January, as the American Government pretends? An interpretation like this is diametrically opposite not only to the second part of the declaration of Mr. Onis, but even to the legal principle established in the same eighth article. All that can be inferred, at most, was, and is, that the error into which both parties had run about the substance of the eighth article had rendered it null, invalid, and baseless; and that it was necessary to remodel it, and agree upon something to the point by a new mutual agreement, and not by the way of a declaration or explanation, which its context did not admit.

The question accidentally presented in this humble view would not have been offered, nor given an opportunity for the many difficulties which have occurred. The grants made to Don Pedro de Vargas could have been immediately separated, and, as being posterior to the 24th January, 1818, might have been declared the property of the United States, according to the letter and spirit of the article; and, with regard to the other two, anterior to the said day, upon which grants the equivocation had relapsed, the liberal medium might have been adopted, which is generally used in doubtful cases, by yielding to each one a part of his claims, in compliance with a good understanding. But as this was not solicited by your excellency, and if the text of the eighth article, whose letter, and the principle which supported it, favored Spain, might yet receive an interpretation diametrically opposite to the said letter, being founded for that purpose on a declaration of Mr. Onis, the second part of which evidently resisted a similar interpretation, difficulties seemed easily to arise from hence, which, with more or less foundation, might be likewise converted into suspicions concerning the stability of the other articles of the treaty, on seeing the readiness with which doubts had arisen also concerning one, the literal tenor of which seemed less ambiguous. This disposition of the thoughts brought to recollection the offer of a guaranty of the Spanish possessions in North America, made by his excellency Mr. Pinckney, on the 7th of February, 1802, in the name of the United States, in case the Spanish Government would consent to cede the Floridas to the United States for a sum to be stipulated—a guaranty which was not asked by the Government of Spain, and yet offered in the name of the United States, but to which my Government gave so much importance, that, if his offer had been renewed, it would have ceded in compensation any right over the grants of land which remained by the eighth article of the treaty. From these principles flowed, no doubt, the new mission of General Vives to the United States, and all the other incidents of which your excellency is informed.

The changes which happened a little afterwards in the Government of Spain, and the reunion of the national representation, have been the cause that the Government of His Majesty, complying with the provision of the constitution of the state, should offer to the consideration of the Cortes all that has occurred in this long and complicated negotiation, for the purpose of obtaining their consent, as well as that the dismemberment of the Spanish territory in America might be discussed. It must have been a sensible grief to the representatives of the nation, in the first steps of their august functions, to be obliged to authorize a dismemberment of the territory; they have been solely guided by the consideration that this sacrifice may be conducive to cement upon a solid basis the relations of friendship and harmony between Spain and the United States, by avoiding the causes of future discords, and establishing a fixed and permanent dividing line which shall prevent all ambiguity and indecision for the future. Besides the reciprocal interests which ought always to unite the Governments of both countries, the great analogy which now actually exists between their political institutions, after the change that has occurred in those of Spain, appears to have given greater weight to that interest, and to have increased the importance of a good understanding. These, at least, are the dispositions which have produced the resolution I have mentioned of the representatives of the Spanish nation: may they be answered with similar and reciprocal dispositions on the part of the Government and people of the United States for the well-being of both nations! But, at the same time that the Cortes and His Majesty's Government have rendered easy even the most serious difficulty which the subject could present, they could not but direct their attention to the reflections made known to your excellency, which have been expressed above, on the explanation which the American Government desired to give to the eighth article, diametrically opposite to its literal tenor, and to the principle or rule which is established in the same article. The Spanish Government does not pretend that it may not be firm and be executed as it is printed; its delicacy does not permit it to pretend ignorance of the equivocation committed, which the declaration of Mr. Onis lays open sufficiently in its first part; but this equivocation does not destroy the principle which serves as the basis for the formation of the article to which the second part of the declaration of the same Mr. Onis is evidently referred. It cannot be agreeable to the honor and the good faith of the American Government to take advantage of that part of the declaration of the said minister, or of any act or instrument which it may find useful, in order to tie it down and quote it in its favor, and to pretend not to understand that which does not favor it in the same instrument. No impartial person, who examines the eighth article, and the declarations of Mr. Adams and Mr. Onis, will see in the whole of it any thing else but that, by the involuntary error which has intervened, there has not been a real contract or agreement upon the point of the waste lands; and that, if there is any thing existing in the article, it is the rule or principle of leaving untouched what the King did when his hands were not bound by means of the offer of the 24th of January, 1818.

In this case, then, it appears that harmony, the desire of peace, the honor of both Governments, and the necessity of repairing an equivocation that had passed their plenipotentiaries, dictate that middle path which is proper in doubtful cases and questions of this nature. The grants made to Don Pedro de Vargas may remain immediately in favor of the United States, because, inasmuch as they are posterior to the 24th January, 1818, they are excluded by the letter and by the spirit of the eighth article; and those, respectively, to Alagon and Punon Rostro, which, as anterior to the 24th of January, 1818, constitute the real point of the doubt, may be divided by equal parts, or by the mode which may be agreed upon by the Spanish and American Governments. His Majesty, agreeably to the intentions of the Cortes, is desirous of being able to make a better exchange of property by applying one part of this fund to the redress and indemnification of the Spaniards injured, and comprehended in the agreement of 1802, whose indemnification was at the charge of the American Government, even whilst the treaty was not ratified, and whose lot was entirely unattended to by the plenipotentiaries of 1819. The American Government and Congress, so jealous of the interests of their fellow-citizens, can do no less than applaud these correct intentions of the King and the representatives of the Spanish people towards their own people. On the other hand, it would appear very indecorous that the Cortes, in the commencement of their august functions, should not only have to authorize the dismemberment of the territory, but also to assent that a doubtful act, which was in favor of Spain, (the letter of the article, and the foundation on which it is supported,) should be explained in a sense diametrically opposite to its tenor, and that upon the basis of a declaration of the Spanish minister truncated and disregarded in its second part.

If the means hinted had not been thought admissible, there still remained another equally conformable to the spirit and to the letter of the treaty. All the waste lands of the Floridas, including the three grants of Vargas, Alagon, and Punon Rostro, may be valued according to the prices of lands of their class in the bordering territories of the United States; the amount of $5,000,000 may be deducted from their value, in which the same treaty adjusts, and with which the American Government obliges itself to satisfy, the amount of the claims; and the surplus may be declared to belong to Spain, because it can liquidate the indemnifications of its subjects, for which the United States are responsible by the agreement of 1802, which continues in force whilst the treaty is not ratified. It may be objected that the claims exceed the sum agreed upon; but it ought also to be considered that, even to this day, an examination or liquidation of such claims has not taken place; and that, if the agreement of 1802, and the mixed tribunal established by it, had been carried into effect, perhaps the claims admitted and approved of by the mixed Spanish and American tribunal might not have amounted to said sum, especially if the fifth commissioner, chosen by lot, had been of the nation which was bound to pay them; so that, on the whole, $5,000,000 being the sum which the treaty fixes, and there having been even to this day no examination or liquidation of individual claims, this sum, and no other, is that which legally represents the amount of said indemnifications.

Such have been the reflections and observations which I have had the honor of making to your excellency in our two conferences, by order of His Majesty, conformably to the intentions of the Cortes. By these, and by all besides, which I have had the honor to point out by word, your excellency will have come to the knowledge of His Majesty's resolution to terminate entirely the subjects pending by means of a prompt exchange of the ratifications of the treaty. I have been very sensible that your excellency has not been authorized to agree to the explanation which the eighth article requires, but I am assured, by the candor, good faith, and spirit of conciliation, which animate your excellency, that you will present to your Government the observations referred to, in regard to the only point upon which an explanation is desired by both parties—that, at the time of General Vives's presenting the ratification of the treaty on the part of His Majesty's Government, which it is about to send, an explanation may be presented and submitted of the sense of the eighth article, in the terms of equity and reciprocal satisfaction which I have hinted, or others equivalent, such as the good faith and the honor of both Governments dictate. The King and the representatives of the Spanish nation see, in this honorable and impartial explanation, the beginning of a new order of political relations, which, by tightening the bonds of friendship between both nations, present the most sure guaranty of their union and prosperity in future.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my most exalted and distinguished consideration, and pray God that your excellency may live many years.

Your obedient, humble servant,

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. De Castro.

SIR: MADRID, October 10, 1820.

I had the honor, late last night, to receive your excellency's official of the 9th. From our two conversations, previously held, and from your letter embodying the substance of what was suggested and urged in those conversations, I learned, with concern, that I had mistaken the object and intention of the note of the 6th instant. I supposed it intended merely to enable your excellency to determine on the most convenient mode for the ratification of the convention of February, 1819, by His Catholic Majesty, to prevent any discussion or delay preceding the exchange of the ratifications at Washington. It was with unfeigned surprise and great regret that I discovered that the object was to bring again into view what is considered by the Government of the United States as no longer a subject of discussion with that of His Majesty. In the verbal communications I have made in our two conversations, my intention was solely to prevent, if possible, any further attempts to discuss this matter, satisfied that no advantage could be derived from a reference to a topic of such an unpleasant character. As I have had the misfortune not to produce this desired effect, I do not think myself authorized to enter into any further investigation of the subject. I shall communicate to my Government the notes received from His Majesty; and such replies will be given to General Vives as the case may require. But I cannot take leave of the subject, without stating, explicitly, that the official communication made to your excellency on the 21st July was framed and bottomed upon the admission of General Vives, that he was satisfied with the explanations given at Washington on the subject of the eighth article of the treaty, and that it was the determination of his Government to assent to the total nullity of the large grants. If this admission was unauthorized, the offer of the President I had the honor to communicate to His Majesty, through your excellency, is not obligatory upon the United States; the whole ground of dispute is open for re-examination; and the original claims and pretensions of my Government will be reasserted and maintained.

Although beyond my duty, I cannot forbear to remark to your excellency that a great error is committed in supposing the construction put on the eighth article by the United States is founded altogether upon the declaration given by Mr. Onis after the signature of the treaty. This construction is taken from the instrument itself, explained and elucidated, as all instruments must be, by the intention of the parties, and the nature of the subject-matter of it. Mr. Onis's letter of the 10th October is no further of importance than as a simple evidence to all nations, and to His Catholic Majesty, of the act and intention of his minister to annul the large grants, and the express recognition by him of the correctness of the assertion of the American negotiator, that the phrases supposed to be equivocal were admitted only upon the condition that the annulment of those grants was not affected by the use of those favorite phrases. The qualifying addition to Mr. Onis's frank declaration of what he believed and understood, amounts to nothing more than an assertion that the treaty would not have been agreed to without a recognition of such of the large grants as were of a date prior to the 24th January, 1818—an assertion altogether at variance with the declarations of Mr. Pizarro to Mr. Erving, that these donations would not be obstacles to the treaty, contradicted by Mr. Onis's perfect readiness to annul them, and by the reasons he assigned for it, "that the essential conditions of them had not been complied with," and altogether irreconcilable to a remark made to me in person by the Marquis of Casa Yrujo when Minister of State ad interim, "that he regretted the large grants had not been particularly named in the treaty, and their annulment expressly stipulated."

From an anxious desire to see buried in oblivion all recollections unfavorable to the perfect harmony between Spain and the United States, in closing this note, I would entreat His Majesty's Government to re-examine this whole subject before it is again pressed; to reflect that all that has occurred has arisen from a reliance on the information and good faith of the minister, and confidence in the purity of the Government of Spain. The Duke of San Fernando stated that the American Government wished to change the eighth article by a declaration, a copy of which I had enclosed to him. Your excellency now tells me the wish of the American Government is diametrically opposed to the literal text of the treaty, inasmuch as Alagon and Punon Rostro's grants are of a date prior to the date fixed in the eighth article. The Duke of San Fernando refused, as inconsistent with the honor of the King, to order me copies of those donations! What would your excellency think, were I to say to you, "Sir, I do not know that your assertion is true; show me the donations!" If the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga thought his general assertion that the declaration changed the treaty was so full that further information could not be asked without reflecting upon His Majesty's honor, what would be the reply to a doubt of the correctness of your excellency's unqualified, deliberate, and explicit assertion? Yet, in relying upon the information and the word of Mr. Onis, the United States had the same reason to confide, as they now have, in the assertion made by your excellency, unless it should be supposed that there is a difference in the degree of confidence due to the representative of Spain at home and abroad. I feel, however, that I am treading upon the yet warm ashes of a previous unprofitable controversy, and exceeding the limits to which, at the outset, I proposed to confine myself.

I hasten, therefore, to assure your excellency that the United States wish nothing but what they believe to be just and equitable; what is equally honorable to Spain and to the United States; nothing inconsistent with the decorum and glory of His Catholic Majesty, or with the duties and obligations of the Cortes, by whose advice and authority the treaty of February, 1819, is to be ratified.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve many years, the assurance of my perfect respect.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. De Castro, Minister of Foreign Despatch, to Mr. Forsyth, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America at Madrid.

SIR: PALACE, October 11, 1820.

I have received your excellency's note of yesterday's date, in which you seem to agree with mine of the 9th. In said note I proposed to myself to recapitulate, and send to you all the essentials of the controversies which we had on the two antecedent days, not with the view, which your excellency appears to have apprehended, of commencing new discussions incompatible with the desire which animates His Majesty of seeing all the points which have been the object of the treaty speedily terminated, but with that of agreeing here with your excellency upon the proper terms of extending the explanation or declaration of the eighth article in a mode satisfactory, and such as that the exchange of the ratifications might not experience any obstacle or inconvenience at Washington.

On a view, therefore, of what your excellency had the goodness to express in the said conferences, and of what you manifested in your said note of yesterday, I confine myself to secure that which was contended for in the ratification on the part of this Government; which will be sent back to the United States, in terms which will be no doubt satisfactory to the American Government, and which avoid the discussions which your excellency seems to fear, to ascertain that neither the tenor of our conferences, nor that of my said note, is intended for this object, which inspires your fear.

If your excellency should please, in order to forward despatches to your Government, to avail yourself of the opportunity of a courier, who must be despatched as soon as possible, with the ratifications and packets for General Vives, you may begin to prepare them immediately; in expectation of which, I shall again give you information some hours before the departure of the courier.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

I am your obedient and humble servant,

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

SIR: MADRID, October 11, 1820.

I have received, with great satisfaction, your excellency's note of this day's date. If I have misapprehended the object in our conferences, and the tenor of the note of the 9th, your excellency must do me the justice to impute it to my imperfect knowledge of the Spanish language, and to my anxiety to comply with your excellency's request to give an immediate answer to the note.

I shall with pleasure use the occasion you have offered to me of sending despatches to my Government by the Spanish courier. A messenger will go from this legation to the United States the close of the present week. Should your excellency have any thing to send to General Vives, it will gratify me to forward it by this opportunity.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve many years, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Dear Sir: Madrid, October 12, 1820.

I have this moment learned that the Cortes, in authorizing, by an almost unanimous vote, the ratification of the treaty, and annulling the donations, at the same time recommended to the ministers to endeavor to procure some advantages to the nation on account of the difficulty about the eighth article. With this recommendation the ministers must comply, even although they may be satisfied the effort will be useless. The attempt once made, and failing, the affair will proceed to its proper conclusion without further trouble.

I am, dear sir, very sincerely, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

Hon. John Quincy Adams, Washington.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, (marked private,) dated

Dear Sir: Madrid, October 15, 1820.

In great haste I send you a rough copy of a note from Mr. De Castro to Count Bulgary, of this day's date. I believe the Count Bulgary has enclosed in the accompanying letter to Mr. Poletica a copy of the same paper.

I had on the 14th a short conversation with the Spanish minister, which served to confirm the opinion expressed in my private letter of the 12th instant.

I am, dear sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

Hon. J. Q. Adams, Secretary of State.

The Spanish Minister to the Chargé d'Affaires of Russia.

Sir: Madrid, October 15, 1820.

His Majesty's Government having given information to the Cortes of the nation concerning the existing differences with the United States of America, resulting from the treaty entered into between Spain and that Power on the 22d of February, 1819, and not ratified by the King, in order that the legislative power might authorize His Majesty to cede the two Floridas, as is stipulated in one of the articles of said treaty, and grant power to proceed, consequently, to the ratification of it, which His Majesty has thought fit to do, and the Cortes having resolved to give to the Government the authority required, carries into effect the ratification.

His Catholic Majesty, to whom are evident the good offices of His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias at several stages of the negotiation with the American Government, proving his august and friendly solicitude in favor of Spain, discharges the grateful task of communicating to the cabinet of His Imperial Majesty the flattering state in which this affair is, and the resolution of His Majesty to ratify the treaty mentioned, which will produce the re-establishing of that perfect harmony between Spain and the United States which it is of so great importance to both Powers to maintain without the least shadow of discord.

With this motive, the King rejoices to repeat to his august friend the Emperor of all the Russias the esteem and gratitude with which, on all occasions, he has seen His Imperial Majesty take the most distinguished interest in the prosperity of His Majesty, and that of his people, &c.

[Signed by the Spanish minister, and addressed to the Chargé d'Affaires of Russia.]

Madrid, October 24, 1820.

The delay of the departure of the Spanish messenger enables me to give you copies of my correspondence with Mr. De Castro subsequent to the decision of the Cortes on the cession of Florida, in regard to the execution of the convention of February 22, 1819. No. 1 is a copy of my note calling the attention of the Spanish minister to the provisions of the first and seventh articles of the treaty. I saw Mr. De Castro on Saturday; he had received my letter; the propriety of issuing the order suggested in my note had not escaped him, and he would send, as I requested, a copy of it as soon as it was made. To-day I received his answer, with a copy of the order to which it refers. Copies are marked Nos. 2 and 3.

No. 1.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. De Castro.

By the seventh article of the convention of the 22d February, 1819, the ratification of which is preparing on the part of His Catholic Majesty to be sent to General Vives, at Washington, it is stipulated that the officers and troops of His Majesty shall evacuate the Floridas within six months after the exchange of ratifications, or sooner if possible, and shall give possession of them to the officers or commissioners of the United States who may be properly authorized to receive them. Calculating on a speedy exchange of ratifications, I would suggest, if it has not already occurred to your excellency, that it would be extremely convenient if the order of His Majesty for the evacuation and delivery of the territory, as also the archives and documents relating to the sovereignty and property of the same, should go to General Vives with the ratified treaty, to be forwarded to the proper authority on the exchange of ratifications, as by these means the United States would have timely notice to prepare the escort and transports to carry the officers and troops of His Majesty and their equipage to the Havana, in conformity with the obligation of the said article. I should be pleased to be enabled, by the politeness of your excellency, to furnish to my Government a copy of this order, if His Majesty's Government should send it to General Vives.

I seize with avidity every occasion to offer to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurance of my distinguished respect.

JOHN FORSYTH.

The Minister of Spain to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: PALACE, October 24, 1820.

I have received your esteemed note of the 17th current, in which you say that you have taken the liberty of suggesting to me, in case it should not have already occurred to His Majesty's Government, that it would be extremely convenient if the order of His Majesty for the evacuation and delivery of the Floridas, and of the archives and documents relating to the sovereignty and property of those provinces, should go to General Vives with the ratification of the treaty; that it should be sent, at the same time, to the proper authorities, in order to be transmitted after the exchange of the ratifications; and that it would be very agreeable to your excellency to have it in your power to send a copy of said order to your Government, if His Majesty should transmit it to General Vives, and should find no inconvenience in granting it.

The idea had occurred to His Majesty's Government, as it could not fail to do, of transmitting to General Vives the proper order for the delivery of the Floridas, and whatever else is stipulated in the seventh article of the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, in order to be forwarded to the proper authorities, after the exchange of the ratifications. Estimating, as it deserves, your excellency's suggestion, produced, no doubt, from a desire of connecting more closely the relations of amity and good understanding between Spain and the United States, by removing every obstacle or distant incident which might retard so desirable an object, and cheerfully acceding to the desire which your excellency has manifested to me of obtaining a copy of the order which may be sent to the proper authority for carrying into effect the seventh article of the treaty, I have the honor of enclosing to you a copy of that which is addressed to the Captain General of the island of Cuba, through the medium of General Vives, in order that he may make use of it immediately after the exchange of the ratifications has been certified.

In all to-morrow an extraordinary courier will go to convey the despatches of the Government to His Majesty's minister in the United States; and I have the satisfaction of giving your excellency this advice beforehand, that you may, if you please, forward any packets to your Government by this opportunity; in which case, I hope you will have the kindness to send me them by two in the afternoon of to-morrow, the 25th current.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

Your most humble and obedient servant,

EVARISTO DE CASTRO.

Translation of the royal order of the King of Spain to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba and of the Floridas.

OCTOBER 24, 1820.

FERDINAND THE SEVENTH, by the grace of God, and by the constitution of the Spanish monarchy, King of the Spains, to you, the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba and of the Floridas:

Know you, that, by a treaty concluded in the city of Washington on the twenty-second of February of the last year, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, by plenipotentiaries duly authorized for the purpose of arranging the differences which have existed between the Government of Spain and that of the United States of America, and the limits of their respective territories, there was stipulated, on the part of Spain, the cession to the United States of all the country situated east of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Florida; the adjacent islands dependant upon the two Floridas being comprehended in said cession; together with all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings which are not private property, with the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces; it being provided at the same time that the inhabitants of the territories so ceded shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion without any restriction; and that all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, in order that they may better effect their purpose without being subject, in either case, to duties; and that those who prefer remaining in the Floridas shall be admitted, as soon as possible, to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States; it being added, by another article of the same treaty, that the Spanish officers and troops shall evacuate the said territories ceded to the United States six months after the exchange of the ratifications of the same treaty, or sooner if possible, and shall give possession of them to the officers or commissioners of the United States duly authorized to receive them; and that the United States shall provide the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana. And I, having considered and examined the tenor of the articles of the treaty, after having obtained the consent and authority of the General Cortes of the nation with respect to the said cession, have thought proper to approve and ratify the treaty referred to, the ratification of which must be exchanged at Washington with that which was formed by the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate of the same; after which exchange, the said treaty will begin to be obligatory on both Governments and their respective citizens; therefore, I command you, and ordain, that, after the information, which shall be seasonably given you by my minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary at Washington, of the ratifications having been exchanged, you proceed, on your part, to make the proper dispositions, in order that, at the end of six months, counting from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible, the Spanish officers and troops may evacuate the territories of both Floridas, and that possession of them be given to the officers or commissioners of the United States duly authorized to receive them, in the understanding that the United States shall provide the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana. You shall arrange, in proper time, the delivery of the islands adjacent and dependant upon the Floridas, and the public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings which are not private property, as also the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of the same two provinces, by placing them at the disposal of the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them; and all the other papers and the effects which belong to the nation, and which have not been comprehended and mentioned in the expressed clauses of the cession, you shall have conveyed and transported to another part of the Spanish possessions which may be most convenient for the public service. As, also, you shall take care that, previous to the delivery, it may be made known by edicts to all the present inhabitants of the Floridas that they have power to remove to the Spanish territories and dominions, the sale or exportation of their effects being permitted to them by the United States at any time whatever, without being subject to duties; and also the advantages stipulated in favor of those who shall prefer to remain in the Floridas, to whom I have wished to give this last proof of the protection and affection which they have always experienced under the Spanish Government. Of the delivery which you may make, or may be made by your delegation, in the form which has been expressed, you shall make, or cause to be made, a corresponding receipt, duly authenticated, for your discharge; and, in order that you may proceed with entire knowledge in the execution of this commission, there shall be likewise sent to you, by my minister plenipotentiary at Washington, an authentic copy of the treaty referred to of the twenty-second of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, with the insertion of the ratifications of both parties, and of the certificate relative to the exchange of the same; of which documents, and of this my royal order, you shall send a copy, in authentic form, to the governors of both the Floridas, and to the person or persons who may have, in your name, the accomplishing of the delivery, if it has not been made by yourself.

All which you shall well and completely execute in the form which I have prescribed to you, agreeably to the public service, advising me of your having executed it through my underwritten Secretary of Despatch of State.

Given at Madrid, the 24th of October, 1820.

Mr. Adams to General Vives.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, February 28, 1821.

I have submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States the observations which, in conformity to the instructions of your Government, were verbally made by you in the conference which I had the honor of holding with you, when you notified me of your readiness to exchange the ratifications of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, between the United States and Spain.

With regard to the omission on the part of the Spanish negotiator of the treaty to insist upon some provision of indemnity in behalf of Spanish claimants, to whom a pledge of such indemnity had been stipulated by the previously ratified convention of 1802—an omission stated by you to have been peculiarly dissatisfactory to the Cortes—I am directed to observe that, as in all other cases of the adjustment of differences between nations, this treaty must be considered as a compact of mutual concessions, in which each party abandoned to the other some of its pretensions. These concessions on the part of the United States were great; nor could it be expected by the Spanish nation that they would be obtained without equivalent. Probably the Spanish negotiator considered the claims of Spanish subjects embraced by that convention so small in amount as scarcely to be worthy of inflexible adherence to them; he certainly considered the whole treaty as highly advantageous to Spain—a sentiment in which the Government of the United States always entirely participated, and still concurs.

This also furnishes the reply which most readily presents itself to the proposition which you have also been instructed to make, that some compensation should be allowed by the United States for the benefit of the grantees of lands recognised by the treaty to have been null and void. While appreciating in all its force the sense of justice by which, after the maturest deliberation and the fullest examination, the Cortes have declared that those grants were so, as at the signature of the treaty they had been clearly, explicitly, and unequivocally understood to be by both the plenipotentiaries who signed it, the President deems it unnecessary to press the remark which must naturally present itself, that, to grantees whose titles were in fact null and void, and by all parties to the negotiation were known to be null and void, no indemnity can be due, because no injury was done.

Nor can it be admitted that this is one of the cases of misunderstanding from which the grantees could be entitled to the benefit of a doubtful construction. The construction of the article was in nowise doubtful; for any construction which would have admitted the validity of the grants would have rendered impossible the fulfilment of other most important stipulations of the treaty.

The discussion of this subject, having already been a subject of correspondence between the Minister of Foreign Affairs of your Government and Mr. Forsyth, could now be continued to no profitable purpose. I take much more satisfaction in assuring you of the pleasure with which the President has accepted the ratification of the treaty, as an earnest of that cordial harmony which it is among his most ardent desires to cultivate between the United States and Spain. This disposition he cherishes the hope will be further promoted by the community of principle upon which the liberal institutions of both nations are founded, and by the justice, moderation, and love of order which they combine with the love and the enjoyment of freedom.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

General Don FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

[The following resolution was thereupon adopted by the Senate of the United States.]

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 19, 1821.

Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein,) That the Senate, having examined the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, made and concluded on the 22d day of February, 1819, and seen and considered the ratification thereof made by his said Catholic Majesty on the 24th day of October, 1820, do consent to and advise the President to ratify the same.

16th Congress.] No. 322. [2d Session.

SPAIN: RICHARD W. MEADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 14, 1821.

To the Senate of the United States: WASHINGTON, February 13, 1821.

I transmit herewith to the Senate a copy of a memorial received from Richard W. Meade, together with a report of the Secretary of State concerning it.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 13, 1821.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom has been referred the letter and memorial to the President of R. W. Meade, has the honor of reporting his opinion:

That, from the nature of the claim, now first announced by Mr. Meade in the letter, it will be proper that it should be communicated to the Senate, when the ratification by Spain of the treaty signed on the 22d of February, 1819, shall be submitted to that body for their advice and consent to receive it in exchange for the ratification of the United States heretofore given.

With regard to the material facts alleged by Mr. Meade in support of his claim to a distinct and separate engagement, involved in the treaty on the part of the United States, to pay the whole of his liquidated demand upon Spain, he has been misinformed. Neither his nor any other individual claim was ever mentioned between the negotiators of the treaty; no proposal was consequently ever made by Mr. Onis that it should be inserted by name. It was known that Mr. Meade had a large unliquidated claim on the Spanish Government, and he had been informed, according to his request, that it would be considered by the Government of the United States in common with others at the negotiation of the treaty; but of the amount or validity of the claim this Government had no knowledge sufficient to warrant any special engagement to assume it, had such a proposal been made; and by Mr. Meade's own statement, it was not liquidated until nearly a year after the signature of the treaty, and then without the privity of this Government, and not in the manner prescribed by the treaty for all claims provided for in it.

The argument of Mr. Meade's memorial, drawn from the law of nations as in his opinion applicable to the case, and founded upon a statement of facts, the most essential of which are unfounded, may be left to the sound judgment of the Senate.

The distinction drawn in the memorial between the claims of a citizen of one country upon the Government of another, arising from contract or from wrong, is undoubtedly so far just, that the claimant by contract cannot resort to the interposition of his own Government to obtain from the other satisfaction for his claim to the same extent as the claimant from wrong. The Government of the claimant by contract can interpose in his behalf only by its good offices, and cannot, as the memorial states, press to the extent of reprisals for the satisfaction of the claim. It has no right to interpose at all, without the solicitation of the claimant himself, who, having stated his interest upon his own confidence in the Government with which he contracts, may properly abide by the result of that confidence, without calling upon his country to make itself a party to his demand. But if he does appeal to his own Government for that adventitious aid to which other contractors with the same party, and on the same security, cannot resort, he thereby voluntarily makes his claim a subject of negotiation and of those compromises in which all national adjustments of individual claims must and do always consist. It is unnecessary to pursue this position into the detail of argument by which it is susceptible of illustration. No special provision for the individual claim of Mr. Meade, no express renunciation of it, was ever made or contemplated by the treaty; nor was any mention made of it by General Vives in delivering to me the ratification of his sovereign.

By the statement of the memorial itself, it was questionable to the Cortes and to the Spanish Minister of Finance whether it was included in the renunciations of the ninth article or not. If it was, Mr. Meade will be entitled to the indemnities stipulated by the treaty, and in the forms provided by the same instrument; if it was not, his resort is, as it originally was, exclusively to the Spanish Government; and the Cortes, in recognising his claim, have given directions for its payment.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MEMORIAL.

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 8, 1821.

Since the recent intelligence from Spain has reduced it nearly to a certainty that the treaty concluded at Washington on the 22d February, 1819, has been ratified by the Government of Spain, and that it is speedily to be offered for the ratification of this Government, it becomes highly expedient that all the collateral and implied as well as the direct and explicit obligations which such ratification may carry with it should be fully understood and distinctly recognised before any definitive and irrevocable determination be taken in the business. My most vital interests are so deeply involved in the interpretations with which the terms of the treaty may be understood and accepted, and may, moreover, enter so essentially into the motives which might dictate the ratification or rejection of it, in the whole or in part, that I owe it as a duty equally to myself and to the Government to make a preliminary and frank declaration of the nature and extent of the indemnities which the ratification of the treaty may give me a right to claim from the United States. The validity of such a claim was, without doubt, prospectively contemplated and admitted by the functionaries directly concerned in the negotiation, if, as I have every reason to conclude was the fact, it formed the groundwork of any one of the treaty stipulations; nor do I apprehend that the tedious procrastinations and vexatious shifts which have since been interposed by the late administrators of public affairs in Spain have at all impaired the force of the original considerations and impressions by which our own Government was actuated. But the more definite and authentic shape which subsequent events have given to my claim, and the further development of the views of the Spanish Government respecting it, would alone have justified the propriety of this preliminary explanation, even if the full execution of the treaty did not mainly depend upon the collective wisdom and discretion of Congress, to whom the involved consequences of its stipulations are not supposed to be so distinctly enunciated as to the original negotiators. I shall submit it, with the most entire deference and respect, to your known judgment and discretion to devise the most proper and effectual mode, when the occasion shall arise, of communicating to the Senate an official notification of this claim, and also of recommending to Congress, among the measures necessary to carry the treaty into practical effect, a distinct provision for the complete and immediate satisfaction of the claim; so that its distinct recognition as one of the treaty stipulations may be concomitant with the treaty through its several stages of final ratification and complete execution. The advantages resulting from this mode of clearing away all ambiguities, and obviating future misunderstandings, are evident, besides saving me from expensive solicitations and ruinous delays.

In conformity to these views, I shall proceed, without further apology, to lay before you a summary exposition of my claim (as it has been fully recognised and admitted) upon the Spanish Government, and of the process by which the Government of the United States may become identified with that of Spain in the obligation to satisfy that claim immediately upon the exchange of ratifications.

As soon as I was released, through the humane and decided interposition of my country, from the prison to which I had been consigned by the unparalleled injustice and perfidy of some of the ministers and agents of the restored Government which superseded the illustrious Cortes, by whose wisdom and heroic constancy Spain had been saved from a foreign yoke, I lost no time in preferring the most urgent solicitations for the settlement of my claims, to an immense amount, upon the Spanish Government. These claims were due on account of extensive supplies of provisions and advances of money, at a time when the nation was in the most trying and doubtful crisis of its fate; to the timely assistance of which supplies and advances, it has been distinctly and gratefully acknowledged by the great body of patriotic Spaniards, both in public and private life, that the nation was mainly indebted for the ultimate achievement of its independence. Notwithstanding the counteractions thrown in my way from the same corrupt sources of selfish intrigue by which my most iniquitous imprisonment had been planned and prolonged, so manifest and so cogent was the equity of my claims, and so powerful the appeal to the gratitude of the nation, that the Government could not avoid giving serious attention to the case. It was notorious enough how unprepared they were to meet my demands, and, indeed, that the conscious embarrassment of the Government on that head was one of the mainsprings of action put in motion by the intriguers, who were permitted, for so long a time, to evade the pressing instances of Mr. Erving and my friends for my release, and even to nullify the effect of royal orders ostensibly commanding it. Very soon, however, after my release, they turned their attention to the crown lands in Florida as a resource for discharging the debt; and, accordingly, it was insinuated to me that I might receive payment by means of an equivalent in those lands. But I knew that the Government of the United States had long contemplated a cession of the Floridas as the ultimate satisfaction and indemnity for the insults and injuries which our flag and commerce had sustained through the instrumentality, active or passive, of Spain. I therefore felt myself not only bound by the general obligations of a good citizen, but especially moved by the strongest sense of gratitude for the disinterested and magnanimous interference of my country in my behalf, to avoid every step which might possibly traverse even the ulterior and contingent views and projects of the Government in its diplomatic relations with Spain; and, accordingly, without stopping to inquire whether the negotiation had assumed such a shape as to give the United States any right, either absolute or inchoate, to insist upon specific indemnity in the Floridas, I addressed a letter to Mr. Adams, dated on the 6th June, 1818, (eight months before the signature of the treaty,) in which I stated the proposition, expressly with a view to ascertain whether my acceptance of it would be agreeable to this Government. As soon as the answer of Mr. Adams, dated on the 18th September, 1818, informed me that this Government apprehended ill consequences from admitting the precedent of the grant in question pending the negotiation, as it might open a door for other grants, tending materially to diminish the value of the desired cession, I abandoned all thoughts of accepting payment in that mode, and applied myself exclusively to the direct means of obtaining satisfaction. Having experienced, throughout the whole affair, the greatest inconvenience from the dilatory proceedings of the Spanish Government, I presented, in the month of December, 1818, a memorial to the King, backed by an official letter from Mr. Erving, urging the appointment of two or three persons in the entire confidence of the King to audit and settle my claims. My petition was finally granted, and a junta or commission, consisting of four counsellors, was accordingly appointed by a royal order. The report of that junta, on the 30th September, 1819, after a laborious and minute investigation of six or seven months' duration, and a critical examination into all the merits of the case, specifically admitted and passed my claim, to an amount less than I had all along stated, both directly to this Government and to Mr. Erving. The report of the junta, in frank and explicit terms, acknowledges and enforces the most cogent motives for the speedy satisfaction of the debt by the Spanish Government—motives avowedly derived, not only from the faith of the most solemn contracts, but from the national gratitude for the signal and meritorious services I had performed in the execution of those contracts. That report or award has been approved, ratified, and adopted, in all its terms, by the Spanish Government, and sanctioned by all the highest solemnities that can be invoked to bind the faith of the state.

The delay of the report to so late a period as September, 1819, was, in a great measure, occasioned by the multiplicity of contracts to be examined, and of departments from which information was to be sought. After the report had been sent in, it was returned, with various suggestions and observations from the Minister of Finance to the junta, who, after considering the suggestions of the minister, on the 15th November, 1819, confirmed their first report, reasserting and enforcing all the reasons upon which it was founded, and even declaring that the sum awarded was less than what, in justice and equity, the Government ought to pay me. Still the Minister of Finance thought it necessary to consult, in succession, the Treasurer General of the kingdom and the Comptroller General of Accounts; and their decision concurring with that of the junta, the King finally ratified the award. A formal certificate was made out and delivered to me, signed by all the members of the junta, and approved by the Minister of Finance, by order and acting in the name of the King; and the royal seal is affixed thereto—solemnities observed only in cases of high commissions, and in affairs of the utmost importance. This certificate, (which, together with another royal order, was transmitted to me in May, 1820, by Mr. Arguelles, the new Minister of Finance,) imports the clearest and most unequivocal acknowledgment that the Spanish Government is indebted to me in the sum of $491,153 33, and directs that the same shall be paid out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, with interest.

The embarrassments of the new revolution, which ensued in the interval between the definitive award of the junta and its final ratification by the King, delayed and impeded the full measure of justice which I had every reason to expect from the more enlightened and just Government of the Cortes, which that revolution has now restored to Spain. I nevertheless pressed for a settlement with all the diligence that the magnitude of the claim and my necessities justified and required; and, as soon as its definitive and official recognition, in the form of the certificate just mentioned, was communicated to me by the Minister of Finance, I petitioned the Cortes to order its immediate payment, and to designate the mode of payment. I could obtain no definitive resolution from the Cortes till the 5th October last, the day they decided in favor of ratifying the treaty for the cession of the Floridas to the United States; upon which occasion they ordered that my memorial should be united with the papers relative to the treaty, and submitted to the King, in order to have it ascertained whether the American Government had consented to the introduction of my individual claim into the negotiations on the treaty; and, if so, that the American Government had distinctly assumed upon itself the payment of my claim, and had wholly exonerated Spain from it; but, if it should be found that my case had not been taken into view by the negotiators, and was not distinctly understood as embraced in the treaty stipulations, they, in that case, decreed the immediate payment of the debt by the Spanish Government. Upon this reference from the Cortes, the Spanish Minister of State pronounced an unequivocal opinion that the debt had been distinctly and specifically assumed by the United States, in exoneration of Spain, or would be so upon the exchange of ratifications; consequently, I was referred to the eventual ratification of the treaty for the ultimate satisfaction of my claim. The opinion of the minister was founded (as I was informed from high authority) upon facts said to have been notorious to the negotiators of the treaty, and verified, as it was said, by the official communications of Mr. Onis to the Spanish Government, to wit, that my claim had been introduced by name into the discussions between Mr. Adams and Mr. Onis, who finally agreed, in their verbal conferences, that it should be assumed and paid by the United States; that Mr. Onis proposed the insertion of my name, and a specific stipulation to that effect in the treaty, but that Mr. Adams thought it unnecessary to do so, though he agreed to the insertion of a clause intended to comprehend my case without naming it, and to exonerate Spain from the debt, with the understanding, nevertheless, that it was to be specifically assumed and paid by the United States. The clause alluded to as the one intended to embrace my claim is the fifth of the renunciations declared on the part of the United States in the ninth article of the treaty.

From an examination of the three documents—the protocol of the treaty as delivered by Mr. Onis, the counter-projet of Mr. Adams, and the treaty as it was actually concluded and signed, so much is certain and evident, that the protocol contains a clause nearly equivalent to the one in question, which is entirely omitted in the counter-projet; and so it becomes highly probable that it was inserted in the treaty in consequence of some new arrangement or substantive understanding, discussed and adjusted in the latter stages of the negotiation. What were the nature and extent of such arrangement or understanding, and of the preliminary discussions which led to it, and whether Mr. Onis had made an accurate report of them in his alleged communications to his own Government, are matters of which you, sir, must have far more authentic and certain information than any I can pretend to offer. If the fifth renunciation on the part of the United States were, in fact, designed to extend beyond such claims as arose out of injuries and aggressions in which the nation, in its sovereign capacity, was immediately concerned, and for which it might, conformably to the law and usage of nations, have claimed restitution and indemnity under the peril of reprisals; and if, in truth, it were intended to reach and comprehend claims arising out of civil contracts—in other words, bona fide debts due from the Spanish Government to private citizens of the United States—then it is perfectly clear that the sweeping terms of the stipulation are broad enough to embrace my identical claim; and it is equally clear and certain that it was the identical claim (if not the sole and only one of the kind) intended to be so embraced. It may, therefore, be conceded that the Spanish Government, so far, was warranted in concluding that they were to be as effectually exonerated and discharged from their debt to me as if it had been mentioned by name in the treaty; and their corollary, that the United States would then be bound to pay and satisfy that debt without defalcation or delay, was surely a very natural one, and as surely founded in the soundest principles as well of the moral as of the conventional law.

I have, however, positively denied and formally protested against one of the postulates assumed by the Spanish Government, which is, that any stipulation of the United States could be competent, per se, to cancel the debt, and exonerate Spain from her original and inherent obligation, in any other way than by actually paying the debt to me. Not that I have ever been in the least averse from accepting the United States for my debtor in lieu of Spain; on the contrary, if the undertaking of the United States were co-extensive in point of legal and moral obligation with that of Spain, so that the existing pecuniary debt of the one, with all its concomitant duties, becomes identically the debt of the other, I should then most willingly accede to the proposed transposition of the indebted party. But it is precisely on this point that the most alarming ambiguity exists; for, if this particular debt be embraced by the terms of the fifth renunciation on the part of the United States, and was so intended by the negotiators, then there is no distinct and substantive provision for the payment of it, unless the official report, alleged to have been made by Mr. Onis, of a verbal arrangement and understanding on the subject between him and Mr. Adams, and not fully expressed on the face of the treaty, should be distinctly and formally recognised by this Government. The terms of the treaty, taken simply and strictly, without being interpreted by any such supplemental arrangement or understanding, clearly import that all the claims embraced by all the five renunciations on the part of the United States are to be thrown into one heterogeneous mass, and placed on the same level, and subject to the same rule of compensation: whereas nothing could be more unjust and injurious than such an operation in regard to my claim; because nothing can be more dissimilar in their nature, in their origin, and in all their circumstances, and nothing more unequal in the cogency of the legal and moral obligations out of which they arise, than my claim, and the mass of others with which it is apparently confounded.

The broad distinction, in all their moral and political consequences and relations, between a mere debt voluntarily contracted by a state in the ordinary transactions of business with a private person, whether citizen or foreigner, and a claim for unascertained damages on account of injuries to private property, involved and bound up in national injuries, is manifest and universally admitted. Depredations upon the commerce, aggressions upon the flag, either of the military or commercial marine of a nation, equally with invasions of its territory, are always considered and treated as direct aggressions upon the sovereignty of the nation, and equally to be resented and repelled as acts of hostility, if a reasonable satisfaction be not made. All forcible and violent seizures, at sea or upon land, of the persons or property of private citizens, partake of the same character of hostility, and, according to the various degrees of the offence, may give just cause for reprisals. When the state is injured or insulted in the persons of its citizens, if the aggression be manifestly and flagrantly unjust, the state is bound by its correlative duties to its citizens, whilst it avenges its own wrongs, or, by peaceable means, vindicates the violated rights of its sovereignty, to demand just reparation for the injuries inflicted on its citizens. In all these cases, however, the compensations for the private injuries, equally with the satisfactions for the public wrongs, must necessarily be fair subjects of compromise and mutual accommodation. The offended state is not bound, nor has it any right, to set up its own judgment as paramount and infallible, and to insist upon the summum jus, according to that judgment; otherwise, disputes and wars would be interminable. These compromises between states, both of the public wrongs and of the private injuries involved in them, are of necessity, and agreeable to the universal usage of civilized nations; but that a mere failure in contract, on the part of one state towards a private citizen of another, should be treated as a violation of the high rights of sovereignty, so as either to justify reprisals, or to give occasion for any of those compromises or mutual concessions usually incident to a treaty of pacification, would be an assumption as absolutely destitute of any countenance from precedent as from any of the analogies of public law.

From the following comparison of my actual condition, as an acknowledged creditor of Spain, having a present and perfect right to demand instant payment, with that to which I should be reduced as a deferred claimant of a precarious dividend under the eleventh article of the treaty, there will appear abundant cause for my anxiety, and for my having protested to the Spanish Government, as I now do to this, against the competency of the treaty, either to operate the release, without providing for the payment of the debt, or to annex to its transposition such interpolations upon the terms of the original obligation as the letter of the said eleventh article would seem to imply.

I have shown what procrastinations, what long, wearisome, and expensive solicitations and investigations I have had to wade through; and what sacrifices of my time, my means, and my comforts, I have had to endure, in order to have my claim definitively and conclusively adjusted, ascertained, and settled, by the only party connected with me in the contract, or responsible to me under it, by a party in all respects competent to take upon himself the most perfect obligation. After I have surmounted every difficulty, and have at last conclusively fixed upon this party a consummate obligation to pay me an ascertained sum of money, instanter; upon what terms and for what equivalents am I called upon to renounce or to transpose this perfect right? Why, if the ostensible stipulations of the treaty, as defined in the eleventh article, are to be strictly taken as the only rule for determining the equivalents, then what is now an ascertained debt, standing upon the basis of a consummate obligation, is reduced to a mere outstanding claim, open to fresh and reiterated contestations from unknown parties, from intermeddling strangers without privity or interest in the original contract, or any motive for engaging in the controversy but an eager emulation for the apportionment of the very inadequate sum set apart for the satisfaction of all the claims. It is to be re-examined and adjudicated over again by a new commission, which may not, and probably will not, be closed in less than a period of three years, commencing from some undefined point of time hereafter, viz: the meeting of the commissioners in Washington; and which, if it decide, as possibly it may, to investigate over again the merits and details of my claim, will have to invoke documentary evidence from the bureaus of a foreign country peculiarly tenacious of its archives. Now, suppose the claim, as it stands adjudicated by the Spanish authorities, to be affirmed by the American commissioners; then, instead of a present right to demand payment of the whole sum, without defalcation or delay, from a party abundantly solvent and of presumed good faith—a party not yet declared bankrupt, either in character or circumstances—I am to wait for a contingent quota or dividend out of the gross sum set apart for the satisfaction, pro rata, of the entire mass of claims; and even that quota cannot be ascertained and declared until the whole of the claims are finally adjudicated, within the aforesaid period of three years. Lastly, this tedious process being accomplished, and the commission functus officio; all the claims being definitively adjusted, and the respective quotas ascertained and declared; even then, the mode and the time of payment are left at the absolute discretion of Congress, viz: first, immediately at the Treasury; or, secondly, in six per cent. stock, payable out of the proceeds from the sales of public lands in the ceded territory; or, lastly, in such other manner as Congress may prescribe by law.

I beg leave to advert, very cursorily, to the principles of public law and of natural justice upon which I have founded my protest against the assumed power so to dispose of my rights of property, if, indeed, contrary to my best hopes and expectations, any such power was ever intended to be exerted in the case.

All debts, both public and private, are universally held, among civilized nations, as a species of property more sacred and inviolable than any other. This principle seems to have been peculiarly acceptable to the moral sense of the people of the United States. The constitution, whilst it leaves to the several States the discretionary rights of sovereignty over the ordinary property of their citizens, expressly prohibits them from making any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, and from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts—a clause which, in its established construction and practical effect, has been held to annul all State laws professing, under any pretext, to discharge debtors from the obligation of their debts. By the treaty of 1794, with England, all debts, both public and private, are to be held absolutely inviolate in case of war between the two nations, whilst every other species of property is left exposed to belligerant confiscation and reprisals. That clause of the treaty is further remarkable for its clear and emphatic enunciation of the abstract principles of national morality and good faith upon which the stipulation is founded. Since the benign and prevailing influence of these principles has been able to relax the iron grasp of war, I cannot doubt their sovereign efficacy in that temperate state of the body politic when its passions or necessities claim no prescriptive charter to consecrate force and vengeance on the altars of justice and mercy. With respect to private property in general, the power of the sovereign to cede or dispose of it without the consent of the owner has been held to result from the various modifications of that high prerogative of majesty supposed to be vested in absolute princes, and by some jurists and writers on public law styled the eminent domain; by virtue of which, in its pure, unmodified state, all property is theoretically supposed to be enjoyed by the citizens under the tacit condition of being resumed by the sovereign when the necessities or the safety of the state shall require it. It is agreed, however, by all the most approved expounders of the laws of nature and nations, that this right of ceding private property, in virtue of the eminent domain, is restrained within certain rules, founded in natural justice, which cannot be transgressed by any state that is civilized and governed by laws, no matter how absolute the form of government in other respects. In the first place, it is lawful only upon occasions of the highest state necessity and for the public safety; and, in that case, full compensation must be made to the owner; for which purpose, if the ordinary revenue of the state be inadequate, the deficiency must be made up by contributions from all the citizens. The power to cancel debts, under any circumstances, is treated as one of the most questionable and pernicious results of the eminent domain, and, of course, cannot be justified by any inferior necessity than what is requisite to give validity to cessions of other property. It is no ordinary conjuncture, no inducement of mere expediency or convenience, no bargaining or compromising for the settlement of disputed limits or of indemnities for injuries—it is nothing, in short, but an imperious political necessity and an indispensable regard to the common safety, that can justify even an absolute prince in bartering away, by a treaty of cession, the private property of the citizen, and then only upon the condition of making full compensation. Indeed, no treaty can well be brought within these rules but a treaty of peace for the conclusion of some destructive war menacing extreme danger to the state, and for the termination of which cessions of private property had, in some way, become necessary. If, by the common consent of mankind, an absolute monarch cannot transgress these wholesome regulations of the eminent domain without the stigma of a lawless violator of public faith, far less admissible would be the supposition that the Government of the United States could ever have aimed at any more unlimited prerogative. Indeed, so little do the assumed privileges of this eminent domain accord with the theory of our Government, and the known and defined origin and limits of its powers, as to have raised no inconsiderable doubt of the expediency of that amendment to the constitution which forbids the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, apprehending that it was calculated to extend, by implication, rather than to limit the specific powers of the General Government; since, without the aid of such implication, the power to take private property for public use, upon any terms, might not have been inferred. However that be, it is certain that the practice of the Government has strictly and invariably conformed (unless this treaty shall so be interpreted and executed as to establish a solitary exception) to that great principle of universal ethics and public law so distinctly recognised and imperatively enjoined by the constitution; for, upon all the occasions when the prerogative of taking private property for public use has been exerted, (and it has been exerted only in cases of the highest necessity, and for the public safety,) full compensation has invariably been made to the citizen. Witness the numerous instances of the last war—a war of invasion and devastation—in which it became necessary, occasionally, to take military occupation of private houses, which caused their destruction; or to burn bridges, and otherwise use or destroy private property, for the advancement of military operations: in every case the proprietor has been compensated to the full value of the property lost.*

I need not institute any comparison between that sort of necessity contemplated by the great expounders of public law, when they undertake to define the rightful limits of the eminent domain, and that necessity created by the motives of profit or convenience, which operated in the present instance; nor any inquiry into the authority of the Government of the United States, by mere dint of power, to release a claim under the circumstances of mine, namely, a debt due from a foreign state, upon a contract not made within the jurisdiction nor under the legal sanctions of the United States, of which they had no privity or control but what may have resulted from the mere circumstance of the creditor's being a citizen, sojourning and carrying on trade in foreign parts. All that can be required to make out my case is this brief and simple state of it: my property, to the value of near half a million, is taken to pay for the Floridas. Then, upon any principle of public law, or of a constitutional bill of rights, what is there to cast the shadow of a doubt over my claim to be compensated and reimbursed that instant the cession of the Floridas is consummated?

The history of the negotiation, through all the stages of its progress, whereof any monuments are extant, infers an intent entirely conformable to the legal and moral obligations (such as I have endeavored to expound them) of the high contracting parties. Upon the great question of adjusting the equivalents for the long desired, anxiously expected, and all-important cession of the Floridas, it has already been shown how material a term in the calculations of the parties, and how much discussed, was that of exonerating Spain from her debt to me: being first demanded by Mr. Onis, as appears by his protocol; at first refused by Mr. Adams, as appears by his counter-projet; still insisted on by Mr. Onis; at length conceded by Mr. Adams; and, accordingly, the fifth renunciation, framed purposely to embrace that specific object, was admitted in the treaty. There is one other circumstance, however, of itself, conclusive to expound the genuine intent of the parties at that stage of the transaction. It is this: in the counter-projet of Mr. Adams, the gross sum of $5,000,000 is designated for the aggregate satisfaction of all the claims proposed to be renounced by that instrument; which, be it remembered, did not include mine, or any of the like description; yet, after the fifth renunciation (including my claim, and every other of the like description, and enhancing by so much the price of the cession, comes to be inserted) nothing more is appropriated by the treaty for private indemnities than the same identical $5,000,000. Thus the sum of compensation remains precisely the same; whilst the sum of claims to be compensated is so materially increased, by the addition of this entirely new description of claims to the list of renunciations. This fact alone imperatively demands the hypothesis of an implicit understanding between the parties that the satisfaction of my claim was to be substantively provided for, apart from the others renounced by the treaty; otherwise, we have a paradox equally perplexing to the casuist, the arithmetician, and the jurist; namely, that the price to be received by the vender may be increased ad infinitum, without adding any thing to the price to be paid by the vendee.

If the report said to have been made by Mr. Onis to his Government, corroborated as it is by so many circumstances, should encounter no emphatic contradiction from any quarter which we are bound to consider as more authentic, it must be taken as a concession that the debt was to be fully and absolutely assumed by the United States: and so the case becomes clear and intelligible, and the whole proceeding fair and just. Nothing then remains but to clear it from all ambiguity, by distinct recognitions in the act of ratification, and in the appropriations for carrying the treaty into effect.

But, suppose it turn out that no verbal or implicit arrangement or understanding, supplemental to the letter of the treaty, can be admitted; still there is no essential difference in the right of the case; for it is clear the debt is embraced by the sweeping terms of the fifth renunciation, and was intended to be so: then the United States have stipulated absolutely to cancel the debt and exonerate Spain, and must, at all events, perform that stipulation. How is it to be performed? Why, there is but one just and rightful way, which is, simply, to pay the debt. It signifies nothing to say the treaty designates the mode and the extent in which the debt shall be compensated, and binds the United States to nothing more; because, I answer conclusively, first, the act is yet in fieri; and the precise question is, how shall it be consummated? Whether in conformity, or in direct opposition, to principles consecrated by public law, by the constitution, and by the faith of nations; and, secondly, when consummated, it is res inter alios acta; it concludes the high contracting parties as to all that it stipulates for the benefit of either: but as to any stipulation volunteered for or against him who was neither party nor privy, and whose particular claim was not necessarily involved or committed in the negotiation, it concludes not him; he is perfectly free to accept it, if it be for his benefit, or to renounce it, if it be otherwise. I maintain that Spain cannot be exonerated; the debt cannot be cancelled until it is paid, either by Spain herself, or by some guarantee for her. Until then, it subsists, de jure, in as full force after as before the ratification of the treaty; and unless it be distinctly pronounced by the terms of the ratification that the United States are to be made the guarantee, I shall not cease to urge Spain for payment, by all the sacred and inviolable ties of national faith and honor, and to avail myself of all the legal remedies that her tribunals are competent to entertain. Then, would not a clear right result to Spain to come upon the United States for indemnity, under the stipulation which obliges them to cancel the debt and exonerate Spain? That stipulation is not made to depend upon the condition of my accepting this or that equivalent, but is absolute; and if the United States cannot have the debt cancelled, and Spain exonerated, in the way most agreeable to themselves, it is their business to devise an adequate mode; but, at all events, their duty to exonerate Spain. So long as the obligation, legal or moral, of Spain, is permitted to continue in force, though there be no adequate remedy for coercing her to payment, still, if one scintilla juris be left unextinguished, she cannot be said to be exonerated, in any sense of the term; her appeal to the yet untarnished faith of the United States could not be resisted. Thus, the United States, by taking the direct course of paying the debt to me, do nothing more than strictly fulfil a clear and unconditional stipulation with Spain. In no other way can it be fulfilled; and no better can be desired. The only alternative is an arbitrary invasion of private right, and a very ambiguous implication of the faith of treaties.

I would also submit, with great deference, that the circumstances of this transaction have given me a strong claim to the equitable consideration of the Government. In the purchase of the Floridas, my property has been freely used, and every advantage has been derived from it, just as if it had been committed to the negotiation by the most valid assignment. Now, whether the stipulation to cancel the debt and exonerate Spain be effectual or not, yet, in fact, that stipulation has supplied to Spain an apology, a pretext, and a color of right, to deny or evade the payment of a debt, otherwise acknowledged under circumstances of such persuasive and cogent equity as to have made the prompt payment of it necessary and inevitable. I need not remark how notorious it is that, with sovereigns, who are amenable only to the ultima ratio, an apology, a pretext, or a color of right, is too often equivalent to a legal defence or plea in bar in disputes between private persons amenable to the ordinary process of law. I can truly say that, under my present circumstances, with all my means and resources absorbed and bound up in this large debt, the delay is little less than the denial of justice.

In every possible view that can be taken of the case, as regards the question either of strict right or of equitable discretion, I humbly submit whether it be not obviously just and expedient for the Senate to annex to the ratification of the treaty, by way of rider, a distinct recognition of my claim, so that it may be specifically provided for amongst the appropriations necessary to carry the treaty into effect. But if, for any reason, it be decided that the debt shall not be so assumed by the United States, then I think there is one act of justice I may boldly presume to ask, without fear or hesitation; and that is, to have the fifth renunciation distinctly excepted from the ratification, and expunged from the treaty, or, at least, to have my claim excepted from it by name. I shall then be left free to prosecute it where it is unquestionably due, unembarrassed with the imposing renunciation of my country. I have the most assured confidence that Spain, when her moral sense and good faith are no longer perplexed by the salvo of that renunciation, cannot resist one moment my instances for an immediate liquidation of the debt. In all events, it is my clear and decided election to abide the issue of an appeal to the moral sense and good faith of that nation, rather than the chances of that contingent and long-deferred indemnity provided for the other claims, into whose company mine has been introduced by the treaty, though introduced as casual acquaintances merely, and not, I hope, with any view to force them into a loathed and unnatural union.

For the freedom (and, probably, the superfluous elaboration) with which I have thus claimed your attention to the facts and the principles upon which my rights are asserted, I have no apology but my deep interest in the consequences of the public act about to become the subject of executive and legislative deliberation. Indeed, if an individual interest were at stake, of far less import than the fruits of a life of honest enterprise and active exertion, in the preservation of which the inestimable blessings of personal independence and the comfortable existence of a large family are involved, I should do injustice equally to the spirit of our institutions and the character of the Government, if I thought it necessary to deprecate censure or offence for a respectful and well-founded remonstrance against the effect of any public act, consummate or intended, upon my private rights. The implicit confidence, so absolutely due to the Government collectively, would be most unjustly withheld, sir, from any department of it under your exclusive administration. I therefore repose myself with an unlimited trust in the habitual equity of your mind, when I defer to your judgment and discretion that disposition of this memorial which may give me the benefit of the facts and the reasons it advances, wherever the authority resides to administer the proper remedy.

With the profoundest sentiments of respect, I remain your much obliged and grateful fellow-citizen,

RICHARD W. MEADE.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

NOTES.

"Every thing in the political society ought to tend to the good of the community; and if even the citizen's person is subject to this rule, his fortune cannot be excepted. The state cannot subsist, or constantly administer public affairs in the most advantageous manner, if it has not the power of disposing, on occasion, of all kinds of goods subject to its authority. It may even be presumed that, when the nation takes possession of a country, the property of certain things is only allowed to individuals, with this reserve. The right which belonged to the society, or to the sovereign, of disposing, in case of necessity, and for the public safety, of all the wealth contained in the state, is called the eminent domain. It is evident that this right is, in certain cases, necessary to him who governs; and, consequently, is a part of the empire, or sovereign power, and ought to be placed in the number of the prerogatives of majesty. When, therefore, the people submit the empire to any one, they at the same time yield to him the eminent domain—at least, if it is not expressly reserved. Every prince who is truly a sovereign is invested with this right, in the same manner that his authority is limited in other respects.

"If the nation disposes of the public property, in virtue of his eminent domain, the alienation is valid, &c.

"When he disposes, in like manner, in a case of necessity, of the possessions of a community, or of an individual, the alienation will be valid for the same reason. But justice demands that this community, or this individual, be recompensed out of the public money; and, if the treasury is not able to pay it, all the citizens are obliged to contribute to it," &c.—Vat. b. 1, ch. 20, § 244.

"The necessity of making a peace authorizes the sovereign to dispose of things even belonging to private persons; and the eminent domain gives him this right. In some degree, by virtue of the power which he has over all his subjects, he may dispose of their persons. But these cessions being made for the common advantage, the state is to indemnify the citizens who are sufferers by them."—Vat. b. 4, ch. 2, § 12.

"The promises, the conventions, all the private contracts of the sovereign, are naturally subject to the same rules as those of private persons. If there arise any difficulty, it is equally conformable to prudence, to the delicacy of sentiment that ought to be particularly conspicuous in a sovereign, and to the love of justice, to cause it to be decided by the tribunals of the state. This is the practice of all the states that are civilized and governed by laws."

The author next treats of the conventions and contracts made by the sovereign, in his quality of sovereign, and in the name of the state, with private persons, either subjects or foreigners, and of the manner of deciding controversies arising from such contracts; and he then proceeds as follows:

"Authors add that the sovereign may cancel these contracts if he finds they are contrary to the public welfare. He may, doubtless, do it, though not from any reason taken from the particular nature of these contracts, but either from the same reason that renders even a public treaty invalid when it is fatal to the state and contrary to the public safety, or in virtue of the eminent domain, which gives the sovereign a right to dispose of the property of the citizens with a view to the common safety. We speak here of an absolute sovereign."

"The conductor of the nation may have his private affairs, and his particular debts; these kinds of debts he is obliged to pay out of his own private fortune. What he borrows for the service of the state, the debts contracted in the administration of public affairs are contracts of strict right, obligatory upon the state and the whole nation. Nothing can dispense with the discharging of these debts. As soon as they have been contracted by a lawful power, the right of the creditor is not to be shaken," &c.—Vat. b. 2, ch. 14, § 213, 214, 216.

[The following papers relating to the same subject were presented to the Senate, January 10, 1825.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress: The memorial of Richard W. Meade respectfully shows:

That the practical operation and effect of the "treaty of amity and limits between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty," originally signed at Washington on the 22d day of February, 1819, but, after having expired in its unratified and inchoate state, and become void by its own limitation, renovated and proposed by the Spanish Government in October, 1820, and finally concluded and ratified at Washington on the 22d of February, 1821; and the result of the commission established by the said treaty, for the adjudication of the claims therein provided for, have confirmed all the anticipations of your memorialist, originally communicated by him to the President of the United States and to both Houses of Congress, by way of preliminary caution at the inception and in the inchoate state of the treaty, that the Government of the United States would find itself bound, by good faith and justice, to make some special provision, separate and apart from any mode of indemnity provided by the treaty, for a debt due from the Spanish Government to your memorialist—a debt originating in considerations the most meritorious, and of the most indispensable obligation upon the moral sense, the gratitude, and the justice of the Spanish nation; acknowledged and secured to him by all the highest solemnities and sanctions that can be invoked to bind the faith of a state; and which, as he is ready to prove, nothing but the interposition of this treaty, and its ostensible but fallacious transfer from Spain to the United States of the duty to pay the debt, has prevented from being fully and satisfactorily discharged by his original debtor. The history and nature of your memorialist's connexion with the Spanish Government, and of his claims upon the same, have already been so amply unfolded, upon more than one occasion, to the Government and people, as to make it necessary now to recapitulate only such of the facts connected with it as tend to illustrate the kind and degree of the obligation which, he conceives, has devolved upon the United States.

Your memorialist was originally led to Spain, in the year 1803, to solicit the restitution of property to a large amount, belonging to himself and other citizens of the United States, which had been detained at Buenos Ayres. The Spanish Government having refused to ratify the convention of 1802, and all his solicitations proving fruitless, he was induced, during his long detention in the country, whilst engaged in this pursuit, to form some commercial connexions which led to the establishment of a commercial house at Cadiz; and, in the year 1806, he received the appointment of navy agent of the United States for the port of Cadiz, which office he held till the year 1817. A succession of complicated engagements and difficulties prolonged his sojourn in Spain very far beyond his original intention, and he did not quit the country till the spring, or early in the summer, of 1820.

The various revolutions and wars which succeeded the attempt of the French Emperor to subjugate Spain, after having led her Kings into captivity, found your memorialist engaged in very extensive commercial business in the country, and especially in vast consignments of American produce. His principles, his habits of thinking, and the sympathies thence resulting, led him into very extensive commercial transactions with those parties among the Spaniards whom he found to be actuated by the most patriotic and disinterested motives, and not so much bigoted to particular dynasties as possessed with enlarged and liberal views of national independence, and of reforms in their domestic institutions. With a country distracted and torn to pieces by intestine factions, passing through all the stages of confusion and perplexity from wild anarchy to wholesome revolution; pressed by foreign invasion from an overwhelming Power, and their finances prostrate; the popular Governments which had been established in the several provinces, as well as the General Regency which had assumed the reins of government in the name of their captive King, found themselves in the greatest straits for the various supplies absolutely necessary to keep their armies and guerrillas on foot. In these circumstances, your memorialist, from time to time, entered into contracts with the local authorities in Spain for the furnishing of these necessary supplies upon a vast scale; his contracts, from first to last, amounting to many millions. These transactions, in several instances, brought him under an actual advance of a million of dollars, at times when the Spanish cause was almost despaired of by its most devoted partisans and defenders. His claims were acknowledged with the most explicit demonstrations of gratitude, and he received a public vote of thanks from the Cortes. Indeed, the great body of patriotic Spaniards, both in public and in private life, did not hesitate to admit that the supplies were of the last necessity in the then existing state of the country, and publicly avowed their conviction that the success of the revolution mainly depended on the financial facilities afforded by his commercial credit and enterprise. There was no objection, no difficulty, no hesitation, about the acknowledgment and remuneration of his claims, but what arose from the present defect of available funds—a subject of as much regret to the debtor as to the creditor; and no exertion was spared by the existing Government to discharge a debt admitted as of the most sacred and indispensable obligation. But, after all they could do, they were still left in very great arrears to your memorialist. These difficulties, however, were merely temporary, and must soon have yielded to the wise and patriotic measures of the revolutionary Government, from which he entertained no doubt of speedy and liberal remuneration. But the most extraordinary and perplexing difficulties were thrown in his way by the new troubles and unlooked-for changes which followed the restoration of the King, in person, to the Government of the country, under the patronage of the prevailing system of legitimacy in Europe. The Cortes, who, during his captivity in France, had governed in his name, and, by their wisdom and energy, had preserved the country from foreign domination, being dissolved by military force, their wholesome reforms in the system of government abolished, the patriotic party become the object of hatred and persecution, and its more prominent leaders proscribed and in exile, the claims of your memorialist shared in the neglect and aversion with which the royal Government treated the party it had superseded, and under whose administration the debts were contracted.

The first difficulty thrown in his way was an attempt to incorporate the debt due to him in the funded debt of the nation—a depreciated fund, in accepting which he would have suffered great loss. This attempt was made under a royal order of the 12th of September, 1815, from which debts due to foreigners were distinctly and in terms excepted, and nearly a year was consumed in dilatory discussions whether your memorialist came within the exception. On the 26th April, 1816, the report of the assessor general to the captain general of the province ascertains that your memorialist was a foreigner within the meaning of the exception—in other words, a citizen of the United States—and that the debt due to him is one of the debts excepted in the royal order, and ought to be paid. On the 30th of the same month, the captain general made an official report of the same tenor; and, on the 9th September following, the intendant communicated to the treasurer of the army and of the royal finance of Cadiz a royal order, dated on the 22d of August, by which the debts due to your memorialist, and some others named in the order, were recognised as exceptions from the said order of the 12th of September, 1815, and were ordered to be paid, as had been promised, after the same are duly liquidated, &c. The debt due to your memorialist was thus authentically and repeatedly acknowledged, in the most unequivocal terms, as early as the years 1815 and 1816, by the highest authorities under the immediate government of the King, as it had been before by the Regency and the Cortes. The allusion in this last order to a due liquidation of the debts, in so far as it practically affected the principal mass of his demands, already liquidated in the form of libramientos, or orders upon the treasury, was merely formal.

But this species of vexation was a trifle to the oppressions and persecutions which were practised upon him the same year by means of the darkest intrigues and conspiracies against his liberty and fortune. He alludes to his long and cruel imprisonment in the castle of St. Catalina, at Cadiz, from the 2d May, 1816, to the 7th May, 1818, under the most fraudulent pretexts, and without any shadow of justice. The history and the character of this proceeding are so well known from the diplomatic correspondence of the two Governments, and the communications of the Executive to Congress on the subject, and from the proceedings and resolutions of Congress denouncing the injustice and iniquity of it, that it is only necessary, on this occasion, to advert very succinctly to some passages of the affair to illustrate the sources and the causes of his difficulties with the Spanish Government, and the true character of his transactions and connexions with it, so as to determine how consistent they were with the most punctilious regard to his duties as an American citizen.

In the year 1811 he had been appointed, by the royal tribunal of commerce at Cadiz, in virtue of its unquestionable power and jurisdiction in such matters, assignee of one Glass, an Englishman, resident at Cadiz, who had been declared bankrupt in England in consequence of his connexion with a mercantile house in London. Bond, with security, was given by your memorialist, making him responsible solely to the said tribunal for the proceeds of the bankrupt's estate, and restraining him from making any disposition of it without their sanction. After having settled the affairs of the estate, and satisfied all demands on the same in Spain, there remained in his hands a balance of about $52,000, which he solicited the tribunal to permit him to remit to the assignees in England, and he several times petitioned the tribunal to that effect. The delays incident to all Spanish proceedings postponed any decision till a Mr. Hunter, a partner in the bankrupt house, was sent out to Cadiz for the purpose of winding up its concerns. But, before the business could be settled, Glass laid an injunction on the funds, pretending that he had been illegally included in the bankruptcy of the English house. After some difficulty and delay, produced by this dispute, Hunter appointed one McDermot, a British subject, his agent; and the tribunal decreed that, upon his giving the necessary bond and security, the effects should be delivered over to him, and the bonds of your memorialist cancelled. McDermot being at a loss for the requisite security, the tribunal at length ordered your memorialist to pay the money forthwith into the King's treasury, and appointed an hour on the following morning for his so doing, under the penalty of sequestration of all his property. This order was punctually complied with, and he produced the treasurer's certificate of the deposite. In a few days a question was raised, at the instigation of McDermot, whether this deposite had been made in specie or in treasury notes; and the intendant, in answer to an official letter from the tribunal, certified that "the deposite had been made in due form, and in effective specie; and that, whenever required by the tribunal, His Majesty would pay it in the same coin." Notwithstanding all this, a suit was commenced against your memorialist, and, strange as it may appear, the tribunal, in order to get rid of responsibility for the irregularity of their own procedure in directing the deposite, decreed him to pay the money over again. From this decree he appealed to a superior tribunal called the alzadas, being the proper tribunal to which he was entitled, by the treaty, to appeal as an American citizen. Pending this appeal, McDermot, through the influence of the British minister, procured an order for the removal of the cause to the council of war at Madrid, by which the sentence of the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz was confirmed; and the appeal of your memorialist from that decision was refused, contrary to all law and usage. Upon his application to the King for redress, it was ordered that the cause should be reheard before the same tribunal, with the addition of five associates, nominated in the order. But, before any definitive proceeding could be had in this tribunal, McDermot, still backed by the influence of the British minister, obtained from Mr. Cevallos, the Minister of State, with the secret advice of the same council of war, an order of immediate arrest against your memorialist for the payment of the said sum of money so remaining on deposite in the royal treasury; under which order your memorialist was arrested, imprisoned in the castle, and there detained, under circumstances of aggravated cruelty and oppression, for more than two years. In the mean time, the urgent and repeated remonstrances of Mr. Erving, the American minister at Madrid, and his peremptory demands for the release of your memorialist, were shamefully evaded by every species of mean subterfuge and chicanery, from the highest officers of state down to the most corrupt of their tribunals and the most servile of their official instruments. Indeed, the system of intrigue against your memorialist in the court of the King himself, countenanced as it was by the known wishes and imposing influence of the British party and their minister, was carried to a degree of baseness and perfidy unparalleled, it may be hoped, by the conduct of any civilized Power in the world; for they were detected in having procured a direct instruction of the council of war, in an official letter from Don Manuel Aurajo, Minister of Finance, importing "that it was His Majesty's will that, notwithstanding the letters or royal orders which it might receive through the Secretary of State, pressing for a decision of the affair of Mr. Meade, the same should be delayed as long as possible;" the avowed motive for which most extraordinary order was, that, whatever might be the decision, His Majesty would be called on to pay the money in dispute, which, owing to the scarcity of funds, was particularly inconvenient. Nothing prevailed, at last, to put an end to these outrages against the rights of humanity and every law, public and municipal, but the resistless energy infused into the ordinary channels of communication between the two Governments by those glorious resolves of Congress which have afforded such precious evidence of the inviolable sanction with which a nation renowned for justice and magnanimity may surround the persons of its citizens. The royal order under which he was finally released promulgated his innocence, and denounced and condemned the illegality and iniquity of his imprisoment just as unreservedly and emphatically as if the Government, or its highest and most trusted officers, had not participated in all the guilt of the corrupt and shameful arts by which it had been effected. The facts to which your memorialist has adverted, with all the concomitant circumstances of superfluous injustice and meanness, are now matter of history, and may be found authentically stated in the documents among the archives of Congress.

These circumstances sufficiently demonstrate how entirely his Spanish transactions and connexions were severed from and irreconcilable with every party that might have identified him or his claims with any of the odium attached either to an ultra-royal or a British faction. In truth, he had deeply offended the ultra-royal faction under the Regency, and had severely suffered for that offence, which was further remembered to his cost when the restoration of the King gave complete ascendancy to that faction, and unlimited sway to its remorseless vengeance; and as to any British connexion, his character of American citizen, and the corresponding principles and motives which had brought him into contact with the liberal and patriotic party in Spain, were causes of mutual repulsion too powerful to be overcome by any accidental coincidence in the means of obtaining different ends. Indeed, your memorialist has always suspected, upon the strongest probabilities, and the best information, that the Spanish Government would never have ventured to proceed the lengths they did against him but for the countenance and imposing influence of the British minister and his party at court, who acted ostensibly from the motive of patronizing the unprecedented and iniquitous pretensions of his countrymen.

During the imprisonment of your memorialist, all payments on account of the debt due to him from Spain, (except some few partial payments, which he was enabled to obtain at a sacrifice of from twenty to thirty per cent.,) and all effectual means of prosecuting the recovery of it, were entirely suspended—a suspension which was doubtless felt to be very convenient to the Government, and which, it may well be supposed, they were in no hurry to remove, if it did not form one of the leading motives for the perfidious and cruel means by which it had been prolonged. As soon as he obtained his release from prison, he set on foot the most active and strenuous exertions to assert his claims, and to press upon the Government and its tribunals the duty and necessity of an immediate settlement. He renewed and pushed, with all his energy, the prosecution of the suits which, with the permission of the Government, he had instituted in the tribunals before his imprisonment. He added to the large amount of his pecuniary claims one for compensation in damages for the now confessed injustice and iniquity of his long and rigorous imprisonment. Not only were the tribunals and the proper officers of the department urged to a speedy decision of the pecuniary claims cognizable by their authority, but the Government was pressed by memorials, embracing both the branches of the claim, for the pecuniary debt and the unliquidated damages; and these memorials were supported by the earnest and pressing remonstrances of Mr. Erving in his diplomatic communications, who also kept his own Government regularly informed of the nature of these claims, and of his exertions to advance them. It would be tedious and useless upon this occasion to recapitulate all the steps pursued by your memorialist, with the direct co-operation and assistance of his country's representative at the court of Madrid, in order to obtain justice; the most authentic documents, furnishing this information in detail, are either among the archives of Congress, or ready to be produced. He will now confine himself to some of the more prominent circumstances necessary to trace and explain generally the process by which the claim, as it now stands, was finally ascertained and adjudicated; the indissoluble connexion between all the parts and stages of that process, whether before or after the signature of the treaty; the unity and identity of the claim, in its essence and in all its elements, as it stood on the 22d of February, 1819, when the treaty was signed, on the 22d of February, 1821, when the ratifications were exchanged at Washington, and as it now stands; and the official recognition of that claim, in its present shape, on the part as well of the Government of the United States as of Spain; and also to illustrate how, and in what degree, it has been affected, or was capable of being affected, by the treaty, or by any proceeding under it.

Your memorialist had not been discharged from prison a month, when it was hinted to him, in a way that left him no doubt of the official and high source from which the intimation proceeded, that, if he would make some further advances of money to the Spanish Government, he might obtain a grant of land in either of the Floridas, sufficient to cover both the presumed amount of such advance, and of that of his existing claims upon the Government. This was a most tempting offer, under the circumstances in which he found himself; for, doubtless, he had every reason to expect that when, urged by present need, and harassed with his unceasing importunities, they had once made up their minds to carve out satisfaction of his demands from the crown lands in a distant and neglected province, he should, in all likelihood, receive no stinted measure; besides, in the then unsettled and menacing relations between the two countries, he had every thing to apprehend from delay; for if the discussions had ended in a rupture, as indicated by their tone, he had every reason to apprehend that it would be fatal to his claims. But having understood that a cession of the Floridas was looked to as the ultimate satisfaction and indemnity for the injuries which our commerce had sustained from Spanish aggressions and abuses, he conceived himself peculiarly bound to observe the most scrupulous caution, and to avoid every step that might traverse, directly or indirectly, the policy of his own country. He accordingly addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, in which he mentioned his having claims upon Spain, and proposed the question, how it might comport with the views of Government for him to receive satisfaction in Florida lands. Mr. Adams, in his answer, September 18, 1818, communicates to your memorialist the disapprobation with which any private grant from Spain of land in Florida would be received; and, after hinting at the intention of the Government to provide (in case a treaty should be made) for the claim of your memorialist, concluded with an intimation that there was no hope of an early and favorable conclusion to the negotiation. The President had himself endorsed on the original letter from your memorialist to Mr. Adams, a memorandum of his decision to the same effect. Your memorialist, however, had intermitted none of his efforts to obtain justice from the Spanish Government, but continued to urge his demands as if he had entertained no expectations, either from a specific grant in Florida, or from the result of the negotiations between the two Governments; and when he received Mr. Adams's letter, he abandoned all hopes from either. In July, 1818, he had transmitted, through Mr. Erving, to Mr. Pizarro, the Spanish Secretary of State, a memorial, demanding of the Spanish Government, in strong terms, a settlement of his claims, and compensation for his sufferings and losses; and Mr. Erving communicated the same to Mr. Adams on the 3d of August following. This was followed up, the ensuing December, with a second memorial, delivered by Mr. Erving in person to the Spanish Secretary of State, accompanied by strong representations in support of it. In January, 1819, a third memorial was addressed to the Spanish Government, in which he demanded the appointment of a junta, or special commission, to audit and liquidate all his claims, including his losses and personal sufferings, induced by the illegal proceedings of the council of war, and his consequent imprisonment. This memorial was enclosed in a letter from Mr. Erving to the Marquis Casa Yrujo, Spanish Secretary of State, dated January 18, 1819, and in which he insisted that the claims of your memorialist as a creditor on the royal hacienda were undeniable, and appealed to the King's sense of the very important services rendered to the nation, which form the groundwork of the claim, and give to it the most sacred character, and entitle it to the first consideration and to immediate settlement. And, lastly, in March, 1819, he sent in a fourth memorial through the same channel, reiterating the request contained in his last. The prayer of these two last memorials was granted, by the appointment, on the 7th of May, 1819, of a junta or commission for the purpose of auditing and liquidating his claims. This junta proceeded forthwith to execute its commission; but from the extent and variety of the contracts to be examined, the number of departments from which information was to be sought, and the multiplicity of documents, vouchers, and evidence to be examined, they did not make their report till the 30th September, 1819. In that report, the importance and value of the services rendered by your memorialist, and of the supplies which he had furnished, at the most doubtful and trying crisis of the national struggle, are liberally and gratefully acknowledged; and the aggregate of the sums awarded to him, both in his own right and in his character of agent for other American citizens whose property had been disposed of to the Spanish Government, was little short of half a million, with interest. But the sum found due to him in his own right, and awarded to him accordingly, was $373,879 88, which comprised the balances due to him under his contracts; upon libramientos, protested bills, with interest and damages upon the same, balances of account current, and an allowance for the depreciated value of the paper in which payments had been made to him—this last item being a deduction, in proportion to such depreciation, from the credits to the Spanish Government, for the payments they had made on account; added to all which was compensation in damages for his imprisonment, liquidated at $75,000. This award was sent back to be reconsidered by the junta, with various objections from the Minister of Finance; and, on the 15th of November, 1819, the junta confirmed their award, reasserting and enforcing the reasons on which it was founded, and even declaring that it was less than what in justice and equity the Government ought to pay. The Minister of Finance, not yet satisfied, thought it necessary to consult, in succession, the Treasurer General and Comptroller General of Accounts; and their decisions concurring with that of the junta, the King finally ratified the award on the 9th of May, 1820; and your memorialist received a formal certificate of the same, directing the amount to be paid out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, with interest; which certificate was signed by all the members of the junta, and by the Minister of Finance, acting by order and in the name of the King, with the royal seal affixed—solemnities observed only in cases of high commissions and in affairs of importance. This result was communicated to Mr. Forsyth, then our minister at Madrid, in a letter dated June 10, 1820, from Mr. De Castro, Spanish Secretary of State, requesting, in substance, that, as the Government of the United States had taken part in the transaction, and manifested an interest in the fortune of the individual concerned, the result should be communicated to the President, "inasmuch as the respect he deserves has had much influence in it." Mr. Forsyth, in answer, June 29, 1820, promised to communicate this information, as requested, to his own Government, who, he intimates, would receive it with pleasure, as an indication of good-will from His Catholic Majesty; and he communicated it accordingly in his letter to Mr. Adams, July 13, 1820. Your memorialist left Spain in May, or early in June, 1820, a few days after receiving the said certificate of the ascertained amount due to him, and returned to the United States with despatches from Mr. Forsyth; amongst others, with a letter, dated May 20, 1820, to Mr. Adams, in which the arrangement of the claim is announced. Immediately on his arrival at Philadelphia, in August, 1820, he sent to Mr. Adams copies of the official documents of the adjustment; and Mr. Adams, in his answer of September 6, 1820, congratulates him "on the adjustment of his accounts with the Spanish Government, and assures him that this Government feels not a little gratification in having at all contributed to the satisfactory result"—an assurance that should, perhaps, have dispensed with the recapitulation of the circumstances, from which it has been made so clearly to appear that this Government concurred, and went hand in hand, and step by step, with the Spanish Government, and with your memorialist, in all the proceedings by which that result had been produced; contributed to produce it; admitted it to be satisfactory; and, of course, must be altogether incapable of denying to it the attribute of presumptive if not of conclusive verity and justice; or of disclaiming any of the duties ascertained and defined by that result as inherent to the intrinsic merits of the original claim; for all of which conclusions the compendious evidence of this assurance might have sufficed. And if any further confirmation of them were requisite, it may be found in the highly respectable evidence of Mr. Juan Rico, late vicar-general of the armies of Spain, and one of the patriotic and virtuous, therefore proscribed and exiled deputies of the last Spanish Cortes, who circumstantially and distinctly proves the prevailing influence with which the direct agency and co-operation of our Government and its ministers operated in producing this result.

In order to explain the subsequent proceedings of the Spanish Government in relation to this claim, it may be remarked that, in the interval between the first award of the junta, in September, 1819, and its final ratification in May, 1820, another revolution in the Spanish Government had occurred, by which a constitutional frame of government and the legitimate functions of the Cortes were restored, and limitations imposed upon the power of the Crown. The unsettled state of the country, and the embarrassments and confusion inseparable from such revolutions, necessarily impeded and delayed the full measure of justice which your memorialist had every reason to expect from the more enlightened and just administration of affairs under the constitution which this new revolution had re-established. He nevertheless persevered in his active exertions to obtain payment of the debt now ascertained to be due to him; and, accordingly, when he quitted Spain in the spring of 1820, he left instructions with his agent to present to the Cortes, at their first meeting in July, a petition for the immediate satisfaction of his claim. This was done accordingly in his absence; and the subject would have been taken up by the Cortes and some provision made, without delay, but for the then exhausted state of the treasury, and an assurance from Mr. Arguelles, Minister of Finance, that, if the treaty should be ratified, this debt would be included in it and paid by the United States; or if, contrary to expectation, the treaty should not be ratified, your memorialist might be indemnified out of the crown lands in Florida, or some other territory.' When the Cortes afterwards (some time late in September, or early in October, 1820,) proceeded to discuss the expediency of advising the ratification of the treaty, they at the same time took into consideration the petition presented in behalf of your memorialist, and immediately instituted the most anxious and minute inquiries whether, if the treaty should be ratified, this debt would be embraced by it, and assumed and paid by the United States. The subject was referred to the Minister of State for information; and his official report gave the most unequivocal assurance of the debt being so embraced, assumed, and paid, in the event of ratification. Not content with these domestic sources of information, a committee of the Cortes, and several of the eminent and leading individuals among the deputies, called upon Mr. Forsyth for information, and, from their conversations with him, were satisfied, as they informed the Cortes, that the United States recognised the debt as comprehended in the treaty, admitted the justice of it, and intended to assume it. In short, the most distinct assurance of the assumption of this debt by the United States was made a sine qua non to the ratification of the treaty by the Cortes; and, if they had not been completely satisfied on that head by the report of their own minister, confirmed by their conversations with Mr. Forsyth, they would never have consented to ratify the treaty with the rider, by which the grants to Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas were annulled, and by which the lands comprehended in those grants were, in effect, ceded to the United States; but they would have set aside these grants in virtue of an ancient law, well known to the history of Spanish legislation, called the law of reversion and incorporation, by which royal prodigality to favorites was restrained; and having thus converted these lands into national property, they would instantly have appropriated the same to the satisfaction of the debt due to your memorialist, either by a specific equivalent in land, or by a sale of the same, and an appropriation of the proceeds to that object. But, with the clear and express understanding, and upon the declared faith and confidence that the nature and amount of this debt were well known to our Government, that Spain would be exonerated from it by the treaty, and that the United States would assume and pay it, they proceeded, on the 5th of October, 1820, to decree (what they would not have done upon any other condition) the ratification of the treaty; and it was accordingly ratified by the King on the 24th of the same month. All the facts and circumstances above adverted to as conducing to the ratification of the treaty subsequent to the liquidation of the debt in May, 1820, and identifying the assumption of that debt by the United States as the sine qua non to the ratification, are proved in the fullest and most positive manner, with such circumstantial details as leave no doubt of their truth and accuracy, by the same Mr. Rico above mentioned, and by four of the prominent and leading deputies who took an active part in the proceedings and discussions which led to the renovation and ratification of the treaty by the Cortes in the autumn of 1820. The depositions of these gentlemen, who are all sharing in the proscription and exile of Mr. Rico, and for the same glorious cause, have been recently taken, and are herewith submitted, with the utmost confidence in the credit that will be found due to them, as well from the consistency and circumstantial accuracy of the testimony as the high character of the witnesses.*

Your memorialist now begs leave to advert to the circumstances under which an authority was assumed by the ministers of the high contracting parties to include his claim in the renunciations and provisions of the treaty, by which Spain was to be exonerated, in terms, from the obligation to pay it, and that duty transferred to the United States.

He had, from the commencement of his difficulties, invoked and obtained the good offices and active assistance of his country's representative at the court of Madrid, and enjoyed the benefit of them throughout the whole of his toilsome and long-deferred solicitations for justice; but he availed himself of them merely to reinforce and sustain his own personal exertions to obtain a specific settlement between the Spanish Government and himself, and by no means as committing the claim to the fate of any negotiation between the two Governments on affairs of national import. This will be evident enough from a mere inspection of the correspondence of our ministers at

* See the depositions of Mr. Juan Rico, vicar-general of the armies of Spain, and late a deputy to the last Spanish Cortes, and of Messrs. Joseph Moreno de Guerra, Joseph Becerra, Francisco Fernandez Gasco, Juan Palarea, and Estevan Desprat, late deputies to the Cortes for the years 1820 and 1821.

Madrid with both Governments on the subject. The only circumstances which ever have given any pretence for inferring his assent to abandon his claim unconditionally to the fate of the negotiation, and to abide such compromises as it might suit the political views of the two Powers to make concerning it, have, as he conceives, been greatly misconstrued. But whatever strained constructions or far-fetched inferences may be deducible from them, of this he is certain—that such a conclusion never was contemplated by him; was always contrary to his most settled intentions; and utterly irreconcilable with the whole tenor of his conduct, and with every manifestation of his intention from his acts—acts done with the privity and concurrence of the ministers of both Powers, and in entire conformity with their own concomitant acts and declarations. There are only two passages in the history of this business, from which he understands the inference of his assent, and the consequent authority of the Government to dispose of his claim at discretion, are deduced.

1. The first is in his aforesaid letter to Mr. Adams, (June 6, 1818,) in which, looking forward to certain events that might justify his despondency, he alludes to a resolution, merely contingent, and in the event of a final disappointment of all his expectations of a settlement with Spain, either through the proposed grant of Florida lands, or otherwise, to enter his protest, quit the country, and abandon his claim to the protection of his country. After all that has appeared, and will be made to appear, on this subject, it is almost superfluous to remark that this intention was never carried into effect, but was as emphatically renounced and relinquished by the whole tenor of his subsequent proceedings, and of his correspondence and connexion with the diplomatic agents of his country, as it was possible for the united force of deeds and words to have renounced it. But it is a sufficient answer to any argument drawn from an intention thus contingently and hypothetically stated, to say it was never carried into effect, without showing that it was renounced. Connected with this letter is the answer of Mr. Adams, (September 18, 1818,) which contains the first and only notice ever received by your memorialist of any intention on the part of the Government to provide for his claim by treaty; and that so indeterminate and hypothetical, and depending upon contingencies so remote, if not improbable, (as if stated by way of softening the President's refusal to admit the overtures for the Florida grant,) that he could not have been expected to rely on it; and it was certainly and officially known that he did not rely on it, but upon his own unremitting diligence and persevering exertions, backed by the good offices of the American minister to effect a specific settlement between himself and the Spanish Government, as the only creditor and debtor concerned in the business. Besides, he never imagined that any thing was meant by such suggestion but to assume the specific debt, with all its concomitant obligations, precisely as it was due from Spain, in consideration of some satisfactory equivalent to the United States. It never entered into his thoughts that the delegation of an unlimited authority to dispose of the claim at discretion was, or ever could be, asked for or expected.

2. The next warrant for the authority assumed in this case is the statement of the general heads, and the sum total of his claim, dated November 5, 1818, sent by him from Spain to Mrs. Meade at Philadelphia, and by her transmitted in her letter of January 17, 1819, to the Department of State, where it was received two days afterwards. This statement was sent in consequence of his having received, whilst deeply engaged, in concert with Mr. Erving, in pressing the Spanish Government for a settlement, a confidential intimation from a member of Congress that a negotiation was going on which would probably terminate in a treaty making provision for private claims, and that none would probably be admitted but such as should be stated and sent into the Department of State before the signature of the treaty; and your memorialist was advised that it would be a prudent precaution to send in a statement of his own. This paper is a simple statement of the general heads and sum total, and nothing more: it applies for nothing; communicates no authority to do any thing; and refers nothing to the will or discretion of the Government, unless it purport to apply for the sum total therein stated, to communicate an authority to collect that sum for him, with the correlative duty to pay it over to him when collected, and a discretion to execute that specific authority, or to let it alone. Nor does Mrs. Meade's letter at all enlarge the import, or extend the constructive operation of the statement enclosed in it. At the time he transmitted this statement from Spain, he knew nothing, and could have known nothing, about the terms of the negotiation then going on at Washington; but presumed that, if provision should be made for his claim, it would be in consideration of a valuable equivalent, which would insure the payment of it, in solido, more promptly by the United States than by Spain. Nothing was more remote from his thoughts or intentions than to give an unlimited discretion to bargain away his claim for less than an equivalent; and he therefore made his statement simply as a notice of the maximum to be provided for, in case it could be secured by the treaty. Far less could he have imagined that he was delegating an authority to frustrate the end and object of all his personal sacrifices, toils, and expenses, and to subject his claim to a treaty stipulation, which should leave it in a worse condition than it found it.

But whatever the nature or extent of the delegated authority implied by this or any of the precedent acts imputed to him, it was virtually and necessarily renounced and revoked in so far as it transgressed the limit of taking up the claim in the actual state and improved condition to which the diligence and labor of your memorialist had brought it, when the treaty was first awakened from its long and death-like slumber, and of paying it, in solido, as then ascertained and definitively stated. It is clear that he reposed not upon any hope or expectation growing out of the treaty; nor was it reasonable or probable that he should have reposed upon any such, but that he should have trusted, as he notoriously did, to the effects of his own diligence and perseverance. When the treaty, as signed at Washington, arrived in Spain, he was still perplexed with the ambiguity as to the mode of settling and paying his claim, if included, as he was confidently assured it was. He would at once have rejected every idea of accepting the contingent indemnity which the apparent terms of the treaty purported to hold out to such claimants as were embraced in it; but it was confidently said in all the ministerial circles at Madrid, upon the authority of Mr. Onis, that the claim of your memorialist had been mentioned by name in the negotiation, and was the subject of a distinct and substantive provision understood between them. However, the heated disputes which soon ensued about the ratification of the treaty put an end to all these speculations as to its effect upon the claim of your memorialist. During the whole process of negotiation, amidst all the controversies connected with the proposed ratification until the limited term for its ratification expired, and down to the time of its redintegration and final ratification, his instances to the Spanish Government, sustained by the good offices of his own, were incessant for a specific settlement as between the original creditor and debtor. The appointment of the junta to audit and settle the claim was produced by, and in pursuance of, repeated memorials and petitions, backed by strong representations from Mr. Erving, before the signature of the treaty. The junta were going on with their investigation of the claim at the same time that the ratification of the treaty was disputed between the ministers of the two Governments; their award was made more than a month after the inchoate treaty had expired by its own limitation, and become a dead letter—a mere nullity; and the adjustment of the amount of his claim was consummated by the definitive ratification of their award, after the treaty had lain in that state for the space of nine months; after the lapse of eighteen months from its signature, and five months before any advance by either party towards its renovation; at a time, in short, when an open rupture seemed far more probable than the conclusion of any treaty.

Then, what was your memorialist to do during all this period of acrimonious controversy, of crimination, recrimination, and menace, between the two Powers? Was he bound by any duty, moral or conventional, to embroil his private interest in these national disputes, or to lie upon his oars, and make no effort to redeem his property from the jeopardy in which it stood, so long as it remained obnoxious to the consequences of having these disputes carried to the last extremity? And after he had exerted his unquestionable right, under the favor and encouragement of his Government, to disentangle and separate his claim from the perplexed and apparently interminable disputes growing out of the subject-matter of the treaty, and had exerted it so effectually as to have removed all ground of dispute or difficulty, and to have arrived at the very point of entering upon the full and undisturbed fruition of what he had earned by his own diligence and perseverance—is the idea of such injustice to be tolerated for an instant as that, under the notion of a stale and expired authority, questionable in its origin, vague and dubious in its terms, and notoriously superseded and annulled, the treaty should be endued, at the long-postponed date of its renovation and final ratification, with a retrospective power to overreach all the intermediate steps of diligence by which the claim had been meliorated and matured; to annihilate the labors and sacrifices of years; and to throw the claimant back upon all the difficulties, perplexities, and uncertainties from which he had with so much toil, and with infinite sacrifices of ease and comfort, just been extricated? It is impossible that any such retrospective operation could have been intended by the treaty; and, if the strict construction of its terms prescribed such an operation, it must be concluded in favor of one who is incidentally affected by it, but no party to the instrument, that it has been produced by some casual lapse of attention to its minuter details, amidst all the perplexing circumstances that attended its dilatory, interrupted, and anomalous progress from inception to consummation; and that statesmen, absorbed in the great national objects that tasked their energies and engrossed their faculties, have not discriminated the peculiarities of the private and pecuniary concerns of individuals with the minute attention and exactness of mere men of business.

As soon as intelligence reached this country, in the winter of 1821, of the renovation of the treaty by the Cortes, your memorialist was led to consider the effect of its provisions upon his claim, in particular, if it should be determined to have been embraced in those provisions; and reflecting that claims had been advanced to the apparent amount of about fifty millions, besides interest; that only five millions had been set apart for their satisfaction, and, of course, that such satisfaction might be resolved into a mere dividend of ten per cent.; that a commission was to be appointed to examine and ascertain the validity and amount of such claims, and, if such course were to be pursued in respect to his own, upon the technical and strict principles of evidence adopted by tribunals of ordinary judicature, that it would be nearly impossible to fulfil the requisites of such rules of evidence, from the peculiar nature and circumstance of the claim, and of the evidence by which it was supported; from the distance and the lapse of time; from the surrender and cancelment of the original documents and vouchers upon the final liquidation of the amount; and from the various accidents, in the unsettled and disturbed state of the country, to such of the evidence as depended upon living witnesses; and from the absence of that personal consciousness and acquaintance with many circumstances of notoriety in Spain, and with the modes and habits of business which were perfectly familiar to all the public functionaries and well-informed citizens of that country—strongly impressed with these doubts and apprehensions, he addressed to the President of the United States a memorial, in anticipation of the arrival of the treaty, stating at large the nature and extent of his claim as liquidated and ascertained, and his objections to have it incorporated into the treaty upon the terms therein provided for the general mass of the claims. To that memorial, dated February 8, 1821, he begs to refer; from which will appear the facts and the reasons upon which he advanced the following propositions, and gave notice of his determination to adhere to them.

1. That the United States had no power or authority whatever to cancel or release the debt, in any way, or upon any terms, but the actual payment of it; in other words, that the treaty-making power was utterly incompetent, under the constitution of the United States, expounded by the sound principles of public law, to exert its jurisdiction over the rights of a creditor claiming a mere pecuniary debt contracted in a foreign country—a species of claim widely and fundamentally differing from other of the renounced claims in all the incidents, qualities, and relations which may rightfully have subjected them to the action of the treaty-making power.

2. That the claim was nevertheless embraced in the terms of the fifth renunciation, declared, on the part of the United States, in the ninth article of the treaty, and was distinctly intended to be so; in virtue of which, and of the positive stipulation in the eleventh article, the United States were absolutely and unconditionally bound to exonerate Spain from the debt, for which they had received from Spain, and yet enjoyed, a valuable and adequate consideration.

3. That, having no right to take the debt due to your memorialist to pay for the Floridas, the only way in which they could fulfil that stipulation, with justice to him or with good faith to Spain, was to pay the debt according to the primary obligation of Spain, and, in so doing, to fulfil the specific duty which that obligation devolved upon Spain, without defalcation or delay.

In conclusion, he insisted that, as the treaty was yet in a mere inchoate state; as it had been recently redintegrated by Spain, after having become a dead letter; consequently, as the faith of the United States was in no degree pledged to accede to such redintegration, or to ratify the treaty; and as such material changes to his advantage had taken place in the state and prospects of his claim since the signature of the original treaty; and as those changes had virtually and necessarily abrogated whatever motive or inducement might ever have existed for introducing the claim into the negotiation, he had a clear right to object, and did object, in limine, to have his claim compromised in such a way; and he gave distinct notice that, if the United States exerted a discretion to adopt and ratify the treaty as now proposed by Spain, they would do it at their own risk, and without any consent on his part to relinquish his claim upon Spain. But as the renunciations of the treaty itself, whether lawful or unlawful, with or without authority, must necessarily interpose practical difficulties of a very serious nature in the way of the effectual prosecution of his original claim upon Spain, he insisted that all ambiguities and doubts should be removed, by annexing to the ratification of the treaty one of two specific declarations: either that the claim was embraced in the renunciations, and released to Spain, and that it should be paid by the United States, in solido, without delay; or, that it was not so renounced or released, and would not be assumed by the United States, in order that your memorialist might distinctly understand from whom and how he was to obtain payment; and, in the latter alternative, that he might continue his application to the Spanish Government, disincumbered with the presumed renunciation of his own country, and the consequent pretence of an exoneration to be set up by Spain.

This memorial was transmitted by the President, with the treaty, to the Senate, and was regularly entered on the journal of that body, with the other proceedings relative to the treaty.

After the ratification of the treaty, and when the bill making the necessary appropriations for carrying it into execution was before the House of Representatives, your memorialist, deeming it expedient to assert his claim, and to renounce the provisions of the treaty at every stage of its progress to maturity, presented a memorial to the House of Representatives, substantially assuming the same grounds of objection, and demanding the like indemnity against the implications of the treaty as in his first memorial to the President.

He then applied to the Spanish Government in order to ascertain from the fountain-head their views and understanding on the subject; and he received an answer, dated in June, 1821, from the Spanish Secretary of State, declaring that the claim was provided for in the treaty, that Spain was exonerated, and the only recourse for payment was to the United States.

When the commissioners appointed under the eleventh article of the treaty assembled at Washington, and gave notice for all claims to be produced before them by a given day, your memorialist found himself extremely perplexed with the strange and anomalous condition in which the treaty had placed him in relation to his original debtor—with a clear and undiminished right to call upon that debtor for payment, but without any means or power to enforce that naked right against the grounds of defence and excuse which the renunciations of the treaty had supplied to the debtor; reduced to the alternative either to renounce forever all advantage from the provisions of the treaty, and trust only to the precarious recourse against a sovereign thus fortified with excuses and defences under a color of right, or to accept (under protest, reserving all his rights to ulterior redress) such satisfaction as might be obtained under the treaty. After great hesitation and doubt, he was advised that a memorial to the commissioners might be framed so as to secure him the advantage of whatever indemnity was attainable under the treaty, at the same time that it effectually reserved all his existing rights undiminished, and guarded against any unfavorable conclusion from his appearance in the character of a claimant under the treaty. Such a memorial was framed and presented, upon reference to which it will plainly appear that it proceeded from necessity—was a choice of evils—and by its protestations and averments leaves him just as free now to prosecute his original claim as if this qualified and conditional submission of it to the cognizance of the commissioners had never been made.

Upon the presentation of his memorial, the commissioners doubted whether this or any other claim under contract was comprehended in the treaty, and at length came to an opinion in the negative. The point was elaborately discussed before them, and finally turned upon a question of fact—whether such claims, though held to be excluded by the terms of the treaty, were not really intended and understood by the negotiators to have been included. Being satisfied, by the concurrent evidence of Mr. Adams and Mr. Onis, that such was their genuine intent and understanding, the commissioners determined to entertain jurisdiction of such claims.

The claim of your memorialist was then submitted, upon the evidence of the final adjustment of the same with the Spanish Government, as authentically certified by the solemn document before described—evidence which he was confidently advised must be taken as prima facie sufficient and satisfactory, if not undeniable and conclusive of the validity and amount of his claim. A question was then raised before the commissioners as to the admissibility of this evidence, and, after an elaborate discussion of the point, and mature consideration, it was at length decided that it was inadmissible, and that the board could receive nothing short of original and substantive proof of the items—just the same as if no adjustment of the amount of the claim had ever been made with the Spanish Government. The grounds on which this decision turned, as your memorialist understood, were, that the authority and jurisdiction of the board must be referred back to the date of the original treaty as signed on the 22d of February, 1819, and that the nature and character of the claims over which such authority and jurisdiction were to be exerted must be determined by the actual state and condition of the same at that precise point of time; so that the same kind and degree of proof then extant, and then necessary to substantiate the claims, were still necessary; that it was the express duty of the board to ascertain both the validity and the amount of each claim, and to ascertain the same, not by evidence subsequently created, as by acknowledgments or settlements between debtor and creditor, but by examinations of evidence on oath, or other original and substantive proofs; in short, that both the claim itself, and the evidence to support it, must be identically the same at the time of the hearing before the board, as in an original investigation and audit of the same on the 22d of February, 1819; and so they could not, under the limitations of their authority and jurisdiction as defined by the treaty, take cognizance of any change or melioration, either in the specific nature or in the state and condition of the claim, subsequent to such date.

As soon as this decision manifested the necessity of an appeal to the Spanish archives for documents, a requisition for the same was communicated from the commissioners to the Secretary of State; and instructions were given, in April, 1823, to Mr. Nelson, then on the eve of departure as minister to Spain, to apply to the proper authorities for the documents required in the cases of your memorialist and some others, mentioned in the Secretary of State's instructions. The various circumstances and accidents that delayed Mr. Nelson's departure, and, after his departure, his arrival at Madrid, which he did not reach till December, 1823, are well known. Indeed, if his arrival had been in better season, it is not probable that his application could have availed to obtain the documents alone necessary to fulfil the rule of evidence laid down by the commissioners in the case of your memorialist; and, after the documents had been procured, there would still have been some wide gaps in the evidence to fill up, in the way of which obstacles of equal magnitude presented themselves. The troubles and commotions by which the whole country had been convulsed and distracted, in consequence of the re-establishment of the constitution in 1820, and the subsequent struggle to maintain it against the united forces of legitimacy at home and abroad, are too well known to require any illustration of the impediments they must necessarily have presented to such minute, diversified, and laborious researches into the public archives as would have been necessary in the single case of your memorialist. Though Mr. Nelson arrived just as the more violent agitations of the subsiding storm had died away, yet it will appear from his correspondence what inevitable delays attended his applications for papers. So late as the 30th of July last, more than six months after his arrival, and more than a month after the final adjournment and dissolution of the board before which the documents were to be exhibited, he indulges the hope that most of the records which have been asked for may be furnished before a very distant day; but the papers wanted in the case of your memorialist, being so voluminous, he fears must be postponed to a still more distant day.* No reluctance whatever has been manifested by the Spanish authorities to comply with these calls for papers, which, in fact, have been attended to with as much alacrity and expedition as are at all consistent with the habits of business, or perhaps practicable, in the existing state of affairs. The delay has been produced solely by imperious circumstances, beyond any human control, and by the lateness of the hour at which the application has been made, itself the effect of the same imperious circumstances. Your memorialist then submitted to the commissioners such documents as remained in his possession; among others, notarial copies of some of the vouchers which had been surrendered at the time of the settlement by the junta, and which probably still remained deposited in some of the Spanish archives. These last were rejected as inadmissible; but, upon such of the documents as were deemed admissible evidence, the commissioners avowed themselves perfectly satisfied of the existence of a debt due from the Spanish Government to your memorialist at the date of the treaty—a debt established by the public, repeated, and concurring admissions and acknowledgments, both express and implied, of every successive administration of public affairs in Spain, through all their revolutions and changes, from the year 1815 to the present time; but, for the want of proof sufficiently specific and particular of the items and of the amount, though the validity of the claim was undisputed, the amount could not be ascertained with the necessary certainty and precision, and therefore the whole was rejected.

* See Mr. Nelson's letter (July 31, 1824) to Mr. Adams. (No. 35.)

Your memorialist has recently received from Spain a large mass of documentary and other evidence, in addition to what was laid before the commissioners, which he is ready to produce if it be deemed requisite. But he cannot imagine that, at this time of day, and after all that has passed, it ever could have been made a question anywhere but before a tribunal of the most strictly limited and defined powers, and tied down by the law of its constitution to positive rules of evidence; least of all that it could ever have been matter of any possible doubt with this Government whether the Spanish Government were truly and justly indebted to him in the sum ascertained by the settlement and award of the junta, as ratified and confirmed in May, 1820.

Your memorialist thinks it material to remark that the United States are indebted for the treaty and for the all-important cession of the Floridas to the revolution, by which the constitutional government was restored in the year 1820, and by which the administration of affairs was disenthralled from the control of corrupt favorites, and left free to act upon great motives of public policy, and with a single view to the national interest; and that this new administration, capable of feeling and of estimating the incalculable value and importance of the considerations in which the debt to your memorialist had originated, and of the cause with which it had been identified, would not in any event have adopted and ratified the treaty but with the sine qua non of a stipulation, faithfully and clearly understood, as they thought, to provide for the payment of the debt as then ascertained; or, at least, they would have insisted upon resuming and retaining the lands contained in the obnoxious grants, and of appropriating them specifically to the satisfaction of the debt; and so the United States would have had to choose between the treaty without the lands, and the treaty with the lands, but saddled with the debt in question. It is conceived that no conclusion can be clearer, from all the facts and circumstances now in evidence. Then the treaty, with that sine qua non clearly implied and understood, actually dispensed with all the cogent and irresistible motives prevalent with the then existing Government of Spain to satisfy and discharge the debt at all events; it took away, and appropriated to the use of the United States, the specific fund out of which the debt would have been so satisfied and discharged; it took, at the same time, the large and entire mass of funds represented by that debt, the private estate and property of your memorialist, and used it as part of the consideration and purchase-money for those same lands which had constituted the specific fund of his indemnity, and for all the other immense territorial acquisitions and political advantages obtained by means of the treaty.

Your memorialist now begs leave, in conclusion, to submit the following summary of the propositions upon which he founds his present claim:

1. It being clear, and now, indeed, a concessum, that the treaty-making power was utterly incompetent, of its own mere authority, to negotiate away the claim of your memorialist, or any other of the like description, and under the like circumstances, he maintains that such defect of original and inherent power had never been supplied by any conventional authority, flowing from his assent to submit and subject his claim unconditionally to the fate of the negotiation by which the treaty was concluded; but, on the contrary, that, from first to last, he had rested on his own personal exertions and solicitations, and had merely called in aid of them the countenance and assistance of the public functionaries in the ordinary routine of the good offices with which the representations of ambassadors and other public ministers in behalf of their fellow-citizens are gratuitously interposed and gratuitously listened to, from mere diplomatic comity.

2. If any such conventional authority could have been inferred to sustain the original frame of the inchoate treaty, when signed on the 22d day of February, 1819, that authority necessarily expired with the inchoate instrument by which it had been executed; and never was renewed, but was virtually and publicly revoked by the intermediate acts of all the parties, and by the essential change in the condition of the debt before the redintegration of the instrument by the Cortes, in the autumn of 1820.

3. It is no answer to say that, in the absence of every inherent power and conventional authority to extinguish the debt, it still subsists de jure, and may still be demanded of Spain, notwithstanding the unauthorized and therefore ineffectual assumption of the right to extinguish it. 1. Because the stipulation to exonerate Spain is positive and unconditional, for a valuable consideration received and yet enjoyed by the United States, and as between the two sovereigns is just as obligatory as if the authority to make it and the power to execute it had been altogether indisputable. It is no excuse for either party that he has covenanted what he had no right or power to do; he must either find means to execute his contract in specie, return the equivalent, or make compensation: in this case, the plainest and easiest mode of executing the contract in specie, and of making adequate and complete compensation, lies at the very threshold, which is, to exonerate Spain by paying her debt in solido. 2. Because the unauthorized assumption of the power has practically destroyed that recourse of the creditor against his original debtor which must otherwise have proved effectual; it has reduced a clear, admitted debt, carrying with it the most cogent and persuasive appeal to the conscience, the equity, and the good-will of the debtor, and fenced in by all the most sacred and inviolable sanctions of national faith and honor—a debt which the debtor, impelled equally by every moral motive and duty as by the most consummate of legal obligations, was on the very point of discharging. All this is now reduced to a naked, theoretical, outstanding, and litigated right; stripped of its original sanctions, both legal and moral; and to be contested with an adversary above the law, and in no circumstances to discuss questions of abstract right and justice, or to perform what he would understand as a gratuitous act of liberality. The obligation to repair and compensate these injurious consequences implies no burden or loss to the country, because all the property of your memorialist represented by this debt has been, in fact, as beneficially appropriated to public use as if it had been so appropriated by the most regular and legitimate means; it has contributed just as effectually to the purchase of the Floridas as if it had been rightfully and lawfully taken for that purpose; and it would be contrary to the plainest principles and analogies by which right and wrong are distinguished if the public could have any advantage from a wrongful which it could not claim from a rightful appropriation of private property.

4. But suppose the most unquestionable authority originally delegated, and never annulled, but subsisting and continuing down to the time when the treaty was revived from the state of absolute nullity to which it had been consigned by its own limitations: still, here was the commencement of a new and distinct negotiation; here was essentially a new projet of treaty, originating at that time and in that conjuncture; it could rightfully have operated only on the claims affected by it in their then existing state and condition, no matter how changed or meliorated since the date affixed to the former, and preserved in the new projet of treaty. The parties were bound to take notice, and, in fact, had actual notice, of the then existing state of the claim in question, and ought to have provided for it accordingly.

5. The public act, by which the amount of the claim had been definitively ascertained and fixed after that date, was merely the consummation of a procedure commenced and inchoate before. The whole negotiation, from the first proposal of a junta to audit the claim, down to the final ratification of their award, was inseparably connected, from the beginning to the end, by links of unbroken continuity: and so the debt was identical and inseparable in its essence, and in its mode of existence, at the one as at the other point of time. The Government of the United States, through its proper functionaries, was privy, aiding and assisting, to its progressive march to consummation, through all its gradations, and, in the language of Mr. Adams, "contributed to the satisfactory result." These two facts being officially admitted and announced, namely, that the Government contributed to produce the result, and that the result was satisfactory to the Government, there was no ground for any distinction between the obligation to pay a debt of uncertain amount, and depending upon the original evidence in detail, as it existed at the date of the treaty, to ascertain and fix its amount, or a debt of an ascertained and fixed amount; there was no reason to discriminate between the obligations incident to the debt, in the one condition or the other; nor can it be presumed, from any of the concomitant circumstances, that any such discrimination was contemplated by the parties at any stage of the negotiation, or at the final ratification of the treaty. Then the conclusion is clear and irresistible that the treaty ought to have been so framed (if it were competent to act upon the claim at all) as to have embraced it in its actual state and condition when the treaty was redintegrated by the Cortes and definitively ratified, and to have given effect to the preceding adjustment of the actual amount; and if, in its original frame, it fell short of that object, it ought to have been so reformed and enlarged as to accommodate its phraseology to existing circumstances, and to make it adequate to the object.

6. It now appears conclusively, from the decision of the tribunal appointed to adjudicate all claims under the treaty, that it was neither framed originally nor subsequently reformed so as to cure its defects, whether inherent or adscititious, and to fit it to the circumstances and condition of the cases upon which it professed to operate; and, in consequence, that the power and jurisdiction of that tribunal, as limited by the treaty, has fallen short of the obvious ends of justice, and of the genuine intent of the parties, by having excluded from its cognizance a species of evidence to which the most implicit respect and unqualified credit ought to have been conceded—a consequence which, so far from being at all imputed, or capable of being imputed, to your memorialist, he took the most timely and effectual means in his power to obviate and to warn against.

7. If all these grounds were beaten from under him, and it were decided that the treaty had rightfully and justly repudiated and set at naught the best existing evidence of the validity and amount of his claim; if it were admitted that the high contracting parties really intended, and were strictly justified in the intention, to ravel and tangle the whole web of proof which had been wrought by the labors of so many anxious days and nights, and to resolve the consolidated mass of his claim into its original elements, with their original coherency and solidity weakened, dissipated, and diminished; if it could be tolerated that, after inducing him to surrender all the muniments and vouchers of his right, upon the faith of a definitive settlement and consummate obligation, they could again open the claim to indefinite contestation, and then take advantage of the want of those same muniments and vouchers—if all these appalling conclusions were the most unquestionable corollaries of political morality and constitutional law, still the circumstances under which he was deprived of the benefit of the evidence extant in the Spanish archives entitle him to equitable relief. But under what possible circumstances could he be subjected to the utter and irretrievable loss of his debt for trusting to the validity of an arrangement which his Government had contributed to effectuate and admitted to be satisfactory, and which necessarily dispensed with all extrinsic evidence, whether of the validity or of the amount of his claim?

Your memorialist therefore prays that the defect of justice thus arising from accidental inadvertencies and omissions in the transaction of a complicated negotiation, under very peculiar circumstances of difficulty, and from the anomalous and perplexing situation of one of the high contracting parties, may be supplied by a substantive provision for the payment of the debt due to him, in his own right, from the Spanish Government, and which has been merged and swallowed up in the purchase of the Floridas.

He conceives that the bona fide nature, and the conclusiveness of the adjustment by which the amount of his claim was ascertained and fixed, are placed beyond dispute or doubt; but, if there be the most latent suspicion that it was brought about by any indirect means, or for any indirect object, he would not only be willing to subject it to the severest scrutiny, but would invoke such a scrutiny; and, therefore, any provision for his relief might, in that case, be made to depend upon the result of such a scrutiny before any tribunal to which Congress may be pleased to refer it, or which it may be deemed expedient to constitute for the purpose.

R. W. MEADE.

WASHINGTON CITY, January 8, 1825.

No. 1.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 24, 1818.

The Committee of the Senate on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, asking the interposition of Congress in behalf of Richard W. Meade, an American citizen, unjustly and wantonly confined in a dungeon in Spain, by the authority of that Government, have given to the subject the deliberation its importance deserved, and beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears from the documents that R. W. Meade is an American citizen who went to Spain, in the year 1803, on lawful business; that, in the year 1806, such was the confidence of the Government in his integrity, that he was appointed navy agent for the United States at the port of Cadiz, a station which he held until the time of his confinement. Such was the correctness of his deportment as to have been appointed by the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz, with the consent of all the parties concerned, assignee of a bankrupt, the amount of whose estate involved a high responsibility. He performed the duties thus devolved upon him honestly; and, having collected for distribution fifty thousand dollars, he several times petitioned the tribunal to permit him to remit this sum to the creditors of the bankrupt resident in England—the only proper course left him to pursue, inasmuch as he had, when appointed agent of the bankrupt, given his bond to that tribunal, conditioned to take charge of the effects of the bankrupt, and to be responsible solely to the tribunal for the proceeds; being prohibited, under the penalty of the bonds, from disposing of the funds without the sanction of the tribunal. A controversy having arisen between the creditors and bankrupt about the distribution, Meade offered the money to either, if they would give a bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce, by which his own might be cancelled. This they were unable to do. The tribunal, of its own accord, and unexpectedly, decided that Meade should, on the following morning, place the money into the King's treasury, until the parties litigant should give the security required; it being declared that all Meade's property should be sequestered in the case of non-payment at the time limited. The money was forthwith paid by Meade into the Treasury, in Treasury notes equal to specie, and hence acknowledged by the Treasurer that the deposite had been made in due form, under his inspection, in effective specie, and that, whenever the tribunal should order its payment, His Majesty would pay it in the same coin.

Notwithstanding this judgment, and the discharge thereof, by the payment aforesaid, Mr. McDermot, the agent for the British creditors, brought suit against Meade in the same court to recover the very sum he had theretofore paid in conformity to its own judgment. The court awarded judgment against Meade a second time for this money. The latter appealed to the superior tribunal called alzadas. During its pendency, it is charged by Meade that the cause was removed, by the interposition of the British minister, to the council of war, and, by the same interposition, his arrest and confinement were procured, from which he could be relieved only by a repayment of the money. He has languished in confinement from the 2d of May, 1816, down to the last accounts from Spain. The representative of this nation at that court has repeatedly appealed to His Catholic Majesty for the relief of Meade, and the appeal has been in vain; the court of Spain having refused either to restore the money deposited in its own treasury, by order of its own competent judicial authority, or to release the person of Meade from the long confinement to which he has been doomed; and, finally, the President of the United States, whose peculiar province it is to take cognizance of subjects of this kind, has caused a representation on the subject to be made to the minister of Spain to the United States, demanding his immediate liberation. Nothing but a confidence that this representation will produce the desired result would have restrained your committee from recommending the adoption of measures of severe retribution.

Your committee are of opinion that it is due to the dignity of the United States to adopt, as a fundamental rule of its policy, the principle that one of its citizens, to whatever region of the earth his lawful business may carry him, and who demeans himself as becomes his character, is entitled to the protection of his Government; and that whatever intentional injury may be done him should be retaliated by the employment, if necessary, of the whole force of the nation.

No. 2.

Report of the Select Committee (in the House of Representatives of the United States) appointed on the 12th of February last, (1818,) upon the subject of the confinement in prison of Richard W. Meade.

The committee, to whom were referred a resolution of the 12th of February, and a memorial from a number of citizens of the United States residing in the city of Philadelphia, relating to the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade, report:

That, upon an examination of the documents communicated to the House by the President, the following facts appear:

On the 2d day of May, 1816, Richard W. Meade, a native citizen of the United States, who has resided in Cadiz for some years past, was arrested and closely confined in the castle of St. Catalina, which is described by the minister of the United States at the court of Spain as a felons' prison. At the time of the arrest, Mr. Meade was the navy agent of the United States at the port of Cadiz, and acted as consular agent, under an authority derived from Mr. Cathcart, the consul of the United States at that place, and with the approbation of the Spanish authorities; Mr. Cathcart having appointed him to act in his stead during his absence upon a visit he made to the United States. Mr. Meade does not appear to have ever renounced his character of a citizen of the United States, nor to have accepted from any foreign Power any right or privilege, nor to have contracted any obligation that could for a moment make his citizenship doubtful, or impair the claim he has upon his country for protection.

Soon after his confinement began, George W. Erving, minister of the United States at the court of Spain, interposed to obtain his liberation; and, from the 27th of August, 1816, to the 9th of May, 1817, made repeated and earnest applications to the public functionaries of Spain, claiming his release as a citizen of the United States unjustly deprived of his liberty. It is chiefly from this correspondence, accompanying the message of the President, that the committee have been able to obtain any knowledge of the causes that led to Mr. Meade's arrest and imprisonment.

Mr. Meade, it seems, had been regularly appointed assignee at Cadiz of the estate of James W. Glass, declared a bankrupt in England; and, in that capacity, after faithfully executing his duty, there remained in his hands a sum of about $52,000, belonging to the estate, which there is reason to believe was the subject of controversy between different claimants. There is no complaint or suggestion that Mr. Meade improperly retained this money in his hands, or was prevented from paying it over by any consideration but that of a just regard for his own security, which did not, under the then existing circumstances, permit him to part with the fund; and it seems that he could not, under any circumstances, pay the money without the consent and direction of the consulado of Cadiz.

In this state of things, on the 18th of February, 1814, the consulado of Cadiz, a tribunal whose jurisdiction over the matter does not appear to be questioned, made a summary order requiring Mr. Meade, within a limited and very short time, (about twenty-four hours,) to deposite the above-mentioned sum of money in the Treasury General of the province. With this order Mr. Meade complied on the following day. The fact of his compliance was vouched at the time by the usual and authentic evidence from the proper officer, and has since been satisfactorily established in the manner that will hereafter appear.

The consulado, by its own act, in taking the fund from the hands of Mr. Meade, and causing it to be deposited in the public Treasury, would seem, upon every just principle, to have liberated him from further accountability. That tribunal, nevertheless, soon after entertained a new proceeding against Mr. Meade, at the instance of a certain John McDermot, the agent of Duncan Hunter, having for its object to compel him to pay to the consulado the same amount which he had been previously ordered to pay, and, under their order, had already paid into the public Treasury; that is, in substance, to pay the same sum a second time. The consulado made a decree against him to that effect. From this decree Mr. Meade appealed to the superior tribunal of the province, called the alzadas, "but its interference was overruled by the tribunal of war at Madrid, and this latter confirmed the sentence of the consulado at Cadiz."

On the 4th August, 1815, a royal decree was issued, suspending the further proceedings of the consulado against Mr. Meade till funds could be collected by the Treasury to restore the deposite made by Mr. Meade.

From the date last mentioned, (4th August, 1815,) it does not appear that any proceedings took place till the 2d May, 1816, when the tribunal of war issued the order under which Mr. Meade was arrested, and continues to be imprisoned.

This order was founded upon a suggestion made by McDermot, that Mr. Meade was about to leave the kingdom, and required him to "deliver up the aforesaid deposite [meaning the money belonging to the bankrupt's estate] in like manner, and in the same specie, as he had received it; or to give full, clear, and sufficient security, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz; and, in default thereof, to be removed to a public prison, to prevent all evasion of the sentence against him." It is understood that the tribunal would receive nothing as satisfactory security but a deposite of specie.

The proceeding of the tribunal of war is apparently so destitute of all foundation in justice, and so plainly contradictory to the royal decree of the 4th August, 1815, that it becomes necessary to examine, for a moment, the only suggestion bearing the semblance of a vindication of it that has been offered on the part of the Spanish authorities.

Don Pedro Cevallos, in his note to Mr. Erving of the 10th September, 1816, alleges "that Mr. Meade attempted to restore [alluding to the payment into the Treasury] the money demanded of him, in credits of the Treasury." The precise import of this allegation may be understood to be, that Mr. Meade had made the deposite in Government paper, instead of making it in specie.

That Mr. Meade made the deposite in what was equivalent to specie, and was received as such by the officer authorized to receive it, is perfectly clear. The Intendant of the Treasury gave him a receipt for the deposite, made pursuant to the order of the consulado. In answer to an inquiry soon after directed by the consulado, the same officer replied that the deposite had been made in effective specie, and that he would respond for the specie. The royal order or decree of the 4th August, 1815, is founded upon the admission of the same fact. But there is still further evidence, though further evidence would seem to be unnecessary. In November, 1816, the Treasurer General of Spain distinctly put the questions to the consulado, whether the deposite had been made, whether it still existed, and whether there was any impediment to its return? That tribunal, with equal distinctness, replied that the deposite was made pursuant to their order, "in Treasury notes of effective cash, which said Meade had to receive from said department; and the deposite was thus made: the Treasurer obliging himself to hold the amount at the disposition of this tribunal." They state also that the deposite still exists at their disposition, and that they cannot resolve to whom it is to be returned. And again, on the 29th April, 1817, the treasurer of the revenue, or provincial rents of Cadiz, states explicitly to the Treasurer General of Spain that the deposite had been made, and had not been returned.

With such an accumulation of evidence from sources of unquestionable authenticity, and wholly uncontradicted, to show that the deposite had been made in what was equivalent to specie, and received as specie, and that the Treasury became, and acknowledged itself to be, answerable for the amount, it is almost superfluous to add a remark, which the course of the business very naturally presents, tending to the same result. If the order made by the consulado in the first instance had not been complied with, that tribunal would have proceeded to enforce its authority by summary and direct compulsion; in other words, it would have used the means with which it is invested by law to compel Mr. Meade to do exactly what that order required. This would have produced an immediate inquiry whether he had or had not complied, and would have enabled Mr. Meade to justify himself. The resort to an irregular and arbitrary course, which avoids that question, affords the strongest reason to believe that the allegation of Mr. Cevallos was known to be untenable. In fact, that allegation has since been wholly abandoned; for in the three notes subsequently addressed to Mr. Erving in reply to his urgent remonstrances, one by Mr. Cevallos, and two by his successor, Mr. Pizarro, it is not even alluded to.

It is impossible, however, to avoid remarking the extraordinary character of one of the questions put to the consulado in November, 1816, and the still more extraordinary character of the answer. The inquiry alluded to was, whether there was any impediment to its (the deposite) being returned? The answer is, that, from the circumstances of the suit still pending, this tribunal cannot resolve to whom the sum so deposited is to be returned. Why Mr. Meade should be imprisoned pending that suit, which was to determine to whom the money in the Treasury was to be paid, is a question that seems to admit of no answer that is reconcileable with common justice; more especially as the same document implies that the Treasury was to pay the money as soon as the suit should be decided; and, of course, the object of the suit was not to coerce Mr. Meade to pay, but simply to determine who was to have the money from the Treasury.

There is still another view of this matter which the committee think it proper to submit, and which they deem of itself decisive to establish the flagrant injustice of Mr. Meade's imprisonment. If the deposite was made in paper, it is beyond a doubt that the paper was the evidence of a debt due from the Treasury to Mr. Meade, and the receipt of it amounted to nothing more than a payment of what was justly due to him. In fact, it was the same thing as if the Treasury had paid him the money, and he had immediately after repaid the same money to the Treasury. The Treasury, therefore, had no just cause of complaint. It is equally evident that the individual interested in the deposite (Mr. McDermot, or his constituent) had no reason to complain. Whether the deposite was made in specie, or what was equivalent to specie, or how it was made, could not be material to him, provided it was so made as to give him a right to call upon the Treasury; that is, to make him a creditor of the Treasury for the amount in case of an eventual decision in his favor. That this was the effect of the deposite made by Mr. Meade, and received by the Treasurer, is not and cannot be disputed. The Treasurer cancelled the securities deposited, and engaged to respond for the amount in specie.

If the Treasury of Spain had been ready and willing to fulfil this engagement, Mr. Meade's imprisonment could not have continued for a single moment; and it is, therefore, evident that he is kept in confinement simply because it is not convenient for the Treasury to pay the money. And your committee are well assured that the Government of Spain, aware that, let the decision be what it might, the royal Treasury would be called on to pay the money in dispute, has, by a secret exertion of the authority it possesses over the proceedings of the tribunals, commanded "the business to be prolonged as much as possible."

In every point of view, then, in which the case can be considered, your committee can discover no justification for the imprisonment and sufferings of Mr. Meade. It does not appear that he has violated any civil or social duty which he owed by the laws of Spain, and for which, in the ordinary administration of justice, he might rightly be imprisoned. They are satisfied, too, that the continuance of his imprisonment is dependant upon the pleasure of the Government of Spain, and that his liberation may at any time be effected by that Government.

Your committee hope and believe that the demand made by the President will not be unavailing; but they think it proper, at the same time, on the part of this House, to give assurance of support in the measures that may become necessary in case this expectation should be disappointed. They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House is satisfied that the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade is an act of cruel and unjustifiable oppression; that it is the right and duty of the Government of the United States to afford to Mr. Meade its aid and protection; and that this House will support and maintain such measures as the President may hereafter adopt to obtain the release of the said R. W. Meade from confinement, should such measures be proper and necessary.

SIR: CADIZ, June 6, 1818.

I have had the honor to address you twice since I was put at liberty by this Government, transmitting you a copy of the royal order communicated by the Minister of State to the Supreme Council of War, containing the motives of the King for directing me to be liberated; and, at the same time, I requested you to return my most grateful acknowledgments to the President, and to accept them yourself, for the protection you have been pleased to grant me.

I now take the liberty of addressing you on a subject of extreme importance to myself, my family, and the persons connected with me, and which I have to entreat you will be pleased to communicate to the President, and let me have his answer for my information and government.

The Government of Spain is indebted to me to a very considerable amount. For the last five years I have been making the most enormous sacrifices to procure payment for property which I had unfortunately intrusted into their hands. From the date of my arrest, every species of payment was suspended; and no doubt can exist but that the object of this Government was to exterminate, if possible, a creditor whose claims were too just to be denied. My resistance, the justness of my demands, and the protecting hand of my Government, have disappointed the hopes and expectations of those who planned my ruin. I feel, however, sensible that to the want of inclination is to be added the want of means of satisfying my claims; and I therefore fear a delay, which, in the present state of the political relations between the two countries, may be fatal to me. It has been insinuated to me that, if I could procure and advance a further sum, in cash, a cession of lands might be procured in either of the Floridas to cover the probable amount of said advance and my claims. No specific proposal has been made to me, nor have I dared, indeed, to listen to any till I should receive the approbation of the President on the subject, as I have been led to suppose that the Government of the United States have required or said that no cessions of lands made after a certain date would be admitted, in case of the Floridas being ceded in sovereignty to the United States; yet, as the object of the demand on those provinces, and their cession to the United States, if it should take place, is designedly and expressly for the purpose of remunerating the citizens of the United States for injuries sustained or damages claimed by them from Spain, which is the precise nature of my claims, I conceive no objection could occur to the arrangement proposed. I have, however, abstained from receiving or making any formal proposal till I should receive a specific answer from the President or you on the subject. Should I be fortunate enough to make an arrangement of the kind, I shall always be willing, if the Government of the United States think proper to assume the grant made me, to give it up to them for a sum equal or equivalent to my demands on this Government.

I shall wait in Madrid for your answer; and, should it be unsatisfactory, or should I find it impracticable even to obtain this mode of arrangement from the Spanish Government in case of your answer being satisfactory, I shall enter my protest, and leave the kingdom, and place a full reliance on my own Government for supporting my just demands, whenever an arrangement shall take place between the two countries; being confident that, whenever such an event does take place, provision will be made for the claims of our citizens.

By this opportunity, and under the special charge of Mr. Willing, of Philadelphia, I transmit a despatch sent to me by Mr. Erving, to be forwarded to you.

Your answer, addressed to Mrs. Meade, at Philadelphia, will be duly forwarded to me.

I have the honor to remain, sir, with due respect and consideration, your obedient, humble servant,

R. W. MEADE.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State U. S., Washington.

No. 4.

Memorandum in the handwriting of the President, James Monroe, endorsed on the back of R. W. Meade's letter, dated Cadiz, 6th of June, 1818, and addressed to the Secretary of State, John Q. Adams.

The injuries of Mr. Meade have been deeply felt by the Government and people of the United States; but no particular arrangement for the payment of his claims, by the Government of Spain, in lands in the Floridas, can be countenanced or admitted by the Executive.

His claims, with those of every other citizen, will be carefully attended to, and provided for, so far as the Government may be able. It is expected that all grants in Florida, after a certain date, will be annulled, in case of a treaty of cession.

SIR: BOSTON, September 18, 1818.

Your letter of the 6th June has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States, by whose direction I have the honor of informing you that, in the negotiations pending between the United States and Spain, it is the intention of the President that provision shall be made for the eventual adjustment and satisfaction of the just claims of many citizens of the United States, among which every attention which may be proper will be shown to yours. It has been contemplated that means might be found, by the cession of Florida, for obtaining this satisfaction, in a manner which may not be burdensome to Spain; which expectation would be disappointed if the property of all the vacant lands in the province should be granted by the King of Spain to individuals before the cession of the jurisdiction to the United States. It is expected, therefore, that, in case of the conclusion of a treaty, including this cession, all grants after a certain date, to be agreed upon, will be annulled. It is not in my power to say what that will be, nor to give you any hopes of an early and favorable conclusion of the negotiation.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

No. 6.

Mrs. Meade to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, January 17, 1819.

I have the honor to hand you, enclosed, a statement of the grounds of my husband's claims on the Spanish Government, which will be followed by a specific statement of the amount due him from said Government, showing the amount due on *libramientos now in his possession, on contracts, and on damages, on bills received from said Government, as well as his reclamation on the score of the unjust imprisonment suffered by him for two years.

The time allowed him to avail himself of the opportunity by which I received this statement was too short to enable him to make out a detail of his claims; but, thinking it important that some statement should be immediately forwarded to you, he hastily made out the enclosed; trusting that, in the event of a speedy conclusion of a treaty between our country and Spain, this document would serve as a guide for that protection which his Government may think proper to grant him.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

No. 7.

Statement by R. W. Meade, from Madrid, November 5, 1815, sent to Mrs. Meade, at Philadelphia, and by her transmitted to the Department of State, in her letter to Mr. Adams of January 17, 1819.

The claims of Richard W. Meade on the Spanish Government are comprised under the three following heads:

1st. Sales of goods to the Government under contracts, loans of specie, and provisions; the latter lent at the earnest solicitation of the then Government of Spain, and in periods of their greatest distress. For the provisions, prices were afterwards agreed on, and a guaranty given to Mr. Meade for the payment, but which has never been complied with; and Mr. Meade has not been able to recover the amount acknowledged due him, though he procured regular condemnation through the competent tribunals of the country, and execution against the individual who became guarantee, and who is a Spanish merchant. Mr. Meade has been prevented from carrying the execution into effect, by a royal order issued by the Minister of Finance, in consequence of this individual having several contracts pending actually with this Government. Against the injustice and illegality of this order, the tribunal of commerce of Cadiz have made three very strong representations, pointing out the dangerous consequences to the credit and honor of the nation if the sentence of the tribunals of justice, granted in favor of a foreign merchant, can be set aside by a ministerial order, though under the sanction of the King, merely because the individual against whom judgment was given had entered into other contracts with the Government.

The last of these representations is, however, yet undecided. Mr. Meade only waits the present Minister of Finance's answer in order to lay this case before Mr. Erving, the minister of the United States at Madrid, with all the documents, who has promised him to lay the same before the Minister of State. This particular case is one of high importance, and it is intended to point out, in the complaint which is to be made to the King, through Mr. Yrujo, the present Secretary of State, the persecution of Mr. Meade, and the enormous difference in the administration of justice in Spain when an American citizen is a defendant and when a plaintiff.

In the case of Mr. Meade's imprisonment, which lasted above two years, and which finally has been declared illegal by the King, Mr. Meade was put into prison because he refused paying a second time a sum of money which the King actually held, and holds, in his own possession; and, in the present case, when Mr. Meade is plaintiff, and calls for the payment of above fifty thousand dollars, for which he has obtained a regular judgment through all the different tribunals to which appeals are allowed, or can be made, and in a case where the Government hold property of the debtors, they refuse to allow Mr. Meade to execute his judgment against the debtor, or to suspend the payments which they are making to him weekly, in order to satisfy the judgment; and thus Mr. Meade is kept out of his money, and cannot get it, either from the Government who received the provisions from Mr. Meade, or from the man who guarantied the transaction.

The other libramientos are for specific sums, and admit of no dispute. The only excuse for not paying them is the present state of the finances, and the great want of money. The claims, however, of foreigners, in general, have been acknowledged by the King since his coming to the throne. Those of the Spaniards are, with few exceptions, all declared as appertaining to the mass of public debt, for which provision is hereafter to be made, but which are considered as waste paper at present.

By a special decree of His Majesty, dated in ———, (copy of which is annexed,) Mr. Meade's demands on the Government have been fully recognised as just and legitimate, and the order directs that they should be paid agreeably to the original stipulations, but which have never been complied with.

Whatever part of these libramientos Mr. Meade has recovered since 1813, and particularly since the arrival of the King (Ferdinand) in Spain, in 1814, has been with a loss on the original capital of about one-third, besides the sacrifice of all the interest for a number of years, which has made the total loss amount to one-half of the capital. Mr. Meade remains, however, with a considerable sum of those libramientos, for which he has not been able to recover one shilling since his imprisonment in May, 1816, though acknowledged, and repeated orders given for their payment.

2dly. A demand on the Spanish Government for damages and actual losses sustained by Mr. Meade on a bill of exchange drawn to Mr. Meade's order by the Minister of Finance, by order of the Regency, dated in 1812, on the Viceroy of Mexico, payable at Vera Cruz, for $300,000; the specie of which was allowed to be exported, by special contract, to London. The bill was protested, and $50,000 only were paid in Mexico, on account, and that in tobacco. The actual loss which accrued to Mr. Meade in this transaction amounts to considerably more than $100,000. He had an English vessel detained at Vera Cruz twelve months, waiting for the specie; and the Cortes, who then governed Spain, commanded that Mr. Meade should be heard in justice respecting his claim for damages, viz: that the affair should be regularly tried, and the damages assessed by a competent tribunal. In 1815, Mr. Meade obtained also an order from his present Majesty, directing the Supreme Council of Finance to hear the demands of Mr. Meade, and to decide on the question; but Mr. Meade has never been able to obtain any decision or satisfaction from the council, though the Fiscal admits the justice of Mr. Meade's claim for damages, and Mr. Meade possesses the most ample testimonies to fully establish the same.

3dly and lastly. The claim which Mr. Meade has for his illegal imprisonment, the damages he sustained thereby, as well as the total ruin of his mercantile establishment at Cadiz, and the enormous expenses he was put to, to defend himself.

The foregoing comprises all Mr. Meade's personal claims, and, according to his estimate, may amount altogether to between three and four hundred thousand dollars.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, dated August 3, 1818, to the Secretary of State.

I also enclose, herewith, copy of a note which I wrote to Mr. Pizarro on the 27th July, transmitting Mr. Meade's memorial, in which he asks compensation for his sufferings and losses. The first memorial which Mr. Meade made, (copy of which, as he informed me, he transmitted to you,) was not altogether proper to be presented to the King. I induced him to alter it in some respects, though, in its principal features, the new memorial is the same. I presume that Mr. Meade has sent to you a copy of the corrected memorial.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro, Minister of Foreign Affairs, &c.

SIR: MADRID, July 27, 1818.

In my note to your excellency of May 13, acknowledging your communication of the royal orders for the release of Mr. Meade, I expressed a hope that the same dispositions which led His Majesty to that act of justice would induce him to make compensation to Mr. Meade for the sufferings and losses which an imprisonment, avowedly illegal, had brought upon him. I have now the honor to transmit to you his memorial, praying for such compensation, and I request that your excellency will be pleased to lay it before His Majesty. A copy of the same has been sent to the Secretary of State of the United States; and I need not assure your excellency how particularly happy I should be to terminate this disagreeable business by transmitting to my Government, as early as possible, a favorable decision of His Majesty on the reclamations of Mr. Meade.

I renew, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

No. 9.

Mr. Erving to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo.

SIR: MADRID, January 18, 1819.

I have the honor to transmit to your excellency, herewith enclosed, two memorials addressed to His Majesty by Richard Meade, a citizen of the United States: the first, dated on the 12th instant, prays that the King would be pleased to appoint a commission to liquidate the several demands which Mr. Meade has against the Government on account of supplies furnished for the support of its armies, and otherwise, during the late war, as well as to consider of the compensation due to him for his losses and personal sufferings under a late proceeding of the council of war, already declared by His Majesty to have been illegal.

The second memorial, dated 13th instant, in behalf of John Dickson, an American citizen, and others, interested in a cargo of tobacco sold and delivered to the Spanish Government under a solemn contract, in the year 1815, complains of the injustice done to parties in a decision of the council of war in that case, and prays that the King would be pleased to refer all the "autos" and antecedents in the affair to the examination and judgment either of the supreme council of Hacienda, or of that of the Indies, or of that of Castile, as His Majesty may deem to be most fit. The object of either memorial appears to be perfectly reasonable; they ask but common justice, and in the mode the best comporting with the good faith and decorum of the Government. In what regards more particularly the interests of Mr. Meade, he has undeniable claims as a creditor of the royal hacienda, and it cannot be doubted but that His Majesty will be sensible of the value of those very important services rendered to the nation, which form the ground of these claims, which give to them the most sacred character, and entitle them to the first consideration and to immediate settlement; and, in what regards the object of the second memorial, as little can it be presumed that the undue prejudices of the council of war therein complained of—prejudices which led that council, in one case, to a decision declared by His Majesty to be illegal—will be suffered to be an obstacle in the way of the justice which Mr. Meade demands in behalf of those whom he represents in another case. Has not the council, by its notorious partiality, and the declared illegality of its conduct in the case first alluded to, disqualified itself as a calm and dispassionate tribunal to judge in the last resort in any case which Mr. Meade is concerned in? The King will, I am persuaded, on this consideration, readily allow of an appeal from its sentence. I therefore lay these memorials before your excellency, requesting that you would be pleased to submit them to His Majesty, and in the full confidence that the royal decision thereon will satisfy the just claims of the memorialist.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

SIR: PALACE, January 26, 1819.

The King, my master, to whom I have submitted the two memorials of Mr. Richard Meade, which your excellency transmitted to me with your note of the 18th instant, has ordered me to request the necessary information whereon to found his royal determination, of which I have the honor to inform your excellency.

Proffering this to your excellency as an answer to the note above referred to, I reiterate the sentiments of my particular respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

MARQUIS DE CASA YRUJO.

From Mr. Erving to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo.

SIR: MADRID, February 9, 1819.

I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note of the 26th January, by which you have been pleased to acquaint me that, by order of His Majesty, you asked the necessary "informes" previous to the royal decision on the two memorials of Don Ricardo Meade, which I transmitted to your excellency with my note of January 18.

I am sorry now to inform your excellency that I have received such advice as leaves no doubt but that the council of war, with a view to anticipate the order which His Majesty may give on the "informes" to be presented to him, are pushing on the decision of the case relating to the tobacco contract in a shameful and unprecedented manner.

Therefore, not doubting of your excellency's good faith and the just intentions of the King in this matter, I earnestly request you to give an order to the council of war to suspend its proceedings till His Majesty shall be pleased to decide on the memorial of Don Ricardo Meade, which you have presented to him.

I renew, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

No. 12.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, March 4, 1819.

On the 18th January last I sent to Mr. Yrujo two memorials of Richard W. Meade by the note No. 9; he acknowledged the receipt of them on the 26th January by the note No. 10. On the 9th February I learned that the council of war was pushing forward one of the affairs in question with a view to decide on it before the interference of His Majesty, which had been prayed for, could be obtained; and I wrote to Mr. Yrujo to that effect, as by the note No. 11. The next day (10th of February) Mr. Yrujo sent back to me my note in the most insulting manner.

I did not immediately reply to him; I feared to be carried too far by my feelings, highly irritated. Finally, on the 20th February, I wrote to him the note No. 9.*

Mr. Yrujo has not been able, or has not thought proper, to reply specially to that last note; but, in a note of 26th February, (No. 10*) wherein it is but slightly adverted to, he has sent to me a copy of his order to the council of war, by which it appears that, without taking the affair in question altogether out of the hands of the council, he has added to that tribunal three judges from the council of hacienda; thus endeavoring to save the honor of the council, and to satisfy the demand of the memorialist; but by which measure, however, he has been obliged virtually to confess that my objections against the council were solid and reasonable.

Copy of an official letter addressed by His Excellency Don José Canga Arguelles, Minister of Finance at Madrid, to Richard W. Meade, citizen of the United States of America.

A statement, in due form, of your claims against this Government, and the damages you have sustained in consequence thereof, was transmitted to this Department of Finance by the Minister of State, accompanied by a royal order, dated the 26th of January of last year, which statement had been received from and supported by the minister of the United States resident at this court. His Majesty named a special junta of counsellors to take cognizance of the liquidation of all the credits which you might present or be able to substantiate, and of the claims which you should make.

The junta gave in their award, and consulted His Majesty on the subject, who, having been pleased to approve thereof, and adopt the same, the said junta have extended, in legal form, a certificate of the entire credit due to you by the nation; the sum of which amounts to 9,823,072 r. vn. 11 ms. or $491,153 62, in the terms and for the reasons therein specified; which document, with His Majesty's approbation thereunto annexed, and certified by me, I herewith transmit to you, by his royal order, for your security, and for whatever other purpose or object that may be conducive to your interest.

God preserve you many years. Given at the royal palace, in Madrid, the 21st of May, 1820.

CANGA ARGUELLES.

Señor Don RICARDO MEADE.

[NOTE.—The sum recited in the above order contains the total amount of the claims for Mr. Meade's own account, as well as agent for others. The personal claims of Mr. Meade amount only to 7,497,595 reals of vellon, equal to $373,879 75.]

Don Evaristo Perez de Castro, Secretary of State, to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: MADRID, June 10, 1820.

I have the satisfaction of informing you that the Spanish Government, always upright and honorable in its decisions, has determined to acknowledge, with the sanction of His Majesty, Don Richard Meade, a citizen of the United States, its creditor for nine million eight hundred and twenty-three thousand and seventy-two reals of vellon and eleven maravedis, for which a competent security in writing has been given him. As your Government, sir, has taken part in the fortune of this individual, I hope you will be pleased to communicate this favorable determination to the President of the said States, inasmuch as the respect which he deserves has had much influence in it; and also the hope that Spanish subjects may, by a just reciprocity, find equal protection and consideration in the United States.

With so agreeable a motive, I present myself anew to your disposal, and pray God that you may live many years.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, August 17, 1820.

I beg leave to transmit for your information, and that of the President, (if you will please to communicate them to him,) three documents, received by me from the Spanish Government, on the subject of my claims, their final liquidation, and the acknowledgment of the balance due me by the Spanish nation. The perusal of these documents will, I trust, convince the President and yourself that the interference of the Government has not been bestowed on a person unworthy of the high protection he has received. I should immediately have proceeded on to Washington had I been certain of meeting there the President or yourself; but, on application to General Cadwalader, and to the post office of this city, I was not able to obtain any positive assurance of it. Should you conceive that I could afford any information relative to the late changes and present state of Spain, I shall feel extremely happy in so doing, and, on the smallest insinuation, would either proceed to Washington, or to any other point or place you might appoint. I suppose that you are aware that the Cortes would meet on the 9th of July, and that, by the constitution, they could remain only four months in session; and that, of course, every thing that was to be done must be accomplished within that period, or lie over one year more.

I remain, &c.

In making it now, it gives me pleasure to offer you my congratulations upon the adjustment of your accounts with the Spanish Government, and to assure you that this Government feels not a little gratification in having at all contributed to the satisfactory result.

I return you my thanks for your obliging and polite intimation, but see no sufficient inducement for putting you to the trouble of coming hither.

[TRANSLATION.]

In the city of London, on the 14th day of the month of September, in the year 1824, before me, Daniel Simon Merceron, notary public of this city, and in presence of the undersigned witnesses, appeared Don Juan Rico, vicar-general of the Spanish armies, and late a deputy to the last Cortes for 1822 and 1823, who said and declared, as by these presents he doth solemnly say and declare, for truth, as follows, viz: That, well knowing that large sums, as well in specie as in provisions, had been advanced by Richard W. Meade, Esq., a citizen of the United States, to the Spanish Government, during the glorious struggle against Napoleon, at periods so critical that the most sagacious politician could scarcely discover the least glimpse of hope; and impressed with the conviction that good faith on the part of Governments, and a religious adherence to contracts, offer the best guaranty for citizens of every class, as well natives as foreigners, affording them all the means in their power for the execution of their enterprises; being highly interested, also, in the prosperous issue of so important an enterprise, and being actuated by no other interested motive than that of the honor of his nation, and that the operations of the Government should not be paralyzed by the want of resources, he used the greatest exertions, and employed all the resources inspired by his zeal for inducing the Government, without economizing any species of sacrifice, to punctually perform the obligations it had contracted with Richard W. Meade, Esq.; some of which were of such a nature that, had it not been for the assistance so seasonably afforded to the Government by that meritorious patriot, Richard W. Meade, Esq., those highly important garrisons of Alicant and Carthagena would not have been supplied with provisions in sufficient time, and must have fallen into the hands of the enemy, whereby the cause of Spain would have suffered a mortal blow, inasmuch as they were the only two garrisons that remained free throughout the whole coast of the Mediterranean. The Cortes, animated by the best zeal, having heard the claims of Richard W. Meade, Esq., gave the most positive orders to the Government to spare no means or sacrifice for the effective payment of Mr. Meade's debt, as being of a sacred and privileged nature; when, in fact, amongst other arrangements, the Government gave to the said Meade a bill of exchange or order for three hundred thousand hard dollars on Vera Cruz, which, although not protested, he was informed could not be paid for want of assets. Under these painful circumstances, the said Meade, relying on the antecedent orders of the Cortes, again applied to the Government for effective payment, when the Government answered that they had morally paid him; but as an actual and not a moral payment could alone be satisfactory to Meade, differences and disputes of a highly unpleasant nature arose between the Government and Meade, which were productive of incalculable injury to the interests and fortune of the latter. The Cortes having again taken into consideration the case of Richard W. Meade, Esq. and its consequences, gave the most positive orders to Government to pay Meade, together with such loss and damages as he might have sustained. That additional efforts and exertions were used and employed on the part of the declarant, for the purpose of enforcing a strict observance of the orders of the Cortes on the part of the Government, and of its paying to Meade the enormous sum of twenty-four millions of rials or thereabouts, being the balance then due to him; when, to wit, in or about the month of December, 1813, an agreement was entered into between the Government and the said Meade, whereby it was stipulated that the latter should take a bill of exchange or order for part on the Treasuries of Seville, Xeres, and Alicant, and that he should be paid the remainder by an exclusive appropriation, until the completion of such payment of the whole of such sums as the Government might receive from America, and of the whole of the duties on all such specie and goods as might reach Spain from the same quarter on account of private individuals. The effect of this last arrangement would have been the reimbursement, on the part of Mr. Meade, of the whole of his debt, had it not been for the circumstance of the return of King Ferdinand to Spain, in the year 1814, which plunged the nation into an abyss of evils.

In corroboration of this truth, he will here relate a striking fact as demonstrative of the well-founded hopes entertained by Meade of the actual payment of the whole of his debt. In the early part of the year 1814, a ship having arrived at Cadiz from America, with from eighty to ninety thousand hard dollars, entered for the Treasury,

Mr. Meade, conformably to the provisions of the last agreement, claimed the whole of the said sum, when the Treasurer at Cadiz told him he had private orders from the Treasurer General to appropriate the third part thereof to the supply of Catalonia with provisions. Mr. Meade, dissatisfied with such a notorious infraction of the agreement, lost no time in despatching an express to the declarant, with an energetic note, in order to his presenting the same to the Treasurer General, who, being convinced by the arguments of Mr. Meade, and of the fatal consequences that might result to him, revoked the private order, and despatched another positive order for Meade's receiving the whole of the product of the said ship, and that he should, in like manner, continue to receive the whole of what might be imported from America. Ever since the return of King Ferdinand to Spain, Mr. Meade began to observe and experience a scandalous violation of the most sacred agreements by him entered into with the Government of the Cortes; he, moreover, suffered the most horrid persecution, arising from imprisonment, delay, and sacrifices of every description, as well of his health as of his fortune, to the great scandal of all good Spaniards and of the whole of civilized Europe, until the remonstrances, equally just and energetic, of the Government of the United States, obliged the Spanish Government to do justice, and in some measure to repair the damage and injury sustained by Mr. Meade. King Ferdinand having, in fact, appointed a commission of four counsellors to liquidate the debt of Richard W. Meade, Esq., such commission, composed of four respectable magistrates, proceeded with all the circumspection and wisdom which the grave importance of the matter required, keeping in view the whole of the authentic documents, and acting under the supposition that such sum as on the balance of accounts might appear to be due from the Government to Meade ought to be paid by the Treasury. This liquidation was sanctioned and approved by the King, in the year 1820, within a short time after the re-establishment of the constitution; but the necessary orders were not given to the Treasury for the payment thereof, by reason that Don José Canga Arguelles, the then Minister of Finance, told the said Meade that, should the treaty for the cession of the Floridas be ratified, such debt would be included therein, and consequently be paid by the Government of the United States, or that, in the unexpected event of the non-ratification of the treaty, he might be indemnified by lands situate within the said Floridas, or some other territory, seeing the then penurious state of the nation. That the declarant, not having been a deputy to the Cortes for the year 1820, is unable to depose to what passed in the said Cortes when they took into consideration the ratification of the treaty for the cession of the Floridas and the debt of Richard W. Meade, Esq.; but what he can positively affirm is, that the Spanish Government was uniformly impressed with the firmest conviction that the debt of the said Richard W. Meade, Esq. was included in the treaty, and that, from the day of the ratification of the treaty, the Spanish Government was wholly exonerated from the payment of the said debt, the Government of the United States being exclusively bound to pay the same; which opinion was so generally manifest and prevalent, that, as often as the declarant applied to any of the Ministers of State touching the debt of Richard W. Meade, Esq., in order to their furnishing him with the necessary documents and certificates for the substantiation of his claim to the recovery of the debt in question from the Government of the United States, he was as repeatedly assured that the Spanish Government would ever be ready to furnish the said Meade with such certificates and documents as might be necessary for enabling him to claim his debt from the Government of the United States, because the Spanish Government had been discharged from such debt from the moment of the ratification of the treaty of the Floridas. This was at various times repeated to him by Don José Heredia, one of the clerks in the office of the Secretary of State, and the person specially charged with such negotiation.

In testimony whereof, the said appearer hath signed with me, notary, and witnesses, and I have caused my notarial seal to be hereto affixed, the day, month, and year above written.

No. 21.

In the case of the claim of Richard W. Meade, Esq., depending before the honorable Board of Commissioners, under the eleventh article of the treaty between the United States of America and Spain, concluded at Washington on the 22d day of February, A. D. 1819.

The deposition of Joseph Moreno de Guerra, taken at Philadelphia, before Francis Hopkinson, and by him reduced to writing, one of the commissioners appointed to take affidavits by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.

The said Joseph Moreno de Guerra, on his solemn oath, doth depose and say: That he is a native of the town of Rumbla, province of Cordova, Andalusia, in Spain, and is aged forty-six years and upwards; that he was duly elected from his native province a deputy to the National Cortes of Spain, in the year 1820, for that and the following year, (1821,) and that the said Cortes assembled at Madrid on the 7th day of July, 1820; that, on or about the beginning of October, in the same year, the Cortes discussed the question relating to the treaty signed during the year before, at the city of Washington, between Spain and the United States of America, involving a cession of the two Floridas. At the same time a special committee, to whom the business of that treaty had been referred, made a report on a memorial previously presented by the agent of Richard W. Meade, of Philadelphia, in the United States, claiming an appropriation for the payment of a sum acknowledged to be due to him by His Majesty the King of Spain. This committee, in their report, informed the Cortes that, in order to decide definitively upon the claim of the memorialist, it was necessary to ascertain whether the amount of money due to Richard W. Meade, and to those who were represented by him, had been included among those claims which the Government of the United States undertook to pay, and from which it was wholly to exonerate Spain; for, if this should not prove to have been done, the debt owing to Richard W. Meade, in particular, ought immediately to be paid, as it was considered a national debt, arising either directly out of contracts, or from the consequences of contracts, made by him in aid of the liberty and independence of Spain at the most critical periods of the revolution; that, at the periods of those contracts, and in the full confidence that they would be fulfilled, the services of said Meade had been of the most important kind; and that the sum for which payment was required had been liquidated and fixed by a special commission of counsellors appointed for that purpose by His Majesty the King, who had subsequently sanctioned and approved the settlement. In consequence of this report of the committee, it was proposed in the Cortes to address an official letter to the Secretary of State, to ascertain whether or not the sum then claimed in the memorial above mentioned had been included among those which the United States undertook to discharge. Such a letter was accordingly written by the Secretary of the Cortes in the usual manner, and a reply from the Secretary of State was received, stating distinctly that the debt due to Richard W. Meade was expressly included in the treaty; that the nature and amount of said debt were well known to the Government of the United States, as the same had been officially communicated to the American minister residing at Madrid, but that the said Government of the United States required the large cessions of lands made to the Duke of Alagon, Count Punon Rostro, and Mr. Vargas to be cancelled, considering the entire Floridas appropriated to the payment of the claims of its citizens upon the Spanish Government. In order to avoid any possible misunderstanding or mistake upon this subject, it was proposed in the Cortes that a committee of two of its members should be appointed to wait on the minister from the United States, Mr. Forsyth; and accordingly this deponent, and Mr. Thomas Isturiz, member of the city of Cadiz, were appointed, did wait on Mr. Forsyth, and obtained from that gentleman the clear and distinct assurance that the debt due to Richard W. Meade would certainly be paid to him by the United States if the treaty were ratified by the Spanish Government, and the cessions above mentioned totally annulled.

And this deponent solemnly declares that these assurances thus conveyed to the Cortes, and these assurances only, induced that body to annul the grants of land in the Floridas, two of which had been acknowledged valid in the treaty itself; that, had not the Cortes been perfectly satisfied by these solemn assurances that the national debt (as it was regarded) due to Richard W. Meade would be fully paid by the United States, they would not have consented to vacate those grants of land, as far as respected the United States, but would have vacated them as respects the individuals to whom they had been made, reserving them to the Spanish nation by the law of reversion, for the express purpose of paying, by them, the debt due to the said Richard W. Meade, either by their transfer to said Meade, or by a sale, and with the product thereof would have paid the debt and interest.

In this debt to the said Meade the deponent says that the Cortes took a particular interest, as it arose from contracts the most of which had been sanctioned by the former Cortes which sat in Cadiz during the years 1811 and 1812. The Cortes deemed themselves especially bound to see such engagements complied with; and the said Meade was considered as more than commonly meritorious, having been unjustly persecuted on account of the services he had rendered the Spanish nation. The deponent adds that the Cortes founded their right to vacate, as to the individual grantees, the cessions of lands in Florida above referred to, and to reserve them for the nation, to be devoted to any purpose that might be deemed just and proper, upon the law called reversion and incorporation, well known in the history and legislation of Spain since the fourteenth century—a law which converts into national property whatever the prodigality of the monarchs might confer on their favorites, as happened with those termed enriqueñas, and with many others.

This deponent has been absent from Spain during the last nine months, having left his native country on the 2d day of July, 1823. He arrived at New York in October last; left the United States of America for Mexico on the 14th day of October, 1823, and he is now on his return to Spain, intending to embark from this country for Gibraltar in the course of a few days.

GEORGETOWN, December 10, 1824.

Mr. Richard W. Meade, of Philadelphia, has submitted to my examination a deposition of Joseph Moreno de Guerra, dated at Philadelphia the 23d day of April, 1824, and taken before Francis Hopkinson, and by him reduced to writing. On that part of this deposition which relates to myself, I certify that I have no recollection of any conversation with Joseph Moreno de Guerra and Thomas Isturiz, both of whom were deputies of the Cortes in 1820, in relation to Mr. Meade's claim. No persons ever presented themselves to me as a committee of the Spanish Cortes during my residence in Madrid as the minister of the United States. If I ever had any conversation with these deputies on the subject of the Florida treaty, I was entirely unconscious that they spoke with me by the authority of that body, or that any importance was attached to the opinion I might express. It is proper to add that I should have stated, on such an application, that I believed Mr. Meade's claim was provided for in the treaty of cession. This opinion was expressed freely to all who conversed with me, and may have been, and no doubt was, to Joseph Moreno de Guerra, in the presence of Isturiz. The only conversation I distinctly recollect was held with Martinez de la Rosa, also a deputy of the Cortes, and of the commission to whom was referred the treaty of 1819. Having learned by accident that an attempt was about to be made to make a distinction favorable to Meade between his claim and the claims of other persons embraced in the treaty, I expressed my conviction to Mr. De la Rosa that the claim was just, and was provided for in the treaty, but that it ought to be left to share the same fate, as to its payment, with the equally just claims of other citizens of the United States. The Cortes deliberated in secret session on the subject of the treaty of 1819, and of Meade's claim; the little information I could obtain of what was done was communicated to my own Government, and is on file in the Department of State. From the nature of the case, I did not consider myself at all answerable for the correctness of the information procured and communicated.

The conversation I have stated with Mr. De la Rosa was not considered by me of sufficient importance to be communicated to the Secretary of State in any of my letters written at Madrid; nor has it ever been stated in writing to the Department since my return home.

I wish it to be clearly understood that I do not question the accuracy of Joseph Moreno de Guerra's statement further than relates to my conversation with him and Isturiz as a committee from the Cortes. The Cortes may have given them such a commission, and the conversation may have been held in consequence thereof; if it was, I have no recollection of it, and do not know that they were conversing with me officially, and certainly did not say more than that Mr. Meade's claim was included in the treaty of 1819.

JOHN FORSYTH.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, County of Washington, to wit:

On the 19th day of May, 1824, personally appeared before the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for the county aforesaid, the honorable John Forsyth, who acknowledged the annexed statement to be in his handwriting, and at the same time made oath, in due form of law, that the facts therein stated are true, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

Sworn before JOSEPH FORREST.

DEAR SIR:

I return to you Moreno de Guerra's deposition, with a statement of what I recollect on the subject of your claim. This statement, if necessary, will be given on oath.

If it is desirable that I should give you any further certificate, or attend the commission to give them any verbal explanations, I will do either with great pleasure. Your obedient servant,

Letter from Mr. Bardazi, Spanish Secretary of State, to Mr. Meade, and by him communicated to the President.

SIR: MADRID, June 16, 1821.

The King has made himself thoroughly acquainted with the exposition and documents which you addressed to me on the 14th of the last month through your agent at this court, Don Francis de la Carrera; and, by his minister plenipotentiary in Washington, he was previously informed of the correspondence which he had had with you, and of the measures you had adopted with the American Government, in order that, in conformity with the fifth paragraph of the ninth article of the treaty celebrated between the two Powers on the 22d February, 1819, it should pay you the liquidated credit which you hold against the National Finance Department of Spain for all you demand on it, and the damages to which it refers.

His Majesty being convinced that your credit against the public finances of Spain is comprised in the before-mentioned fifth paragraph of the ninth article of the treaty, as possessing the only two qualifications or characters which are required by said article, has given orders and the corresponding instructions to his minister plenipotentiary at Washington to support all the measures you may adopt with the Federal Government, directed to obtain the acknowledgment and payment of your credit on the terms which are stipulated in the eleventh article.

The circumstance of the minister plenipotentiary of the King not having made particular mention of your credit or reclamation before or after presenting the ratification of the before-mentioned treaty cannot, in any manner, prejudice the rights you have, or oblige Spain to be responsible for the amount, because, when a general principle is sanctioned which embraces all particular cases, it is unnecessary to make individual mention of each of them—a motive which no doubt induced General Vives not to make any express mention of your credit, as he did not of any other case which might be in the same situation.

By royal command I make the same known to you for your information and government.

God preserve you many years.

Translation of a letter from Mr. Anduaga, Spanish Minister Plenipotentiary, to Mr. Meade, and by him communicated to the President.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, January 11, 1822.

I have received your letter of the 2d instant, in which you are pleased to inform me of the steps you have adopted in order to obtain from my Government the payment of the liquidated claim which you have on the National Treasury or Finance Department of Spain, and the answer which has been given to you, that the same is comprised in the fifth paragraph of the ninth article of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, and that His Majesty had been pleased to command me to support all the reclamations which you might make on the subject to the Government of this country; and also stating the necessity which you found yourself under of protesting that, being compelled by the treaty between Spain and the United States to apply or have recourse to the latter for the payment of your credit, you reserved your right, in case of not obtaining it in the whole, or only in part, against the Government of Spain, which has acknowledged you with so much solemnity as its creditor for the amount you claimed; and you conclude with requiring of me to communicate your protest to my court, and to inform the President of the steps you had adopted as regards my Government, and their results.

I lost not a moment in transmitting to the Spanish ministry the copy of your aforesaid letter of the 2d instant; but it has not appeared to me proper to comply with that part of it which relates to my addressing a note to this Government until you shall be pleased to communicate to me whether it has placed any opposition or difficulty in the way of your first demand.

In fact, I should be guilty of a serious libel on the President if for a moment I should appear to doubt of his entire disposition to comply most religiously with one of the clearest articles of the treaty of 1819, the literal meaning of which does not admit of the most extreme cavil.

When His Catholic Majesty decided on making the sacrifice of such important provinces as those of the Floridas, it was with the object of satisfying in full, and without any deduction, the credits which the citizens of the United States might have against Spain; and it was specified with the utmost care in the treaty what those credits were.

The simple perusal of that instrument will demonstrate, at first sight, that your credit is evidently comprised in it; and it would be, on the part of the American Government, an act of bad faith, of which it is incapable, to suppose the smallest doubt on this point.

This is so much more true as relates to your credit as it is of a distinct character from all the others. It is the only one which, after the most scrupulous or minute investigation, has been liquidated and acknowledged by Spain; the only one, for the same reason, that does not require the examination of the commissioners; and the only one, in fine, on which there can be no cavil or discussion.

These reflections, I think, ought to tranquillize you with regard to the results of your reclamation; and, with respect to the instructions which I have received from my court, it is true that they direct me, in the unforeseen event of any difficulty occurring with regard to the payment of your credit, that I should adopt all the necessary steps, that it may be effected as stipulated, but always declaring that Spain, according to the treaty of 1819, finds herself totally discharged from the payment of the credit you held against her, and that the United States has bound herself to pay it; and that, therefore, neither at this time, nor at any other period, will Spain attend to any reclamation on the subject.

I offer myself at your disposition, and pray God to preserve your life many years.

R. W. MEADE, Esq.

Copy of an official letter from His Excellency the Spanish Secretary of State to Mr. Anduaga, Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, dated EXCELLENT SIR: MADRID, December 20, 1822.

By the official letter of your excellency, (No. 145,) I was informed of the one which Mr. Richard Meade had addressed to your excellency, and of the answer which you had returned to him. His Majesty has been pleased to approve of the reply of your excellency to the aforesaid Meade, with respect to the declaration which the commission established in Washington had made, in virtue of the eleventh article of the treaty, to consider as null the liquidation made by the Spanish Government of the reclamations which Meade held against it.

Under date of 28th of August last, I replied to the letter of your excellency, No. 78, in which you manifested your apprehension that it would be attempted to put on Spain the slight of not agreeing to the liquidation; and to your No. 113, in which you communicated that the commission had declared that it would admit reclamations in virtue of contracts made with Spain, among which that of Mr. Meade was comprised; and, as your excellency did not indicate in that letter any of your fears that the liquidation would not be conformed to, His Majesty inferred that the slight had not taken place which you apprehended in your first letter.

The receipt of my aforesaid letter of the 28th of August will have caused your excellency to see with pleasure that the intentions of the King in the affair in question have been entirely conformable to the ideas which your excellency has manifested to me.

His Majesty flatters himself that the Government of the United States, reflecting maturely on all the circumstances under which the liquidation of the credit of Meade took place, and the irreproachable characters who were employed in it, will not insist in consummating the slight or insult which it is pretended to make to the nation. By royal order I communicate this to your excellency for your satisfaction and information.

God preserve your excellency many years.

PHILADELPHIA, April 15, 1823.

Mr. R. W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, addressed two letters to my predecessor, under date of the 14th April and 10th October, 1822, enclosing the correspondence between your excellency and the commissioners named under the eleventh article of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, ratified by His Catholic Majesty, and exchanged in February, 1821, relative to the admission of certain claims therein detailed. My predecessor transmitted the same to my Government, together with the answer which he addressed to Mr. Meade, under date of 16th October, 1822, a copy of which I have the honor to enclose. His Majesty has been pleased to approve and sanction said answer of my predecessor to Mr. Meade; and he further commands me to support his reclamation, and represent to your excellency in the most friendly, but, at the same time, in the most forcible and solemn manner, against any opposition that may be pretended to be set up of not paying the private debt which the aforesaid Meade holds against the Spanish nation, but which, in virtue of the late treaty, has been assumed by the Government of the United States.

This debt is, perhaps, the only one that has ever been solemnly acknowledged by His Catholic Majesty. It was done at the earnest solicitation of the minister of the United States at Madrid, and its final liquidation and acknowledgment took place at a time and under circumstances that cannot for one single moment authorize the slightest doubt as to its validity and amount.

The amount of the debt was laid before both Governments during the negotiation; the liquidation of it could only be effected by the parties interested in the contracts; and the wrongs it claimed compensation for, and the ascertaining the precise sum due, appeared to be subjects equally interesting to both Governments. It was, at least, thus represented and earnestly required by the American Government, both prior and subsequent to the date of the treaty, and His Catholic Majesty acceded to the wishes of the American Government; and, anxious that there should be no further cause of complaint, selected four counsellors, from distinct tribunals, and instructed them to examine, in the most scrupulous and minute manner, into all the circumstances attending on so complicated an account, and which required all the knowledge and practical information of the Spanish laws and commercial rules of the nation, to be enabled to form a correct view of the whole transaction. No affair of the kind ever underwent a more particular and thorough investigation, not only by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, but subsequently by the Treasurer General, the Comptroller General's Department, and the Minister of Finance, and finally received the full sanction of His Majesty himself.

Under such circumstances, His Majesty feels that he cannot view with indifference, or remain silent, when it is attempted to invalidate so solemn an act. The Spanish nation was most certainly responsible for the full sum acknowledged due. The Government of the United States, by the subsequent ratification of the treaty, assumed the debt, in virtue of the fifth renunciation contained in the eleventh article, with a perfect knowledge of its amount, which had been officially communicated, long prior to the conclusion of the treaty, to the minister in Madrid, for the information of his Government, by the Secretary of State; and most certainly, under all these circumstances, it was not to be imagined that any further information would be required on this subject.

There cannot exist a doubt that, if the treaty of 22d February had not been concluded, Mr. Meade would have received from the Spanish nation the full amount of his debt; and His Majesty cannot perceive the justice of the commissioners in first attempting to disavow the debt in toto, as not included in the treaty; and much less could His Majesty have supposed that so solemn an act of his Government, which was an act of concession, in a great measure, to the interposition of the American cabinet, and which was done in the most perfect good faith, would have been questioned by the agents of the American Government.

It has been a subject of the deepest regret to His Majesty the slight or insult which the commissioners of reclamation have endeavored to show to the most respectable authorities of Spain and to His Majesty himself, and, consequently, to the whole nation.

On a full view of the above exposition, I am directed to represent to your excellency that His Majesty cannot remain silent when an attempt is made to render doubtful an act so incontrovertible, and to protest, solemnly and respectfully, against any decision of the commissioners named in virtue of the treaty which may tend to invalidate, in any manner, the acknowledgment by my Government of the debt due to Mr. Meade, in conformity to the certificate which was granted to him thereof, and which is in his possession.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HILARIO DE RIVAS Y SALMON.

The Count Ofalia to Mr. Nelson.

SIR: PALACE, March 8, 1824.

I have laid before the King, my august master, your note of the 25th of the last month, in which you propose, for the saving of time and expense, to deliver to the legation the original documents which are here, and which may be found necessary for the settlement of the claims of American citizens, in conformity with the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, in the place of copies of them.

His Majesty being informed, he commands me to say to you that the papers of this office (secretaria) have been thrown into great confusion by their removal to Seville and Cadiz, whence they are expected in a few days. As soon as they shall arrive, we will proceed to search for those which you demand, and all those originals whose delivery may not be inconvenient shall be at your disposal; those, also, which are found to be not of this character shall be furnished, that true copies of them may be had conformably with the treaty. With this, I have the pleasure to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

THE CONDE DE OFALIA.

No. 33.

Extract of a letter from the Count de Ofalia, Secretary of State, to Mr. Nelson, dated Aranjuez, May 14, 1824.

"No. 5. To His Excellency the Secretary of the Department of Finance, upon the case of Mr. Richard Meade."

ARANJUEZ, May 14, 1824.

By the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, Spain obliged itself to furnish the Government of the United States of America all the documents which might be necessary for the adjustment of the reclamations of its subjects, the payment of which it remained bound for by the same treaty.

In consequence thereof, the minister plenipotentiary has claimed various papers relative to the comprobation of said reclamations, and, among them, those relating to the contracts and other affairs of Mr. Richard Meade.

In your department there exist writings on this important affair, which, it appears, were remitted to the department under my charge on the 24th of May, 1821, and returned on the 26th of the same month, in which there are probably many of the documents that the said minister calls for, agreeably to the tenor of the annexed exposition of the American commissioners of the 18th of April, 1823, (and which I transmit without a translation, on account of the urgency with which the documents are demanded, and from the scarcity of persons in this royal residence,) the despatch of the remainder corresponding to the authorities and offices depending upon your ministry.

The King, our lord, considering, on one side, the obligation contracted by the treaty, and the benefit which has accrued to the royal finance of being released by it from the payment of near ten millions of rials, to which the claims of Meade amounted, commands me to recommend to your excellency, in the most efficacious manner, that you will facilitate to his excellency the aforesaid minister of the United States, or to the person or persons that he may delegate for this purpose, the said documents, in the earliest time possible, &c.

By royal order, &c.

God preserve your excellency many years.

The Spanish Government seems disposed to proceed with the calls made upon them for papers; and we may now be permitted to indulge the hope that most of the records which have been asked for will be supplied before a very distant day. From this calculation I fear we must exclude the papers in Mr. Meade's case, which, being so voluminous, although entered upon by the Spanish officers apparently in good faith to supply them, seem to forbid any well-founded expectation that they can be speedily furnished.

EXCELLENT SIR: PHILADELPHIA, July 1, 1824.

I have the honor of communicating to your excellency the copy of a decision pronounced on the 29th day of May, and notified to me on the 7th day of June last by the secretary of the commissioners under the late treaty between Spain and the United States, on the claim interposed by me for payment of the debt acknowledged to be due to me by the Crown of Spain.

As in all my proceedings to obtain the recovery of this indisputable debt I have obeyed the impulse of two great Powers, with neither of whom was it possible for me to contend, I have uniformly protested against all prejudice to my rights, in consequence of either demanding or being denied satisfaction of my claim under the treaty. As an humble individual, I can do no more at present than repeat this protest, and beg you to become the means of making it known to the councils of His Catholic Majesty.

I have the honor to remain, with due respect and consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,

R. W. MEADE.

To His Excellency the COUNT OF OFALIA,
Secretary of State of His Catholic Majesty, Madrid.

No. 38.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: The memorial of Richard W. Meade very respectfully shows:

That, whilst he resided as a merchant at Cadiz, in Spain, during the most disastrous but glorious period of their resistance against French domination, the Government of that country became immensely indebted to him for extensive and various supplies, which were of the last necessity in the then state of public affairs. Your memorialist, whilst soliciting the liquidation of his claims, in the year 1816, was thrown into prison, under the most fraudulent pretexts, and without any shadow of justice, and kept in confinement more than two years. This was one of the many atrocities which ensued upon the destruction of the constitution adopted in the absence of the King, and the re-establishment of absolute despotism at his return; but the history of this proceeding is so well known, from the diplomatic correspondence of the two Governments, and from the communications of the Executive to Congress, and the proceedings of Congress itself on the subject, that it is altogether unnecessary to enlarge upon it here. During his confinement, the exertions of himself and his friends were necessarily directed to the means of procuring his enlargement; and he could therefore give but little attention to his pecuniary demands upon the Government. Immediately upon his enlargement, he again pressed the subject, and was at length given to understand that he might be indemnified by means of a grant of lands in Florida, upon certain conditions. Aware of the pending negotiation for the cession of the Floridas to the United States, and apprehensive of crossing the views of the Government, he wrote to Mr. Adams in June, 1818, and stated to him the proposed grant of lands, and received the answer of Mr. Adams, under date of the 18th September, 1818, which was adverse to the acceptance of the grant, but gave your memorialist to understand that, if a treaty should be concluded, his claims might be provided for. The only provision he ever imagined could be made by treaty was, that the United States might find it convenient to offer Spain, as one of the equivalents for the cession, to relieve her from a most pressing demand, by undertaking to pay it as her guarantee. With that understanding, your memorialist transmitted to the Department of State here a general explanation of the nature of his claims. He also laid a statement of the same before Mr. Erving, the minister of the United States in Spain, and had the benefit of his countenance and assistance in prevailing upon the Spanish Government to put the subject in a train of settlement. Their joint efforts at length prevailed, in the course of the winter of 1818—'19, to have a special junta or commission appointed to audit and settle the claims. That junta could not conveniently go through the extensive details necessary to a complete investigation, till the 30th of September, 1819, when they made a report, couched in the most flattering terms, allowing the claim, and superadding what they conceived to be an adequate compensation for the unjust imprisonment of the memorialist; which report, after undergoing very minute and critical revisions by the various departments of the Government, was fully ratified by the King in the most solemn form; in consequence whereof, a certificate, under the royal seal, was duly expedited by the Minister of Finance, in May, 1820, explicitly acknowledging a debt equal to $491,153 33, and directing the same to be paid out of the Royal Finance Department, with interest at the rate of six per cent.

From the more just and magnanimous administration of public affairs introduced by the new revolution in Spain, which took place after the award of the junta, and before its final ratification by the Government, (that is to say, in the period between September, 1819, and May, 1820,) he conceived sanguine hopes of the immediate payment of a debt so conclusively ascertained and acknowledged by successive, competent, and concurring authorities under both administrations. But the commotions and embarrassments incident to a state of revolution and the exhausted state of the Treasury postponed private claims to affairs of more general and pressing importance. At length, in the month of October, 1820, the Cortes took up the subject of the treaty with the United States, which had been signed eighteen months before; and they, at the same time, took up the petition of your memorialists, presented at the commencement of their session in July, requesting them to provide a fund for the payment of the debt acknowledged by the certificate before mentioned: an inquiry was set on foot whether that debt had not been provided for in the treaty; and that fact being satisfactorily ascertained, your memorialist was referred to the United States for payment. The Cortes decreed the ratification of the treaty, with the clear assurance, perfectly understood as a sine qua non, that the United States should assume and pay the debt; for such was the state of the question at that time, and so earnest and intent were the Cortes upon seeing your memorialist satisfied, that they would not have ratified the treaty but upon the condition of stipulating for the satisfaction of his debt, either by the assumption of the United States, or by retaining an adequate fund out of the Florida lands; and when they were clearly given to understand, from the official report of their Minister of State, confirmed by the American minister at Madrid, that the debt was recognised as comprehended in the treaty, and its justice undisputed, it was not supposed to admit of a possible doubt that the renunciation of the claim, accompanied by an express stipulation to exonerate Spain from it, necessarily made the United States the guarantee, to whom the creditor was to look for payment. From the refusal of the Spanish Government to ratify the treaty, and the consequent rupture of the negotiation, your memorialist had never stopped to inquire whether any provision had been made for liquidating his claim; or, if there was any such provision, whether it was adequate in itself, and consonant to the reciprocal obligations and duties of the parties. He had, therefore, proceeded with his solicitations to the Spanish Government, and accomplished his object to the extent just mentioned, without any regard whatever to the unratified treaty, which had been the subject of such animated discussion. As soon as he was informed of the final resolution of the Spanish Government on the subject, he hastened to give notice of it to the American Government; and to give in a protest to the Spanish minister at Washington, importing that, if the American Government should not recognise the claim in the manner supposed by the Spanish Government, he should still call upon the latter as bound by every legal and moral tie to see to the satisfaction of the debt. Immediately after the arrival of the messenger from Spain with the ratification of that Government, your memorialist sent in a formal memorial to the President, which was communicated to the Senate at the same time the treaty was sent in. He has stated at large in that memorial his reasons for concluding—

1st. That the Government of the United States has no power or authority whatever to cancel or release the debt due from Spain to your memorialist, in any manner, or upon any terms, but the payment of the debt as guarantee of Spain: in other words, that the treaty-making power is utterly incompetent to exert its jurisdiction over the rights of a creditor claiming a pecuniary debt under the circumstances of the one in question, which differed widely and fundamentally from all the incidents, qualities, and relations which may rightfully have subjected other of the renounced claims to the action of the treaty-making power.

2d. That the claim is nevertheless comprehended in the fifth renunciation declared on the part of the United States in the ninth article of the treaty; in virtue of which, connected with the express stipulation in the eleventh article, the United States are absolutely and unconditionally bound to Spain to exonerate her from the debt; for which purpose the United States have received from Spain, and now enjoy, an adequate consideration.

3d. That, by the force and effect of these stipulations, the public faith of the United States is solemnly pledged equally to Spain as the debtor, and to your memorialist as the creditor, to discharge the debt without defalcation or delay; and, consequently, that any attempt to substitute for such payment a contingent, precarious, and long-deferred dividend out of the fund provided for the compensation, pro rata, of the other claims renounced by the treaty, which fund may eventually prove very inadequate to its object, would be not only an arbitrary and illegal usurpation of private property, directly opposed to considerations of cogent equity peculiar to the case of your memorialist, but, by throwing the creditor back upon Spain for indemnity, would be a clear infringement upon the spirit and intent of the treaty as between the two contracting sovereigns.

A copy of the memorial so presented to the President and Senate prior to the ratification of the treaty is hereto annexed; to which reference may be had for a more full and complete exposition of the facts, reasons, and authorities upon which your memorialist maintains the three propositions just stated.

Thus has the treaty been ratified by the President and Senate, and the ratifications been exchanged between the two Governments, after full and fair notice of the nature and extent of your memorialist's claim, and of the grounds upon which it was to be asserted under the treaty; and such ratification has been consummated without making any exception of such claim from the operation of the treaty, as your memorialist requested might be done in case there should be any doubt of his claim being comprehended in the treaty, or of its being entitled to full and immediate compensation, separate and apart from the other claims renounced by the treaty. The unqualified ratification of the treaty, under such circumstances, leaves him no room to doubt the intention to admit the validity of his claim; and he is advised that now, when the bill for carrying the treaty into effect is about to be passed, is the proper time and fit occasion to present his petition to Congress, praying that provision may be made in that bill for paying his claim according to the obligations of good faith contracted by the United States to Spain, under the express stipulations of the treaty, and to your memorialist, by parity of reason and necessary inference.

Your memorialist will be content to receive payment in either of the two modes designated in the eleventh article of the treaty, viz: either in cash, at the Treasury, or in six per cent. stock, redeemable out of the proceeds from the sales of public lands in the Floridas; and he leaves it entirely to the discretion of Congress to decide what portion, if any, of the sum so to be paid him should be deducted from the sum of $5,000,000 to be appropriated for the satisfaction of the other claims.

All which is, with all possible deference and respect, submitted, &c.

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1821.

No. 39.

Extract from the memorial of R. W. Meade to the Commissioners appointed under the eleventh article of the treaty of amity, &c. between the United States and Spain.

That, between two great nations, one of whom is unquestionably liable to your memorialist for the full amount of the said claim, and in opposition to either of whom he has nothing to sustain him but the principles of justice and the obligations of national honor, your memorialist trusts that his reference to either will never be considered by the other as an abandonment of any of his rights. Whatever he may do in the way of soliciting payment, or of preferring his claim, he submits, is the result of a necessity which, as an individual, he has no means to evade or avert; and, therefore, all which he now does or shall hereafter do in this behalf is, and will continue to be, done under an explicit reservation of all his rights up to the time when he shall enter into the full enjoyment of them.

Being instructed by the Government of Spain that his claim is within the provisions of the said treaty; having received no decision or instruction of the American Government that it is not so; and conceiving, if the said claim is so embraced, that the just interpretation of the said treaty, and of the obligations so assumed in consequence thereof by the United States, entitles your memorialist to the full and entire payment of his demands, he accordingly submits the claim to the board of commissioners constituted under the said treaty, and prays to have an opportunity of offering any further evidence that may be required in support thereof.

Your memorialist, by way of explaining more at large the grounds upon which he protests against being concluded, either by the treaty or by any claim which he may set up under the treaty, from asserting or pursuing his original claim, or of adopting either alternative in the assertion and pursuit of it, as against the Government of Spain, or that of the United States, prays that particular reference may be had to his memorial dated on the 8th of February, 1821, addressed to the President of the United States before the final ratification of the treaty, and by the President of the United States laid before the Senate at the same time that the treaty was presented for ratification; also, to his second memorial after the ratification of the treaty, addressed to both Houses of Congress during the last session. From the facts and the reasons advanced in those two memorials, and from such other facts and reasons as he reserves to himself the right of bringing forward hereafter, he hopes to have established the following conclusions beyond doubt or controversy:

1. That the Government of the United States had no power or authority whatever to cancel or release the debt due from Spain to your memorialist, in any manner, or upon any terms, but the payment of the debt as guarantee of Spain; in other words, that the treaty-making power, per se, is utterly incompetent to exert its jurisdiction over the rights of a creditor claiming a mere pecuniary debt, under the circumstances of the debt due from Spain to your memorialist, differing so widely and fundamentally as it does in all the incidents, qualities, and relations which may rightfully have subjected other of the renounced claims to the action of the treaty-making power.

2. That, in default of an original and inherent jurisdiction of the treaty-making power to cancel or release the debt, no authority whatsoever has in fact been supplied by the agency or consent of the creditor, who, in point of fact, has never committed his claim to the management or discretion of the Government any further than to invoke the interposition of the good offices of the American Government in aid of the claims and petitions of the individual creditor; which claims and petitions, in all instances, went the length of demanding full and complete satisfaction, without being at all intermixed with the public negotiations and discussions between the two Governments; so that the entire agency of the American functionaries, as auxiliary to the individual demands and resources of the creditor, was merely gratuitous, and in the ordinary routine of diplomatic comity.

3. That the claim is nevertheless comprehended in the fifth renunciation declared on the part of the United States; in virtue of which, connected with the express stipulation of the eleventh article, the United States are absolutely and unconditionally bound, in consideration of a valuable equivalent received of Spain, to exonerate her from the debt, and, by that means, have interposed a bar to remedies otherwise clear and indisputable, by which the creditor might have secured his debt from the original debtor.

4. That, by the force and effect of these stipulations, the public faith of the United States is solemnly pledged equally to Spain as the debtor, and to your memorialist as the creditor, to discharge the debt without defalcation or delay, and without reference to the stipulated and limited fund provided by the treaty.

With the clear and unfaltering intent of adhering to these principles in the present as in all future assertions of his claim, whether it be advanced against the Government of Spain or against that of the United States, your memorialist prays that you will proceed to investigate the circumstances of his claim, in order that it may be officially decided and promulgated what provision is intended for your memorialist by the treaty; that is to say—

1st. Whether his claim be not clearly comprehended in the list of renunciations declared on the part of the United States in the ninth article of the said treaty.

2dly. Whether, being so comprehended, your memorialist be not clearly entitled to a substantive and full satisfaction of his claim, whatever may be the pro rata allowance to the general mass of claimants, out of the specific fund provided by the said treaty.

R. W. MEADE.

WASHINGTON, January 6, 1822.

[The following reports were made to the Senate and House of Representatives, March 21 and April 22, 1826.]

Mr. CLAYTON, from the select committee to whom was referred the memorial of Richard W. Meade, made the following report:

That, by the fifth clause of the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, by which Florida was ceded to the United States, the Government of the United States renounced to Spain "all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of the treaty."

By the eleventh article of that treaty, the United States undertook to make satisfaction for these claims to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To ascertain the full amount and validity of these claims, it was stipulated that a commission, to consist of three commissioners, should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which commission should meet at the city of Washington, and, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, should receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all claims included within the renunciations of the treaty.

The commissioners were accordingly appointed; and they commenced their sessions in June, 1821, and closed them in June, 1824. Mr. Meade, among others, presented his claims on the Spanish Government to the commissioners for ascertainment and decision. The sum claimed at that time was $491,153 62; and it was conceded that Mr. Meade had presented a statement of his claims on the Spanish Government to the Department of State, and to the minister of the United States in Spain, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, since the date of the convention of 1802, and before the signature of the treaty of 1819; and that, therefore, if he could establish the amount and validity of his claims by "suitable authentic testimony," he came within the fifth clause of the ninth article above recited. Mr. Meade failed, in the opinion of the commissioners, to prove, by sufficient evidence, the amount and validity of his claims, and they were therefore, on the 7th of June, 1824, finally rejected.

Under these circumstances, it is not deemed necessary that the committee should go into an investigation of the claims of Mr. Meade, or inquire whether the evidence adduced to the commissioners was sufficient to establish the validity of his claims, because the commissioners, in the opinion of the committee, were constituted the sole and exclusive judges of that question.

It will be proper to inquire what were the obligations imposed by the treaty on the Government of the United States. It assumed the payment of the claims of its citizens to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To distribute this sum among its citizens proportionate to their respective claims, it undertook to establish a commission, to be composed of three of its citizens, to ascertain, by "suitable authentic testimony," the full amount and validity of these claims; and it may be conceded that a further obligation was imposed on the Government, not, indeed, in terms, but impliedly, to be careful, in appointing persons to form the commission, to select men of known intelligence, integrity, and learning, and, when the claims presented to the commissioners for decision had been adjusted and admitted, to pay them, provided they did not exceed five millions of dollars; and, if they did exceed that sum, to pay them pro rata. All these obligations the Government has performed with the utmost sincerity and good faith.

It will not be pretended that the Government stipulated that the decisions of the commissioners should be infallible; it is enough that the commission was composed of learned and discreet men, whose decisions would be respected in all parts of the world. But it is by no means intended to insinuate that the correctness of the final rejection of Mr. Meade's memorial is questioned, because the committee have not permitted themselves to go into a consideration of that matter. By undertaking to review the proceedings of the commissioners, a wide door would be opened to a flood of claims to an amount which it was not in the contemplation of the Government to pay when it entered into the stipulations of the treaty. A fund of five millions of dollars was provided, to be distributed, by the adjudication of the commissioners, among citizens having valid claims on the Spanish Government. This distribution has been made, and the whole fund is exhausted. The amount of claims exhibited to the commissioners, the committee are informed, exceeded forty millions of dollars; so that, if the proceedings of the board are to be reviewed and investigated anew, as but about five and a half millions of dollars were allowed, claims to the amount of thirty-five millions more are yet to be investigated and provided for. In such a course of proceeding there is no mutuality of advantage between the Government and the claimants; for, if an erroneous decision shall have been made against the Government, there is no possible means by which the injury can be redressed.

It is insisted that the United States, having renounced these claims to the Spanish Government, are under a moral obligation to discharge them all, without regard to the limited sum specified in the treaty. But, without the aid of the Government, these claims on the Spanish nation never could have been enforced. Its aid was invoked; it was extended to them; and the most beneficial terms of compromise were made which could be obtained, without the sacrifice of a much larger sum than prudence would authorize to be given for the ceded territory. Nor should it be forgotten that the sum of five millions was not the only consideration given for the cession of Florida: we, at the same time, surrendered a large and valuable territory lying beyond our present southern limits; and, without this treaty, all the claims would have remained unpaid to a much more distant day than the present; and, if we look to the exhausted state of the Spanish treasury, and its impoverished resources, perhaps that period never would have arrived. Statements of these claims were presented to the Government, soliciting its interposition in their favor, and the consequence was the treaty of 1819, by which the Government assumed the payment of these claims to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. Had the aid of the Government not been asked, the fate of the claimants must have rested altogether upon the honor and justice of the Spanish nation; but the interposition of the Government being required, the claimants were bound to submit either to the fate of war, or to such amicable compromise as could be made in their behalf. And it may be truly said that, in estimating the value of these claims, their nominal amount is not to be looked to only, but the spes recuperandi is the standard by which their just value is to be estimated. The certainty of having a smaller sum paid by this Government would, by a prudent man, be valued higher than the contingent prospect of obtaining a larger sum from Spain.

But a further view of this case, from the facts presented, is required. Mr. Meade's claim was disallowed by the commissioners, because the evidence which he adduced to them was not sufficient to prove the amount or validity of his claim; and it is believed they went so far as to say that it was incompetent evidence, and wholly inadmissible to prove any thing before them. This was a matter of which they, by the treaty, were made the exclusive judges. This opinion was rendered on the 16th of April, 1823; and, on the next day, Mr. Meade filed a specification of the documents which he requested the commissioners to demand of the Spanish Government under the following clause of the eleventh article of the treaty, viz: "And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of the said claims according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of 27th October, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said commissioners;" and on the following day the commissioners requested the Secretary of State to adopt such means as he should think proper to require of the Spanish authorities the documents so specified. On the 13th of May the Secretary of State instructed Mr. Nelson, who was then about to depart this country as minister to Spain, to demand the specified documents from the Spanish Government. These documents were accordingly demanded; but, owing to the distracted situation of the country, being then recently overrun by French troops, the documents were not obtained so as to enable Mr. Meade to lay further proof before the board before the termination of the commission: nor has the demand of our Government for these proofs yet been complied with. The consequence has been, that the commissioners, adhering to their decision of the 16th of April, 1823, and no further proof being presented to them, on the 7th of June, the day previous to the close of their session, finally rejected the claim. This statement is made to show that no negligence is imputable to the Government of the United States in performing its duty under the treaty to demand the desired documents, for the earliest opportunity was taken by the Secretary of State to instruct our minister to make the demand; and, if there has been a failure of duty anywhere, it is attributable to Spain. That Government engaged to furnish the documents when demanded, and it has not furnished them. If, therefore, a fair claim (about which the committee express no opinion) has been lost through the fault of the Spanish authorities, who ought to make good that loss—Spain, or the United States, to whom no blame or negligence can be imputed?

Every suitor prepares his own cause for the hearing. He comes to it, if unprepared, at his peril. It is not the duty of the tribunal which is to decide his cause to instruct him beforehand as to the nature of the evidence which it will require to sustain his case; that is the duty of others; and if he is erroneously advised, it is his misfortune. The documents which it is alleged are to be found in the Spanish archives, and which it is contended would sustain Mr. Meade's claim, were not specified to the commissioners until the 17th of April, 1823, when nearly two-thirds of the time limited for the duration of the board had expired. Had the specification of the documents been made at the commencement of the session, as Spain was at that time, and for a long time after, free from invasion, the probability is that all the documents relating to the claim might have been procured in season to have enabled the commissioners to judge whether they would sustain the claim, or any part of it. That these documents were not earlier demanded was not the fault of any agent of the Government. The commissioners, after having decided the cause against Mr. Meade upon the evidence on which he relied, indulged him to the last moment to enable him to produce further proof; and, upon his failing to do so, they finally dismissed his memorial. The committee therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialist ought not to be granted.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee of Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Richard W. Meade, made the following report:

That the petitioner was a claimant to a portion of the five million fund provided by the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, between the United States and Spain; that the commissioners appointed to carry into effect the eleventh article of that treaty rejected his claim on the last day of their session.

The committee consider that the decision of the commissioners, forming a tribunal of limited and specified jurisdiction under a treaty, ought to be considered conclusive, and would recommend that the whole subject of claims of citizens of the United States on Spain prior to 1819 should be deemed settled; but the petitioner alleges that his claim has not been, and could not be, fairly examined by the commissioners, for the want of sundry papers in the hands of the Spanish Government, which they were bound to furnish; which were, at his instance, duly demanded; were not furnished prior to the day fixed by the treaty for the termination of the commission, and the final decision on all claims presented to it; indeed, not yet furnished by the Government of Spain. The evidence laid before the committee shows that the commissioners deemed the claim of Richard W. Meade embraced by the treaty; that, at his instance, a demand was made on Spain for the evidences deemed by them necessary to a fair examination of it; that this demand was not made on Spain, owing to unforeseen occurrences, until a short time previous to the termination of the commission, although the application for them by Meade had been made fourteen months prior to that time.

Under these circumstances, the committee believe that provision ought to be made for the petitioner; that he should not suffer by the delay to furnish evidence in the hands of Spain that we have demanded, and she was bound to furnish. They therefore report a bill to give him the means of establishing his claim in the same manner as if the board of commissioners still existed.

As it is known to the committee that there are several other claimants in the same situation as the petitioner, they present a bill embracing all cases of a similar kind. They deem it, however, proper to state to the House that, as the five million fund provided by the treaty has been distributed among the claimants whose claims were allowed by the commissioners, the amount now proposed to be paid will be in addition to that sum. In all cases where the delay to furnish evidence can be attributed to Spain, there has been a violation on her part of the provisions of the treaty, for which she is, and should be held, answerable to the United States. The committee think that this question of liability, and its extent, should not be further touched until the facts are clearly ascertained, and the money paid by the United States.

17th CONGRESS.] No. 323. [1st SESSION.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SEVENTEENTH CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 5, 1821.

WASHINGTON, December 3, 1821.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The progress of our affairs since the last session has been such as may justly be claimed and expected under a Government deriving all its powers from an enlightened people, and under laws formed by their representatives, on great consideration, for the sole purpose of promoting the welfare and happiness of their constituents. In the execution of those laws, and of the powers vested by the constitution in the Executive, unremitted attention has been paid to the great objects to which they extend. In the concerns which are exclusively internal, there is good cause to be satisfied with the result. The laws have had their due operation and effect. In those relating to foreign Powers, I am happy to state that peace and amity are preserved with all by a strict observance, on both sides, of the rights of each. In matters touching our commercial intercourse, where a difference of opinion has existed as to the conditions on which it should be placed, each party has pursued its own policy, without giving just cause of offence to the other. In this annual communication, especially when it is addressed to a new Congress, the whole scope of our political concerns naturally comes into view, that errors, if such have been committed, may be corrected; that defects, which have become manifest, may be remedied; and, on the other hand, that measures which were adopted on due deliberation, and which experience has shown are just in themselves, and essential to the public welfare, should be persevered in and supported. In performing this necessary and very important duty, I shall endeavor to place before you, on its merits, every subject that is thought to be entitled to your particular attention, in as distinct and clear a light as I may be able.

By an act of the 3d of March, 1815, so much of the several acts as imposed higher duties on the tonnage of foreign vessels, and on the manufactures and productions of foreign nations when imported into the United States in foreign vessels, than when imported in vessels of the United States, was repealed so far as respected the manufactures and productions of the nation to which such vessel belonged, on the condition that the repeal should take effect only in favor of any foreign nation when the Executive should be satisfied that such discriminating duties, to the disadvantage of the United States, had likewise been repealed by such nation. By this act a proposition was made to all nations to place our commerce with each on a basis which it was presumed would be acceptable to all. Every nation was allowed to bring its manufactures and productions into our ports, and to take the manufactures and productions of the United States back to their ports in their own vessels, on the same conditions that they might be transported in vessels of the United States; and, in return, it was required that a like accommodation should be granted to the vessels of the United States in the ports of other Powers. The articles to be admitted or prohibited on either side formed no part of the proposed arrangement. Each party would retain the right to admit or prohibit such articles from the other as it thought proper, and on its own conditions.

When the nature of the commerce between the United States and every other country was taken into view, it was thought that this proposition would be considered fair, and even liberal, by every Power. The exports of the United States consist generally of articles of the first necessity, and of rude materials in demand for foreign manufactories, of great bulk, requiring for their transportation many vessels, the return for which in the manufactures and productions of any foreign country, even when disposed of there to advantage, may be brought in a single vessel. This observation is the more especially applicable to those countries from which manufactures alone are imported, but it applies, in a great extent, to the European dominions of every European Power, and, in a certain extent, to all the colonies of those Powers. By placing, then, the navigation precisely on the same ground in the transportation of exports and imports between the United States and other countries, it was presumed that all was offered which could be desired. It seemed to be the only proposition which could be devised which would retain even the semblance of equality in our favor.

Many considerations of great weight give us a right to expect that this commerce should be extended to the colonies as well as to the European dominions of other Powers. With the latter, especially with countries exclusively manufacturing, the advantage was manifestly on their side. An indemnity for that loss was expected from a trade with the colonies, and with the greater reason as it was known that the supplies which the colonies derived from us were of the highest importance to them, their labor being bestowed with so much greater profit in the culture of other articles; and because, likewise, the articles of which those supplies consisted, forming so large a proportion of the exports of the United States, were never admitted into any of the ports of Europe except in cases of great emergency to avert a serious calamity. When no article is admitted which is not required to supply the wants of the party admitting it, and admitted then, not in favor of any particular country, to the disadvantage of others, but on conditions equally applicable to all, it seems just that the articles thus admitted and invited should be carried thither in the vessels of the country affording such supply, and that the reciprocity should be found in a corresponding accommodation on the other side. By allowing each party to participate in the transportation of such supplies, on the payment of equal tonnage, a strong proof was afforded of an accommodating spirit. To abandon to it the transportation of the whole, would be a sacrifice which ought not to be expected. The demand in the present instance would be the more unreasonable in consideration of the great inequality existing in the trade with the parent country.

Such was the basis of our system, as established by the act of 1815, and such its true character. In the year in which this act was passed, a treaty was concluded with Great Britain, in strict conformity with its principles, in regard to her European dominions. To her colonies, however, in the West Indies and on this continent, it was not extended; the British Government claiming the exclusive supply of those colonies, and from our own ports, and of the productions of the colonies in return, in her own vessels. To this claim the United States could not assent, and, in consequence, each party suspended the intercourse in the vessels of the other, by a prohibition, which still exists.

The same conditions were offered to France, but not accepted. Her Government has demanded other conditions more favorable to her navigation, and which should also give extraordinary encouragement to her manufactures and productions in ports of the United States. To these it was thought improper to accede, and, in consequence, the restrictive regulations which had been adopted on her part being countervailed on the part of the United States, the direct commerce between the two countries in the vessels of each party has been in a great measure suspended. It is much to be regretted that, although a negotiation has been long pending, such is the diversity of views entertained on the various points which have been brought into discussion, that there does not appear to be any reasonable prospect of its early conclusion.

It is my duty to state, as a cause of very great regret, that very serious differences have occurred in this negotiation respecting the construction of the eighth article of the treaty of 1803, by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, and likewise respecting the seizure of the Apollo, in 1820, for a violation of our revenue laws. The claim of the Government of France has excited not less surprise than concern, because there does not appear to be a just foundation for it in either instance. By the eighth article of the treaty referred to, it is stipulated that, after the expiration of twelve years, during which time it was provided, by the seventh or preceding article, that the vessels of France and Spain should be admitted into the ports of the ceded territory without paying higher duties on merchandise, or tonnage on the vessels, than such as were paid by citizens of the United States, the ships of France should forever afterwards be placed on the footing of the most favored nation. By the obvious construction of this article, it is presumed that it was intended that no favor should be granted to any Power in those ports to which France should not be forthwith entitled, nor should any accommodation be allowed to another Power on conditions to which she would not also be entitled on the same conditions. Under this construction, no favor or accommodation could be granted to any Power to the prejudice of France. By allowing the equivalent allowed by those Powers, she would always stand in those ports on the footing of the most favored nation. But if this article should be so construed as that France should enjoy of right, and without paying the equivalent, all the advantages of such conditions as might be allowed to other Powers in return for important concessions made by them, then the whole character of the stipulation would be changed. She would not be placed on the footing of the most favored nation, but on a footing held by no other nation. She would enjoy all advantages allowed to them in consideration of like advantages allowed to us, free from every and any condition whatever.

As little cause has the Government of France to complain of the seizure of the Apollo, and the removal of other vessels from the waters of the St. Mary's. It will not be denied that every nation has a right to regulate its commercial system as it thinks fit, and to enforce the collection of its revenue, provided it be done without an invasion of the rights of other Powers. The violation of its revenue laws is an offence which all nations punish; the punishment of which gives no just cause of complaint to the Power to which the offenders belong, provided it be extended to all equally. In this case, every circumstance which occurred indicated a fixed purpose to violate our revenue laws. Had the party intended to pursue a fair trade, he would have entered our ports and paid the duties; or, had he intended to carry on a legitimate circuitous commerce with the United States, he would have entered the port of some other Power, landed his goods at the custom-house according to law, and reshipped and sent them in the vessel of such Power, or of some other Power which might lawfully bring them, free from such duties, to a port of the United States. But the conduct of the party in this case was altogether different. He entered the river St. Mary's, the boundary line between the United States and Florida, and took his position on the Spanish side, on which, in the whole extent of the river, there was no town, no port, or custom-house, and scarcely any settlement. His purpose, therefore, was not to sell his goods to the inhabitants of Florida, but to citizens of the United States, in exchange for their productions, which could not be done without a direct and palpable breach of our laws. It is known that a regular systematic plan had been formed by certain persons for the violation of our revenue system, which made it the more necessary to check the proceeding in its commencement.

That the unsettled bank of a river so remote from the Spanish garrisons and population could give no protection to any party in such practice is believed to be in strict accord with the law of nations. It would not have comported with a friendly policy in Spain herself to have established a custom-house there, since it could have subserved no other purpose than to elude our revenue law. But the Government of Spain did not adopt that measure; on the contrary, it is understood that the Captain General of Cuba, to whom an application to that effect was made by these adventurers, had not acceded to it. The condition of those provinces for many years before they were ceded to the United States need not now be dwelt on. Inhabited by different tribes of Indians, and an inroad for every kind of adventurer, the jurisdiction of Spain may be said to have been almost exclusively confined to her garrisons. It certainly could not extend to places where she had no authority. The rules, therefore, applicable to settled countries governed by laws, could not be deemed so to the deserts of Florida, and to the occurrences there. It merits attention, also, that the territory had then been ceded to the United States by a treaty, the ratification of which had not been refused, and which has since been performed. Under any circumstances, therefore, Spain became less responsible for such acts committed there, and the United States more at liberty to exercise authority to prevent so great a mischief. The conduct of this Government has, in every instance, been conciliatory and friendly to France. The construction of our revenue law, in its application to the cases which have formed the ground of such serious complaint on her part, and the order to the collector of St. Mary's, in accord with it, were given two years before these cases occurred, and in reference to a breach which was attempted by the subjects of another Power. The application, therefore, to the cases in question was inevitable. As soon as the treaty by which these provinces were ceded to the United States was ratified, and all danger of further breach of our revenue laws ceased, an order was given for the release of the vessel which had been seized, and for the dismission of the libel which had been instituted against her.

The principles of this system of reciprocity, founded on the law of the 3d of March, 1815, have been since carried into effect with the kingdoms of the Netherlands, Sweden, Prussia, and with Hamburgh, Bremen, Lubec, and Oldenburg, with a provision made by subsequent laws in regard to the Netherlands, Prussia, Hamburgh, and Bremen, that such produce and manufactures as could only be, or most usually were, first shipped from the ports of those countries, the same being imported in vessels wholly belonging to their subjects, should be considered and admitted as their own manufactures and productions.

The Government of Norway has, by an ordinance, opened the ports of that part of the dominions of the King of Sweden to the vessels of the United States upon the payment of no other or higher duties than are paid by Norwegian vessels, from whatever place arriving, and with whatever articles laden. They have requested the reciprocal allowance for the vessels of Norway in the ports of the United States. As this privilege is not within the scope of the act of the 3d of March, 1815, and can only be granted by Congress, and as it may involve the commercial relations of the United States with other nations, the subject is submitted to the wisdom of Congress.

I have presented thus fully to your view our commercial relations with other Powers, that, seeing them in detail with each Power, and knowing the basis on which they rest, Congress may in its wisdom decide whether any change ought to be made, and, if any, in what respect. If this basis is unjust or unreasonable, surely it ought to be abandoned; but if it be just and reasonable, and any change in it will make concessions subversive of equality, and tending in its consequences to sap the foundations of our prosperity, then the reasons are equally strong for adhering to the ground already taken, and supporting it by such further regulations as may appear to be proper, should any additional support be found necessary.

The question concerning the construction of the first article of the treaty of Ghent has been, by a joint act of the representatives of the United States and of Great Britain at the court of St. Petersburg, submitted to the decision of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia. The result of that submission has not yet been received. The commissioners under the fifth article of that treaty not having been able to agree upon their decision, their reports to the two Governments, according to the provisions of the treaty, may be expected at an early day.

With Spain, the treaty of February 22, 1819, has been partly carried into execution. Possession of East and West Florida has been given to the United States, but the officers charged with that service by an order from His Catholic Majesty, delivered by his minister to the Secretary of State, and transmitted by a special agent to the Captain General of Cuba, to whom it was directed, and in whom the government of those provinces was vested, have not only omitted, in contravention of the order of their sovereign, the performance of the express stipulation to deliver over the archives and documents relating to the property and sovereignty of those provinces, all of which it was expected would have been delivered either before or when the troops were withdrawn, but defeated since every effort of the United States to obtain them, especially those of the greatest importance. This omission has given rise to several incidents of a painful nature, the character of which will be fully disclosed by the documents which will be hereafter communicated.

In every other circumstance, the law of the 3d of March last, for carrying into effect that treaty, has been duly attended to. For the execution of that part which preserved in force, for the government of the inhabitants, for the term specified, all the civil, military, and judicial powers exercised by the existing Government of those provinces, an adequate number of officers, as was presumed, were appointed, and ordered to their respective stations. Both provinces were formed into one territory, and a governor appointed for it; but, in consideration of the pre-existing division, and of the distance and difficulty of communication between Pensacola, the residence of the Governor of West Florida, and St. Augustine, that of the Governor of East Florida, at which places the inconsiderable population of each province was principally collected, two secretaries were appointed—the one to reside at Pensacola, and the other at St. Augustine. Due attention was likewise paid to the execution of the laws of the United States relating to the revenue and the slave trade, which were extended to these provinces. The whole territory was divided into three collection districts—that part lying between the river St. Mary's and Cape Florida forming one, that from the cape to the Appalachicola another, and that from the Appalachicola to the Perdido the third. To these districts the usual number of revenue officers were appointed; and, to secure the due operation of these laws, one judge and a district attorney were appointed to reside at Pensacola, and likewise one judge and a district attorney to reside at St. Augustine, with a specified boundary between them; and one marshal for the whole, with authority to appoint a deputy. In carrying this law into effect, and especially that part relating to the powers of the existing Government of those provinces, it was thought important, in consideration of the short term for which it was to operate, and the radical change which would be made at the approaching session of Congress, to avoid expense; to make no appointment which should not be absolutely necessary to give effect to those powers; to withdraw none of our citizens from their pursuits, whereby to subject the Government to claims which could not be gratified, and the parties to losses which it would be painful to witness.

It has been seen with much concern that, in the performance of these duties, a collision arose between the governor of the territory and the judge appointed for the western district. It was presumed that the law under which this transitory Government was organized, and the commissions which were granted to the officers who were appointed to execute each branch of the system, and to which the commissions were adapted, would have been understood in the same sense by them in which they were understood by the Executive. Much allowance is due to officers employed in each branch of this system, and the more so as there is good cause to believe that each acted under the conviction that he possessed the power which he undertook to exercise. Of the officer holding the principal station, I think it proper to observe that he accepted it with reluctance, in compliance with the invitation given him, and from a high sense of duty to his country, being willing to contribute to the consummation of an event which would insure complete protection to an important part of our Union which had suffered much from incursion and invasion, and to the defence of which his very gallant and patriotic services had been so signally and usefully devoted.

From the intrinsic difficulty of executing laws deriving their origin from different sources, and so essentially different in many important circumstances, the advantage, and, indeed, the necessity of establishing, as soon as may be practicable, a well-organized Government over that territory, on the principles of our system, is apparent. This subject is, therefore, recommended to the early consideration of Congress.

In compliance with an injunction of the law of the 3d of March last, three commissioners have also been appointed, and a board organized for carrying into effect the eleventh article of the treaty above recited, making provision for the payment of such of our citizens as have well-founded claims on Spain, of the character specified by that treaty. This board has entered on its duties, and made some progress therein. The commissioner and surveyor of His Catholic Majesty, provided for by the fourth article of the treaty, have not yet arrived in the United States, but are soon expected. As soon as they do arrive, corresponding appointments will be made, and every facility be afforded for the due execution of this service.

The Government of His Most Faithful Majesty, since the termination of the last session of Congress, has been removed from Rio de Janeiro to Lisbon, where a revolution, similar to that which had occurred in the neighboring kingdom of Spain, had, in like manner, been sanctioned by the accepted and pledged faith of the reigning monarch. The diplomatic intercourse between the United States and the Portuguese dominions, interrupted by this important event, has not yet been resumed; but the change of internal administration having already materially affected the commercial intercourse of the United States with the Portuguese dominions, the renewal of the public missions between the two countries appears to be desirable at an early day.

It is understood that the colonies in South America have had great success during the present year in the struggle for their independence. The new Government of Colombia has extended its territories, and considerably augmented its strength; and at Buenos Ayres, where civil dissensions had for some time before prevailed, greater harmony and better order appear to have been established. Equal success has attended their efforts in the provinces on the Pacific. It has long been manifest that it would be impossible for Spain to reduce these colonies by force, and equally so that no conditions short of their independence would be satisfactory to them. It may, therefore, be presumed, and it is earnestly hoped, that the Government of Spain, guided by enlightened and liberal counsels, will find it to comport with its interests, and due to its magnanimity, to terminate this exhausting controversy on that basis. To promote this result, by friendly counsel with the Government of Spain, will be the object of the Government of the United States.

In conducting the fiscal operations of the year, it has been found necessary to carry into full effect the act of the last session of Congress authorizing a loan of five millions of dollars. This sum has been raised at an average premium of five dollars fifty-nine hundredths per centum, upon stock bearing an interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, redeemable at the option of the Government after the 1st day of January, 1835.

There has been issued, under the provisions of this act, four million seven hundred and thirty-five thousand two hundred and ninety-six dollars and thirty cents of five per cent. stock; and there has been, or will be, redeemed during the year, three million one hundred and ninety-seven thousand thirty dollars and seventy-one cents of Louisiana six per cent. deferred stock and Mississippi stock. There has, therefore, been an actual increase of the public debt, contracted during the year, of one million five hundred and thirty-eight thousand two hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-nine cents.

The receipts into the Treasury from the 1st of January to the 30th of September last have amounted to sixteen million two hundred and nineteen thousand one hundred and ninety-seven dollars and seventy cents, which, with the balance of one million one hundred and ninety-eight thousand four hundred and sixty-one dollars and twenty-one cents in the Treasury on the former day, make the aggregate sum of seventeen million four hundred and seventeen thousand six hundred and fifty-eight dollars and ninety-one cents.

The payments from the Treasury during the same period have amounted to fifteen million six hundred and fifty-five thousand two hundred and eighty-eight dollars and forty-seven cents, leaving in the Treasury on the last mentioned day the sum of one million seven hundred and sixty-two thousand three hundred and seventy dollars and forty-four cents. It is estimated that the receipts of the fourth quarter of the year will exceed the demands which will be made on the Treasury during the same period, and that the amount in the Treasury on the 30th of September last will be increased on the 1st day of January next.

At the close of the last session it was anticipated that the progressive diminution of the public revenue in 1819 and 1820, which had been the result of the languid state of our foreign commerce in those years, had, in the latter year, reached its extreme point of depression. It has, however, been ascertained that that point was reached only at the termination of the first quarter of the present year. From that time until the 30th of September last, the duties secured have exceeded those of the corresponding quarters of the last year one million one hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars; whilst the amount of debentures issued during the first three quarters of this year is nine hundred and fifty-two thousand dollars less than that of the same quarters of the last year.

There are just grounds to believe that the improvement which has occurred in the revenue during the last mentioned period will not only be maintained, but that it will progressively increase through the next and several succeeding years, so as to realize the results which were presented upon that subject by the official reports of the Treasury at the commencement of the last session of Congress.

Under the influence of the most unfavorable circumstances, the revenue for the next and subsequent years, to the year 1825, will exceed the demands at present authorized by law.

It may fairly be presumed that, under the protection given to domestic manufactures by the existing laws, we shall become, at no distant period, a manufacturing country on an extensive scale. Possessing, as we do, the raw materials in such vast amount, with a capacity to augment them to an indefinite extent; raising within the country aliment of every kind to an amount far exceeding the demand for home consumption, even in the most unfavorable years, and to be obtained always at a very moderate price; skilled, also, as our people are in the mechanic arts, and in every improvement calculated to lessen the demand for and the price of labor, it is manifest that their success in every branch of domestic industry may and will be carried, under the encouragement given by the present duties, to an extent to meet any demand which, under a fair competition, may be made upon it.

A considerable increase of domestic manufactures, by diminishing the importation of foreign, will probably tend to lessen the amount of the public revenue. As, however, a large proportion of the revenue which is derived from duties is raised from other articles than manufactures, the demand for which will increase with our population, it is believed that a fund will still be raised from that source adequate to the greater part of the public expenditures, especially as those expenditures, should we continue to be blessed with peace, will be diminished by the completion of the fortifications, dock-yards, and other public works, by the augmentation of the navy to the point to which it is proposed to carry it, and by the payment of the public debt, including pensions for military services.

It cannot be doubted that the more complete our internal resources, and the less dependant we are on foreign Powers for every national as well as domestic purpose, the greater and more stable will be the public felicity. By the increase of domestic manufactures will the demand for the rude materials at home be increased, and thus will the dependance of the several parts of our Union on each other, and the strength of the Union itself, be proportionably augmented. In this process, which is very desirable, and inevitable under the existing duties, the resources which obviously present themselves to supply a deficiency in the revenue, should it occur, are the interests which may derive the principal benefit from the change. If domestic manufactures are raised by duties on foreign, the deficiency in the fund necessary for public purposes should be supplied by duties on the former. At the last session it seemed doubtful whether the revenue derived from the present sources would be adequate to all the great purposes of our Union, including the construction of our fortifications, the augmentation of the navy, and the protection of our commerce against the dangers to which it is exposed. Had the deficiency been such as to subject us to the necessity either to abandon those measures of defence, or to resort to other means for adequate funds, the course presented to the adoption of a virtuous and enlightened people appeared to be a plain one. It must be gratifying to all to know that this necessity does not exist. Nothing, however, in contemplation of such important objects, which can be easily provided for, should be left to hazard. It is thought that the revenue may receive an augmentation from the existing sources, and in a manner to aid our manufactures, without hastening prematurely the result which has been suggested. It is believed that a moderate additional duty on certain articles would have that effect, without being liable to any serious objection.

The examination of the whole coast, for the construction of permanent fortifications, from St. Croix to the Sabine, with the exception of part of the territory lately acquired, will be completed in the present year, as will be the survey of the Mississippi, under the resolution of the House of Representatives, from the mouth of the Ohio to the ocean, and likewise of the Ohio, from Louisville to the Mississippi. A progress, corresponding with the sums appropriated, has also been made in the construction of these fortifications at the points designated. As they will form a system of defence for the whole maritime frontier, and, in consequence, for the interior, and are to last for ages, the greatest care has been taken to fix the position of each work, and to form it on such a scale as will be adequate to the purpose intended by it. All the inlets and assailable parts of our Union have been minutely examined, and positions taken, with a view to the best effect, observing, in every instance, a just regard for economy. Doubts, however, being entertained as to the propriety of the position and extent of the work at Dauphin island, further progress in it was suspended soon after the last session of Congress, and an order given to the board of engineers and naval commissioners to make a further and more minute examination of it, in both respects, and to report the result without delay.

Due progress has been made in the construction of vessels of war, according to the law providing for the gradual augmentation of the navy, and to the extent of existing appropriations. The vessels authorized by the act of 1820 have all been completed, and are now in actual service. None of the larger ships have been, or will be, launched for the present, the object being to protect all which may not be required for immediate service from decay, by suitable buildings erected over them. A squadron has been maintained as heretofore in the Mediterranean, by means whereof peace has been preserved with the Barbary Powers. This squadron has been reduced the present year to as small a force as is compatible with the fulfilment of the object intended by it. From past experience, and the best information respecting the views of those Powers, it is distinctly understood that, should our squadron be withdrawn, they would soon recommence their hostilities and depredations upon our commerce. Their fortifications have lately been rebuilt, and their maritime force increased. It has also been found necessary to maintain a naval force on the Pacific, for the protection of the very important interests of our citizens engaged in commerce and the fisheries in that sea. Vessels have likewise been employed in cruising along the Atlantic coast, in the Gulf of Mexico, on the coast of Africa, and in the neighboring seas. In the latter, many piracies have been committed on our commerce; and so extensive was becoming the range of those unprincipled adventurers, that there was cause to apprehend, without a timely and decisive effort to suppress them, the worst consequences would ensue. Fortunately, a considerable check has been given to that spirit by our cruisers, who have succeeded in capturing and destroying several of their vessels. Nevertheless, it is considered an object of high importance to continue these cruises until the practice is entirely suppressed. Like success has attended our efforts to suppress the slave trade. Under the flag of the United States, and the sanction of their papers, the trade may be considered as entirely suppressed; and if any of our citizens are engaged in it, under the flag and papers of other Powers, it is only from a respect to the rights of those Powers that these offenders are not seized and brought home to receive the punishment which the laws inflict. If every other Power should adopt the same policy, and pursue the same vigorous means for carrying it into effect, the trade could no longer exist.

Deeply impressed with the blessings which we enjoy, and of which we have such manifold proofs, my mind is irresistibly drawn to that Almighty Being, the great source from whence they proceed, and to whom our most grateful acknowledgments are due.

17th CONGRESS.] No. 324. [1st SESSION.

SPAIN: DELIVERY OF THE FLORIDAS.

COMMUNICATED WITH THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE, DECEMBER 5, 1821.

Instructions to Colonel James G. Forbes.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 10, 1821.

The President of the United States having occasion to employ a person to take to the Spanish Governor General of the island of Cuba the order from his Government for the delivery of the provinces of East and West Florida to the commissioners or officers of the United States duly appointed to receive them, has selected you as the agent for that purpose, and a certificate to that effect from this Department will be delivered to you with this letter.

You will forthwith repair to New York, and there take passage in the United States sloop of war Hornet, Captain Read, who will be instructed to receive you, and to proceed as soon as possible to the Havana. The order to the Governor General of Cuba, together with a letter from the Spanish minister, General Vives, to him, is committed to you, and you will deliver it to him in person upon your arrival. You will urge the immediate execution of it, and will offer to take charge yourself of the governor general's order to the Governor of West Florida. Should he prefer to transmit this by an officer of his own appointment, Captain Read will be authorized to give him a passage with you in the ship to Pensacola. You will also concert with him the means of transmitting the order for the delivery of the province of East Florida to the Governor at St. Augustine. It has been represented that the archives and public documents stipulated to be delivered up by the treaty are at the Havana, and, if so, you will require that they should be delivered to you, and take them with you in the ship to Pensacola, where you will keep them in safe custody till the arrival of Major General Andrew Jackson, who is appointed governor of the whole of the territories ceded, and to whom you will deliver them over or to his order, taking a suitable receipt or receipts for them, by duplicates, one of which you will transmit to this Department. On arriving at Pensacola, and communicating to the governor the order from the Governor of Cuba, you will immediately give notice, by express, to General Jackson, who will be at Montpelier, in the vicinity of that place, that he may repair to it to receive possession; and you will then remain at Pensacola, giving information to this Department through the nearest mail (believed to be at Blakely) of your proceedings. You will also communicate to this Department any information relating to the country which it may be useful for us to possess, and wait for such instructions as may be transmitted to you till the accomplishment of the objects of your mission.

Your compensation will be at the rate of eight dollars a day from the time of your departure from this place till your arrival at Pensacola; all your expenses on the passage are to be at your own charge; and from the time of your arrival at Pensacola the allowance will be six dollars a day till you receive notice that it is to cease. If you then conclude to return to New York, the allowance will be continued for a reasonable time, to admit of your return.

The papers herewith furnished you are—

1. A certificate of your appointment.
2. A commission authorizing you to demand and receive the archives.
3. The order to the Governor and Captain General of Cuba, with a letter to him from the Spanish minister here.
4. Six copies of the treaty, with the ratifications, to be used as you may find convenient.
5. A copy of the order to the Governor of Cuba.
6. A copy of the act of Congress for carrying the treaty into execution.

It is proper to apprize you that if, by any accident, you should be prevented from executing the service herewith assigned to you, Mr. G. L. Thompson has a commission for performing it in your stead.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

JAMES G. FORBES, Esq.

Certificate of appointment to Colonel Forbes.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas, by the second article of the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, concluded at Washington, on the 22d day of February, 1819, between these United States and His Catholic Majesty, it is stipulated as follows: "His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Florida, the adjacent islands dependant on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property; archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them:"

And whereas the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his said Catholic Majesty at this place has delivered, to be transmitted to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba, his said Majesty's royal order for the due execution of the said stipulation:

Now, therefore, I do hereby authorize and appoint James G. Forbes, a citizen of the United States, as agent and commissary of the United States, to deliver to the said captain general and governor the royal order aforesaid; to arrange and concert with him, conformably to the instructions herewith committed to the said James G. Forbes, the execution of the said stipulations, and to receive from the said captain general and governor, and from any and every person who may be possessed of the said archives and documents, all and every one of the same, and to dispose thereof in the manner prescribed by his instructions. And I do hereby request the said captain general and governor, and any and every person who may be in possession of any such archives and documents, duly authorized by or under the authority of His Catholic Majesty's Government, or otherwise, to deliver up the same to the said James G. Forbes, conformably to the above-recited stipulation of the said treaty. And a copy of this letter patent, certified by the said James G. Forbes, together with his receipt for the said archives and documents, shall be full and satisfactory proof of the fulfilment of the said stipulation, with respect to the archives and documents so by him received.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the said United States, at Washington, this 14th day of March, 1821, [L. S.] and in the forty-fifth year of the independence of the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Special commission to Colonel Forbes.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to James G. Forbes, of the State of New York, greeting:

Whereas, by the second article of the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, concluded at Washington, on the 22d day of February, 1819, between these United States and His Catholic Majesty, it is stipulated as follows: "His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Florida, the adjacent islands dependant on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property; archives and documents, which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them:"

Now, therefore, I do hereby authorize and appoint you, as commissary of the United States, to receive from any and every person, who may be possessed of the said archives and documents, all and every one of the same; and the said archives and documents to keep in safe custody until further order for the disposal of the same shall be taken.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the said United States, at Washington, this 14th day of March, 1821, [L. S.] and in the forty-fifth year of the independence of the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Translation of the royal order of the King of Spain to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba, and of the Floridas.

FERDINAND THE SEVENTH, by the grace of God, and by the constitution of the Spanish monarchy, King of the Spains, to you, the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba, and of the Floridas.

Know you, that, by a treaty concluded in the city of Washington, on the twenty-second of February of the last year, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, by plenipotentiaries duly authorized for the purpose of arranging the differences which have existed between the Government of Spain and that of the United States of America, and the limits of their respective territories, there was stipulated, on the part of Spain, the cession to the United States of all the country situated east of the Mississippi known by the name of East and West Florida; the adjacent islands dependant upon the two Floridas being comprehended in said cession, together with all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, with the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces: it being provided, at the same time, that the inhabitants of the territories so ceded shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restriction; and that all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, in order that they may better effect their purpose, without being subject in either case to duties; and that those who prefer remaining in the Floridas shall be admitted, as soon as possible, to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States: it being added, by another article of the same treaty, that the Spanish officers and troops shall evacuate the said territories ceded to the United States, six months after the exchange of the ratification of the same treaty, or sooner if possible, and shall give possession of them to the officers or commissioners of the United States duly authorized to receive them; and that the United States shall provide the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana. And I, having considered and examined the tenor of the articles of the treaty, after having obtained the consent and authority of the General Cortes of the nation with respect to the said cession, have thought proper to approve and ratify the treaty referred to, the ratification of which must be exchanged at Washington, with that which was formed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the same; after which exchange, the said treaty will begin to be obligatory on both Governments and their respective citizens: therefore, I command you, and ordain that, after the information, which shall be seasonably given you by my minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary at Washington, of the ratifications having been exchanged, you proceed, on your part, to make the proper dispositions, in order that, at the end of six months, counting from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible, the Spanish officers and troops may evacuate the territories of both Floridas, and that possession of them be given to the officers or commissioners of the United States duly authorized to receive them; in the understanding that the United States shall provide the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana. You shall arrange, in proper time, the delivery of the islands adjacent and dependant upon the two Floridas, and the public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, as also the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of the same two provinces, by placing them at the disposal of the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them; and all the other papers, and the effects which belong to the nation, and which have not been comprehended and mentioned in the expressed clauses of the cession, you shall have conveyed and transported to another part of the Spanish possessions which may be most convenient for the public service; as, also, you shall take care that, previous to the delivery, it may be made known, by edicts, to all the present inhabitants of the Floridas, that they have power to remove to the Spanish territories and dominions, the sale or exportation of their effects being permitted to them by the United States at any time whatever, without being subject to duties; and, also, the advantages stipulated in favor of those who shall prefer to remain in the Floridas, to whom I have wished to give this last proof of the protection and affection which they have always experienced under the Spanish Government. Of the delivery which you may make, or may be made by your delegation in the form which has been expressed, you shall make, or cause to be made, a corresponding receipt, duly authenticated, for your discharge; and, in order that you may proceed with entire knowledge in the execution of this commission, there shall be likewise sent to you, by my minister plenipotentiary at Washington, an authentic copy of the treaty referred to, of the twenty-second of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, with the insertion of the ratifications of both parties, and of the certificate relative to the exchange of the same: of which documents, and of this my royal order, you shall send a copy, in authentic form, to the governors of both the Floridas, and to the person or persons who may have, in your name, the accomplishing of the delivery, if it have not been made by yourself.

All which you shall well and completely execute in the form which I have prescribed to you, agreeably to the public service; advising me of your having executed it through my underwritten Secretary of Despatch of State.

Given at Madrid, the twenty-fourth of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty.

FERDINAND.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

SIR: HAVANA, April 28, 1821.

I have the honor to report to you that, after alternate strong gales and calms, the Hornet did not anchor in this harbor until the 22d instant, too late for business, had it not been on Sunday.

Governor Mahy received us very graciously on the following day, when I delivered to him the royal order for the delivery to the United States of the Floridas; and, after exhibiting to him my commission, inquired "when I wished to proceed." I immediately replied, "as soon as possible;" which gave rise to a long conference, in which I offered to be the bearer of his order, and urged the expediency of despatch, as being most conducive to the true interests of both Governments. His excellency stated that he would do every thing in his power to expedite me. I asked, when? which he answered by saying as soon as the records could be examined, selected, and inventoried. I then, to save time, expressed a wish to know the bulk, and that some of these might be dispensed with; but the interpreter who had been called in, officially, and otherwise unnecessarily, told me (by way of interloper) that there would be about twenty boxes of them, and that form as well as regularity required a punctilious inspection of them before they could be delivered to me. On retiring, his excellency told me that we should be satisfied with each other.

The next two days were to close the holidays; notwithstanding which, the interpreter called upon me, by order of the governor, to require my commission for translation, and to say that I must put to writing the substance of my conversation with his excellency, which I immediately did; copy of which is herewith sent, under date of 24th instant.

Allowing one day to intervene, I waited upon the governor on the 26th, to ascertain the progress making in the departments to expedite me. I was well received, and told that the necessary orders had been given, and that, as soon as the convoy about sailing for Spain had departed, my business should be particularly attended to.

The interpreter, whom I again saw at the governor's, mentioned the appointment of an officer to accompany me to Pensacola, and that he held the draught of a letter from the governor in answer to mine. I regret, however, to state, sir, that, to the moment of closing this despatch, I have not received it, or any communication from him. I have, however, reason to hope that, on the arrival of the intendant, hourly expected from the country, my stay will not be prolonged more than one week.

As some circumstances may occur during my agency which may be worthy of your notice, to be taken abstractedly, I shall submit them by reference as abstracts, and prepare them accordingly.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir, your very faithful and most obedient servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

Mr. Forbes to Governor Mahy.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: HAVANA, April 24, 1821.

When I had the honor of delivering into your excellency's hands the royal order of His Catholic Majesty, through his minister plenipotentiary at Washington, for the delivery to the Government of the United States of the Floridas, conformably to the treaty ratified on the 22d February last, I took occasion to present my commission from the President, and to submit various reasons for carrying into immediate effect the stipulations of said treaty, by offering to be the bearer of the final order of possession, and of the archives and public documents.

If arguments were necessary to carry into effect a treaty as illustrative in its stipulations of the honor of the Spanish Government as in its ratification, it is of the moderation and justice of that of the United States, and farther, in its completion, by the solid foundation it lays of a perpetual friendship between the two nations, I would offer the following for your excellency's consideration:

That the messenger of His Catholic Majesty was nearly four months in reaching Washington, while the ratification of the treaty at Madrid reached this island in a few weeks.

That, from the 24th October, 1820, (date of the ratification at Madrid,) to the present day, a period of six months has been afforded, of which His Catholic Majesty's officers and subjects have virtually availed themselves in preparing for the surrender of the Floridas—an evident advantage to one party not unworthy of consideration, since no charge of delay has been ascribed to it.

That, while a natural impulse is felt on the one hand, by the citizens of the United States, to become possessed of a promised land, an anxiety equally natural has been manifested on the other, that of the Spanish subjects, to retire from a country about to change its government.

That the season for calms and contrary winds is fast approaching, which is calculated to incommode seriously His Catholic Majesty's forces; while that of rain and of sultry weather may prove very injurious to the troops of the United States.

The gracious manner in which your excellency has already evinced his disposition to satisfy these demands upon His Catholic Majesty's Government as soon as practicable, are such sources of satisfaction as will be highly appreciated by the President. I hope, therefore, that, according to the stipulations of the treaty, your excellency will, with the least possible delay, appoint an officer to carry the ultimate orders for possession of the Floridas, by the constituted authorities of the United States, to accompany me in the Hornet sloop of war, Captain Read.

That the archives and documents relating to the Floridas may be accordingly delivered over to me.

That a mode may be adopted for the transmission to the Government of the United States of the final order (in duplicate form) from your excellency, upon the sub-governors, for the delivery of the Floridas, in case of any accident to the officer accompanying me, and in any event for the delivery of East Florida contemporaneously with that of West Florida, whither the Hornet is bound.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, most excellent sir,

Your excellency's most obedient and very humble servant,

JAMES G. FORBES,

A Commissary and Agent of the U. S. under the Florida Treaty.

To His Excellency Don NICOLAS MAHY, Lieutenant General of the National Armies, and Governor of the island of Cuba and its dependencies, &c. &c., Havana.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

SIR: HAVANA, May 5, 1821.

Since I had the honor of addressing you on the 28th ultimo, I availed myself of the earliest opportunity of reminding the governor of the disposition he had evinced of expediting me. This was afforded me incidentally on the 1st instant, when Mr. Warner desired me to present him as the commercial agent of the United States. After his excellency gave this gentleman to understand, very pointedly, that he could not recognise him, or view him in any other light than as a merchant, divested of all public character, I observed to him that, as the convoy had sailed, I hoped his excellency would enable me to proceed; upon which I was told that he was anxious to be disincumbered of the country, that orders had been given, and every necessary disposition was making by his secretary, with whom the matter now was, and by whom I should be apprized.

An assurance so gratifying was promptly met by a return of thanks for the early attention he appeared to have shown to my business; under which favorable impression I was about retiring, when it occurred to me to ask his excellency whether he knew that the intendant had given his orders on the subject? He appeared ignorant of any occasion for the interference of that officer, and put the question to the interpreter, who hesitatingly replied that "he might have."

This unexpected inconsonancy induced me to obtain an introduction to the register of the records which are in the department of the intendant, with whom I conversed freely, and was told that most of the papers in his office were those of accountability, and unnecessary to the Government of the United States; that about ten boxes containing the records of grants of land in West Florida were taken by an insurgent privateer out of the vessel in which Governor Mazot was a passenger from Pensacola.

Having brought letters of introduction to the intendant, which were, on my arrival, sent to him in the country, from whence he wrote me a note to say that he would be in town in a few days, I therefore felt myself at liberty to wait upon his secretary, to ascertain when he would arrive; he answered that it was very uncertain, and probably not before the middle of the month.

As the silence of the governor and of his secretary might be attributed to the frequent holidays, I sought an occasion to see the former, by accompanying Captain Read to obtain an order to apprehend a man charged, as a citizen of the United States, with depredating on our commerce. His excellency received us with his characteristic complacency, and agreed upon a course of procedure, reconciling his official duties with the rites of hospitality; then putting both his hands upon my shoulders, in the most friendly manner, said to me in French, (having previously conversed in Spanish,) "Quant à notre affaire, j'espère vous expedier sous peu de jours." I had scarcely time to thank him before he added "au moins d'ici"—meaning, no doubt, his office.

I have been thus minute in my detail, sir, that you might know precisely the situation in which my agency stands; and without calling your attention to the various buzzes I have heard, I feel it my duty to advert to one which, if well founded, may be of vast importance; it is, that "the Government is very much in arrears to the officers, both civil and military, in the ceded provinces." In this case, moral obligation and honor may impel, or obvious policy may prescribe, that some provision or arrangement may be made for their satisfaction, previous to their change of position, and thus at least cause delay.

With the treaty before me, I see no other alternative than that of yielding, however reluctantly, to the movements of the governor, hoping that no political changes in Europe can take place to thwart the just expectations of our nation, or alter the pacific policy of its Government. I shall advise General Jackson of my progress here.

I am, with great respect, sir, your faithful and most obedient servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

SIR: HAVANA, May 7, 1821.

In referring you to the enclosed letter, which I had the honor of writing on the 5th instant, I have that of submitting to you a copy of my letter of this date to General Jackson, who is said to be at New Orleans, whither Mr. Thompson proceeded this day in the steamboat with it.

The governor has sent me a message to wait upon him to-morrow morning, the result of which shall be immediately communicated to you.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Forbes to General Jackson.

SIR: HAVANA, May 7, 1821.

Commissioned by the President of the United States to deliver the royal order upon the Governor of Cuba, for the delivery of the Floridas to our Government, I was directed by the honorable Secretary of State to communicate with your excellency upon my arrival in Pensacola, with the further order of the governor to the Spanish authorities in the Floridas.

I arrived in the Hornet sloop of war on the 22d of last month, and was very favorably received by Governor Mahy, who expressed a wish to expedite me very promptly, as soon as the convoy for Spain sailed.

This assurance has been renewed to me occasionally since, but I regret to say that I am still uncertain when I can receive either the necessary order or the archives, which come also within the range of my commission.

I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by Mr. Thompson of making this communication, and take the liberty of suggesting to your excellency the expediency of having a person at Pensacola from whom I can, on landing, receive such information as will enable me to communicate immediately with your excellency by express.

I beg leave also to state that I have applied for an order, in duplicate form, embracing the delivery of East Florida, and that I shall endeavor to find a suitable opportunity of transmitting it to the commanding officer of the United States troops at Amelia island, subject to such orders as he may receive from the Department of State, or from your excellency, taking the original with me in the Hornet.

As Mr. Thompson is fully acquainted with the nature of my mission, I refer your excellency to him, with the assurance that no exertions on my part have been, or shall be, spared to give complete effect to objects of such national importance.

I am, with great respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient and very faithful servant,

JAMES G. FORBES,

A Commissary and Agent of the U. S. under the Florida treaty.

His Excellency Major General ANDREW JACKSON,

Commander-in-chief of the Southern army U. S., and Governor of the Floridas.

SIR: HAVANA, May 9, 1821.

The message from the governor, to which I had the honor of referring in my letter to you under date of the 7th instant, was found, on its delivery to me, to be nothing more than a proposal, through the commissary he is about sending, that "the Hornet should convey him to St. Augustine from Pensacola;" to which I could not assent, not only because she had other duties to perform, or of the delay which that mode of transmission of the order would occasion, but because I perceived in it a digression (otherwise immaterial) from the plan agreed upon in a former interview, viz: "that I should be the sole bearer of the orders." I therefore replied that I should wait upon his excellency; and, considering it opportune, I did this with Captain Read, to explain and to discover, if possible, the chance of getting away. We found him, as on a former occasion, much engaged and fatigued by his personal exertions to procure relief for the inhabitants of St. Antonio, a town just burnt. He was less affable than before; and although he mentioned, as then, that every thing was in a fair train, and that he would give me a duplicate order for East Florida, yet he adverted to the term allowed by the treaty, and said that there were a great many little things to do. After leaving his excellency, I heard that a petition had been sent to him that day from Pensacola, expressive of the attachment of the inhabitants to the Spanish Government; and, upon soliciting lands in this island, stated "that a judge of the United States, of much influence and talent, had come there with a trunk of British titles to lands in West Florida, with which he had pledged himself to upset all the grants by Spain since the treaty of 1783."

In consequence of this unexpected and very unpleasant delay, and the still greater apprehension of its continuance, I have determined to proceed this morning into the country to see the intendant, and ascertain whether he has any thing to do with the archives, and obtain an order that the proper officers may attend to their immediate arrangement and delivery.

By the enclosed paper, just received, it will be seen that General Jackson was, on the 27th of April, at New Orleans.

There is in this port the Kangaroo, British brig of war, from surveying the Bahama and Florida keys: a vessel of that nation is generally here—I mean public.

I remain, with great respect, sir,

Your faithful and most obedient servant,

J. G. FORBES.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

SIR: HAVANA, May 14, 1821.

Pursuant to the resolution I had formed, and which I had the honor of communicating to you in my letter of the 9th instant, I proceeded on that day to St. Antonio, about twenty-seven miles distant. An excessively hot ride, with bad horses, prevented me from waiting on the intendant before the next day, when he received me very well, and assured me there would be no difficulty in the way of despatching me; that he would write to the city on the next day for the necessary papers, which would be sent him on the succeeding day, and that, immediately after, he would return them completed. Agreeably to this calculation, I ought to have the archives from the intendancy on the 16th instant, and shall call for them on that day accordingly.

On my return to the city, I waited upon the govêrnor, and was told by his interpreter that he was very much engaged, but that my business was progressing. I begged him to acquaint his excellency of my intention to see him on Monday, (this day.) I went accordingly, and met at the door my colleague, the Spanish commissary, who assured me that every thing was ready, and would be signed (firmada) this day, and that we might go to-morrow or the next day. I congratulated him, as well as myself, upon the occasion, but was nevertheless determined to see his excellency, which I did instantly.

I found him much occupied, and, after some preliminary conversation on the excessive heat, represented to him that we had been here a considerable time, that the hot and unhealthy season was fast advancing, and that I hoped he would despatch us. He replied, "In a few days." I asked, "How many?" and observed that a vessel was about sailing for the United States in the morning, and that I wished to advise my Government when I was to go. He answered that he would give me notice. The conversation having been in French, he said further, "Eh, bien, ecrivez que ce sera dans huit ou dix jours ou quinze." Upon his observing that I appeared surprised at such a distant period, after the various promises, or rather assertions, he had made, he added, "J'ais besoin de quelques papiers de dehors, que peuvent venir d'un jour à l'autre; et d'ailleurs, je suis extrèmement pressé de tout côte; un courier partant demain pour l'Espagne, c'est oblige de me lever tous les jours à quatre heures du matin, et travailler jusqu'à minuit: fort heureusement, je jouis d'une bonne santé."

It was difficult for me to conceal my disappointment; yet, if my business required any exertion, sensible of the perplexities of his situation and of his arduous duties, I should, on consideration of them, be more willing to ascribe the further delay to them rather than to any secret influence, which it has not been in my power either to penetrate or detect.

I shall, on the sailing of the packet for Spain, if encouraged by an interview with the intendant, address a note to his excellency proposing to leave the archives until the return of the Hornet, provided he will despatch me immediately with the orders upon the sub-governors of the Floridas.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very faithful and most obedient servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

SIR: HAVANA, May 17, 1821.

I have the honor of enclosing to you the copy of a letter, dated yesterday, but received this forenoon, from Governor Mahy. The packet for Spain is expected to sail to-morrow, when I shall see his excellency and the intendant, and urge with both of them the fulfilment of their promises to despatch me.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir, your very faithful and most obedient servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Substance of a letter from Governor Mahy, of Havana, to Mr. Forbes, dated

MAY 16, 1821.

That the governor had observed Mr. Forbes's credentials from the President of the United States, dated at Washington, March 14, 1821, and which comprehend the second article of the treaty of friendship and adjustment of limits, concluded 22d February, 1819, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, in virtue of which the Spanish minister at Washington had transmitted to the governor the royal order for the due execution of the stipulations of that treaty; and that the President had authorized Mr. Forbes, as agent and commissary of the United States, to deliver to him (the governor) the said royal order, to the end that they might, in concert, make arrangements for the delivering up by the governor, and by such other persons as are in possession, of the archives and documents, as well as the fulfilment of the other stipulations of the said treaty.

With respect to which, and to what is presented in the aforesaid second article, the governor sends to Mr. Forbes the copy of a royal order communicated to the Government and Captain Generalship of Cuba, under date of the 12th of September, 1783, by the Minister of the Indies of His Catholic Majesty, and by the Count de Aranda, at Versailles, dated the 19th of the same month and year, on which day the ratifications of their Majesties, Catholic and Britannic, were exchanged, inserting in that royal order the articles five, seven, and ten of the definitive treaty of peace, which were formed at Versailles the 3d of September; this being an authentic document, found in the archives of Cuba, relative to the property of the Floridas, to which the said second article of the treaty of cession refers.

In the year 1819, there were sent to Havana from West Florida various boxes of papers of the archives of that province, in disorder and without indexes, the registering (registrar) or examining of which will require time.

Respecting East Florida, where there ought to be found all her archives, Governor Mahy would direct that governor, as intrusted by him with the important commission, to make a formal delivery to Mr. Forbes of that province, as well as of the documents belonging to it. A similar despatch would be addressed to the commandant of West Florida.

Don Pedro de Alva, administrator of the post office in Pensacola, and comptroller of the military hospital, now returning to his post, will be charged with the despatch for the delivery of West Florida, and which despatch he is to put into the hands of that commandant, and afterwards he will proceed with the despatch for the commandant of the eastern province.

SIR: HAVANA, May 22, 1821.

By the letters which I had the honor of addressing to you under date of the 14th and 17th instant, you will perceive that I had entertained great hopes of being despatched, and had relied upon the influence of the intendant. Agreeably to that of the 17th, I had made an arrangement with Mr. Layalla, an eminent counsellor and friend of the intendant, to urge his immediate attention to my earnest solicitations. In the morning he called at the office with that view, and we learned, to our mortification and grief, that the intendant had received a paralytic stroke, which deprived him of speech. Thus the hand of Providence had interfered to thwart my most sanguine expectations, as, on the succeeding day, the greatest human efforts were unavailing, and he died, much lamented by all the Americans, to whom he was considered an invaluable friend.

I waited, on the same day, upon the governor, and received his usual assurance that, as soon as the packet sailed, I should be despached. The funeral, which was of great pomp and ceremony, I attended, and at which I exchanged a salute with the governor; it engaged the public attention the whole of yesterday, so that on this day I presented myself to the successor of the intendant, before whom the secretary placed the agenda papers relating to the Floridas. They appeared to be few, and within a loose sheet, (chemise de bureau.) He inquired what had passed between the late intendant and myself; upon hearing which, and upon my urging despatch, he said "that the matter was new to him, and that he must require to-morrow or next day to investigate it." From thence I proceeded to the governor's, and was informed that he was out soliciting, from house to house, subscriptions for the relief of the inhabitants of the burnt village of St. Antonio.

I was the more anxious to see his excellency to day, as the steam-ship, by which this goes, offered a favorable opportunity of addressing you. I returned to the palace. The governor, who appeared overwhelmed with business, apologized for keeping me so long, showed me some of the large packets made up for Pensacola, said they were making copies, and that the day after to-morrow he hoped to give me free (franqueza.) I then reminded him of his promise to give me the duplicate order to send to East Florida; he told me that he had a merchantman. I proposed and urged as most expedient that I should forward it by an officer of the United States; to which he assented. I have therefore put in requisition, by letter to Captain Read, the United States schooner Nonsuch, Lieutenant Turner, now here, by which I propose to send the duplicate, under cover, to the commanding officer of the United States troops at Amelia island, subject to such orders as you or General Jackson may transmit to him.

I am, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State, Washington.

SIR: HAVANA, May 23, 1821.

The steam-ship Robert Fulton sailed yesterday for Charleston with the letter of that date, which I had the honor of addressing to you. Since which I have received one from the secretary of the intendant, soliciting that I should carry to Pensacola ten thousand dollars, and as much to East Florida, to pay the troops; which sums would have been doubled under the late intendant. I have answered that I would cheerfully do this if they would ship them without delay, say in equal sums, in the Hornet and Nonsuch. Captain Read is indisposed—I hope not seriously.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient and very faithful servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State, Washington.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

SIR: HAVANA, May 28, 1821.

From the conversation with the governor, which I had the honor of detailing to you in my letter of the 23d instant, it was natural to suppose that on the 24th I would have been despatched.

I waited upon his excellency to remind him of his promise, but he appeared to have forgotten it, and again mentioned press of business, and the term of "pocos dias," which became more familiar than reconcileable to me. He had just received a letter from the Governor of Pensacola, which he showed me, stating an inquiry on the part of General Jackson as to the delivery of the province. The sub-governor, in forwarding the general's letter and his answer, asked for orders, which his excellency was about sending, and offered to take any letters from me; but I replied that the best communication I could make to him would be in person. He remarked that he thought our general "avoit la tête montée."

I addressed the governor the letter, a copy of which is herewith, marked B, to which I received, on the 26th, the answer, copy also, marked C; upon the receipt of which, I called upon his excellency, and was met by an affable apology for the unavoidable detention, assuring me that, as Saturday was general post day, the day after Sunday, he would positively despatch me on the succeeding day, (the present.) I could not but acquiesce. However, after learning, in conference, that there would be no archives ready, I immediately, on retiring, addressed him the letter, of which a copy is enclosed, marked D, to which I have not yet received any answer in writing; but, on calling at the governor's, was told it had been written, together with a copy of the orders to the sub-governors of the Floridas, but, on a revision, there was some expression which his excellency thought proper to alter, and on which account it could not be handed to me before to-morrow, when I should positively be despatched. I hope, therefore, that, the money being on board, my next will be from the offing, and put in charge of Captain Turner, of the Nonsuch, who will forward it immediately to the United States, whither he is proceeding, after landing the Spanish commissary and specie at St. Augustine, and after delivering my despatch to the commanding officer of the United States troops at Amelia.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient and very faithful servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

The Captain General of Cuba to Mr. Forbes.

SIR: HAVANA, May 26, 1821.

I acknowledge the receipt of your official letter of the 24th current, in which, among various reflections which it contains, I am requested, as soon as possible, to complete the delivery of the Floridas. You can sufficiently testify my desires for the conclusion of this business, and in my last conference I showed that it would be in a few days after. Considering that the stipulation of the treaty grants six months for its completion, and three having already elapsed, as you mention, it does not depend upon delays on the part of this Captaincy General; and, desirous to give further proofs of the good intention of this Government in fulfilling the said royal order, I have nominated the Auditor of War of the province of East Florida, who is at present there with his license, and ought to be present at the delivery, to convey the proper order to the governor; in which understanding I should think that he might be conveyed in the vessel which you tell me would be destined for that service. Thus I have answered your said official letter.

I remain, with the highest consideration, and pray God to preserve you many years.

NICOLAS MAHY.

B.

Mr. Forbes to Governor Mahy.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: HAVANA, May 24, 1821.

I have had the honor of receiving your excellency's letter of the 16th instant, acknowledging the receipt by my hands of the royal order for the delivery of the Floridas to the Government of the United States, advising me that measures are taking for the delivery of the archives, and for the further execution of the treaty between the two Governments, and enclosing to me copies of the fifth, seventh, and tenth articles of the definitive treaty of peace between Spain and Great Britain in 1783.

In the first interview, your excellency was pleased to manifest a readiness to despatch me with the requisite documents in a few days, or as soon as the convoy for Spain had sailed, which was immediately communicated in corresponding terms to the President of the United States, who has relied, accordingly, upon its execution. Since then, a period of near five weeks has elapsed, during which every day has appeared to have increased your excellency's avocations.

While your excellency has been incessantly engaged in performing the arduous duties of his [your] important and highly responsible station, it has fallen to my humble lot to be only the idle spectator of the ravages of the climate, and, in contemplating their secret and rapid progress, to flatter myself with the hope of embarking so as to rescue the officers and crews of the ships from their fatal effects.

As three months of a favorable season have passed away in preliminary measures, and as it appears uncertain when the archives here of the Floridas can be delivered over to me, I crave the reference again of your excellency to my last despatch, confirming the various reasons offered in conference for my early departure, and therefore propose that if any further researches should be necessary for the discovery of the said archives, they might be delivered when more convenient to the Spanish Government; that I should be allowed to proceed immediately to West Florida with the commissary appointed to carry the final order to the sub-governor there; and, lastly, that a duplicate order be given at once, as agreed upon, to the Governor of East Florida, for the delivery of that province to the constituted authorities of the United States, together with the archives which are declared to be on the spot: which last order I will, with your excellency's permission, despatch immediately by a public officer of the United States.

I am, with sentiments of the highest consideration, most excellent sir,

Your excellency's most obedient and very humble servant,

JAMES G. FORBES,

A Commissary and Agent of the U. S. &c.

His Excellency Governor Don NICOLAS MAHY,

Lieutenant General of the National Armies, Governor of Cuba and its dependencies, &c.

Don Juan Nepom. de Arocha to Mr. Forbes.

SIR: MAY 23, 1821.

The intendant ad interim commands me to ask you whether or not it will be inconvenient to transport on board the vessel of your nation twenty thousand dollars, which he wishes to remit for the disposal of the governors of the two Floridas—ten thousand to Pensacola, and ten thousand to St. Augustine—in the supposition that the ship will go to either of those ports.

This quantity being precisely destined for the assistance of the troops of both garrisons, and for the purpose of avoiding particular agreements when the completion of the treaty between both Powers takes effect, the said intendant ad interim has no doubt that you will have the goodness to comply with this service in the spirit of harmony and consequent friendship.

I have the honor to express my hope of your answer, and therefore to offer myself to your disposal, as your most obedient, humble servant,

JUAN NEPOM. DE AROCHA.

D.

Mr. Forbes to Governor Mahy.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: HAVANA, May 26, 1821.

I had the honor of receiving your excellency's letter of this date, informing me of the appointment of the Auditor of War of the province of East Florida to become the bearer of your excellency's order on the sub-governors of that province for its delivery, in form, to the constituted authorities of the United States, and renewing to me your excellency's disposition to despatch me in a few days.

The accidental arrival here of the United States schooner Nonsuch enables me to meet the views of the Spanish Government, by putting her in requisition for the purpose of conveying some specie, by desire of the intendant, as well as of conveying said officer; she therefore awaits your excellency's despatches.

I beg leave to know if I understood your excellency to say, in conference to-day, that the archives of West Florida, which are in the public offices here, are of a character involving importance only to Spain; that, in the further examination of them, such as interest the Government of the United States should be set apart and transmitted to our Government.

It would be agreeable to me, also, to have from your excellency copies of the orders transmitted by him to the sub-governors of the Floridas, touching their delivery to the United States.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, most excellent sir,

Your excellency's most obedient servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

To His Excellency Governor MAHY, &c.

E.

Mr. Forbes to Señor Juan Nepom. de Arocha.

SIR: HAVANA, May 23, 1821.

I had the honor of receiving your letter of this date, desiring, on the part of the intendant, that the ship of war of the United States should convey to the Floridas twenty thousand dollars on account of the Spanish Government.

Please to assure the intendant that it affords me much pleasure to accord with his wishes, and that, in the same spirit of accommodation and friendly intercourse which ought, and I hope may always, subsist between the American and Spanish Governments, the money shall be taken on board the Hornet for Pensacola, and the Nonsuch for St. Augustine; but my duty prescribes that no further delay can be the consequence.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, very respectfully,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,

JAMES G. FORBES,

A Commissary and Agent of the U. S. under the Florida treaty.

Mr. Forbes to Mr. Adams.

SIR: HORNET, OFF HAVANA, May 30, 1821.

Since I had the honor of addressing you, on the 28th instant, I have received an answer from the governor to my letter of that date, enclosing copies of his orders to the sub-governors of the Floridas, and declaring that the archives should be transmitted to the Government of the United States as soon as they were selected.

Immediately on reading the orders just referred to, I perceived that the sub-governors were directed to deliver the provinces to me; I therefore waited upon his excellency, and requested that he would insert "to the constituted authorities of the United States;" to which he readily assented, but said, as the despatches were written, it would require a particular order, which he issued, and of which copies are herewith, together with those written under date of the 5th instant.

The governor, who was exceedingly polite, invited Captains Read and Turner and myself to dinner, at which I alone attended; and after which he gave the new instructions in relation to the delivery. He asked if I was now satisfied. I mentioned a further wish that he had been more pointed to the governors as to the period of evacuation, and urged the season as one which would expose the Spanish troops to much delay and inconvenience. He said he knew, from General Jackson's character, that he was impatient, but that the treaty was of considerable importance, now happily and formally concluded; and he hoped that all regard would be paid to its happy conclusion; that the governors would use all due diligence.

I have the satisfaction of saying, at last, that I embarked this morning with the Spanish commissary, but that the one for St. Augustine, just appointed, will not be able to proceed in the Nonsuch until the day after to-morrow. I have preferred leaving him to a moment's unnecessary delay, on my part, for the delivery of West Florida.

I have addressed a copy of the orders of which he is the bearer to Colonel Bankhead, or commanding officer at Amelia, subject, as before mentioned, to such directions as he should receive from the department, or from General Jackson, as governor of the territory.

It has been a source of regret and vexation to me to have met with this unforeseen detention, but I hope and trust that you will have perceived, in the course of my agency, that every exertion has been used, and that the delay may be attributed more to a tardiness inherent in those with whom I have had to do, than to any political or commercial advantage expected to be derived from it by speculation. The authorities here consider it a prompt despatch!

I request your attention to my draft of this date in favor of Messrs. Gutierrez & Morland for $350, chargeable to my account.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir,

Your most obedient and very faithful servant,

JAMES G. FORBES.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

[TRANSLATION.]

Order of the Governor General of Cuba for the delivery of the Floridas.

HAVANA, May 5, 1821.

The time having arrived for beginning to take the necessary measures for the evacuation of West Florida, at present under your command, to make formal delivery of it to the authorized commissary of the Government of the United States, citizen James G. Forbes, within the space of six months, or sooner if possible, counting from the 22d of February last, the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty formed between the two Powers, I have resolved to charge you with the execution of this important commission with the brevity and order which it demands, and for the good event of which I forwarded to you some preparatory instructions, which ought necessarily to have served to dispose each branch to have been arranged as an object so interesting demands. You will have, therefore, to agree with the commissary of the Government of the United States on the mode of transporting the troops, munitions, effects, &c., according to the articles of the treaty, a copy of which I enclose, and which will give information on the subject. The detachments of each corps will be reunited under the command of the chief, or its senior officer, taking all the precautions which you think convenient for maintaining good order in this delicate circumstance. At the moment of giving possession of that country, and of quitting it, I recommend to you to do what you can for apportioning to the families which may wish to be transferred to this island all the means which may be in your power, and the necessary protection which I myself have solicited from the said commissary in his kindness, manifesting on my part how agreeable it would be, as they come to live amongst our people.

May God preserve you many years.

NICOLAS MAHY.

To the COMMANDER ad interim of West Florida.

Additional order for the delivery of West Florida.

HAVANA, May 27, 1821.

Although it is expressed in the order for the delivery of the province under your command to Don James G. Forbes, the commissioned agent of the United States to that effect, it ought also to be understood that, in case of any accident happening to that gentleman, (which God forbid,) it shall be delivered to the authorities of the said United States, legally constituted, who may present themselves to you for the completing of the afore-cited order.

God preserve you many years.

NICOLAS MAHY.

Additional order for East Florida, (the original, or first, being the same for both provinces.)

HAVANA, May 29, 1821.

In the order which I addressed to you for the delivery of the province under your command, it is not expressed to whom it should be given; it will be understood that it shall be the authorities of the United States, legally constituted, who may present themselves to you for its completion.

God preserve you many years.

NICOLAS MAHY.

To the GOVERNOR of East Florida.

Colonel Butler to the Secretary of State.

SIR: ST. AUGUSTINE, EAST FLORIDA, July 13, 1821.

I have handed over to Major Cross, for your information, a book containing copies of the official correspondence which resulted in the reception and occupancy of this province.

You will likewise receive, herewith, the official document of interchange of authority, which was formally executed at the period when the American and Spanish flags were flying on the standard.

You have enclosed a communication and document accompanied, from the Spanish commissioner, which I have informed him has been referred to the American Government for decision, on the subject of several pieces of artillery at Amelia island.

The archives relating to private property are so numerous that it would be an endless task to have them transcribed; and I therefore claimed them as they were, and I deemed it of great importance to particularize, as you will find from my letter of the 3d instant, and numbered 26, owing to my receiving information that a large portion of these documents were packed for transportation. This letter had the effect of keeping all the documents here until your decision is made with the Spanish authorities.

The documents are forwarded by Major Cross, on the part of the Spanish commissioner, to the minister at Washington, from which you will be enabled to settle the points left open with them speedily.

I shall be gratified to receive a communication from you, if my services in this instance have corresponded with the interests of my country.

As I have not been informed of what allowance will be authorized as a compensation for the duty which I have performed, will you be kind enough to give me the necessary information on this subject, directed to Pensacola?

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

NOTE.—I am just informed by the Spanish commissioner that his documents will not be sent by Major Cross, but will be transmitted immediately by another conveyance. R. B.

Act of Cession of East Florida.

In the place of St. Augustine, and on the tenth day of July, eighteen hundred and twenty-one, Don José Coppinger, colonel of the national armies, and commissioner appointed by his excellency the Captain General of the island of Cuba to make a formal delivery of this said place and province of East Florida to the Government of the United States of America, by virtue of the treaty of cession concluded at Washington, on the twenty-second of February, eighteen hundred and nineteen, and the royal schedule of delivery of the twenty-fourth of October of the last year, annexed to the documents mentioned in the certificate, that form a heading to these instruments: in testimony thereof, and the adjutant general of the southern division of said States, Colonel Don Robert Butler, duly authorized by the aforesaid Government to receive the same: We having had several conferences, in order to carry into effect our respective commissions, as will appear by our official communications; and having received by the latter the documents, inventories, and plans, appertaining to the property and sovereignty of the Spanish nation held in the province, and in its adjacent island depending thereon, with the sites, public squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, and other works, not being private property, and the same having been preceded by the arrangements and formalities that, for the greater solemnity of the important fact, they have judged proper, there has been verified, at four o'clock of the evening of this day, the complete and personal delivery of the fortifications, and all else of this aforesaid province, to the commissioner, officers, and troops of the United States, and, in consequence thereof, having embarked for the Havana the military and civil officers and Spanish troops in the American transports provided for this purpose, the Spanish authorities having this moment ceased the exercise of their functions, and those appointed by the American Government having begun theirs, duly noting that we have transmitted to our Governments the doubts occurring whether the artillery ought to be comprehended in the fortifications; and if the public archives relating to private property ought to remain and be delivered to the American Government by virtue of the cession; and that there remain in the fortifications, until the aforesaid resolution is made, the artillery, munitions, and implements specified in a particular inventory, awaiting on these points, and the others appearing in question in our correspondence, the superior decision of our respective Governments, and which is to have, whatever may be the result, the most religious compliance at any time that it may arrive, and in which the possession that at present appears given shall not serve as an obstacle. In testimony of which, and that this may at all times serve as an expressive and formal receipt in this act, we, the subscribing commissioners, sign four instruments of the same tenor, in the English and Spanish languages, at the above-mentioned place, and said day, month, and year.

ROBERT BUTLER,
JOSE COPPINGER.

Colonel Butler to the Secretary of State.

SIR: ST. AUGUSTINE, June 20, 1821.

I have the honor to report to you that the understanding which at present exists between the governor who is the commissioner on the part of Spain, and myself, is, that the exchange of flags will be effected on or about the 1st of July, and in a manner which, I trust, will be deemed satisfactory by my Government.

I shall avail myself of the earliest opportunity after that event to give you in detail the whole of the proceedings on that subject.

I was induced to believe, from information received some time since, that the provisions destined to subsist the Spanish forces to the Havana had arrived at Amelia island, and I therefore gave an order for their delivery to the officer commanding the detachment destined to occupy the fortress at this place. A partial supply only was delivered, and that out of the supply for the troops at that place. I have therefore despatched a transport to Amelia to procure the supply necessary, and, if not in store, to purchase such as may be wanting. I am without any advices from the commissary general's department on this subject.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT BUTLER.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 12, 1821.

By direction of the President of the United States, I have the honor of transmitting to you three commissions:

1. As commissioner to receive possession of the provinces of East and West Florida, conformably to the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded on the 22d of February, 1819.

2. As governor of the whole territories of which possession is to be thus taken.

3. As commissioner vested with special and extraordinary powers, conformably to the stipulations of the treaty, and to the act of Congress for carrying the same into execution; copies of both of which are also among the enclosures with this letter.

Together with the Spanish ratification of the treaty, there was transmitted to the Spanish minister at this place a royal order to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba for delivering possession of the provinces of East and West Florida, according to the stipulations of the second article of the treaty.

Colonel James G. Forbes has been appointed by the President agent and commissary to deliver this royal order to the Governor of Cuba, to concert and arrange with him the execution of it, and to receive any documents or archives which may be at the Havana, and which are stipulated to be delivered by this article. A copy of his instructions is herewith enclosed, by which you will perceive that he is to deliver over to you all such documents or archives as he may receive at the Havana. It is desirable that those relating to each of the two provinces should be kept distinct from each other, and that this Government should be informed generally of their character and quantity.

Colonel Forbes is to take passage at New York in the United States sloop of war Hornet, Captain Read, and, on arriving at Pensacola, is to give you immediate notice, that you may repair thither to receive possession of that place. The Hornet is to remain there to escort the transports in which the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage are to be conveyed to the Havana.

The Spanish minister has expressed a strong wish that no troops of the United States may be introduced into Pensacola or St. Augustine until after the evacuation by those of Spain. The object of this request being to avoid any possible unpleasant altercations between the soldiers of the two nations, the President thinks it reasonable to comply with it, unless you should be of opinion that it will be attended with inconvenience. In that event, he relies that you will take every measure of precaution which may be necessary to guard against any such collisions between the soldiers; and he trusts with confidence that, in every arrangement for the evacuation, the utmost delicacy will be observed to avoid every thing which might tend to wound the feelings of any of the Spanish officers, soldiers, or subjects who are to remove.

It is the President's desire that you should appoint General Gaines, or such other officer as you may deem expedient, to receive possession of St. Augustine; and that the same instructions should be applied to the execution of that service. The United States brig Enterprise or schooner Porpoise will be ordered to proceed to that place to escort the transports which are to convey the Spanish officers and troops thence to the Havana. The care of providing the transports at both places is referred to you. The number of troops at either place is not known, but supposed to amount to about five hundred men at each. The stipulation is understood to include civil as well as military officers, and provisions as well as passage.

Instructions will be given by the Secretary of War to the quartermasters and commissaries to furnish to your orders provisions and transports for the conveyance of the Spanish officers and troops. It is expected they will be supplied at New Orleans and Mobile for those to embark within the Gulf, and at Savannah and Charleston for those going from St. Augustine.

A copy and translation of the royal order to the Governor of Cuba, for delivering the possession of the provinces, is among the enclosures herewith. You will observe that it includes expressly the islands appurtenant to them. It will be proper that attention should be paid to taking possession of all these islands, but it may not be necessary that a formal delivery of them in every case should be made.

On receiving from the Governors of West and of East Florida possession of those respective provinces, it will be proper to exchange certificates of the time and mode of the transaction. Orders for the delivery of any military posts within the provinces will be expected, and they will be occupied by detachments of our troops, as you may deem expedient.

As soon as the possession shall be transferred, you will, in pursuance of your authority over the ceded territories, issue proclamations announcing the fact. A form adapted from that which was issued on the first occupation of Louisiana is herewith enclosed, to be modified as the circumstances, in your opinion, may require.

The powers vested in you by the enclosed commissions are also conformable to those which were intrusted to the Governor of Louisiana under an act of Congress of similar import. The President is satisfied that they will be exercised by you with a due regard as well to the privileges and usages of the inhabitants under the Government to which they have been subject, as to the personal and social rights to which they will be entitled by the stipulations of the treaty, and as associates to the union of these States. The money paid into the Spanish treasury before the delivery of possession, and whatever may be due thereto at that date, is to be considered as the property of Spain. Payments and debts subsequent to that date will belong, of course, to the United States.

The laws of the United States relating to the revenue and its collection, and those relating to the introduction of persons of color, being extended by the act of Congress to the territory, the execution of them will be superintended by officers to be appointed for the several collection districts to be established by the President conformably to the law.

Your compensation as governor will be at the rate of five thousand dollars a year. As commissioner for receiving possession of the provinces, such reasonable expenses as may be incurred will be allowed. Whenever your military command ceases, your salary as governor will commence.

In the taking possession of St. Augustine and East Florida, similar proceedings to those relative to the occupation of West Florida will be proper. Both provinces being placed under your direction, the proclamation to be issued there will be in your name; and General Gaines, or such other officer as you may appoint, will be instructed to consider himself, for all the purposes of the Government, subject to your orders.

At the ensuing session of Congress it is to be presumed one of the earliest objects of attention to that body will be to make further provision for the government of these territories. The President wishes you, in the interval, to collect and communicate to this Department any information relating to the country and its inhabitants which may be useful to the exercise of the legislative authority of the Union concerning them.

For the expenses incident to the services herewith required, you will draw upon this Department. Strict economy is to be observed in incurring them; and I have urgently to request the transmission, as early as possible, of all the accounts resulting from them, with the vouchers necessary for their settlement at the Treasury.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

P. S. The third commission, being reserved by the President for consideration, is not enclosed.

Commission to General Jackson to receive possession of the Floridas.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that, reposing special trust and confidence in the patriotism and abilities of Major General Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, I have appointed him commissioner of the United States, with full power and authority to him to take possession of, and occupy, the territories ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Washington on the twenty-second day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, and for that purpose to repair to the said territories, and there to execute and perform all such acts and things touching the premises as may be necessary for fulfilling his appointment, conformably to the said treaty and the laws of the United States: and I do, moreover, authorize the said Andrew Jackson to appoint any person or persons in his stead to receive possession of any part of the said ceded territories, according to the stipulations of the said treaty.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to [L. S.] be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 10th day of March, A. D. 1821, and of the independence of the United States of America the forty-fifth.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Commission to General Jackson as Governor of the Floridas.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by an act passed on the third day of the present month, did provide that, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the territories of East and West Florida, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty between the said parties, concluded at Washington, on the twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing Government of the same shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion: Now, know ye, that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and abilities of Major General Andrew Jackson, I do, in virtue of the above-recited act, appoint him to exercise, within the said ceded territories, under such limitations as have been, or may hereafter be, prescribed to him by my instructions, and by law, all the powers and authorities heretofore exercised by the Governor and Captain General and Intendant of Cuba, and by the Governors of East and West Florida, within the said provinces, respectively, and do authorize and empower him, the said Andrew Jackson, to execute and fulfil the duties of this present appointment according to law, and to have and to hold the same, with all its powers and privileges, until the end of the next session of Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the said territories so ceded by Spain to the United States: Provided, however, (and it is the true intent and meaning of these presents,) That the said Andrew Jackson, or any person acting under him, or in the said territories, shall have no power or authority to lay or collect any new or additional taxes, or to grant or confirm to any person or persons whomsoever, any title or claims to lands within the same.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to [L. S.] be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 10th day of March, A. D. 1821, and of the independence of the United States of America the forty-fifth.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Special commission to Major General Andrew Jackson for carrying into effect the stipulations of the treaty.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to Andrew Jackson, greeting:

Whereas, by an act of Congress passed on the third day of the present month, entitled "An act for carrying into execution the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Washington, on the twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen," it is provided that, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the territories ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Washington, on the twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, between the two nations, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing Government of the same shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion: And whereas, on the tenth day of the present month, I did, by letters patent, under the seal of the United States, in pursuance of the powers vested in me as aforesaid, appoint you, the said Andrew Jackson, to exercise, under certain limitations, within the said ceded territories, all the powers and authorities heretofore exercised by the Governor and Captain General and by the Intendant of Cuba, and by the Governors of East and West Florida, within the said provinces, respectively, with the clauses and conditions in the said letters patent expressed: And whereas it appears to me expedient that you should be vested with the other powers hereinafter specified: Therefore, be it known that, in virtue of the above-recited act of Congress, I do, by these presents, appoint and authorize you, the said Andrew Jackson, to administer the government, with the existing authorities, in the best manner in your power, for the present, and to report without delay the actual state, with such alterations as you may think advisable, that further instructions may be given respecting the same; and I do, moreover, authorize you to suspend any officer or officers in the said territories which the public good may seem to you to require, with the exception always of such as are or may be appointed by the President of the United States, making a report to this Government of your proceedings therein. These letters patent are to continue in force until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the temporary government of the said territories so as aforesaid ceded by Spain to the United States, and unless it should be sooner revoked by the President of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States [L. S.] to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 20th day of March, A. D. 1821, and of the independence of the United States of America the forty-fifth.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

FORM OF PROCLAMATION.

By Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the provinces of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and of the Intendant of the island of Cuba over the said provinces, and of the Governors of said provinces, respectively.

Whereas, by the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain, on the 22d day of February, 1819, and duly ratified, the provinces of the Floridas were ceded by Spain to the United States, and the possession of the said provinces is now in the United States:

And whereas the Congress of the United States, on the 3d day of March, in the present year, did enact that, until the end of the first session of the seventeenth Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of said provinces be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing Government of the said provinces shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the President of the United States has, by his commission, bearing date the 20th day of said March, invested me with all the powers, and charged me with the several duties heretofore held and exercised by the captain general, intendant, and governors, aforesaid:

I have therefore thought fit to issue this my proclamation, making known the premises, and to declare that the government heretofore exercised over the said provinces, under the authority of Spain, has ceased, and that that of the United States of America is established over the same; that the inhabitants thereof will be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the federal constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States; that, in the mean time, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess; that all laws and municipal regulations which were in existence at the cessation of the late Government remain in full force; and all civil officers charged with their execution, except those whose powers have been specially vested in me, and except, also, such officers as have been intrusted with the collection of the revenue, are continued in their functions, during the pleasure of the governor for the time being, or until provision shall otherwise be made.

And I do hereby exhort and enjoin all the inhabitants and other persons within the said provinces to be faithful and true in their allegiance to the United States, and obedient to the laws and authorities of the same, under full assurance that their just rights will be under the guardianship of the United States, and will be maintained from all force and violence from without or within.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand.

Given, &c.

From the Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson, at Nashville.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 20, 1821.

I have the honor to transmit the third commission referred to in the instructions of this office to you of the 12th instant; and to be, with respect, your obedient and humble servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

From the Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson, Nashville.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 23, 1821.

By the second article of the Florida treaty, it is stipulated that, with the Territories of East and West Florida, the fortifications within the same are ceded and to be delivered to the United States; but no express mention is made of the cannon belonging to them.

By the seventh article of the same treaty, it is provided that the United States shall furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana; but no mention is made of the transportation of cannon, nor is there any express engagement on the part of the United States to furnish provisions to the Spanish officers and troops on the passage.

It is the opinion of the President that, by a fair and just construction of the treaty, the cannon belonging to the fortifications are to be considered as appendages to them, included in the cession, and are, therefore, to be left with them.

On the same principle, he is of opinion that, with the transports and escort to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage, the provisions necessary for the passage are also to be furnished at the expense of the United States, although not specially mentioned in the treaty, and orders have accordingly been given for the supply of provisions.

It is, however, possible that the Spanish Governors of East and West Florida may, upon a different construction of the treaty, claim to carry away the cannon from the fortifications, because they are not expressly named in the article.

You will, in that case, claim that they should be left with the fortifications, and insist that, upon the principle of the other construction, the United States are not bound to furnish provisions for the passage of the officers and troops. You will state that the supply has been ordered in the confidence that the benefit of the same liberal construction of the treaty will operate in favor of the United States; and that, if it be not extended to them, they will have a just claim to be reimbursed for the expense of supplying the provisions.

You will add that, as there is no engagement on their part, express or implied, to furnish the means of transporting the cannon, they have made, and can make, no provision for that purpose.

Should the Spanish governors allege that their orders are express for having the cannon carried away, you will leave it to them to make provision for their transportation, and report forthwith the facts to this Department.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

From the Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson, Governor of East and West Florida.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 22, 1821.

I have the honor, by direction of the President of the United States, of informing you that he has established within the Territories of East and West Florida three districts for the collection of the revenue, namely, at Pensacola, St. Mark's, and St. Augustine. He has at the same time thought proper to appoint two territorial secretaries and two judges, one of each to reside at Pensacola, and the other at St. Augustine; the revenue district of St. Mark's to be included within the judicial district of Pensacola. He has thought the appointment of one marshal sufficient for the whole territory, authorizing him to appoint a deputy either for St. Augustine or Pensacola, while he shall reside himself at the other of those places. I subjoin hereto a list of the several persons appointed to these offices.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

[List of officers referred to in the above letter.]

Eligius Fromentin, of Louisiana, to be judge of the United States for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape; to reside at Pensacola.

Alexander Anderson, of Tennessee, to be attorney of the United States for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape; to reside at Pensacola.

William P. Duval, of Kentucky, to be judge of the United States for East Florida, with the exception of that part which lies westward of the cape; to reside at St. Augustine.

John G. Bird, of Georgia, to be attorney of the United States for East Florida, with the exception of that part which lies westward of the cape; to reside at St. Augustine.

James Grant Forbes, of New York, to be marshal of the United States in and for East and West Florida, with authority to appoint a deputy either for St. Augustine or Pensacola, while he shall himself reside at the other of those places.

George Walton, of Georgia, to be secretary in and for West Florida, and for that part of East Florida which lies westward of the cape.

William G. D. Worthington, of Maryland, to be secretary in and for East Florida, with the exception of that part which lies westward of the cape; to reside at St. Augustine.

Mark Harden, of North Carolina, collector of the customs at St. Mark's.

John Rodman, of New York, collector of the customs, and Richard S. Hackley, of Virginia, surveyor and inspector of the revenue at St. Augustine.

Alexander Scott, of the District of Columbia, collector of the customs; William S. Smith, of the District of Columbia, naval officer; and Charles Jenkins, of South Carolina, surveyor and inspector of the revenue at Pensacola.

The Secretary of State to Major General Andrew Jackson, Governor of East and West Florida.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 23, 1821.

I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 2d, 10th, and 12th of April from Nashville. The request for instructions relating to the Seminole Indians, contained in the first of them, having been referred by the President to the Secretary of War, has been answered through that Department.

The list of officers appointed by the President within the territory, which is now transmitted to you, consists altogether of citizens of the United States, the objects of their respective functions being the introduction and establishment of the laws of the Union in the country.

It is not, however, the intention of the President that, in the distribution of official situations, the natives or inhabitants of the country itself should be overlooked. The offices, the duties of which relate to the civil and internal administration of the territory, will be those for which the qualifications of the people of the country will be peculiarly appropriate; and, leaving the distribution of them entirely to your discretion, he is confident it will be exercised with a just regard to the interest and feelings of the people of Florida, and in a manner which may tend at once to their satisfaction, and to render their change of condition as acceptable to their inclinations as it is hoped it will be propitious to their welfare.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Secretary of State to Andrew Jackson, Esq., Governor of Florida.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 27, 1821.

I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 24th of April, 1st, 7th, 19th, 23d, and 30th of May, with their enclosures.

The conduct of the Governor and Captain General of the island of Cuba in delaying, without any apparent satisfactory reason, the delivery of the orders to the Governors of East and West Florida for the evacuation of those provinces by the officers and troops of Spain, and in evading the delivery at all of the archives in his possession, and which, by a stipulation of the treaty, were to be given up, appears to have been very exceptionable.

The President has been disposed to make every allowance for the dilatory character of all transactions habitual to the officers of the Spanish Government. On receiving your letter of 19th May, he had thought it would be necessary to take measures, on a presumption that the unwarrantable delays of the Governor of Cuba would be still continued, which, under other circumstances, it would be very desirable to avoid. While these measures, however, were under consideration, intelligence was received from Colonel Forbes that he had at length received the orders for the delivery of the two provinces, and, immediately afterwards, that he had actually sailed from the Havana, on the 30th ultimo, for Pensacola. As the order to the Governor of St. Augustine had been despatched on the same day, and that order was received by him on the 7th instant, we are in daily expectation of receiving the information that that place has been delivered up to Colonel Butler, and that the Spanish officers and troops there have embarked for the Havana. The tenor of your correspondence with the Governor of Pensacola, as well as the character heretofore known of Governor Callava, have led to the hope and expectation that he will, on receiving the order of evacuation, manifest all the alacrity for carrying the treaty into execution which has been professed in his letters. It was therefore concluded here that it would be most advisable to take no step founded on the supposition that unnecessary delays will be still experienced in the evacuation of the Floridas, even after the orders for their evacuation shall have been received by the governors of the respective provinces.

Your letters of the 23d and 30th ultimo have been forwarded to the President, who is in Loudoun. I shall inform you as soon as possible of his directions on your suggestion of a wish to be furnished with a check on the Branch Bank at New Orleans.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Secretary of State to Andrew Jackson, Esq., Governor of the Floridas.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, August 20, 1821.

I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 16th, 17th, and 18th ultimo, with their enclosures. They were immediately transmitted to the President, who is at the Shannondale Springs.

As it will doubtless be one of the earliest objects of attention to Congress, at their ensuing session, to prepare a more permanent system of government for the Territories of Florida, I would solicit communications from you, as early and as ample as you can make them, of information which may serve to enlighten the inquiries upon which it may be expected that this legislation will be founded.

A reference to the laws of Congress which were from time to time enacted for the government of the Louisiana Territories, may serve to point out some of the particulars upon which information will be most desirable. In this view, the following acts are presented to your attention:

1. An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof. March 26, 1804. Laws U. S., vol. 3, p. 603.

2. An act further providing for the government of the Territory of Orleans. March 2, 1805. Page 648.

3. An act further providing for the government of the district of Louisiana. Page 658. March 3, 1805.

4. An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans and the district of Louisiana. Page 652. March 2, 1805.

5. An act extending the powers of the surveyor general to the Territory of Louisiana, and for other purposes. Vol. 4, p. 6. February 28, 1806.

6. An act supplementary to an act entitled "An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans and the district of Louisiana." Page 50. April 21, 1806.

7. An act respecting claims to land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana. Page 111. March 3, 1807.

8. An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana. Vol. 4, p. 322. February 15, 1811.

9. An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes. Page 328. February 20, 1811.

10. An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, and to repeal the act passed for the same purpose, and approved February 16, 1811. Page 356. March 3, 1811.

11. An act for ascertaining the titles and claims to lands in that part of Louisiana which lies east of the river Mississippi and island of New Orleans. April 25, 1812.

There may be some others, but my reference to these is merely to suggest the nature of part of the information which it is probable may be desired by Congress in relation to the Floridas, and which, it is hoped, your position will enable you to furnish.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: NASHVILLE, April 2, 1821.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th ultimo, together with its enclosures, viz: two commissions; copy of the treaty; law for executing it (in a newspaper;) Colonel Forbes's instructions; royal order for delivery; translation of same; form of proclamation.

In pursuance of the instructions of the President, as communicated through you, I shall proceed, as soon as practicable, to Montpelier, via New Orleans, there to await the necessary information from Colonel Forbes, and shall immediately, upon receiving it, take possession of Pensacola, and proceed to organize the Government agreeably to the instructions. I hope to be able to leave this by the 15th instant, and to arrive at Montpelier by the 1st of May.

I have, agreeably to instructions, appointed Brevet Major General Gaines to receive possession of St. Augustine, and by the southern mail have forwarded him the necessary instructions for that purpose.

There is one subject which, at this early period, I wish, through you, to call the attention of the President to, and receive your instructions thereon. It is the situation of that part of the Creek Indians who in the late war abandoned their own country and fled to the Floridas, and continued hostilities against the United States until conquered in 1818. During that campaign, I ordered the conquered Indians above the Florida line, and directed them to settle down within their own limits (the Creek nation.) I have lately, however, understood that McQueen and his adherents have made a settlement at Mickasuky, and also on the Suwanee river. Are these Indians to be ordered up to the Creek country, there to settle themselves, or are they to be protected in their new settlement? I have only to remark that the country set apart for the Creek nation is sufficient for the support of all, and that, by removing those within Florida, greater security will be given to our frontier, and the Government would more certainly be enabled to prevent smuggling, which, no doubt, will be attempted to a considerable extent, through the various inlets in the country now inhabited by them. Whatever may be the President's instructions upon this subject shall be strictly obeyed, and likewise in relation to the negroes who have run away from the States, and inhabit this country, and are protected by the Indians.

With sentiments of esteem and regard, I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: NASHVILLE, April 10, 1821.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 23d ultimo, and have perused with attention the instructions contained therein. The second article of the treaty, in which it is stipulated that the Territories of East and West Florida, and the fortifications within the same, are ceded and are to be delivered to the United States, is so clear and explicit, that it had never occurred to my mind that an attempt would be made by the Spanish authorities to strip the fortifications of their means of defence. Cannon is an indispensable appendage of a fortification, and the term fortification is always understood to include every thing appertaining to a work constructed for defence. Indeed, such was my view of that article of the treaty, that I should have considered the Spanish Government bound by their cession of the fortifications with the territory to pass over to the United States, not only the fortifications, but the ordnance and munitions of war contained therein.

If, on my arrival at Pensacola, any difficulty should arise on this subject, I will avail myself of your very just suggestions, and will endeavor, as forcibly as I can, to impress the governor with a sense of the liberal construction which the United States are disposed to give to the treaty. In any event, you may rest assured that your instructions will be most promptly attended to.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: NASHVILLE, April 12.

I have the honor to inform you that I sail from this place to-day, at 1 o'clock P. M. I have despatched my aid-de-camp, Captain Call, to Montpelier, with instructions to receive the communications from Colonel Forbes, in the event of his arrival before I reach that place, and to place the troops destined for the occupation of Pensacola in a state of readiness to march at a moment's warning. I hope to reach Montpelier by the 1st of next month, should I not be detained at Orleans for the want of a vessel to transport me to Montpelier.

I am, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: NEW ORLEANS, April 24, 1821.

On the evening of the 22d instant I reached this city on my way to Montpelier, and will, if I can procure a transport, proceed on my journey on the 26th instant.

Immediately on my arrival, Mr. Fromentin waited upon me, and produced a commission dated in the year 1819, authorizing him to receive the Floridas, together with the archives at Pensacola and St. Augustine. He appears to be impressed with a belief that, although that part of his commission to receive the Floridas was superseded, yet, as the Executive had been silent on the subject of the archives to be received at Pensacola, &c., that he, with my approval, was entitled to the safe-keeping of them. From the tenor of my instructions, I do not conceive that I can create any office in the Floridas that does not exist there at present, and that clerks of any kind, except those that are contemplated under my instruction to translate and transcribe the archives for the information of the President, cannot be necessary until the next meeting of Congress. However, should the President be of opinion that a safe-keeper of the archives should be necessary, and that Mr. Fromentin should be appointed to that trust, and express the same to me, with the salary to be annexed, I will immediately notify Mr. Fromentin thereof, and request his removal to Pensacola. But it does not appear to me that there can arise a necessity for any individual to have a copy of any of the records before the meeting of the next Congress. I shall, therefore, not make any appointment of this kind until I hear from the President on the subject.

I have here met with Major Stanton, of the quartermaster's department, who advises me that he is without quartermaster's funds for the purpose of carrying into effect the transportation of the civil and military officers of Spain from the Floridas, as stipulated under the late treaty with Spain; and informs me that it is understood by the quartermaster general that through me the funds necessary to carry into effect the stipulation for transporting the Spanish troops are to be obtained. From the perusal of my instructions, it does not appear that I am authorized to draw upon the State Department for quartermaster's funds, but will take upon me the responsibility so to do. I thought it most advisable to endeavor to raise here, by a draft upon your Department, the sum necessary to meet the expenses of receiving the country and organizing the Government, fearing that a draft would not be sold at Mobile or Pensacola. For this purpose, I offered for sale a draft, and found I could not obtain United States paper for it without a discount. I therefore directed Major Stanton to apply to the Branch Bank of the United States, to be informed whether it would advance upon my draft. It refused. I then addressed a note to the collector, Mr. Chew: the enclosed is his answer. I also enclose the statement of Major Stanton: from all which you will discover that, without a discount, money cannot be obtained here on drafts upon the Government. No delay, however, shall occur in the transportation of the Spanish troops from the want of funds, as far as I can command them; nor will I ever consent to sell bills on the Government at a discount to any, and more particularly to the Branch Bank of the United States, in which is deposited all the revenue of the Government received at this place. I shall endeavor, at Mobile or Pensacola, to raise the necessary funds on drafts. Should I fail there, I trust, upon the receipt of this, the Government will instruct the Branch Bank to furnish me with the amount that may be necessary to meet the expenses that may occur in receiving the Floridas, and organizing the Government thereof.

I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

[Enclosures in the above.]

Major Stanton to Governor Jackson.

SIR: NEW ORLEANS, April 25, 1821.

Agreeably to your request of this morning, I waited on the cashier of the United States Branch Bank, and stated to him your wish to negotiate, through his bank, a draft on Washington for ten or fifteen thousand dollars, which he peremptorily declined doing. Knowing the importance of obtaining funds, and that money could not be had in market for drafts but at a discount, I ventured to state to the cashier such reasons as suggested themselves to my mind why the favor requested should be granted, and the very serious embarrassment that might result to the public service should he persist in his refusal; which, however, he thought proper to do, without assigning any other reason than that the instructions of the mother bank forbade his negotiating drafts.

I have the honor to be, &c.

H. STANTON, D. Q. M. G.

The collector at New Orleans to Governor Jackson, dated

SIR: APRIL 26, 1821.

I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and should have been extremely happy to be empowered to advance the sum you require, by accepting a draft on the Department of State; but particular instructions from the honorable Secretary of the Treasury would be necessary to authorize me to make that disposition of the public money in my hands. I am, &c.

BEVERLY CHEW.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: BLAKELY, ALABAMA STATE, May 1, 1821.

I arrived at this place on the morning of the 29th ultimo, and immediately communicated with Montpelier by express, which returned last evening with information that no advices had been received there from Colonel Forbes.

Being informed that associations exist for the purpose of introducing a number of Afrjcans into Florida before the change of Government, and for this purpose an agent from Baltimore and another from the east are now the one in Pensacola and the other in Cuba or Bahama islands, to obtain possession of the ceded country as soon as possible, and thereby prevent the furtherance of this dreaded evil, I have this morning despatched Doctor Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge with communications to the Governor of Pensacola, copies of which I send you herewith, marked Nos. 1 and 2; and also with instructions to inquire into the truth of a complaint made to me in New Orleans, and reiterated here, that the Spanish subjects in Pensacola are in the habit constantly of pulling down the houses of non-resident Americans for fuel.

My aid-de-camp, Captain Call, whom I sent from Nashville over land to Montpelier, has not reached that place, owing, it is believed, to the unusual freshets prevalent in the upper country. This will detain me here until the arrival of my horses, and until the return of the gentlemen whom I have sent to Pensacola.

I have directed Colonel Brook, in command at Montpelier, to forward to this place all communications which may be received at Montpelier for me.

As soon as I hear from the Governor of Pensacola, I will communicate to you his reply.

I have signified to Commodore Patterson the propriety of sending a vessel to take a reconnoissance of the Florida coastas far as Tampa bay, to intercept any American vessel laden in whole or in part with Africans.

From conversing with Major Stanton, of the quartermaster's department, on the subject of supplies for the Spanish officers and soldiers on their voyage to Cuba, and the inconvenience of preparing their bread on board, I have directed him to order Captain Rogers, of the commissariat department at Orleans, to have a sufficient quantity of sea biscuit prepared for their supply. In this arrangement there will be a saving of tonnage to the United States, and it will have the happy effect of preventing any complaints from Spain on the score of supplies, or as to the liberality of the Government of the United States in their construction of the treaty. I hope this measure will meet the approbation of the President.

With high consideration and respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

No. 1.

Copy of a letter from Major General Jackson to His Excellency Don José Callava, Governor of West Florida, at Pensacola.

SIR: MONTPELIER, April 30, 1821.

Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, surgeon general of the southern division, and my friend, and one of my private secretaries, Judge Brackenridge, will present you this letter; they are the bearers of a communication to you on the subject of a treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, and also of all the documents with which I have been furnished to authorize me to receive possession of the Floridas. These gentlemen are authorized by me to receive any communication you may be pleased to make in relation to the necessary arrangements for the transportation of the officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty, or to such other subjects as you may think necessary, preparatory to the surrender of the Floridas, according to the stipulations of the treaty.

With sentiments of great respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

No. 2.

Copy of a letter from General Andrew Jackson to His Excellency Don José Callava, Governor of West Florida, at Pensacola.

SIR: MONTPELIER, April 30, 1821.

I have the honor to inform your excellency that I have been duly commissioned by the President of the United States to receive possession of the Floridas, agreeably to the stipulations of the late treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty. I have also to state that Colonel James G. Forbes has sailed from New York to Havana, charged with the royal order to the captain general for the delivery of the countries ceded to the United States by the said treaty, and that he is to communicate to me from Pensacola immediately on his arrival, which may be daily expected.

Being desirous, in order to avoid all unnecessary delay, to have in readiness, on the arrival of Colonel Forbes from Cuba, the necessary transports for the civil and military officers, and the troops of His Catholic Majesty, agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty, as well as for their supplies, according to the liberal construction which the President is disposed to give to the treaty, I have to request you to inform me of the number of officers and troops to be transported from Pensacola and St. Mark's, and also of the number of days in which the passage from Pensacola to Havana is usually performed. As the transports and supplies will be procured at New Orleans, you will be pleased to inform me what length of time will be necessary, on your part, after the arrival of the order from the captain general, to enable you to make the necessary preparations to embark. This information is requested, in order that I may have every thing in a state of preparation for your transportation the moment you are ready. It is also important to enable me tohave the necessary supplies transported to Pensacola and St. Mark's, and in depots, for the troops which are to occupy the Floridas.

It being communicated to me that it is expected, from the assurance of the minister of His Catholic Majesty at Washington, that no unnecessary delay will take place in delivering possession of the Floridas, I have ordered the supplies of the troops of the United States to be forwarded to Pensacola and St. Augustine, and they are expected to arrive at those points by the 15th of the next month. The situation of my troops in the interior, and the difficulty of supplying them there, render this step necessary; and orders have been given to expedite no further supplies to the places which those troops at present occupy. A removal of them at an early day is, therefore, rendered necessary, and I have no disposition (unless urged by necessity) to move my troops to any garrison occupied by the troops of His Catholic Majesty, until the same shall be evacuated, being, I assure you, earnestly desirous that nothing may occur to disturb that harmony and good understanding which at present so happily exists between our respective Governments, and the citizens and subjects of each.

From a wish to maintain the most perfect harmony and good understanding between us during our correspondence, I have charged the bearers of this communication, Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, surgeon general of the southern division, and my friend, and one of my private secretaries, Judge Brackenridge, to make known to you the sincere desire, on my part, to carry into effect the stipulations of the treaty and the surrender of the Floridas with the utmost good faith and amity with the officers of His Catholic Majesty, as well as the promptness with which every thing stipulated under the treaty, on the part of the Government of the United States, will be executed, agreeably to the most liberal construction of that instrument.

I am, sir, with sentiments of respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

From Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: BLAKELY, May 7, 1821.

In my letter of the 1st instant I advised you of my arrival here, of communicating with Montpelier, and, hearing nothing from Colonel Forbes, of my sending Doctor Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge to obtain information necessary to be had before I gave instructions to Major Stanton, quartermaster, to provide the transports and supplies necessary for the transportation of the Spanish officers and soldiers. These gentlemen have this morning returned. The enclosed translation of a letter from the Governor of Pensacola, and the report of these gentlemen, will give you the information acquired, and may not be uninteresting to you.

Finding, from the report of the above gentlemen, that the Hornet had reached the Havana on the 9th ultimo, and believing that she must reach Pensacola shortly, and reflecting that it is better for the transports to be ready with supplies, and to wait for the Hornet, than for the Spanish officers and troops to wait for the transports to be procured after her arrival, I have ordered Major Stanton to repair to Orleans and procure the transports and supplies, and to have them ready to sail for Pensacola on the first notice of the arrival of the Hornet there. Major Stanton informs me that he thinks vessels can be obtained on much better terms now than they can be after it is known the Hornet has returned, and that transportation must be immediately had. He is instructed to make the most advantageous contract he can, to save any demurrage on account of any short delay; and I have no doubt, from the rumors of mercantile associations to introduce large quantities of goods into Pensacola, that there will be a great saving to the United States by having the transports ready on the arrival of the Hornet, as well as earlier possession of the ceded country.

It is all-important for the health of our troops to have them removed from Fort Gadsden in all this month, or early in the next, and every exertion, as far as it rests with me, shall be used to obtain this object. I am at a loss to conjecture the causes of the delay of the Hornet; a few days will give us the reason, and I hope it may not be found to exist in any understanding existing between an association of our merchants and the Governor General of Cuba; but, sir, it is rumored and believed here that such an attempt will be made by merchants to prevail upon the governor general to withhold the order for the delivery of the Floridas until the last moment, to give time for the arrival of large shipments of goods for Pensacola.

I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Report of Dr. Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge to Governor Jackson.

SIR: BLAKELY, May 7, 1821.

In pursuance of your instructions, we left this place on Tuesday morning, and reached Pensacola about 10 o'clock the Thursday following. The Hornet was not there, but, from information on which we believe reliance can be placed, she arrived at Havana on the 9th ultimo.

We immediately addressed a note (A) to the governor, enclosing our letter of introduction, and requesting an interview as soon as it would be convenient. He sent us a polite answer, (B,) inviting us to wait on him at the Government-house at 10 o'clock the following morning, the 4th instant. At the hour appointed we waited on him, and presented the communication from you, of which we were the bearers, and which, being explained to him, he observed that, on the subject of the treaty, he was only subordinate to the Captain General of the island of Cuba; that, as nothing had been communicated to him from his superior, he had no authority to enter into any arrangements respecting it; that he could do nothing until he should receive his orders through the regular and proper channel. He declared his wish to avoid all unnecessary delay, and to act with the utmost promptitude the moment he should receive his orders from the captain general. We observed to him that this information was requested in order to prevent useless delay, to enable you with greater certainty to provide the transports and supplies, and offered to show him the copy of the royal order, and other papers in our possession. We reminded him of the situation of the troops of the United States in the interior, intended to occupy the post within the Floridas; the approach of the sickly season; the difficulties of all military movements by land and sea, in this climate, after the months of May and June. He repeated that he had no authority whatever to take any step, until authorized by the captain general; declined the perusal of the royal order, but declared his willingness to communicate fully all the information required by you, the moment of the arrival of the order from Havana. We then requested him to communicate in writing to you what he had stated to us, which he promised to do. We received his reply (E) in the evening, and next morning set out for this place, where we arrived this morning. Previously to our departure from Pensacola, we addressed a letter (C) to the governor, expressing our regret at not being able to obtain the information which we sought, and enclosing a letter (D) to Colonel Forbes, making known your arrival, and stating your anxiety to obtain possession of the Floridas as speedily as possible.

With respect to the points on which we were instructed to obtain information, the following is the result of our inquiries and observation: The number of troops, including officers and persons connected with the Government, who will leave the country, does not exceed five hundred and fifty; two hundred of these are in Pensacola, the remainder at the Barrancas and St. Mark's. Every thing seems to indicate the prevailing understanding that they are shortly to quit the country. The troops are not regularly drilled; there are no morning or evening parades; the public buildings are entirely neglected; and the government seems to be carelessly administered; the inhabitants are impatient for the change, and it is said that but few of the Spanish families will leave the place. The governor, we were told, is personally desirous to be gone; he is a frank, candid soldier, and we have no doubt that any difficulties or delays which may occur will be occasioned by the captain general.

There are at present in the harbor only a few coasting vessels; there have been but few arrivals, and we are satisfied, from every thing we have observed, that the accounts which we have received respecting the importation of Africans is not correct; if any such traffic be carried on, it is much more likely to be between Havana and St. Augustine. On the other subject respecting which we were directed to make inquiry, the injury said to be done by the soldiery to the untenanted houses belonging to American citizens, we find that such injury has been done alike to the buildings of Spanish subjects. Nearly all the houses of this place are in a state of dilapidation, and there are nearly one-half unoccupied, few of which can be inhabited without extensive repairs. Nearly every dwelling, however, has been taken by persons who are waiting with impatience the change of government. Rents have risen astonishingly within a few weeks, and town property is now as high as it probably will be, excepting in particular situations, for some time to come. Nearly all the public property, the public squares, the ground around the block-houses, estimated at a very large amount, is claimed as private property, it having been sold by the order of the King, as we are informed, some years ago. It is a subject, however, very well worth inquiring into. We suspect there is a great deal of very valuable public property in and about Pensacola.

From the shortness of our stay, it was not in our power to obtain information on other subjects, and on those we have noticed not as full as we have wished.

We have the honor to be, &c.

Governor Callava's answer.

SIRS: PENSACOLA, May 3, 1821.

By your esteemed favor of to-day, enclosing the letter from Major General Andrew Jackson, of which you are the bearers, I am informed of your commission from the said general, and, in compliance with your request, I have the honor to inform you that at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, the 4th instant, at the Government-house, you may have the interview which you solicit.

I avail myself of this opportunity (the first which has presented itself) to offer you my services, and in the mean time remain

Your most obedient servant,

JOSE CALLAVA.

Messrs. J. C. BRONAUGH and H. M. BRACKENRIDGE.

Messrs. Bronaugh and Brackenridge to Governor Callava.

SIR: PENSACOLA, May 4, 1821.

We do ourselves the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's reply to the communication of which we were the bearers from Major General Andrew Jackson, commanding the southern division of the United States army, and commissioner for receiving the Floridas.

We regret that your excellency does not consider yourself authorized to communicate the information solicited, as it was extremely desirable, for the reasons which have been urged. An exact knowledge of the number of persons for whom transports are to be furnished, and the necessary supply of provisions, would have very much facilitated the arrangements on the part of the United States. It will, however, be gratifying to General Jackson to receive your excellency's reply, on the arrival of Colonel James G. Forbes with the order from the Captain General of Cuba for the delivery of the Floridas, and to whom we have addressed the enclosed letter, which we take the liberty of requesting your excellency to deliver immediately upon his arrival at this place. We have requested Colonel Forbes to receive any communication your excellency may be pleased to make to General Jackson, and to forward the same, together with his own despatches.

We have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. BRONAUGH,
H. M. BRACKENRIDGE.

His Excellency Don JOSE CALLAVA, &c.

D.

Messrs. Bronaugh and Brackenridge to Colonel James G. Forbes.

DEAR SIR: PENSACOLA, May 4, 1821.

General Jackson arrived at Blakely on the 29th ultimo, and immediately sent an express to Montpelier, in expectation of meeting with despatches from you at that place. On the return of the express, he thought proper, from his great anxiety to comply with the wish of the President to obtain possession of the Floridas early in this month, to send us with a communication to the Governor of Pensacola, requesting the necessary information, to enable him to have provided the transports and provisions for the Spanish officers and soldiers, and also to communicate with you, calculating upon your having arrived. We were much disappointed at not finding the Hornet at this place, but immediately requested an interview with the governor, which we obtained the day following. He informed us that he could make no arrangements, or say any thing on the subject, until he received his orders through the Captain General of the island of Cuba, to whom he is subordinate. We were therefore disappointed in obtaining for the present the information which General Jackson desires; the governor promised, however, to communicate it fully, by express, as soon as you should arrive. General Jackson expected to have every thing in readiness by the 15th of this month, to transport the Spanish troops to Havana. The supplies for the American troops are expected at this place and St. Augustine by that day, and orders have been given to discontinue the supplies at the points which those troops at present occupy. The engagement of transports at New Orleans, and the purchase of supplies, must be delayed until the information requested by the general shall be obtained. The situation of the troops in the interior renders it very important that they should be removed without a moment's delay.

We therefore request you to receive the governor's answer to General Jackson's communication, and to forward it with your own despatches for the general with the utmost possible expedition. He is extremely anxious to avoid all delay, as the season is now far advanced, and many reasons concur in rendering it necessary to take immediate possession of the Floridas.

We have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. BRONAUGH,
H. M. BRACKENRIDGE.

Governor Callava to General Jackson.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: PENSACOLA, May 4, 1821.

In the morning of the day before yesterday I received your excellency's letter, dated at Montpelier, the 30th of April last, by which you are pleased to inform me that Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, surgeon general of the division of the south, and one of your private secretaries, Judge Brackenridge, are the bearers of a communication to me on the subject of the treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, and also of the documents in virtue of which you have been empowered to receive possession of the Floridas; that the said Bronaugh and Brackenridge were authorized by you to receive any reply which I might think proper to make touching the necessary arrangements preparatory to the surrender of the Floridas, according to the stipulations. [Here follows a mere recapitulation of the letter of which Messrs. Bronaugh and Brackenridge were the bearers.] In reply, I have to inform your excellency that, at the present moment, I cannot enter into the particulars which are suggested to me, not having yet received any orders from the Captain General of Cuba, the superior on whom I am immediately dependant, relative to the treaty and the surrender of this province, and by which my measures must be governed, in case I should be selected as the person to make the same. Messrs. Bronaugh and Brackenridge have requested that I would advise you of the arrival of the Hornet as soon as she may arrive at this port, which I consented to do with much pleasure.

I have the honor to declare how satisfactory to me are the sentiments you express, and I take this occasion to reciprocate the offer of my most sincere services.

I am, with the highest consideration, your most obedient servant,

JOSE CALLAVA.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MONTPELIER, May 19, 1821.

I am still without any information from Colonel Forbes, or from the Hornet, since her arrival on the 9th ultimo at the Havana, of which you were advised in my last. Her delay is unaccountable, and places us in an unpleasant situation. It certainly was, from the treaty, the expectation of both Governments that we would have been in full possession of the Floridas before the 22d instant. The situation of the troops on the Appalachicola, in the interior, and which are to garrison St. Mark's, is unpleasant, and the delay will add much to the expense of transporting provisions to them, especially as they are again to be transported to St. Mark's. Believing, as I do, that, as soon as the Spanish agents are notified of the ratification of the treaty, and the exchange thereof, there can be no reason for delay, the moment the Hornet arrives I shall move to Pensacola, and, having taken possession, shall organize and exercise the government of the country, as a thing which we have a perfect right to do at any time. The evacuation of the fortifications by the Spanish officers and troops, and the transporting them to Cuba, is another thing, to accomplish which they have six months, if it is not possible to withdraw them sooner.

Here, from my instructions, I am to remain until the arrival of Colonel Forbes; but, on his arrival, if any delay is attempted, it cannot be attributed to the Government of Spain, but a wanton act of her officers, not warranted by good faith or by the treaty. In this case, therefore, I have a right to present myself and demand possession. This course I intend to pursue, if necessary; and my conjectures that this course may become necessary grow out of the delay of the arrival of Colonel Forbes. From reading his instructions, I cannot see any real cause for his delay, or how it has occurred, or why he has permitted it; still, I hope he has good reasons to satisfy his Government in this particular. I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Extracts of a letter from same to same, dated

MONTPELIER, May 21, 1821.

On last evening Mr. G. L. Thompson reached me, having left the Hornet at Cuba on the 7th instant, and handed me a letter from Colonel Forbes, a copy of which is herewith enclosed. Mr. Thompson informs me that Colonel Forbes had assured him that he would not be detained more than four days at furthest, and stated to him that he had this positive assurance from the Governor General of Cuba.

I sincerely regret the delay of Colonel Forbes, as, on his arrival, I am prepared to present myself and receive possession of the country, and put an end to this barbarous traffic, [slave trade,] which I have no doubt is now practising on the coast of Florida.

I advised you in a former letter that I had sent bills on the Government, by Colonel Gadsden, to the amount of $3,000, to be sold in Orleans. I am advised by him that he could not effect a sale of them, and that he was compelled to raise money to enable him to procure the necessary transports for Major Stanton from other sources, of which you will be advised hereafter. Unless the Government furnishes me with a check upon the Branch Bank of the United States at Orleans, I am fearful that I shall not be able to proceed well in the organization of the Government.

I enclose you a copy of a letter from the Governor of Pensacola, received by my aid-de-camp, (Captain Call,) together with a copy of his report, which will show you the feelings of the governor, and that nothing is wanting but the arrival of Colonel Forbes to place us in possession of the ceded country.

I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Copy of a letter from Colonel J. G. Forbes to Major General Andrew Jackson.

SIR: HAVANA, May 7, 1821.

Commissioned by the President of the United States to deliver the royal order upon the Governor of Cuba for the delivery of the Floridas to our Government, I was directed by the honorable Secretary of State to communicate with your excellency upon my arrival at Pensacola with the further order of the governor to the Spanish authorities in the Floridas.

I arrived in the Hornet sloop of war on the 22d of last month, and was very favorably received by Governor Mahy, who expressed a wish to expedite me very promptly, as soon as the convoy for Spain sailed. This assurance has been renewed to me occasionally since, but I regret to say that I am still uncertain when I can receive either the necessary order, or the archives, which also come within the range of my commission.

I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by Mr. Thompson of making this communication, and take the liberty of suggesting to your excellency the expediency of having a person at Pensacola from whom I can, on landing, receive such information as will enable me to communicate immediately with your excellency by express.

I beg leave also to state that I have applied for an order, in duplicate form, so as to embrace East Florida, and that, on receipt of it, I shall endeavor to find a suitable opportunity of transmitting it to the commanding officer of the United States troops at Amelia island, subject to such orders as he may receive from the Department of State, or from your excellency, taking the original with me in the Hornet.

As Mr. Thompson is fully acquainted with the nature of my mission, I refer your excellency to him for any further information, with the assurance that no exertions have been, or shall on my part be, spared, to carry into complete effect the objects of such national importance.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

JAMES G. FORBES,
A Commissary and Agent of the U. S. under the Florida treaty.

Report of Captain Call to General Jackson.

GENERAL: MONTPELIER, May 21, 1821.

In obedience to your instructions of the 11th, I left this on the 13th, and arrived at Pensacola on the 14th instant. The result of my mission to which place I have now the honor to report.

On my arrival I addressed a note to the governor, of which No. 1 is a copy, and received in reply No. 2, herewith enclosed. On the 15th I had an interview with the governor, delivered your letter of the 11th, and received for answer No. 3, which I have presented to you, and from which you will find that the governor has acceded to your proposition, so far as it relates to your making a deposite of provisions at Pensacola, to facilitate which he has offered a public store-house, and a guard for its protection. But he expresses much regret that he is not authorized to withdraw the garrison of St. Mark's until he receives the orders of the Captain General of Cuba to that effect. He pledges himself that every exertion in his power shall be made to carry the treaty into immediate operation; and that, when ordered by the captain general, every facility on his part shall be given to the American authorities for the most prompt occupation of the ceded territory. I had repeated interviews with the governor, and, as far as I had an opportunity of forming an opinion of his character, I believe him to be a frank, ingenuous soldier, and that every confidence may be placed in the professions which he has made. Of this I am sure—he is not less anxious to leave than you are to occupy the ceded country. For information relative to the sloop of war Hornet, I refer you to Mr. Thompson, who left her in the port of Havana on the 9th instant.

I am, sir, &c.

R. K. CALL, A. D. C.

No. 1.

Captain Call to Governor Callava.

PENSACOLA, May 14, 1821.

Captain Call, of the United States army, presents his respects to Don José Callava, Governor of West Florida, and informs him that he is the bearer of a communication from Major General Jackson to his excellency, with whom Captain Call requests the pleasure of an interview.

No. 2.

Answer to the above.

PENSACOLA, May 14, 1821.

His excellency Governor Callava has just received Captain Call's note. He presents his respects to him, and informs him that he may have the interview which he requests at ten o'clock to-morrow morning, in the Government-house.

No. 3.

[TRANSLATION.]

Copy of a letter from the Governor of West Florida to General Andrew Jackson.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: PENSACOLA, May 16, 1821.

I received yesterday morning, with much satisfaction, by the hands of Captain Richard K. Call, your excellency's aid, your communication of the 11th, in reply to mine of the 4th instant.

I am persuaded that I stated to Judge Brackenridge, in the interview with me, and on the delivery of your first communication, that your excellency would find no obstacle to the depositing at this place the supplies to which you refer, and on this occasion I have given the same assurance to Captain Call.

The suggestion of your excellency respecting the transportation of the Spanish garrison of St. Mark's to this place, in order that, united with the rest, they may sail together under the convoy of the Hornet, is as worthy of your excellency's prudence as it is necessary and proper, and I shall contribute to it with pleasure (as soon as the expected orders shall arrive from the captain general) as far as may be in my power, and with the activity and energy necessary to prevent the inconveniences which may be occasioned by delay. I regret that, at present, this is not within the compass of my authority, those orders not having yet arrived.

I hope your excellency will do me the honor to be fully persuaded that I heartily concur with you in wishing that every thing between us may be conducted with the utmost harmony and friendship; as, also, of the satisfaction which your sentiments have given to the officers and troops under my charge, as well as to myself.

As soon as I shall be empowered to enter on the subject of the evacuation of this province, I will transmit to your excellency, with the utmost punctuality, the information requested of me, and whatever else may contribute to the more satisfactory accomplishment of the business. Captain Call shall receive from me all the respect and attentions due to him, as well on account of his individual worth, as of the pleasure I take in honoring your excellency's recommendation.

God preserve you many years.

JOSE CALLAVA.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MONTPELIER, May 30, 1821.

In my letter to you of the 21st instant, I advised you of the arrival of Mr. Thompson, and the receipt of a letter from Colonel Forbes, a copy of which I enclosed to you, and which I hope will reach you in due time.

I have had no information from Colonel Forbes since my last, but it appears to be understood and expressed by the inhabitants of Pensacola that we will not get possession until the expiration of six months from the exchange of ratifications of the treaty. My letter of the 19th instant will have given you my construction of the treaty, and my power under the commission to take possession of the Floridas, combined with your instructions. I shall anxiously await your answer to that letter, as I have but little doubt now but we will experience every delay that can be thrown in our way, and I have no wish to do any act contrary to my instructions or the wish of my Government; but when I review the delays and conduct heretofore practised by the Spanish Government, I feel myself bound to oppose any attempt to prostrate our national character, and to violate the pledges of friendship given in the treaty. I feel every desire to harmonize and to obtain possession of the country ceded in the most gentle manner, provided I meet a corresponding disposition on the part of the officers of Spain; but if the order for the delivery should not be sent by Colonel Forbes to the Governor of Pensacola, on his report that he has delivered the royal order to the Captain General and Governor of Cuba, I deem it imperious upon me to advance within the limits of Florida, tender sufficient transportation, and demand a surrender of the country, agreeably to the second article of the treaty; it being presumed that the Governor General of Cuba has done his duty, and that, duly notifying the governor, he has given the necessary order for the delivery of the ceded country. If the governor alleges that he is not ready to deliver the country and embark his troops, it seems to me that he is not only bound to show good reasons, but also to defray the expenses of demurrage incurred upon the public vessels ordered for the transportation of his troops. If the Spanish governor should not embark his troops before the 22d of August next, must not the Spanish Government, after that date, furnish their own transportation, having violated the treaty? and have I not a right, after that date, to take possession by force, if not peaceably surrendered? From the wording of the act of Congress, I have no doubt we have.

I hope I may be agreeably disappointed in my forebodings; but, from the declarations of some Americans that we will not get, nor have a right to demand, possession until the expiration of the six months, and that even then we must negotiate for possession, added to the delay already experienced, I am induced to believe that every delay will be experienced that the Spanish officers think will be submitted to by the American Government. Be assured I shall act with caution, but with firmness and energy. I cherish a hope that the officers of Spain may meet me harmoniously; and, although appearances are at present to the reverse, I still believe they think that I will act promptly, and that they will be thereby induced not to hazard too much by unnecessary delay. I shall wait with anxiety for your answer to my letter of the 19th instant. I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Extracts of a letter from Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State, dated MONTPELIER, June 9, 1821.

I am still here awaiting the arrival of Colonel Forbes, from whom I have heard nothing since the receipt of his letter of the 7th May last. As I advised you, Major Stanton has engaged the transports, and they will be in Pensacola bay on the 10th instant, unless adverse winds prevent. They were to sail from Orleans on the 3d instant.

It was calculated with certainty that Colonel Forbes would have been here long since. Should he permit himself to be much longer detained, the demurrage on the transports here and at Amelia island will be a heavy item in our expense, and occasion us to lose many soldiers by removing them in the height of the sickly season; for, sir, to be candid, I have now no hopes of his arriving here before the latter end of this month, or perhaps the 22d of August. I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

P. S. 9 o'clock P. M.—A letter from Pensacola states that a gentleman just arrived from the Havana states that the intendant died on the 19th ultimo, and Captain Read lay very ill. By Lieutenant Hawkins, from Mobile, I am informed that a captain of a vessel from Havana stated to him that Captain Read, of the Hornet, was dead. No account of Colonel Forbes.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: CANTONMENT, MONTPELIER, June 10, 1821.

The mail is just passing, and I have only time to say that an express reached this from Pensacola, one hour since, bringing the information of the arrival of the Hornet at that place yesterday. We shall move from this on the 14th instant, and hope to be in possession of the Floridas as early after that date as possible.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MONTPELIER, June 11, 1821.

My note of yesterday, sent by express after the post rider, will have advised you of the arrival of the Hornet at Pensacola on the evening of the 9th instant. The communication of Colonel Forbes to you, enclosed to me for perusal, with a request to forward the same as early as practicable, will afford you all the information I yet possess on the subject. There can now be no cause for delay in delivering the provinces of Florida, conformably to the stipulations of the treaty, unless it should arise from the error committed in designating Colonel Forbes, in the Captain General of Cuba's order, as United States commissioner authorized to receive the ceded country, and which error appears not to have been corrected on the note attached to the order addressed to the Governor of West Florida, as Spanish commissioner.

Colonel Forbes has not made known to me the causes which detained him after the receipt of the captain general's order for the delivery of the provinces, which bears date the 5th of May, 1821; and it is unaccountable how it should have required until the 28th of the same month for the two notes to be annexed, which are dated on that day.

By reference to Colonel Forbes's letter to you of the 8th instant, it appears that Don Alva, his Spanish colleague, is alone charged with the delivery of East Florida. Should this prove to be the fact, considerable delay and embarrassment may result, as the only public vessel on this station (the Nonsuch) was despatched from Havana to St. Augustine by Colonel Forbes, with the supposed commissioner, Arredondo, for the delivering the province of East Florida to the constituted authorities of the United States.

If Don Alva's presence in St. Augustine be indispensable, it is uncertain when he may be able to reach that place; nor do I conceive that, under the treaty, the United States is bound to furnish him with transportation. It is my intention to send Colonel Gadsden to St. Augustine as soon as possession is obtained of Pensacola, and I have applied to the collector of the port of Mobile for the revenue cutter Alabama for this purpose. Should this vessel be obtained, a passage will be offered Don Alva. I can only assure you that, guided by your instructions, no further delay in obtaining possession of the Floridas will be permitted. I do not anticipate any, unless it should grow out of the detention of Don Alva at Pensacola. I am advised by Colonel Butler that the transports were at Charleston on the 9th ultimo, and must have reached Amelia island by the 15th. All necessary arrangements connected with the occupation of West Florida have been matured. The transports were to have sailed, with Major Stanton on board, from New Orleans on the 3d instant, and their arrival in Pensacola may be expected daily.

I am, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MONTPELIER, June 13, 1821.

Your communications of the 22d and 23d ultimo, accompanied with a list of appointments made by the Executive, with a view of establishing and enforcing the revenue laws of the United States within the Territories of East and West Florida, conformably to the act of Congress for the government of said provinces, were received late last night by express. They have been placed on file, and their contents duly noted.

With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MANUEL'S, (fifteen miles from Pensacola,) June 29, 1821.

I arrived here on the 15th instant, since which I have been employed in making the necessary arrangements for receiving possession of West Florida, &c., and have the honor to inform you that every thing is now in readiness but a vessel, to supply the place of the transport Cora, which was chartered by Major Stanton at New Orleans, and unfortunately lost off the Balize in a heavy gale on her way to Pensacola. Another transport could only be procured at New Orleans, and it was confidently expected that Quartermaster Hunt, stationed at that place, would have chartered another vessel, and despatched her here immediately upon hearing of the loss of the Cora; but this responsibility it appears he did not think proper to assume, although he must have received information of her loss shortly after the accident, and no step was taken to supply another until the arrival of Major Stanton's express, who was despatched to Orleans the instant that a vessel could be procured to transport him, after the information of her loss reached Pensacola. The winds have been unfavorable, but the arrival of the transport I think cannot be delayed more than a day or two, and immediately after I shall receive possession; as I have the pledge of the governor that, in four days, or six at furthest, after the arrival of the transport, he will deliver formally the keys of Pensacola to me.

Some difficulty was likely to have occurred in relation to the artillery appertaining to the fortifications. The governor contended that he had the right to take them away, as they were not specifically ceded under the second article of the treaty. I claimed them as being included under the term fortifications, and urged that it might be considered a violation of the treaty if an attempt should be made to strip the fortifications of their means of defence, and instanced the case of a vessel of war transferred from one nation to another, which might as well be stripped of her armament by the party disposing of her, as to remove from a fortification its guns mounted for its defence, which would entirely change its character, and reduce it to a mere edifice. He, however, at length agreed that an inventory should be taken of ordnance stores, &c., and the subject be referred to our respective Governments; they remaining in the possession of the officers of the United States until the question should be decided. Immediately upon claim being set up to the ordnance, and a receipt demanded for it, as in deposite, I demanded a receipt for the provisions, and likewise for the transportation which would be furnished for the civil officers, and families of officers, which were not specifically enumerated under the seventh article of the treaty. This also has been agreed to, and is to be referred in like manner to our Governments. So soon as I receive possession of the country, I will submit to you all the correspondence which has taken place on this subject, and also a full report of all my proceedings adopted in relation to the occupancy of the Floridas.

In justice to Major Stanton, I must add that no blame can possibly be attached to him for the loss of the transport Cora, he having used every necessary precaution to ascertain that she was seaworthy, as he had been ordered by me to employ no vessel unless he was satisfied that she was such. His report, together with certificates, &c., which fully prove that he faithfully performed his duty, shall be furnished you.

The unlooked-for delay of the Hornet, in the first place; the extraordinary occurrence of Don Alva bringing with him to Pensacola a despatch to the Governor of East Florida, which the Governor of West Florida yesterday assured me was from the Captain General of Cuba, and relates to the delivery of East Florida, when the United States vessel Nonsuch, at the request of Colonel Forbes, was ordered from Havana direct to St. Augustine, together with the delay which has necessarily [been] occasioned by the loss of the transport Cora, will add to our expense in obtaining possession of the Floridas. And, to prevent any further delay from the circumstance of Don Alva having brought to this place despatches for the Governor of St. Augustine, and to insure immediate possession, Colonel Gadsden will sail to-morrow in the United States schooner Revenge, which fortunately touched on yesterday at Pensacola, taking with him the necessary orders to Colonel Butler, and offering to carry the despatch to the Governor of East Florida.

I was fortunate enough to obtain from Colonel Gadsden the sum of four thousand seven hundred and twenty dollars, for which I have given him duplicate drafts, as per letter of advice.

I have had much writing in answering the letters of the Governor of Pensacola, which has engrossed all my time, and given great labor to my translators.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PENSACOLA, July 17, 1821.

Mine of the 29th June advised you of the occurrences to that date. I have now to inform you that, at 10 o'clock of this day, the province of West Florida, with its dependencies, &c., was delivered to me in due form by Don José Callava, the commissioner on the part of the King of Spain.

I shall take the earliest opportunity to communicate the circumstances preceding and attending the surrender. Suffice it to say, for the present, that it was accomplished in the most friendly and harmonious manner, although at one moment, from a misapprehension on both sides, I did not flatter myself with so happy an issue.

Some ordinances for the better government of the town and province, and in fact which are absolutely necessary, have been prepared; copies of these, as well as a report of my whole proceedings as commissioner for receiving possession of Florida, will be forwarded to you as soon as possible, and I am satisfied they will be found strictly within the powers with which I am clothed by the President.

None of the officers appointed by the President for this province have yet joined me; whether any of those appointed for East Florida have arrived, I am not certainly informed.

With great consideration, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Governor Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PENSACOLA, July 18, 1821.

I have the honor to enclose you the procès verbal, having retained the duplicate.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant.

[Without signature.]

The undersigned, Major General Andrew Jackson, of the State of Tennessee, commissioner of the United States, in pursuance of the full powers received by him from James Monroe, President of the United States of America, of the date of the 10th of March, 1821, and of the forty-fifth [year] of the independence of the United States of America, attested by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; and Don José Callava, commandant of the province of West Florida, and commissioner for the delivery, in the name of His Catholic Majesty, of the country, territories, and dependencies of West Florida, to the commissioner of the United States, in conformity with the powers, commission, and special mandate received by him from the Captain General of the island of Cuba, of the date of the 5th of May, 1821, imparting to him therein the royal order of the 24th of October, 1820, issued and signed by His Catholic Majesty Ferdinand the Seventh, and attested by the Secretary of State, Don Evaristo Perez de Castro:

Do certify by these presents that, on the seventeenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one of the Christian era, and forty-sixth [year] of the independence of the United States, having met in the court-room of the Government-house, in the town of Pensacola, accompanied on either part by the chiefs and officers of the army and navy, and by a number of the citizens of the respective nations, the said Andrew Jackson, major general and commissioner, has delivered to the said colonel commandant, Don José Callava, his before-mentioned powers, whereby he recognises him to have received full power and authority to take possession of and to occupy the territories ceded by Spain to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Washington, on the 22d day of February, 1819, and for that purpose to repair to said territories, and there to execute and perform all such acts and things touching the premises as may be necessary for fulfilling his appointment conformably to the said treaty and the laws of the United States; with authority, likewise, to appoint any person or persons in his stead to receive possession of any part of the said ceded territories, according to the stipulations of the said treaty. Wherefore, the colonel commandant, Don José Callava, immediately declared that, in virtue and in performance of the power, commission, and special mandate, dated at Havana on the 5th of May, 1821, he thenceforth, and from that moment, placed the said commissioner of the United States in possession of the country, territories, and dependencies of West Florida, including the fortress of St. Mark, with the adjacent islands dependant upon said province, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings which are not private property, according to, and in the manner set forth by the inventories and schedules which he has signed and delivered, with the archives and documents directly relating to the property and sovereignty of the said Territory of West Florida, including the fortress of St. Mark, and situated to the east of the Mississippi river; the whole in conformity with the second article of the treaty of cession concluded at Washington, on the 22d of February, 1819, between Spain and the United States, by Don Luis de Onis, minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, and John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, both provided with full powers; which treaty has been ratified on the one part by His Catholic Majesty Ferdinand the Seventh, and the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, on the other part; which ratifications have been duly exchanged at Washington the 22d of February, 1821, and the forty-fifth [year] of the independence of the United States of America, by General Don Dionisio Vives, minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, and John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, according to the instrument signed on the same day.

And the present delivery of the country is made in order that, in execution of the said treaty, the sovereignty and the property of that province of West Florida, including the fortress of St. Mark, shall pass to the United States under the stipulations therein expressed.

And the said colonel commandant, Don José Callava, has, in consequence, at this present time, made to the commissioner of the United States, Major General Andrew Jackson, in this public cession, a delivery of the keys of the town of Pensacola, of the archives, documents, and other articles, in the inventories before mentioned; declaring that he releases from their oath of allegiance to Spain the citizens and inhabitants of West Florida who may choose to remain under the dominion of the United States.

And that this important and solemn act may be in perpetual memory, the within named have signed the same, and have sealed with their respective seals, and caused to be attested by their secretaries of commission, the day and year aforesaid.

ANDREW JACKSON.

By order of the commissioner on the part of the United States:
R. K. CALL, Secretary of the Commission.

JOSE CALLAVA.

Por mandato de su Señoria el coronel comisario del Gobierno de España:
El Secretario de la Comision, JOSE Y. CRUZAT.

[The following papers, relating to the same subject, were communicated by the messages of the 29th January, 19th April, and 6th May, 1822.]

The Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 13, 1821.

The hope had been entertained, after the ratification by both parties of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, between the United States and Spain, that all our relations with that country would thenceforth have been of the most amicable character, signalized only by the interchange of good offices. It is painful to be obliged, on your return to your station at Madrid, to charge you with representations to be made to the Government of Spain relative to the unwarrantable delays of the Governor and Captain General of the island of Cuba in taking the measures incumbent upon him for carrying the treaty into execution.

By the seventh article of the treaty, the Spanish troops were to be withdrawn from the ceded territories, and possession of them was to be given of the places occupied by them within six months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible; and the United States were to furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana.

As soon as was practicable after the exchange of the ratifications, arrangements were made on the part of this Government with the view of carrying into effect these stipulations. The royal order from the King of the Spains to the Captain General of the island of Cuba for the delivery of the ceded territories, and of the archives belonging to them, to the commissioners of the United States authorized to receive them, had been transmitted, with the Spanish ratification of the treaty, to the minister of Spain residing here, to be delivered by him after the exchange of the ratifications. It was accordingly delivered by him. Colonel James Grant Forbes was appointed by the President to carry it to the Governor of Cuba, and commissioned to receive the orders to the governors or commanding officers of the places within the territories for their delivery, and also the archives which were to be given up. The United States ship Hornet was despatched to the Havana with Colonel Forbes, who was instructed, on receiving them, to proceed with them forthwith to Pensacola, taking suitable measures for transmitting the order to the Governor of East Florida, at St. Augustine. A letter from the Spanish minister here to the Governor of Cuba was also furnished to Colonel Forbes, announcing him as the officer authorized to receive the order for delivery and the archives. General Jackson was appointed by the President Governor of East and West Florida, and was instructed to proceed immediately to Montpelier, the post within the United States nearest to Pensacola, there to await the arrival of Colonel Forbes with the necessary orders; upon which, the general was directed to receive possession for the United States, and to provide for the transportation of the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana; and, by a liberal construction of that article of the treaty, the provisions necessary for the subsistence of these officers and troops on their passage were considered as included within its obligation.

General Jackson reached the post of his destination on the 30th of April. On the 22d of the same month, Colonel Forbes had arrived in the Hornet at Havana; and, had he been despatched without delay, might have arrived at Pensacola in season for the reception of General Jackson, without any unnecessary detention. The letters received at this Department from Colonel Forbes (copies of which are herewith enclosed) exhibit a series of delays on the part of the governor, for which no adequate reason is assigned, but which have already produced great public inconvenience to the United States, and which, if longer continued, will give them the most serious grounds of complaint. The last letter received from Colonel Forbes bears date of the 23d of May, when his detention had already been protracted more than a month; in the interval of which, the reappearance of the disease incidental to the climate excited strong apprehensions for the health of the captain and crew of the Hornet, as well as of Colonel Forbes himself. There is too much reason for the alarm with regard to Captain Read, who is stated, by accounts of dates more recent than those officially received, to have been on the 28th of May still at the Havana, and very dangerously ill.

General Jackson, desirous of ascertaining the number of men for whom it would be necessary to procure transports and provisions, as well as to make arrangements for the supplies necessary to the troops of the United States who were to take their place, sent, on the 1st of May, Dr. Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge to Pensacola, with a communication to Don José Callava, Governor of West Florida, to communicate to him the commission and authority with which he was clothed, and to ask of him such information as would be necessary for the arrangements adapted to the evacuation of the territory by the troops of Spain, and to the taking of possession on the part of the United States. Governor Callava declined making any such communication, declaring himself subordinate altogether to the Governor General of Cuba; and that he did not feel authorized to act at all in regard to the execution of the treaty, until duly instructed to that effect by his superior officer. The letters (copies of all which are enclosed) contain intimations from various sources that all these dilatory proceedings have too much connexion with private purposes and dishonorable pecuniary speculations. It is yet wished that this awkward and unpleasant state of things may before this have terminated; but the unreasonable delays of the Governor General of Cuba, inconsistent no less with good faith than with the good harmony which we are so desirous of cultivating with Spain, cannot be suffered to pass without animadversion. You will take the earliest opportunity after your arrival at Madrid to make suitable representations on this subject to the Spanish Government, and to state that whatever unpleasant or injurious consequences may result from this unwarrantable conduct of the Governor of Cuba might be attributed altogether to him.

By the fourth article of the treaty, each of the contracting parties engaged to appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, to meet before the termination of one year from the ratification of the treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, to run and mark the boundary line. Colonel McRea has been appointed the commissioner on the part of the United States, and will be ready to proceed on the important duties of the commission as soon as the appointment of the Spanish commissioner and surveyor shall be notified to us. It is further stipulated that the two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and to their escorts, if necessary. At the time of the exchange of ratifications, General Vives, at my request, promised to remind his Government of the necessity of an immediate appointment of the commissioner and surveyor on their part. It is presumed this will have been done before you reach Madrid. Your attention to the subject is nevertheless requested, in case any thing should yet remain to be done to put in train the execution of this article. As the necessary supplies for the commissioners will be naturally best known on the scene of their operations, it is presumed the Spanish Government will authorize its minister here to agree for them to such arrangements in this particular as may be found necessary.

I am, with much respect, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JOHN FORSYTH, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Spain.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 16, 1821.

Since my letter of the 13th instant, a letter of the 28th ultimo, with enclosures, has been received by Colonel James G. Forbes, copies of which will be forwarded to you next week. By a letter of the 5th instant from Mr. Warner, our commercial agent at the Havana, we are informed that Colonel Forbes, in the Hornet, sailed for Pensacola on the 30th ultimo, and the Nonsuch for St. Augustine on the 1st instant.

It is hoped that on the arrival of these vessels at the places of their destination no further vexatious and unwarrantable delays will occur in the execution of the seventh article of the treaty. But Colonel Forbes has been obliged to depart without the archives and public documents which were stipulated by the treaty, and directed by the royal order to the Governor and Captain General of Cuba to be delivered over to us.

As Colonel Forbes thus appears to have been at last despatched, the uncertainty as to the extent of time during which this measure might be protracted has ceased; and the representation which, by my letter of the 13th instant, you were requested to make to the Spanish Government, will properly be accommodated to the circumstances as now known to us. With the complaint of delays, without assignment of any reasonable cause, which it will yet be proper that you should prefer, a firmer confidence in the expectation that no further unnecessary postponements will occur may be expressed; but our disappointment at the detention of the archives will also require to be more explicitly signified; and it will be very desirable that you should obtain a new and peremptory order to the governor and captain general for the delivery of all the archives and documents to which we are entitled by the treaty, which will leave him no apology or pretence for either denial or procrastination.

I am, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JOHN FORSYTH, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Spain.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to Don Eusebio de Bordaxo y Aguva, Minister of Foreign Affairs at Madrid, dated MADRID, September, 1821.

As soon as the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, was ratified by the Government of my country, the necessary steps were immediately taken on its part for carrying it into execution. By the seventh article of the treaty, the Spanish troops were to be withdrawn from the ceded territories, and possession was to be given of the places occupied by them within six months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible; and the United States were to furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and soldiers to the Havana. The royal order from His Catholic Majesty to the Captain General of Cuba for the delivery of the ceded territories, and of the archives belonging to them, to the commissioner of the United States authorized to receive them, was delivered by His Majesty's minister to the American Government with the ratified treaty. Colonel J. G. Forbes was appointed by the President to convey this order to the Governor of Cuba, and commissioned to receive the orders to the governors or commanding officers of the places within the territories for their delivery, and also the archives that were to be given up. The ship of war Hornet was sent to the Havana with Colonel Forbes, who was directed, on receiving them, to proceed forthwith to Pensacola, taking suitable measures for transmitting the order to the Government of East Florida, at St. Augustine. A letter from the Spanish minister near the United States to the Governor of Cuba was also furnished, announcing Colonel Forbes as the officer appointed to receive the order for delivery and the archives.

General Jackson was appointed Governor of East and West Florida by the President, and was instructed to proceed to Montpelier, the post within the United States nearest to Pensacola, there to await the arrival of Colonel Forbes with the necessary orders; upon which the general was directed to receive possession for the United States, and provide for the transportation of the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana; and, by a liberal construction, the provisions for the subsistence of the officers and troops were considered as included within the obligation of the seventh article of the treaty.

General Jackson reached the post of Montpelier on the 30th of April. On the 22d of the same month, the Hornet arrived at Havana with Colonel Forbes; and, had he been despatched without delay, might have arrived at Pensacola in season for the reception of General Jackson, without unnecessary detention. It is with regret that I have to state that, so far from immediately despatching Colonel Forbes, by issuing the necessary orders, and delivering the archives, there was, on the part of the Governor General of Cuba, a series of delays, for which no adequate reason has been assigned, until the end of the month of May, and then Colonel Forbes was under the necessity of departing without having received the archives. Great public inconvenience has been, and will be, sustained by this conduct of the captain general, not less inconsistent with the obligations of the treaty, than, as the United States believe, with the orders of his own Government. The health of the commissioner and of the officers and the crew of the Hornet was endangered by a continuance, at an unhealthy season, in the port of Havana; in fact, her commander, Captain Read, a gallant and meritorious officer, was nearly lost to his country by the ravages of the prevalent disease of the West Indies. General Jackson, desirous of ascertaining the number of men for whom it would be necessary to procure transports and provisions, as well as to make arrangements for the supplies necessary to the troops of the United States who were to take their place, sent, on the 1st of May, a communication to the Governor of West Florida of the commission and authority vested in him by the President, and to ask such information as was necessary to provide for the evacuation of the territory by the Spanish troops, and the occupation of it by those of the United States. This information was not furnished; Colonel Callava replying that he could not act until duly authorized by his superior officer.

In the mean time, intimations were received by the American Government, from various sources, that these delays had too much connexion with private purposes and dishonorable pecuniary speculations. Without giving credit to these intimations, the Government of my country is nevertheless under the necessity of stating that all the injury which has been sustained, and may arise, from the delay to deliver the ceded territory, is to be imputable to the Governor of Cuba; and while the proper confidence is entertained that no further unnecessary postponements will occur in the evacuation of the territory, the failure to deliver the archives is a subject of surprise and disappointment. Although, by the royal order, the delivery of the archives is expressly directed, I would submit to your excellency the propriety of furnishing me with a new and peremptory order to the Governor and Captain General of Cuba for the delivery of all the archives and documents to which we are entitled by treaty, that will leave him neither apology nor pretence for denial or procrastination.

Mr. Salmon to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, October 6, 1821.

It falls to my lot, and to me it is very grievous, to see myself under the necessity of commencing my functions as chargé d'affaires of His Catholic Majesty with complaints. This is the more sensibly felt by me, inasmuch as I have to direct them against an officer of the United States, a conspicuous citizen of the Union, and a highly distinguished general—the hero of New Orleans.

Colonel Don Joseph Callava, as commissary on the part of Spain, confirmed the delivery of West Florida to General Andrew Jackson, who was authorized to receive it, on the 17th of July last; and he could not leave the province on the same day, because it was impossible for him to have concluded the press of business which the delivery produced; and, also, because he was sick; and, lastly, because he had, with the same general, to await the decision of their respective Governments whether the artillery should be included in the treaty or removed, (which was kept in the mean time under his care.) Upon this decision, principally, his remaining in Florida depended, in order to consummate the delivery. Colonel Callava, therefore, remained there, not as an individual, for his pleasure and personal purposes, but for fulfilling his duty as a commissary, charged to give a due effect to the treaty of 22d February. As a commissary, he acted with Governor Jackson many days after the delivery of the province, (on the 3d of August;) and, as a commissary, he was in the territory of a friendly nation, under the protection of the most sacred law of nations. But all laws, divine and human, were, in the present case, trampled under foot by General Jackson.

By the accompanying copy of protest, you will be informed, sir, minutely, of the transactions at Pensacola on the 22d of August last. A copy of other faithful documents likewise accompanies this, which prove the truth and correctness of the whole, as far as the commissary, Don Joseph Callava, has explained; and I am also ready to show you the originals whenever you may demand them.

The treaty of the 22d February speaks of certain documents and papers which the Spanish commissaries were to deliver to those of the United States along with the Floridas, being allowed to carry away others only. The classification of the whole being made, Colonel Callava made the delivery in due form of the former, and then of the second to the Secretary of War and Finance, the officer Don Domingo Sousa; leaving the official correspondence of the Government in the charge of the secretary. The whole were ordered to be put in boxes, in order that, as soon as the commission should be concluded, they might be removed from the province; and Sousa was executing the orders of the commissary, Callava, when three men (to him unknown) presented themselves to him, and, saying that they were commissioned by Governor Jackson, demanded of him those papers. Sousa replied that they were not his, and consequently that he could not give them; but if there were any which they wanted, they could have recourse to his principal, the commissary; but the sight and examination of them were not refused. The same men afterwards returned, repeating that they came for the said papers, and they gave him a note of those which they demanded. Sousa replied as before; but, alarmed at the second visit, and fearing lest they should be taken away, he carried them (now in boxes) to the house of the commissary; but finding him absent, he gave them to his steward. Such is the origin, without disguise, of the atrocious injustice which was afterwards committed upon the Spanish commissary, Callava.

Although his subjoined document shows that none of the papers were of the class of those which ought to have been delivered, since they had no direct relation to the sovereignty and public property of the province, (as the whole belonged to the military, financial, admiralty, or Government archives,) yet there is no opportunity, at present, for discussion on this point. Wherefore, he wishes it to be well understood that General Jackson did not demand them officially of him, Callava; and that a question of that sort ought not to be decided, in the first instance, by the bayonet. Notwithstanding this, the aforesaid general acted in the manner which you will see explained.

Only upon slight suspicions that the Spanish commissary unduly retained some documents, and without their having been demanded in the regular and accustomed way, was his house assaulted and entered by force, in the silence of the night, by a company of soldiers. The servants and friends who were with him were driven from it, and he, being alone, sick, and almost confined to bed, was torn from it with sad array, and conducted, like the most abandoned criminal, about the middle of the night, before Governor Jackson. In vain did he represent the privilege of his character. In vain did he protest against a conduct so atrocious. In vain did he beg to be kept in arrest at his own house, or at least that time should be given him to recover a little from the illness under which he labored. All was in vain. In so abandoned a situation, even there, also, he underwent a species of trial which he could not understand, from his ignorance of the language. A person acted as interpreter, who did not choose to interpret all that he said. A person who acted as interpreter and secretary at the same time, gave as such testimony what that very person had said, and not what the Spanish commissary had wished he should say. From thence they carried him to the prison, and he was set at liberty the day following; but his house, in the mean time, his property, and the papers of his Government, remained at the mercy of the soldiery. He found the seals of his Government broken, and some papers thrown about, and of that he took testimony. This is, in a few words, the history of the noisy occurrence of the 22d August, in Pensacola.

Colonel Callava, considered as a private individual, was in Florida under the protection of the civil laws which secure property and persons. As the federal constitution, so also the present Spanish constitution guaranties these laws of protection. Both constitutions separate the judicial power from the executive, which the governor or captain general of a province exercises, (without which the power would not be independent.) Both constitutions, then, condemn the acts of the general. Arbitrariness in the decrees, informality in the process, inhumanity in the execution of the decrees, are here the characteristics of his procedure with Callava. General Jackson, as commissary, as governor, and even, if you please, as supreme judge, trod all the laws under foot.

If Callava be considered, as in fact he was, as commissary of His Catholic Majesty for bringing to a due conclusion the treaty of the 22d of February, he remained in Florida under the privilege and protection which the laws of the countries (the most sacred) and the law of nations grant. In every way the procedure of General Jackson is irregular, illegal, unconstitutional, and violent. If the security of his person be not guarantied to the commissary, if impediments are put in the way of the exercise of his duty, how can he execute the charge with which the King has intrusted him according to the last treaty of the 22d of February?

The scandalous proceeding of General Jackson against the Spanish commissary is wholly without example, and my Government cannot but view it as a grievous offence committed against Spain. It will be viewed, even by the sensible citizens of this Union, whose sentiments on the point of honor and philanthropy are well known to the whole world, as an insult offered to their country, and to the free constitution which governs it. All nations who esteem themselves civilized and Christian will look upon it as an outrage upon humanity itself.

Wherefore, I believe it my duty to protest, and I do protest, in the name of His Catholic Majesty, before the Government of the United States, against the injustice which General Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, has committed upon the Spanish commissary, Colonel Don José Callava. And I doubt not but that the Federal Government, upon a view of the authentic facts which I have related, will highly disapprove of the irregular and precipitate conduct of the above-mentioned general, and thus give to Spain a proof of friendship which will redound to the honor of both nations; and I expect this with the more confidence, since His Catholic Majesty has recently determined to give a new evidence, among many others, of his particular esteem and regard for the interests of the United States in the permission which he has granted them of keeping in Mahon a deposite of provisions and naval stores, which they may introduce free of duties.

I embrace this occasion of doing myself the honor to present to you, sir, a testimony of my particular respect and distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

Protest of Colonel Callava.

PHILADELPHIA, October 3, 1821.

I, Don José Callava, colonel of the Spanish armies, late Governor of West Florida, and at present commissary, representing my Government, in order to carry into complete effect the stipulations between His Catholic Majesty and the President of the United States of America in relation to said Florida, in the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits which they made and ratified on the twenty-second of February of the present year, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, do make oath, as far as the law requires, upon my honor, as to the truth of what was committed against my privilege, person, house, and papers, on the evening and night of the twenty-second day of August of the said present year, by Don Andrew Jackson, commissary in said Florida, representing the United States under the same treaty.

On the 17th day of July last, at 10 o'clock in the morning, I delivered West Florida, which was that day under my charge as governor, in which character he met me, to the commissary, Don Andrew Jackson, in a public act held in the Government-house. There he received from me all the archives and documents registered, and directly relative to the property and sovereignty of that province of Florida; and he received them by faithful and exact inventories, which had been compared with the documents by four persons, and had been certified to be correct. From the constitutional Spanish alcalde, and by my order, an alcalde named by Don Andrew Jackson received, by like inventories, all the criminal and civil causes of the suits of the neighborhood which are pending before the tribunal of the first instance, over which he presided, and also the notices and papers of its archives.

The papers of the official correspondence belonging to the secretary's office remained in the charge of the secretary of my Government; and the military papers, judicial proceedings of the national finance, and arrivals, (arribadas finecidas,) belonging to their respective branches at the Havana, to which they have been restored by the evacuation, remained with the Secretary of War and Finance, which office Don Domingo Sousa had exercised for the space of fifteen or twenty years. There also remained the smaller vessels, their crews, carpenters, and blacksmiths of the garrison, the effects of the magazines, which were to be withdrawn; the commander of artillery, with the accounting officer of that department, some sick troops, and myself with the aforesaid; and the effects, and all that remained under my authority and prerogative, during the execution of what was intrusted to me, and ordered to be completely fulfilled; and the artillery, with what belonged to that department, kept under my protection during the delivery or removing of it, (which in either case had to be executed by me,) according to the determination which might be made by the President of the United States, and the minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty near that Government, according to an agreement entered into by us, the commissaries, (as the official correspondence between us shows,) and to which I have given performance; and in this state, and as far as I have related, I have waited for that resolution, (which is yet pending;) and the commissary, Don Andrew Jackson, so understood me, (for my Government has substituted no other person in my place;) and I also was recovering from an acute disease, which had at that time brought me to the gates of death.

The day previous to these transactions, (the 21st of August,) three persons, dependants of Don Andrew Jackson, came to the house of the secretary, (Sousa,) to be informed if he had in his possession some military testamentary dispositions, which they mentioned to him. Sousa told them yes, and without reserve they were shown to them, and he informed them that if they wished for any thing they should ask me. All the papers which he had in his charge were closely examined; they declared they would carry off those which they had pointed out to him, because they could not be in his possession as a private individual. Sousa told them that he was not a private individual, that he was an officer depending on my commission and authority, and that he could not give them without my order; and, finally, they went away, leaving the papers. They demanded of him an answer in writing; which they obtained from Sousa, on a second visit.

The following day, (22d,) in the morning, this officer met me in the street; he informed me of the occurrence, and also told me that he had resolved to carry the boxes to my house, with all the papers which he had in his possession, and had delivered them to my steward, not having found me within; because he was afraid, from what he had observed in those people, that they might take them away from his house, and he wished to save himself from the responsibility; and I answered that it was well.

At four in the afternoon of the same day, and not much before, I was dining at the table of Colonel George M. Brooke, of the fourth regiment of the United States line, and of the garrison at Pensacola, by whom I had been invited with all the Spanish officers residing there. The company consisted of Brooke, his wife, Judge Fromentin, the commander of the United States vessel of war Enterprise, Mr. Michael Kearney, the citizens vicar Don James Colman, D. John Innerarity, D. Juan de la Rua, D. Pedro de Alba, and D. José Noriega; and the officers Lieutenant Colonels D. Marcos de Villiers and D. Francisco Palmos; Captains D. Luis Guayare and D. Bernardo Prieto; Lieutenants D. Arnaldo Guillemard and D. Carlos de Villiers; and Sub-lieutenants D. Mariano Latady, and D. José Ignacio Cruzat, secretary of my Government.

Don Domingo Sousa presented himself to me there, with an officer of the United States, telling me that he was a prisoner; and that the reason was, that the three persons of the former day had returned to his house the day before, telling him that they came with orders from Governor Andrew Jackson to seize the papers; that, having informed them that he had that morning sent them to my house, they searched his house, and at last carried him to prison; and he related before the company what had occurred about the papers with the same persons the preceding day.

I immediately ordered my aid-de-camp, Don Bernardo Prieto, accompanied by Alba, who was the public interpreter, to present my compliments to Don Andrew Jackson, and to inform him that Sousa was in fact, as he had intimated, an individual of my commission, and was under my power and authority; and that he could not deliver the papers in question of himself; that he would have the goodness to ask me in writing for such as he might find it proper to claim, and if they were to be given by the regulation of the treaty, or other particular circumstances, I would deliver them to him by the same procedure which indispensable regularity dictated, as had been done with the other papers; or that he should have, in the same way, a distinct explanation of the reasons which prevented their delivery, and that every direct mode of conciliation should be sought, if there was any thing that could be of use to him in any way.

The aid-de-camp and interpreter brought back for answer that Sousa should go to prison, and that they should tell me that I should be put into another dungeon with him.

It appearing to me that Don Andrew Jackson had not been well informed of my message by the interpretation, (although the incident offended me and surprised those at table,) I made the same persons return and inform him a second time; and that gentleman repeated to them in a loud voice, in the presence of several persons, and upon the street balcony, the same thing, saying, Colonel Callava to the dungeon!

An occurrence so strange and abusive in the presence of those who surrounded me at table, a great part of whom were there as a greater compliment to me, and others my subordinates, could not but raise a blush in my face, and disorder my stomach in the very act of eating, and in the convalescent state in which I was; and I felt myself attacked by a deadly pain, (which I almost habitually suffered, and which had frequently attacked me on the preceding days:) notwithstanding, I concealed the circumstance so as to render it impossible to be discovered, that, upon quitting the table, I might go and reflect, for it was not known upon what such answers or occurrences rested.

We all left the table. Brooke's lady was very much grieved; and I was going to the street, when three persons presented themselves to me in Brooke's house, telling me, from Don Andrew Jackson, that they came for the papers which Sousa had carried to my house, or to carry me with them to Jackson's house; because the governor with his authority could not respect me in any other light than as a private individual.

Astonished to find myself involved in such events, with expressive actions I entreated them to do me the honor of returning to the commissary governor with my compliments, asking him how he could forget that I was the Spanish commissary who had delivered to him that province, and whom he had found as governor in it, and who at the same time had not been removed by his Government, nor concluded the delivery, nor withdrawn the artillery, (the destination of which was expected,) nor of other things under my power? That I was surprised at what passed between us; that he would have the goodness to reflect that every paper in my possession on that day belonged to the government which I had exercised in that province, was sacred under my authority and character, by the privilege of the law of nations, which has always been mutually observed and respected among nations, as to those individuals of either to whom the execution of treaties has been intrusted, or other commissioners, and it is a thing unknown that any authority has forcibly violated a trust so sacred, without cause or reason; that whatever paper he might wish to ask, he might demand of me in writing; that on that very day I had offered him this, if it was to be given, or the reasons for its not being my duty or not being in my power to give them; that this was the only mode agreeably to the exact usual procedure in the important charge with which we were intrusted, in the political subject between nations, in the performance of which he could not, by his authority, call my proceedings in question, nor constrain them by judicial force as governor, by which the security of the papers in my possession could be violated, nor any other thing directly depending not on my person, but on my official situation; that I should preserve, as to myself and to my nation, the peace and harmony in which I found our countries, and that I have preserved it with the utmost care as to the commissary, and as to the governor, as far as I have been concerned with him, and also preserved it indiscriminately to all the citizens of the United States who had remained permanently in Florida, or had passed through during my government.

The officers went away to carry this answer, which was given them in the presence of all at Brooke's house; and I, feeling now a recurrence of my pain, requested them to permit me to go home, whither several of those persons accompanied me. As soon as I arrived, I caused my secretary to extend in my office all that I had said to the persons sent, and with him I sent Lieutenant Colonel De Villiers, accompanied by another officer, to the governor, thinking that thus my answer might be more correctly understood by him; but, when it was presented, he would not receive it, and they brought it back to me unopen.

After these officers returned to me, now at my own house, the same three persons came with a determined and brief message that I must not make any pretensions to official situation or other considerations—"the papers, or go with them." I was surrounded by my officers, and other persons of character, whose countenances I saw filled with pain and surprise to see me in the sad state of suffering, and unable to remain tranquil. Till then I knew not of what papers they spoke, as I had not entered upon an inquiry, nor had they given me an opportunity of doing so; and I answered them that I was unable to go out of my house. I entreated that they would, at least, give me an abstract of what papers and of what class those were which they demanded, and I would inform Don Andrew Jackson that I was sick.

Without giving me any answer, they went away, and I laid myself on the bed. An hour afterwards, one of the three presented himself in my house, and gave me an abstract, written on a half sheet of paper, in the English language, and signed Alcalde Brackenridge. I took it; I told him that I should have it translated, and should reply to it; he went away; I gave it to the interpreter at that hour, which was nine at night, and sought repose on the bed; but, a while after, and without further preliminaries, a party of troops, with the commissioners, assaulted the house, breaking the fence, (notwithstanding the door was open,) and the commissioners entered my apartment; they surrounded my bed with soldiers with drawn bayonets in their hands, they removed the mosquito net, they made me sit up, and demanded the papers, or they would use the arms against my person.

It ought to be remarked that, of the three, only one spoke and understood a little of the Spanish language; he was the only interpreter, and I neither spoke nor understood one word of English, and thus I neither knew what he said to his companions respecting what I answered, nor did they know what was asked me. I had to do with him alone, and he was one who had gone and returned with them in all their visits. Some officers and other persons who had accompanied me from the house of Brooke, and who had not yet retired, and were seated in the gallery of the house, leaving me to repose, entered the room, and I answered, in their presence, that the note had not yet been returned translated, but that this was of no consequence; that there were all the boxes containing papers, my trunks, and all my house; that, since force had once openly been used in their demand, they there had every thing at their disposal, without any resistance on my part; but that, before they should proceed to take what they thought fit, I represented to them that now, since my person was not secure as a free man, and in a free country, in the asylum of my house, and in the dead of the night, and that what ought to be preserved to my nation was not respected in my official situation and character, I laid these things before the Government of the United States, and took refuge under their laws, and hoped that they would respect both.

They did not proceed to search for papers, nor did they move any further question about them, when they now saw them at their disposal; but they ordered the troops to carry arms, leave me alone, and send from my house those who assisted and accompanied me. This they did; and to one who appeared desirous to interpret in English what I had said for their better understanding, they intimated, with threats, that he should be silent as soon as he had begun, and I continued alone sitting on the bed, and they in the apartment, looking at each other.

In fine, a short while after, one of the three went out, and returned accompanied with an officer, who, placing himself before me, told me I was a prisoner, and ordered me to dress myself. I answered that I was so, but that he would have the goodness to observe that I was so sick as that I ought not to be taken out of my house at that hour. He made no answer to the interpreter, and remained silent; but one of the three deliberately ordered me to dress. I dressed in my uniform, was going to put on my sword, but, upon reflection, thought it better to deliver it to the officer. I did so, and one of the three took it from his hand, and threw it upon the chimney, and in this manner I was conducted through the streets among the troops.

They took me to a private house, in which they presented me to Don Andrew Jackson, who, with two other persons, was seated near a table; the house was filled with people of all ages and classes, and there he made me a sign to sit down, which I did. By the only interpreter who had hitherto delivered and carried back the verbal messages which I have already mentioned, he put one question to me, according to my recollection, confined solely to whether certain papers had been carried to my house by Don Domingo Sousa, and delivered to my steward.

I requested him to permit me to answer in writing, and to do so with my own hand. He granted it readily. I set myself to write a regular protest, that I might go on to answer afterwards; but I had hardly begun, when Don Andrew Jackson took the paper from before me, and, with much violence and furious gestures, spoke for some time, looking at the by-standers; and when he had concluded, the interpreter told me that he ordered me to give no other answer to all that he had asked me but yes or no. I replied that I offered to be very brief, but that he should question me by writing the question, and permitting me to write the answer with my own hand, and give in my turn the most precise reason for it. He absolutely refused me, and the interpreter wrote upon that same paper which had been snatched from me I know not what.

Don Andrew Jackson proceeded to speak for a considerable time, looking at the people, but speaking furiously; and in the countenances of the by-standers I perceived fear or surprise, caused by what he said. He concluded, and the interpreter told me that the governor would not treat me in any other way than as a private individual; this idea (which I knew not how to account for) made me catch at the word, and demand some explanations. Don Andrew Jackson did not permit me to speak. I insisted that the interpreter should translate what I said; he was sometimes about to do this, and he interrupted him at the very beginning; so that, of all that he said in two hours, (and Don Andrew Jackson directed himself to me,) only the aforesaid intimation was translated to me, that I had not a word to answer but yes or no to what I should be asked, and that the governor would not treat me in any other way than as a private individual. Nothing was read to me, nor was I informed of any thing which the interpreter wrote in that act, nor was any signature required of me; and seeing myself in such circumstances, I put a question, by my secretary, to that of the government of Don Andrew Jackson, if he could furnish me with an authentic copy of all that had been written in the execution of these transactions, and he answered him in the affirmative.

I remained silent; they called my steward; they asked him if certain papers had been delivered to him by Sousa at my house. He answered, yes.

Don Andrew Jackson drew from among other papers one which was already written; he read it to me, and it contained the order for committing me and my steward to prison.

I got upon my feet; I begged the interpreter to ask him if he did not shudder and was not struck with horror at insulting me, and I pronounced a solemn protest against his proceedings. The interpreter informed him, and he replied, that for what he had done he had no account to give but to his Government, and he told me that I might protest before God himself.

I was carried off to prison at twelve at night, and my steward also. I left my house open, with three or four soldiers of the United States troops in it. I left all my private papers, all the official correspondence of my Government, and what was under my charge officially, without any account, at the discretion of Don Andrew Jackson. The keys of my trunks and money chests were not removed. I left in my house no person to represent me, and who was in my confidence; and, lastly, by a respectable citizen of the United States, and my officers, at two in the morning, a couch was spread for me and my other assistants to throw ourselves down upon; (for, by Don Andrew Jackson, I was permitted to throw myself, sick as I was, upon the bricks of the prison;) when, afterwards, I was informed by various persons who understood the Spanish and English languages, that the matters above related, which had been conceived against me, and were not translated by the interpreter, consisted in having endeavored to persuade the people that the papers were taken from the office of the alcalde, and that I was an accomplice in that criminal action.

At eleven in the morning of the following day, (the 23d,) Judge Eligius Fromentin issued a writ of habeas corpus for the release of my person; and Don Andrew Jackson answered that it was not proper to carry it into execution; but, on the same day, at one in the afternoon, he gave order that an officer should inform me that I was released from prison, and might be accompanied by him to my house to examine if the boxes were sealed.

I replied to the person who communicated this to me that I could not enter it unless accompanied by a judge, who might be present, and certify to the situation in which all things in it were found, since I had been dragged from it, leaving every thing to their discretion.

The officer accompanied me into the presence of Judge Fromentin, whom we found sick. I related to him what had happened, and entreated him to afford the protection of the law to my prerogative, person, and house. He informed me that he could not assist me, because his situation rendered it impossible; but he would cause witnesses to accompany me, who should make the examination, and sign it.

I went thither with the officer and many other persons: it was found open, with three or four soldiers within; the papers of official correspondence scattered upon the table, and the covers open; one box, which was left shut, and sealed with the seal of my Government, had been burst open, the seals broken, and again shut, with different seals; and nothing was found wrong in the contents of the money chest. I had not time to examine the papers, nor could I do it, because I was too much indisposed.

On the 26th day of the same month, about half-past three in the afternoon, the secretary of the government of Don Andrew Jackson delivered to mine the testimony which I had asked on the night of the 22d; and early in the morning of the following day, (the 27th,) sick as I was, I set out with my secretary for Washington, to give an account to the minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty near the Government of the United States, leaving without my power and authority in Pensacola what was under my charge belonging to the nation of which I am a dependant, because in me all confidence and every law of nations had been violated by the authority now existing there.

To this faithful narrative, to which I have sworn upon my honor, I add separately, in order to avoid confusion, notes and observations which express and produce the necessary proofs for this condensation.

1st. That the papers in question were most legally and regularly given to the care of Don Domingo Sousa, into his possession, and under my power and authority.

2dly. That they never were abstracted, fraudulently or otherwise, from the archives of the alcaldes.

3dly. That he did not think of concealing them.

4thly. That it was impossible to conceal them; and,

5thly. The nullity and bad aspect of the judicial proceedings against me, against my subaltern, and against my steward, by Don Andrew Jackson, on the day of those events and actions which I have related; and I have produced the proofs of them, as well by authentic as by original documents, all which might be considered as an integral part of this relation, to which I have sworn. And, therefore,

Seeing that Don Andrew Jackson, at present Governor of West Florida, has violated, in that territory, under his authority, the immunity and confidence with which I held in it my situation of commissary for Spain, carrying into effect, under that treaty, what was stipulated by her and the United States in a solemn treaty: that he has also violated the pale of my charge, by breaking open and plundering their sanctuary, at his own discretion alone; by insulting my person in the most illegal manner, and by deeply wounding my character and honor, with the supposition, before the public, of events which I leave to their merits, (ameritadas;) and by obliging me by all this to leave Spain without a representative in said Florida, to the dereliction of its interests: I solemnly protest against the aforesaid Don Andrew Jackson, as the actor in the before-mentioned deeds, before the minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty near the Government of the United States of America.

APPENDIX TO COLONEL CALLAVA'S PROTEST.

Statement of the papers comprehended in the notice of the 22d August, sent to the Spanish commissary, Don José Callava, by a person who signed himself H. M. Brackenridge, Alcalde.

1. The papers relative to the testamentary disposition of José Maria Vidal.
2. The proceedings in the case of Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville.
3. The proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra.
4. The documents in the case of Pedro Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca.

Observations and elucidations which show the merit, importance, and circumstances of these papers.

THOSE OF VIDAL.

Vidal died auditor of war, in Pensacola, in eighteen hundred and six; he left four daughters, whom he had by a mulatto woman, who were informed by the authorities of those times of the sale of some part of their property at Baton Rouge, and, of course, their right to it, and Vidal's property in it ceased, because its having passed to another possessor appears evident from all the antecedent decrees in the register and notarial offices, where the property was then sold, and may afterwards be sold, passing from one to another.

What may depend upon that testamentary disposition has nothing to do with Florida, and belongs entirely to some creditors whom Vidal left residing in the Spanish territories; therefore, those papers belong to the captainship general, with its auditory of war, because, by the evacuation of Florida, it has resumed the authority and tribunal of the Spanish Government of Pensacola. I repeat, it has no existence at this day in Florida: the right of presenting their actions in their proper and natural tribunals cannot be taken from creditors who are Spaniards and reside in the territories of Spain; but, nevertheless, it is also observed (in order to convince that not one person was injured by it in West Florida, in any point of view) that, after the evacuation of the province, the quadroon Merced, daughter of Vidal, requested the Spanish commissary to deliver to her this testamentary disposition, in order that she might show it to lawyers of the United States, that they might inform her if she could obtain any thing from it; and the Spanish commissary ordered the clerk, Don Domingo Sousa, to give it to her, and he told the quadroon, if she wished to procure an authentic copy, to remain in Pensacola, or in her own power, that she might extract it in her own house, and avoid the expenses of the clerk, and that what might be extracted might be immediately compared, and he would legalize the whole, gratis. The quadroon received these papers, and had them on the day when they were demanded in the manner expressed in the proceedings, and she may have them still, since they have neither been procured or demanded to be returned: all which will be hereafter verified.

Those of Carlos de Ville.

Carlos de Ville was a lieutenant colonel of the regiment of Louisiana, stationed in the garrison of Pensacola, and died in eighteen hundred and twenty, (in the time of my government.) About six months before his death, more or less, he sold a house, the only property he had in Florida, and, after his death, all that he left came, in the end, (vino en remmen,) to consist of some pay which was due for his service by the National Treasury. He named as his executor an officer of his own regiment, who went in one of the transports to join it in Havana, on the day of the evacuation of Florida, carrying with him the papers of the testamentary disposition to obtain from the Treasury what was due to the deceased De Ville: he also left some children, whom he had by a mulatto woman, as his sole heirs, but neither their mother nor they are in Florida, or have a residence in it.

Four or six months after the death of De Ville, a difference arose between a Spanish agent, named Don Eugene Sierra, against the testamentary execution about the right of property of a small part of the enclosure of the house which he had sold. Sierra had no means of justifying his claim; I decreed that he should present the proof of property in the time prescribed by law, and that, in the mean time, the executor should not dispose of the property according to the provisions of the testamentary disposition; and thus this difference was suspended, waiting for the time. The property is in possession of the executor at the Havana; thither Sierra is destined, as well as the other agents who have been removed from Florida: the purchaser has quiet and peaceable possession of what he purchased by public and registered deed in the archive delivered, so that, if Sierra has a right, the recovery is certain, and in the place where he can do it; therefore, the demand of these papers is yet more unnecessary, if possible, than that of the others, and their trifling importance has been seen.

The case of Pedro Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca.

They have had a dispute for about fifteen years in the court of the Treasury, (tribunal de Hacienda,) concerning the right of property of a piece of ground; the proceedings proved that it was in neither, and the Treasury sold it for two or three hundred dollars, and in those times employed it in building three small wooden bridges over some rivulets, for the more convenient passage of the people. The purchaser justified the property in Florida by a deed, or document, which the Treasury granted him. Villaseca and Guilkes could not be permitted to plead to a thing which had been finished fifteen years by authority of an affair judged of, nor can it enter into the imagination that it can interest them, nor that they have pretended such a thing, as, in fact, it is not evident that they have made any such request; it is only to be attributed to this: that, on the day when Sousa showed all the papers to those three persons, they, from their animosity, and without entering into an investigation of the precedents, became judges, parties, and attorneys, without knowing what they asked. The proceedings of the Treasury in recoveries, and which produce its entries, are those which produce due steadiness in account and reckoning.

The importance, merit, and circumstances of the papers have been deduced. The case of Manuel Bonfay, which was mentioned in the abstract of Brackenridge, does not take place, because it is comprehended in that of Sierra and De Ville; Bonfay being the person who represents the purchaser of the house: which is another convincing circumstance that the same Brackenridge did not understand what he asked for.

Observations and precedents, which form proofs that the papers in question were, with the greatest legitimacy and regularity, in the care of Don Domingo Sousa, and under my power and authority.

That they never were fraudulently or otherwise taken by him from the archives of the alcaldes.

That he thought as little of concealing them, and that the concealment of them was next to impossible.

And lastly, reflections in regard to the interest to which the actions of Don Andrew Jackson against the Spanish commissary could contribute.

Observation 1.

The Governor of Pensacola, with a lawyer of the title of auditor, exercised all the authority of West Florida in the courts known in Spain, previous to the constitution, except the ecclesiastic, and constituted there the tribunal of the first instance, in which Don Domingo Sousa had acted for fifteen or twenty years as secretary, with an assistant; and under his care, and in his office, were all the causes and documents of the office, because there never had been in Pensacola a person under the title of secretary.

Observation 2.

In the middle of the year 1820, the constitution was established in Pensacola, and by it the political and military governors were deprived of the jurisdiction which they exercised by the ordinary ancient custom. The nomination of a constitutional alcalde took place, into whose power that court came, (he was Don José Noriega,) and to Sousa all the causes and papers relative to the sentence which this alcalde passed came by inventories now existing. It does not appear in those inventories that the papers mentioned in the notice of Brackenridge had been passed to him, which had not taken place, for the reasons which will be mentioned in the following observation.

Observation 3.

The military court was left by the constitution in the same state as formerly, and by that the governor, with his auditor, exercised in it the same jurisdiction as before. The causes of finance, also, were of the same resort, as well as those of the arribadas; and in these three jurisdictions the secretary, Don Domingo Sousa, remained with the governor and the alcalde, to whom other persons were occasionally called to sit in judgment. The testamentary dispositions of Vidal, as he died auditor of war, were dependant on the military court, and the case of Villaseca and Guilkes on the finance; and thus both remained in the jurisdiction of the governor, and in the office of Sousa.

Observation 4.

In 1820, Lieutenant Colonel Don Carlos de Ville died, and, as a military man, his testamentary disposition was subject to the court of the governor, and consequently to the office of the secretary, Sousa: these papers, therefore, not having been in the archives of the alcaldes, could not be taken from them.

Observation 5.

The province was delivered over, on the 17th July, to the commissary of the United States. The Spanish alcalde delivered over all the papers of his archive and jurisdiction, by inventory, to another alcalde, whom Don Andrew Jackson named to receive them; and this last did not receive the said papers from the former; therefore, they could as little be taken from him.

Observation 6.

Nothing was delivered over from the office of Sousa, either to an alcalde named by Jackson, or to any other person, either on the 17th or afterwards; therefore, it is fully proved that such papers were not taken from any of the places from whence they are supposed to have been taken.

These are not the first or second falsehoods which, in the discharge of his duties as commissary for receiving Florida, Don Andrew Jackson has forged to provoke disorders, and to compel me to what it required all human prudence in me to shun; which appears well established in the official correspondence which he has held with me.

Although the reason why the papers of the office of Sousa were not delivered over on the 17th July is here of no consequence, as Don Andrew Jackson, neither as commissary of the United States, nor as Governor of Pensacola, is judge of the residence of a commissary in relation to the functions committed to him by Spain, and as he had nothing else to do but to ask of me whatever he thought it his duty to receive, as comprehended in the treaty, and, in case they were not given to him, to represent it to his Government, to which it belonged to exhibit to mine what it might think necessary, and be confident of satisfaction; nevertheless, I shall express it.

They were not delivered over because they consisted of testaments of soldiers who were not in Florida, and it had not been stipulated that all Spaniards should be prevented from representing their rights in their respective and natural tribunals; nor was it a thing which, in any point of view, interested, or could interest, the United States, in suits of judicial recoveries by the finance, and of shipwrecks and arrivals of vessels, of which the cases were deposited in the national bureaus, and were passed to those of the Havana; but these papers were not yet withdrawn and sent to any part out of Florida, because, with those of the official correspondence of the secretary's office of the Government, which I still left in the charge of the secretary, I had detained them with me under my power and authority as commissary for Spain, because, if any doubt was raised whilst I remained with this charge, as I was remaining to manage it in the way my duty demanded, and having concluded the whole, to make the proper use of them, when the period should arrive for me to withdraw.

Proof that the Secretary (Sousa) did not keep the papers concealed, but also that, at the very time, it was next to impossible that he could conceal them.

Observation 1.

Sousa kept them in the proper place, where the rest were kept. The first time that they were asked for by those three persons, strangers to him, he answered them that they were in his possession. He put them before them, and also all the other papers which were with them in his care, and permitted them to examine both at their discretion, telling them finally, that, if any of them were wanted, they should ask them of me. And could any mortal, any honest man, act with greater candor? That Sousa acted thus, appears confessed by those three persons, in the account which they gave in writing, and it is evident in the trial which they held on the same day. It is therefore seen that Sousa neither kept them concealed, nor thought of concealing them.

Observation 2.

After the delivery of the province had been made, the quadroon Merced, the daughter of the deceased auditor, Vidal, asked me for those testamentary dispositions to show them to lawyers of the United States, because she wished them to inform her if there was any thing in them which she could demand. I ordered Sousa to deliver them to her, and I told her, if she found any thing for her interest, that she might take a copy at her own house, to save what the secretary might require for his trouble, and that I would afterwards compare and legalize the whole, gratis. She carried them away, and she had them in her possession on the day of my apprehension and that of my subordinate. Therefore it was impossible that Sousa, or other persons, could conceal these papers, because they were in the power of one who said that she had an interest in them. With respect to the other papers, I have already related their importance, as also that he placed them in public with the greatest frankness the first time they were asked of him.

Upon a view of the whole that precedes, which has been expressed in the utmost truth, and on an examination also of what will afterwards appear in the returns made in writing, which corroborate and increase the others, the most scanty light of reason will be convinced that the whole is rational, that the opinion was correct of those ideas published before the people being purposely falsified, and the successive steps to appear in their color and sanction conspiring in a very fatal project against innocence.

The most favorable construction that can be given by prudence to those proceedings is, to attribute them to the effects of some lofty and frantic passion. If he assumes upon that authority an anxious desire that his name should make a noise in society, and because other opportunities did not offer in which his existence could be remembered, this excuse had been precipitated to bring him into view; for, in fact, under whatever color it was viewed, the subjecting that which, in its execution, was enforced by the shameful imprisonment, in the face of the world, of the commissary of a friendly nation, and with such impunity, finding it within the period in which he was proceeding to the execution of a stipulation of a solemn treaty of amity and settlement, is not a common occurrence, and, therefore, calls the attention of society towards the man who is capable of depending upon that.

Observations, elucidations, and circumstances, which afford proof of the nullity, illegality, and bad aspect in which the judicial operation has been viewed, which was executed by Don Andrew Jackson and his three officers against the commissary for the Spanish Government, Colonel Don José Callava, in the afternoon and night of the 22d day of August of the current year.

OBSERVATION 1.

The numbers 1 and 2, by which the answers begin, immediately indicate the treachery of the project, if attention be paid to the tortuosity of their commencement, and they also show that the alcalde, Brackenridge, went in that path by joint concurrence and design with Don Andrew Jackson, and not as an impartial man, in the execution of his authority. It is proved, also, because if he took Don Domingo Sousa for a private individual, he assumed in himself all the authority compared with him, if the demand of the papers was a subject of justice, and there was no necessity for that of Don Andrew Jackson; for if he had recourse to him as governor, who had assumed the powers of the Captain General of the island of Cuba and intendant, the alcalde knew very well that neither of them exercises judicial power by the law over private individuals. Therefore, Brackenridge, as well as Don Andrew Jackson, who took up the matter, knew that the claiming of those papers was not a subject of justice, and that it was in the political course of discharging the duties of commissaries named for the execution of the stipulation in the treaty, and that, being with Don Domingo Sousa, they depended upon my power and the proceedings subject to it; but, to pursue the project, they made a mixture of a disguised nature.

OBSERVATION 2.

The numbers 3, 4, and 5, relate to the candor of Sousa, in having placed before the commissioners all the papers which he then had in his care, and informing them that he could not make use of them without my order, because he was subordinate, and also that they should ask them of me; therefore, they then could entertain no doubt in this case, although they had formerly pretended ignorance; but, notwithstanding, in spite of what they saw of the impossibility of their being able to conceal their knowledge, it appears in No. 6, that, without proceeding to the proof of whether what Sousa had shown them was true or not, that, upon a view of the result, they might prosecute the matter, or apply to me; that, leaving this precise path of the law and of the whole proceeding known to be regular, because it did not suit their projected mode, they returned to demand that Sousa should give them up, who, pursuing his duty in the most precise manner, insisted that they should direct their demand to me.

OBSERVATION 3.

In the 7th number Don Andrew Jackson did not address me by word or writing; he commanded my subordinate to be seized because he did not violate the confidence reposed in him by his chief. He did not hesitate to trample upon an ancient and well-deserving officer of the armies of a friendly nation; and, lastly, he confounds him with the greatest impunity and injustice, by insulting him in his person, innocence, society, and his nation.

If it is asked why Don Andrew Jackson preferred this procedure to the regular mode of addressing the Spanish commissary, the imagination, the penetration, and the prudence of man will be unable to discover the reason.

OBSERVATION 4.

In numbers 8 and 9, the officer, Don Domingo Sousa, appears already taken, and in the presence of Don Andrew Jackson, and that without my having the least notice; that he was treacherously asked to give testimony by answering with the monosyllable yes or no, (a sort of limitation unknown till now in all the laws established by men.) What he answered, or did not answer, was done from the rigor of his situation, to please the fancy of his oppressor. What he answered was written, or not written, because one only of those who surrounded him understood the Spanish language, and he, being the only interpreter and secretary, gave credit to himself, and the others did not know what was asked of Sousa, nor what he answered, nor did Sousa know what the other wrote; and, lastly, having understood that the papers had been carried to my house, he finished with him by committing his prisoner to jail. Here I omit referring to the circumstance of the papers, because I have already discussed that with truth in another place.

OBSERVATION 5.

By the 10th number, it appears for the sole fact of Sousa having said that he had carried the boxes of papers to my house before Don Andrew Jackson asked me for them, or claimed them from me in any way, that for that simple act of going to claim them from the commissary of a friendly nation, and to claim papers of that importance, he ordered to prepare a large party of troops, and furnished them with ammunition as if it were for an action in war. But this is not the most singular thing; for its commander had to go five hours afterwards to receive orders, (five hours are mentioned, because at half-past three he made Sousa a prisoner, and that was the course he pursued.) I call attention to this circumstance for a future occasion; but I will mention, by the way, that of all the occurrences with Sousa, in the morning of the 22d, and of these orders of Don Andrew Jackson, I was ignorant, as I was dining at the table of Colonel H. M. Brooke, with all the Spanish officers and other persons, at a public feast which that colonel, the most friendly of his nation and of men, had given for the sole purpose of entertaining us as Spanish soldiers, and from attention to my official situation and character; and I also was making the necessary arrangements for entertaining Don Andrew Jackson, his friends, and the officers of the United States, a few days afterwards—a satisfaction which I might have enjoyed on the day subsequent to the occurrence.

OBSERVATION 6.

In the 11th number he is seen to give the order for my imprisonment, without endeavoring to inquire the least thing of me, or making any claim, by word or writing; and this proves that Don Andrew Jackson well knew, by his own duty, that to ask papers of me from those which depended upon the obligations of my official situation, and to demand them of me with violence in a strange manner, was a natural cause why I should forbear giving them, and should require the precise method in him that I might fulfil my own duty; and thus it is that, the design being to seize me, he commanded it to be done, by giving that as a reason, before hearing or knowing any thing from me.

OBSERVATION 7.

By the 12th number, it appears that the demanding of them from me by judicial process was committed to three persons, but that, in place of the secretary, who had been present at, and acted in, the former proceedings against my subordinate, Sousa, a surgeon, named Bronaugh, was appointed, who is of the family of Don Andrew Jackson, and a man the best suited to his ideas, and subservient to them; and this exchange was certainly formed from a belief that the person and proceedings of the secretary were not suited for the deeds which ensued.

Observation 8.

In the 13th number I am seen in the presence of Don Andrew Jackson, without knowing why he brought me there, because this had been conveniently concealed, and it was also convenient to fabricate other causes. Here it is necessary that the empire of reason and of justice should display, to the horror of mortals, the facts which may convince them of the falsehood, perfidy, and treachery of the three commissioners, and, at the same time, the authority which had induced them to such proceedings.

In the 13th number, already cited, they say "that they had been at my house, and had not found me there; but that, having returned a little after, they found me accompanied by a number of Spanish officers, dressed with their swords by their sides." What is there upon earth so sacred as not to have been insulted and profaned by creatures who, without the least shame, conceal from those who know that it cannot be concealed all that the same persons did in the house of Colonel Brooke, and which I have related in my deposition? They also conceal my answers, and the governor (Don Andrew Jackson) conceals the representations and entreaties which I made, by my aid-de-camp, and the interpreter, Alva; and, lastly, by the officer whom I sent with a lieutenant colonel, which he must have received. And why is that which happened in Brooke's house, in the presence of eighteen or twenty respectable persons, in the very act of meeting them at table, principally concealed? It has already been mentioned that they concealed the insult which they offered in that house to a deserving and respectable citizen of the United States, and such a concourse of persons, to whom, in every point of view, consideration was due, finding them assembled in the act of dining; and it was also concealed to introduce the paradox that the officers had on their swords. (Should they not have had them, when they were dressed in uniform, in that house, and in a becoming act, in company with their chief, and when they went from thence, accompanied by other persons, to his house, which was situated thirty or forty paces from that of Brooke?) What can be expected from men who, in the exercise of judicial proceedings, conceal, on one side, what they do with so much impudence, and, on the other, falsely fabricate criminal ideas against innocence, as will appear in continuation?

Number 13 also says "that the demand of the papers was formally made to me and refused by me." Here, also, they conceal the verbal manner in which it was made to me, and the tenor of yes or no, and come with us; and the regularity of my answer, which I do not repeat, as I have already mentioned it in my deposition.

The same number also states "that, when they informed me that my refusal would be considered as setting the authority exercised by the governor at defiance, and they asked me again, I persisted in refusing to give them up." This relation is entirely false, and their very words show it. In the first place, they omit having any reference to my entreaties and assurances to Don Andrew Jackson, requesting him to ask them, by writing, in the regular course, and that he should immediately have them, if they were to be given to him, or the clearest explanations why they could not be given; and I do not think that this answer was a defiance to him, either as commissary or governor. But I have formally established that no such word was ever spoken to me, nor did they expend more words upon me than those expressed in the relation; and that thirteen impartial persons were present, men of probity, and most honorable in the eye of the law.

The 13th number also says "that, upon my determined refusal to give the papers, these commissioners were about to retire, and that at that moment I declared that, if they would furnish me with a copy of the memorandum of them, I would deliver them, and that they agreed; that Brackenridge gave it me, and informed me that in two hours afterwards he would come for them."

In fact, he gave me the note which I have mentioned in the deposition; and my answer, when he brought it to me, was, that I would have it translated, and would answer it. That of the confession is false, and the following affords proof of it.

The 13th number likewise asserts that, at the appointed hour, they came for the papers, (and they came with a strong party of troops, sent for a seizure, with or without the papers, as will presently appear,) and here observe the proof of the forged confession; because, if they came for papers, which I had offered to give, for what purpose did they bring troops with them? for, in order to receive papers of that importance, or otherwise, there was no necessity for them; but they brought them, not to search for papers, as will hereafter appear.

Now, they likewise, in this number, confess that they also forced the house, the door of which was open; that they found me in my chamber, in bed, &c. &c.; for all the rest which it recites is so much fiction, as the circumstance of Brooke's house has been concealed, for all the act from entering into my chamber, (it was not necessary to seek for lights, as they were there,) consisted in what I have related in my deposition, except that they ordered the troops to charge; and this is the truth, but it is not true that I said, even once, that they should not take me out of my house alive, for I had no idea of saying so, nor was I desirous that they should assassinate me with impunity.

It is also true that the boxes of all classes of papers were in my chamber, and the money chest. But they suppress the observation which I made to them, that, if the taking them prevented the consequences which I was persuaded were about to ensue, they should immediately have my good-will, and the boxes, the trunks, and my whole house should be at their disposal; that they might take what they wanted; (this was said in a suppliant manner, and in the presence of several persons.) They then did not wish the papers, when they could take them away, because they were not those which they were in search of, which, if they had been, it was more in order to violate in my presence the sanctuary which kept them, because, at least, the deed left no suspicion of other cares than to violate it in my absence the following day, (and without any person to represent me,) and to take possession of my house for a whole night, because I gave place to it, especially when I left in disorder all that was within its walls. These papers were not, to appearance, concerned with the course of the transactions, because, in important circumstances, there appeared to be, in no case, any such foreign and clamorous necessity, but the pretext of them prevented the certain advantage of the bold attempt, as will afterwards appear.

Observation 9.

In the 14th number the list of the papers is presented, and the 15th number relates what was done with me in the presence of the governor, and mentions the questions which he put to me, and my answers.

It may be observed that it is not known how, in a population where, in one hour after sunset, not one solitary person was seen in the streets, Don Andrew Jackson had such great numbers of all classes and ages assembled with him, after eleven o'clock, in a very dark night, for those crowds, only knowing (as they did know) all that was resolved on, and was to be transacted on that day with the Spanish commissary, might have been assembled to observe so singular a novelty; but prudence advises that the opinion of that assemblage should be, that it originated from the outcries from the balconies, or other intimations of a similar nature, because the commissary of a friendly nation was about to be sent to prison as an accomplice or the author of abstracting papers from certain archives; for that was the idea which passed current about the imprisonment of the officer Sousa. Let us return to the questions and answers.

It appears in the first, that, whilst I was protesting, in order to answer afterwards, I was not permitted to come to that point; and, also, it appears that the manner of his preventing me is concealed.

In the second, it is observed that he again interrogated me as in the first, but his confining me in my answer to the bare words yes or no is concealed.

In the third, it appears that I was accused, among other things, of being associated with individuals who had concealed papers to carry them out of the country, and that I was tried solely in the capacity of a criminal. I observe here that nothing of this interrogatory and charge was mentioned to me by the interpreter; but that these criminal motives and dishonest actions, which the governor detailed to the public against my person, were the cause of that surprise in the surrounding people, (to which I have made reference in my deposition;) and, therefore, he appears here justified in the opinion of good men for having sent me to prison; besides, my person had been very much offended by the mouth of the governor and the proceedings of the false interpreter.

In those proceedings (which are the only ones which have taken place) no person appears to have accused me; therefore, the governor has falsified that to accuse me of such crimes against my honor; and against him the calumny is proved.

It is said that in my reply I declined answering, except in the manner which I considered proper to my place, and doing it with my hand. And now it appears that, viewing me as a criminal, as a witness, or as a man interrogated in a judicial trial, I asked nothing else but the legal right of men, acknowledged in every society; but it also appears, with the trembling of humanity, that I was absolutely refused, and he was solicitous not to hear me in any way, passing, in order to avoid it, to the examination of my steward.

It may also be observed that, in the two interrogatories, they could not be changed for about two hours, which was the time in which Don Andrew Jackson addressed to me what is above related; and that all was concealed by that minister of justice, only secretary, only alcalde, and only interpreter in the whole transaction; that the other two persons and Don Andrew Jackson did not know what he asked me, or what I answered, and that he wrote what he pleased; but the most particular thing is, that my declaration being written in English, he did not read it to me, nor require me to sign it; and it was very well, for as he knew what he had written, that was all that was necessary. I shall go no further, to avoid being too diffuse, and because it does not appear to be necessary, inasmuch as I presume I have already proved all that was necessary concerning the illegality and fatal aspect of the proceeding.

In the 16th number it appears that I was sent to prison with my confidential servant. On the 18th, the quadroon, Merced Vidal, declares that the papers had been given to her, (as the deposition mentions.) On the 19th, the boxes were ordered to be broken, and their contents to be taken out, without my being present, or any person to represent me. On the 20th, they were broken; and on the 21st, I was ordered to be set at liberty, the papers, as they say, having been found in my possession in the boxes. If, therefore, they were abstracted from the archives of the alcaldes, or concealed in any other manner, maliciously, by private individuals, in order to take them out of the province, why have they not instituted a criminal suit against me?

OBSERVATION 10,

And a review of the preceding, which prove the total impossibility of the Spanish commissary having been able to avoid those scandalous events, by not meeting the project, and the steps which ensued in pursuance of it, in the course of foresight, prudence, suffering, and political sacrifices.

As soon as, by the first premeditated transaction, and Sousa's consequent showing the papers, whom they knew to be the secretary, the circumstance of their having been robbed from the archives of the alcaldes was feigned; then, although this does not appear in the transaction, because it was afterwards concealed in them, it will here produce conviction. On the foundation of said circumstance, the seizure of Sousa was commanded, when he said that I had put them in his possession, and the writ confirmed it, and then my official situation was disavowed; and an understanding with me was absolutely refused, until the party was ready which was to put me in prison, as an abstracter of these papers, or an accomplice; because, if I delivered them to justice as a private individual, the judicial procedure against me was secure; and if I did not deliver them, I was seized for not doing it; but, as I wished to remove that circumstance, if I were heard by writing, under any character, every effort was used to avoid hearing me, that my constancy might give way. The demanding of them from me in that manner, and under the character of a private person, was persisted in; because, if it could be obtained that I would give them up from the persuasion that I might thereby avoid confusion, and save an injury to the nation to which I belonged, and also the official correspondence, it resulted that my proceeding might belong to my official situation, might appear in accordance with that criminal and base circumstance, and then the project might be effected with greater degradation, under a better appearance and with less responsibility; so it is that, without that recourse, (which at first appears to have been adopted as a political agreement to save scandal, and the other papers,) I was set at liberty.

Here I have given the projected machination, and the extremities to which I was reduced by it, without the power of making greater sacrifices than those of stopping the torrent of my feelings, and giving an example to the agents around me of moderation, and also to a people who felt the execution of those atrocities in my person. I owe all to the nation to which as its creature I belong, and, therefore, whatever is most sacred of the dignity of man, which has been violated in me with impunity, I have sacrificed as a debt due to it.

In the proceedings the declarations have been concealed which were cunningly and perfidiously received from the persons who had been tried by the alcaldes in the investigation whether the papers had ever been in their archives, and other informations whilst I was a prisoner; and finding by the results that nothing could be obtained against me, and that now the intention, if it was to obtain possession of my papers, or to make a noise in the world, was gained, I was taken from prison, as has been seen. But previously the mandate of the judge was not obeyed, who put in execution the law of habeas corpus in favor of my person, because it was opposed by Don Andrew Jackson and his three creatures during those last perfidious inquiries.

Testimony respecting bad interpretation.

PENSACOLA, August 24, 1821.

The undersigned, being acquainted with the English and Spanish languages, make their appearance before you. That, on the night of the twenty-second current, they were present at the judicial act which Don Andrew Jackson, the governor of this place, held against you, and that they took special and exact notice that what you alleged in your defence, by the explanations which you made, was not faithfully interpreted; that what was interpreted of all your narrations was very little, and very imperfectly interpreted; that, likewise, in that public act your person was grievously insulted by the governor, and that those scandalous reasons of his were not interpreted to you, leaving them therefore undisputed by you, and, consequently, he who exhibited them may be unpunished for them before justice; and, in the opinion of the by-standers, who were only acquainted with the English language, you were convicted of atrocious deeds which we know to be as foreign from you as they are peculiar to a few of the most abandoned characters. We give you this information in defence of the most sacred things, and which all men ought to protect, even when not called upon in their defence. As we swear, we are ready to prove and make appear the solemn truths which we have related. Be assured that the same interpreter will find it impossible to deny it, because the interpretation was so extremely faulty.

Declaration of many respectable witnesses of what passed with Sousa, Fullarat, and Callava.

We, the undersigned, were present as eye and ear witnesses on the twenty-second day of the month of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, at the events which we are about to express hereafter, which happened on the said day, in the city of Pensacola, and were enforced by the governor of it, Don Andrew Jackson, against the Spanish colonel, Don José Callava, ex-governor of the same place, and commissary residing there on the part of Spain, charged on its part with the entire accomplishment of what was stipulated by the King of Spain with the President of the United States of America in the cession made to them of West Florida by the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, which both ratified on the twenty-second of February of the same year.

Being assembled at four in the afternoon of yesterday, the twenty-second current, at table, dining with the colonel of the troops of the fourth regiment of the United States line, Don George M. Brooke, present at the same table with his wife, and also the citizens of the same nation, Don Michael Kearney, commander of the vessel of war Enterprise, Judge Eligius Fromentin, and the said Spanish colonel, Don José Callava,—an officer of the United States presented himself, guarding the Spanish sub-lieutenant, Don Domingo Sousa; he requesting to see the commissary, his chief, who made him enter; and in presence of all Sousa said "that they were conducting him to a prison." The commissary asked him for what cause, and he answered in the following terms:

"Sir, yesterday three American citizens came to my house, demanding of me, with authority (as they said) of the governor, Don Andrew Jackson, that I should deliver them certain civil causes of the military jurisdiction and of the finance, which they had been told were in my possession. I had some boxes, with papers of the military tribunal and of that of the finance, which you had put under my care for their preservation, till they should be sent to the Havana with those of the secretary's office. That those papers had been put into boxes by me, and that it appeared to me that those which they sought were among them; which knowledge I possessed, because I had spent many years in this place, under the orders of former governors, and of you, in the office of secretary, (or evidence may now be of my presence in both courts,) and I was in the exercise of it on the 17th of July, when you delivered over the province. That I was your subaltern, subject to your immediate orders in your commission; and, therefore, without your express order, I could deliver nothing: for which reason, I represented to them that they should make their request to you. The three persons mentioned went away, and after a short space they paid me another visit, with the same demand in writing, and requiring me to answer it in the same manner. I did so; and this morning, having gone to you to communicate it, I did not find you in the house, and my mind told me to place those boxes there immediately. I carried them and placed them in your apartment, in the charge of your servant, and I gave him a message to deliver to you the moment you came in, if I did not see you before; but in a short time, I having informed you in the street, you answered me that it was well. My house was presently searched by the same three persons, and they told me that, unless I delivered the papers, I must go to prison. I answered that the boxes were in your house; and they are carrying me to prison."

The commissary, Don José Callava, made his aid-de-camp rise from table, and ordered him to inform the governor, from him, that the officer, Don Domingo Sousa, was his subaltern, and dependant on his commission; that, therefore, he had the honor of acquainting him with it, and of requesting him that, if the papers which he demanded from Sousa were relative to the decree of the treaty, or other reasons connected with it, he would have the goodness to direct himself to him as now commissary, or as former governor; because every paper of the office of governor, or which might have relation to his commission, could be delivered by no other but himself; and that, in pursuing the regular course, and the regularity with which he had attended to harmony and concord with him, he was always disposed to give him every accommodation.

The aid-de-camp brought back for answer that Sousa was in prison, and that he should tell Colonel Callava that he would also put him into the same prison.

The Spanish commissary mentioned to those at table that his explanations had been badly interpreted to the governor, and he ordered the same aid-de-camp to return, accompanied by another officer and the public interpreter, to acquaint him anew with the same explanations, because the reply was not a consequence of them, and might be the origin of a great mistake.

The aid-de-camp, the officer, and the public interpreter returned, bringing the same answer; but stating that it had been given them in a loud voice, in the presence of several persons, by telling them Colonel Callava shall go to prison.

The Spanish commissary said, unmoved, yet with wonder, that he knew not to what he could attribute what he had experienced from the governor, and insisted in the belief that some great mistake had been made in the interpretations; and stated that he would go and see the governor when he should rise from table: but, before that time came, three persons, habited like countrymen, presented themselves in the house of Colonel Brooke, demanding, by order of the governor, that he should immediately give up the papers which had been demanded of Sousa, and that it was unnecessary to use other modes or considerations than what might be used with any private individual.

The Spanish commissary gave them for answer that they might advise the American commissary and governor, Don Andrew Jackson, in the first place, that it was impossible that he did not know his official situation on the part of Spain in what had been confided to him under the treaty; also, that he had received West Florida from him as the Spanish commissioner to deliver it; that he had also found him governor in it; and how could he be ignorant that his continuance till that day, with his secretary and other officers depending upon his commission, was waiting for the determination for which they had consulted their respective Governments about the meaning which ought to be given to the second article of the treaty, with regard to the artillery which was deposited under safeguard? and, lastly, how could he be ignorant, also, that the papers or other documents relative to the office of governor, or which were to be delivered over by the treaty, could not be delivered to any one by him under the simple character of a private individual, because they had not thus come into his possession, nor yet had they been deposited in his care as a private individual? that he was surprised at what was then going on; that his papers were sacred and protected in Pensacola, along with his person, under the immunity of the law of nations, which has always been so protected, defended, and respected, between civilized nations, in respect to the individuals of each other mutually commissioned by them with the charges of their respective Governments; that, nevertheless, he knew not what the papers were, ordered to be delivered in that way; that he repeated the request for the third time to the governor and commissioner, Don Andrew Jackson, that he might be the better informed, according to his official situation, and in conformity with the peace and harmony reigning between Spain and the United States and their respective citizens—a peace and harmony which had always been so much respected and observed with particular consideration by the Spanish commissary to Don Andrew Jackson, as an individual of the United States, as well as commissary on their part, and as Governor of West Florida; and had been also constantly observed by Governor Callava (when he was so) to all the citizens of the United States, indiscriminately, and who had arrived in West Florida in the time of his government; that Don Andrew Jackson might be sure, both as commissary of the United States, and as Governor of Pensacola, that whatever papers were to be delivered to him on that day would be facilitated to him immediately by the proper course which they ought to pursue in the regular execution of both their duties.

The commissioners went away with very little good-will, and the Spanish commissary told the by-standers that he felt himself attacked with a deadly pain which he suffered, and that they would permit him to retire to his house, which he did, accompanied by them.

Immediately on his arrival, he caused his secretary to extend an official letter to the governor, making in it all the explanations which have been related, and its contents were read to those who accompanied him, and he delivered it to a Spanish lieutenant colonel, requesting that, accompanied with another officer, he would deliver it to the governor, Don Andrew Jackson; which gentleman would not receive it, after the greatest entreaties of the bearers, according to the information given by them when they returned with it and delivered it to the commissary, who was indisposed; and about seven in the evening those same three persons came to his house, requesting that he would deliver the papers as a private individual, or that he would accompany them to the house of the governor. He answered them that his health at that time would not permit him to go into the street; that the papers, of the nature of which he was still ignorant, could not be delivered in any other way than as claimed from the Spanish commissary under the treaty, or as from the governor, the functions whereof he had exercised; because, being in boxes, (as was mentioned,) they must necessarily belong directly, either to the office of governor, or else to the financial or military branch; whatever civil papers were in the ordinary court having been delivered by the constitutional alcalde, and also the registers, to the United States commissary, Don Andrew Jackson; but yet they should, at least, inform him in writing what class of papers those which they demanded belonged to, as they had hitherto demanded of him papers without his knowing what they were.

The three persons went off, and, about an hour afterwards, one of them returned with a half sheet of paper written in the English language, and told the Spanish commissary that in it were mentioned the papers; that they were ordered to deliver it to him precisely as to a private individual, and that he was recognised in no other light.

The Spanish commissary answered that, after the paper had been translated, he would read and answer it. Upon this, the person who had brought it went away, and he immediately ordered it to be translated by the interpreter. He threw himself upon the bed; and a while afterwards, having found some rest, a large party of troops, commanded by an officer, and under the orders of the same three persons, because they found the principal door shut, scaled the house, breaking the fence; some soldiers, with drawn bayonets in their hands, entered the chamber, and the three persons with them. He sat up in the bed, and, directing his discourse to one of the three who acted as interpreter, said: "Now that the asylum of my house is of no avail to me as a man and a citizen; that the official situation which I have in West Florida, for Spain, is also of no avail to me; nor the character of my office, nor the asylum of the immunity which I possess in the territory of the United States, by its laws and by the rights of nations, I throw myself upon their Government, and solemnly protest, before God, before this very Government, and before men, against the author of such great violations of justice."

One of the commissioners answered that he came with express orders from Governor Don Andrew Jackson to demand of him in that act that he should deliver to him the papers already mentioned in the note, or to bring him prisoner by force; and for that produced his orders.

The Spanish commissary answered that the note had been given to the interpreter to be translated, and that it had not yet come; that he was unwell; and how could he attempt to take him from his house at that hour? but if he could avoid the execution of any similar acts only at the expense of the three persons opening the trunks and boxes of the Spanish commissary, and taking from them those papers which they demanded, or what they deemed proper, that he was ready to yield to force, and that there they had the whole at their disposal. The answer which he received was, that one of the three persons entered into the chamber to the officer who commanded the troops, and the citizen Don Juan Innerarity (who speaks English) seeing the threatening act, it appeared to him that the explanation of the Spanish commissary had been wrongly interpreted, and he wished to mention it; but, upon his beginning to speak, he was commanded, with great menacing, by one of the three, to be silent; and the officer of the troops was ordered to intimate to the Spanish commissary that he might deliver himself up prisoner to an armed force. The said officer did so, and the Spanish commissary answered that he surrendered himself prisoner, but represented to him that he was sick. He answered that he was understood; he ordered him to dress and put on his coat, and in this manner he was conducted by the troops to a house in which, with a great assemblage of all classes, was Governor Don Andrew Jackson; when, by the alcalde, who acted in this business as secretary and interpreter by turns, an interrogatory was extended in writing, which the governor dictated, and the Spanish commissary was required to answer it. He answered that he would do it immediately, but with his own hand, and in his own language, at the foot of the interrogation. This was readily granted; but, whilst he was extending it, he was forbidden to continue what he had scarcely begun.

The governor, Don Andrew Jackson, with turbulent and violent actions, with disjointed reasonings, blows on the table, his mouth foaming, and possessed with the furies, told the Spanish commissary to deliver the papers as a private individual; and the Spanish commissary, with the most forcible expressions, answered him that he was convinced that he did not resist the delivery of papers, because he still did not know what papers were demanded of him; that, as soon as he could know it, if they were to be delivered, he would deliver them most cheerfully; and that, if papers were demanded of him which he ought not to deliver, he would resist it by the regular and prescribed means; that all these questions were not put to him in writing; that his answers were the same as he had given to every interrogatory which had been put to him, because he was not permitted to write it in his own defence; and, also, that he would answer for the future constancy of it, as well as what had been asked of him, and all that had been done to him; that he wished for this protection of the law to every man; that he would never yield.

The governor, Don Andrew Jackson, furious, did not permit the interpreter to translate what the Spanish commissary answered, that the by-standers, it appears, might not understand it; and the interpreter made such short translations that, what the Spanish commissary took two minutes to explain, he reduced to only two words; and that when the governor gave him time enough, (and as has been since related by various persons, who spoke both languages, of what the Spanish commissary said,) not even half was interpreted, and that little not faithfully. Lastly, the governor, Don Andrew Jackson, after having insulted the Spanish commissary with atrocious words, took out an order, already written, and made the interpreter read it; and it contained the order for his imprisonment.

The Spanish commissary said that he obeyed it, but asked if the governor, Don Andrew Jackson, was not afraid to put in execution deeds so unjust against a man like him; and, rising to his feet, he addressed himself to the secretary, whom the governor kept on his right hand, and said, in a loud voice, that he protested solemnly, before the Government of the United States, against the author of the violations of justice against his person and public character.

The governor, Don Andrew Jackson, answered to the protest, that for his actions he was responsible to no other than to his Government, and that it was of little importance to him whatever might be the result, and that he might even protest before God himself.

The Spanish commissary was committed to the armed force, and put in prison at twelve at night; his house was left open, with some soldiers in it; the keys of his trunks were not taken away; all his papers were left at discretion, and also his money, and what he had by his commission belonging to his nation; none of his officers nor any person of confidence were permitted to remain in the house; his steward also was taken at the same time.

At eleven in the morning of this day, several of the undersigned went to the United States judge, Don Eligius Fromentin, soliciting a writ of habeas corpus to liberate the person of the Spanish commissary, Colonel Don José Callava, which was duly issued; but the governor, Don Andrew Jackson, despised the said writ, and replied that it was not proper to carry it into effect.

The relation which we have given is what we were present at; is exactly the most sacred truth, and, therefore, we solemnly swear to it, that it may be for the defence of law and justice wherever the knowledge of it may come. Pensacola, August 23, 1821.

[Documents relating to the arrest of Domingo Sousa, Colonel José Callava, and Antoine Fullarat.]

From H. M. Brackenridge, Alcalde, to His Excellency the Governor.

PENSACOLA, August 21, 1821.

I learn from the most satisfactory evidence that a number of documents relating to estates in this place, and to suits instituted here, are in possession of an individual of the name of Domingo Sousa; these papers properly belong to this office, but were not included in the inventory delivered by the late governor. Some of the circumstances attending the affair are of a very peculiar nature; but, as the necessity of obtaining possession of the documents is urgent, I must defer making a report respecting them to some other period. At present, I must request your excellency to authorize some one to make a regular demand of the said documents, and to ascertain precisely what they are.

I am, respectfully, your most obedient servant,

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE, Alcalde.

His Excellency Major General ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the Floridas, &c.

His Excellency the Governor to Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,

PENSACOLA, August 21, 1821.

GENTLEMEN:

Having been officially informed that there are a number of papers or documents in the possession of an individual of the name of Domingo Sousa, of a public nature, and which belong to the office of the alcalde of this town, although not delivered with the other documents relating to private property, you are hereby authorized and instructed to proceed to the dwelling of the said Domingo Sousa, and to make a demand of all such papers or documents as may be in his possession. In case the said Sousa should refuse to exhibit and deliver the same, you will immediately report the fact to me in writing.

ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the Floridas, &c.

From the Commissioners, Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, to His Excellency the Governor.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

SIR:

At an early hour yesterday morning we repaired to the dwelling of Domingo Sousa, and explained to him the object of our visit, and the authority with which we were clothed. He immediately produced two boxes, containing papers, declaring that they belonged to the military tribunal and to the revenue of Spain. On examining the said papers, it appeared that, with a few exceptions, they related to courts-martial, and to personal disputes between officers and soldiers, cognizable by the military tribunals. But the following papers we conceive to be of a different nature: the proceedings relating to the estate of Nicolas Maria Vidal, formerly Auditor of War of this province, and whose heirs reside in this place. They relate to property and claims in this country; and whatever the Spanish laws may be on the subject of the military privilege by which the military courts have sole cognizance in all cases where persons of that profession are in any way interested, yet in this case the persons now interested have nothing to do with the Spanish Government. Another package contains the papers in the case of Peter Guilkes against Tomas Villaseca, which relate to real property that has passed into other hands. There are, also, the papers in the case of Manuel Bonfay against Carlos de Ville, relating to a lot of ground in Pensacola; also, the proceedings between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra, relating to real property here, and in which other parties are now interested. These are all the papers we conceive important to the inhabitants here, excepting some cases of admiralty jurisdiction, and one as late as 1813, but which appear to be principally copies, the originals having been sent to Havana. After having examined the whole of the papers in the possession of the said Sousa, we made a demand of the foregoing, but he refused to deliver them, declaring that he was merely the servant of the late Governor Callava, who had placed them in his hands, and that, without an order from him, they could not be given up to us. We then made a formal demand in writing, and which is annexed to this report; and the same evening we received his answer, hereto annexed. We then prepared the annexed letter for the 22d; but when presented to him by Colonel Miller and H. M. Brackenridge, he declined receiving it, stating that he had no control over the papers; that Colonel Callava was the person of whom they must be demanded; and therefore refused to receive any letter from them. He further stated that he had communicated the demand to Colonel Callava, who told him to answer by simply stating that he was subordinate to his (Callava's) orders. He said that, in order to relieve himself from the responsibility of keeping the papers, he was about to deliver them to the late governor.

GEORGE WALTON,
H. M. BRACKENRIDGE,
JOHN MILLER.

From Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, to Mr. Sousa, (referred to in the above report.)

SIR: PENSACOLA, August 21, 1821.

We have this day been authorized and instructed by his excellency General Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, to require of you to deliver up certain public documents, which no private individual has a right to keep, as they relate to the rights of persons holding or claiming property in this province. Among those papers it is believed there are the documents relating to the estate of Don Nicolas Vidal, whose heirs are interested in the same; also, the papers relating to a house and lot in Pensacola, which was the subject of a proceeding between Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville; also, Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra, relating to a piece of ground in this place; and, also, the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca, relating to real property in Pensacola. In pursuance of our instruction, we therefore make a formal demand of the foregoing, and all other papers which relate directly to the right of private property in West Florida, and in which the inhabitants thereof are interested.

GEORGE WALTON, Secretary of West Florida.
H. M. BRACKENRIDGE,
JOHN MILLER.

Don DOMINGO SOUSA.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. Sousa to Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, (also referred to in their report.)

MESSRS. ALCALDE AND SECRETARIES:

I am a Spanish officer, staying at present in Pensacola, and subject by my commission to the orders of the late governor of this place, Don Sor. Callava; consequently, I have not under my charge, in quality of a private individual of this town, any papers which I am bound to deliver to you, in compliance with your request. It is a positive fact that I have exercised the functions of assistant witness (testigo de asistencia) for the suits in the courts of war and revenue in Pensacola, and under the Spanish Government; and that there are in my sole keeping, boxed up, some of those papers intrusted to my care by the above-named governor, for their preservation. This is all I have to communicate to you in answer to the letter which you have been pleased to address me to-day.

God preserve you many years.

DOMINGO SOUSA.

Messrs. Walton, Brackenridge, and Miller, to Mr. Sousa.

SIR: PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

Your note in reply to our demand of yesterday has been received. You are in the exercise of no civil functions under the existing Government: we, therefore, can only regard you as a private person. We do not claim any papers in your possession, or in that of any other, relating to the military tribunals, or to the revenue of the Spanish Government; but we are certain that no individual, no matter what office he may have held under the Spanish Government, has any right to retain possession of archives or documents which relate directly to the sovereignty of this province; and no reason can be given why such papers as concern property in this country, and which may be necessary to establish titles or assert the rights of individuals, should be withheld from the officer now authorized to take charge of them. We again make a positive demand of the papers mentioned in our note of yesterday, to wit, the documents in the case of Don Nicolas Maria Vidal; the proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra; also a proceeding between Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville; and the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca. These papers are known to be in your possession, and we demand to know by whose authority, as no person whatever has any right to authorize you to detain them.

GEORGE WALTON,
H. M. BRACKENRIDGE,
JOHN MILLER.

Don Domingo Sousa.

Note.—This letter was handed to the above-named Domingo Sousa by the undersigned, and the said Sousa refused to receive the same.

JOHN MILLER.

His Excellency the Governor to Messrs. Miller and Butler.

Given under my hand, at Pensacola, this 22d day of August, 1821.

ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the Floridas.

Return of Colonels Butler and Miller to the above.

Pensacola, August 22, 1821.

We have the honor to report that we proceeded to the house of the within-named Domingo Sousa, and found that the papers referred to had been by him taken, through the aid of a negro, (as he reports,) to the house of Don José Callava, late governor. The body of Domingo Sousa is herewith presented to you.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servants,

ROBT. BUTLER,

Order to Colonel Butler and Doctor Bronaugh.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

It being made known to me, by the confession of Domingo Sousa, that the papers named in the petition of Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, and which were demanded under my orders as the property of private individuals, by Colonel George Walton, secretary for West Florida, Colonel John Miller, clerk of the county court of Escambia, and Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde for the city of Pensacola, were, after said demand in pursuance of my orders as aforesaid was made, by the said Domingo Sousa and a negro man, carried this day to the house of the late governor, Don José Callava, and delivered the said documents and papers into the possession of his steward, named Fullarat, Colonel Robert Butler, of the army of the United States, and Dr. J. C. Bronaugh, accompanied by Henry M. Brackenridge, Esq., alcalde for the city of Pensacola, will wait upon Colonel Don José Callava, and his steward, named Fullarat, and demand from them the following papers this day delivered to the said Fullarat, at the house of the said Colonel Callava, by the said Domingo Sousa, that is to say: first, the documents and papers relating to the estate of Nicolas Maria Vidal; second, the documents in the proceedings between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra; third, the documents and papers in the case of Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville; fourth, documents and papers in the proceedings in the case of Peter Guilkes against Tomas Villaseca: all which documents and papers are acknowledged to be the property of individuals, and appertaining to their rights, and which are secured to them by and under the second article of the treaty with Spain, concluded at the city of Washington on the 22d day of February, 1819, and ratified on the corresponding day of 1821, and must remain for the protection of the rights and property of the said individuals; and no officer of Spain can rightfully take them away, or keep them from the office of the duly appointed alcalde for the city of Pensacola. It is further ordered that, if the said late governor, Don José Callava, or his steward, Fullarat, when the above-described papers are demanded of them, should fail or refuse to deliver the same, the said Don José Callava and his steward (Fullarat) be forthwith brought before me, at my office, then and there to answer such interrogatories as may be put to them of and concerning the premises, and to abide by and perform such order and decree, touching the said documents and papers secured to them as aforesaid, as the justice of the case may demand.

ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the Floridas.

Report of Messrs. Butler and Bronaugh.

SIR: PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

Pursuant to your official order bearing this date, we proceeded to the house of Colonel Callava, who was absent; but again returning to his house shortly after, we found him, accompanied by a number of Spanish officers, clothed with their side-arms, and Mr. John Innerarity in the porch; the demand was formally made of the documents enumerated in your order, and peremptorily refused; when he was informed that his refusal would be considered as setting at defiance the authority exercised by you as Governor of the Floridas, in the execution of the laws, and they were again demanded, and the consequences of refusal on his part enumerated, but in which refusal he still persisted; and we were about taking our leave to prepare for the final execution of your order, when Colonel Callava declared that, if we would furnish him with a copy of the memorandum of the documents required, he would deliver them to us; to which we assented. The alcalde, H. M. Brackenridge, accordingly waited on him with a copy of the memorandum herewith accompanied, and informed him that he would call in two hours for the reception of the documents as promised. We proceeded at the appointed time, and found the gate and front part of the house closed; the former we opened by removing a bar, and, on reaching the latter, a considerable stir seemed to be making in the house; we knocked some time without receiving any answer, when admittance was demanded in the name of the governor in three instances, still without reply; the guard was then ordered to advance and form in the front of the house, and part detached to the rear, when it was discovered that the back door was open, and several Spanish officers, with Mr. Innerarity, (who is one of your cabildo,) were on the porch. We inquired for Colonel Callava, to which we were answered they did not know where he was; lights were procured and the rooms searched, when Colonel Callava was found in his bed, divested of his coat. Demand was then made of the documents, agreeably to his promise, and to our astonishment they were still refused, and several attempts made on his part to show that he was not amenable to the laws; to which he was answered that the governor was, in the execution of the laws, bound to demand the papers, as they appertained to the rights and property of individuals resident in Pensacola, and that formal complaints had been made that they were improperly withheld, and that the governor knew no distinction between Colonel Callava and any other man under his government. We then proposed that Colonel Callava would deliver the papers, and he should have our receipt for them, which was also refused; we then again demanded them, reiterating our sentiments that his refusal would be received as an act of open mutiny to the civil authority exercised in the Floridas, and that he must expect the consequences. He persisted to refuse, and the officer of the guard was ordered to take him and Fullarat into custody, and bring them before your excellency, which is now done. We would add, in conclusion, that Colonel Callava repeatedly asserted that he would not be taken out of his house alive; but he seemed to act without much difficulty when the guard was ordered to prime and load. A corporal and three men were detached to remain as guard in the house of Colonel Callava, and to prevent the removal of the boxes which had contained the documents, and which Mr. Brackenridge recognised in the bedroom. From the relation in which Mr. Innerarity stands in this business, together with the interest taken on the side of Colonel Callava, and at the same time exercising the functions of one of the cabildo of this city, we deem it an indispensable duty to recommend that your excellency will fill his place in the council with a character who will manifest a proper respect for the dignity of the laws, and you their Executive.

We have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT BUTLER, Col. U. S. A.
J. C. BRONAUGH.

[Memorandum referred to in the above report.]

Memorandum of the documents which have been demanded of Colonel José Callava, agreeably to the order of his excellency Major General Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, and which, on the demand of Colonel Robert Butler and J. C. Bronaugh, accompanied by H. M. Brackenridge, Colonel Callava promised to deliver to Colonel Butler, if they should be found in the boxes delivered to him by Domingo Sousa.

1. The papers relating to the estate of José Maria Vidal.
2. Proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra.
3. Proceedings in the case of Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville.
4. Documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca.

The whole of the above papers having relation to the rights of property in West Florida, and in which private individuals are interested.

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE, Alcalde.

PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

Minutes of the examination of Colonel Callava and Fullarat.

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,
PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821.

Colonel José Callava, being brought before Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, to answer certain interrogations relative to documents and papers named in a schedule bearing this date, and which relate to the property and sovereignty of the Floridas, the following interrogatories were put to him, viz:

Question 1. Were or were not the papers mentioned in a schedule handed to you by H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, delivered by Domingo Sousa at your house this day to Antoine Fullarat, your major domo; and, if so, at what time of the day?

Answer. [Translated.] I say that I solemnly protest against the act, which, at ten, in the middle of the night, took me from my bed, where I was sick, although I consider myself as Spanish commissioner, appointed by the Spanish Government, under the treaty recently concluded between the said Government and that of the United States, for the cession of the Floridas, which commission has been conf—. [Here the governor stopped Colonel Callava, and directed the following question to be put to him:]

Did or did not Domingo Sousa deliver at your house this day the papers above mentioned; and, if so, where are those papers now?—and answer this directly.

Answer. That he declines answering, except in the manner he considers proper—in his own language, and with his own hand.

The question being repeated, he answered that he was here as a commissioner, and could not answer in any other capacity; on which he was informed by the governor that he could not view him as a commissioner, or in any other light than as a private individual charged with refusing to surrender papers which belong to the public archives of this province, and with being connected with individuals charged with being about to secrete papers and to carry them out of the country, by which the inhabitants thereof would be deprived of their evidence of property, and which, under the second article of the treaty with Spain, ought to have been delivered with the other papers placed in the charge of the alcalde for safe-keeping. The question being again repeated, he refused to answer, except in the manner before stated.

Interrogations put to Antoine Fullarat.

Question 1. What is your name and age?
Answer. My name is Antoine Fullarat. I do not know my age.
Question 2. Did not Domingo Sousa deliver to you this day some papers in boxes at the house of Colonel José Callava?
Answer. Yes.
Question 3. Where are those papers now?
Answer. They are at the house of Colonel Callava.
Question 4. In whose possession are they?
Answer. They are now in Colonel Callava's house.
Question 5. At what time of this day were they delivered by Domingo Sousa?
Answer. He does not recollect.
Question 6. Are not you the major domo of Colonel Callava?
Answer. Yes.

I do hereby certify the foregoing to be a correct minute of the examination before Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, at which I acted as clerk and interpreter.

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE.

Order for the imprisonment of Domingo Sousa, Colonel José Callava, and Antoine Fullarat.

WEST FLORIDA, }
Pensacola. }

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE OF FLORIDA,
PENSACOLA, August 22, 1821

TO THE OFFICER OF THE DAY:

You will take into custody, and safely keep, Domingo Sousa, until he produces, or causes to be produced and delivered, unto Henry M. Brackenridge, alcalde of Pensacola, the following documents and papers, viz: Those relating to the estate of Don Nicolas Maria Vidal; also the papers relating to a house and lot in Pensacola, which was the subject of a proceeding between Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra; also the proceedings which took place between Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville, relating to a piece of ground in this place; and also the documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca, relating to real property in Pensacola: all which documents and papers appear to appertain to individuals and their rights, and for their benefit ought to be in the possession of H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola, and not to be taken away by the officers of Spain; and which documents and papers were seen by Colonel George Walton, Colonel John Miller, and H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde, in the possession of the said Domingo Sousa on the 21st instant, and demanded by the said alcalde to be delivered to him, the said alcalde, under the written order of the undersigned given for that purpose, and the said documents and papers to be retained by the said alcalde for safe-keeping; on which the said Domingo Sousa refused to deliver the same, but, in open violation of the above-recited order and demand, did convey the said documents and papers to the house of Colonel José Callava, late Spanish governor of the province of West Florida, and left in the hands of the said Colonel Callava's steward, by name Fullarat, in the dwelling-house of the said Colonel Callava. All which acts aforesaid of the said Domingo Sousa are in open contempt of the authority of the undersigned, as Governor of the Floridas, &c., and in open violation of the rights of the citizens, secured to them under the second article of the late treaty with Spain; for all which, and until he, the said Domingo Sousa, complies with the foregoing order, by delivering the aforesaid enumerated documents and papers, he is to stand committed to the calabouse.

Given under my hand this 22d day of August, 1821.

ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the Floridas, &c.

To Captain DADE, Officer of the Day:

You will take into custody and safely keep Don José Callava, and his steward, (Fullarat,) until the documents and papers recited in the order annexed for the arrest of Domingo Sousa are produced and delivered unto H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of the city of Pensacola.

Given under my hand, this 22d day of August, 1821.

ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the Floridas.

H. M. Brackenridge, Alcalde, to His Excellency the Governor.

SIR: PENSACOLA, August 23, 1821.

Having strong grounds to believe that the documents and papers claimed by me as appertaining to the archives of this province, and directly relating to the property and sovereignty of the same, are now in the house of Don José Callava, but enclosed in boxes, I beg leave to request that authority may be given to such persons as your excellency may appoint to open and examine the said boxes, and to report thereon. From the examination of Domingo Sousa and Antoine Fullarat, and the affidavit hereto annexed of Merced Vidal, there can be no doubt but that the said documents were delivered in the boxes before mentioned to the said Callava, at his house, and are in his possession. The documents demanded are as follow:

1. Papers relating to the estate of José Maria Vidal.
2. Proceedings in the case of Carlos de Ville and Eugene Sierra.
3. Proceedings in the case of Manuel Bonfay and Carlos de Ville.
4. Documents in the case of Peter Guilkes and Tomas Villaseca.

H. M. BRACKENRIDGE, Alcalde.

Affidavit of Merced Vidal.

Before me, H. M. Brackenridge, alcalde of Pensacola, personally appeared Merced Vidal Padro, who, being of full age, and being duly sworn, deposeth and saith: That her father, Nicolas Maria Vidal, left her by will one of his heirs, and that he died about the year 1806, possessed of a large real and personal estate in Florida and Louisiana. The deponent further saith that the will of her said father, together with the inventories of his real and personal estate, and all the papers relating thereto, were for several years missing from the public archives of Pensacola, having been, by some person unknown, withdrawn from the same; that repeated solicitations were made by her to the authorities then existing here to compel the restoration of the said papers and documents, as they were, and she believes still are, necessary to enable her to prosecute her claim under the said will; that a certain John Innerarity, of this place, whom this deponent believes to be a debtor to the said estate to a large amount, was decreed to restore the said papers, if in his possession; that the said papers were finally restored, and that a decree was passed against the said Innerarity to account with the deponent as one of the heirs of Nicolas Maria Vidal. The deponent further states that, a few days before the change of government, she demanded them of Colonel Callava, who informed her that he could not give them up, as he was obliged to take them to Havana. The deponent afterwards requested permission to make a copy of them; that this was granted by said Callava, on condition that they should only be delivered by separate pieces or parcels, and that a confidential person should be found to copy them; but the deponent says that the expense of copying them exceeds her means, as they amount in all to several hundred pages of common writing paper. The deponent afterwards learned that the said papers were in the actual possession of Domingo Sousa, who acknowledged the same, and delivered three pieces to her for the purpose of being copied. The deponent further states that the said papers relate to property in this country and Louisiana, and were necessary in order to enable her to prosecute her claims under the will of her father.

Testimony in behalf of Colonel Callava.

We, the undersigned, declare, upon oath, that about half-past five in the afternoon of yesterday, the 23d current, we were witnesses of the examination which the Spanish colonel, Don José Callava, made of his house, who, accompanied by an officer of the United States, entered it for the first time, after having been dismissed from prison, into which he had been put the night before by the governor of this place, Don Andrew Jackson. The house was found open, and troops in it; these troops belonged to the United States, and were armed. In the colonel's chamber we saw bundles of papers upon the table which served him for a writing desk, and these bundles neither sealed nor secured. We also saw and examined two boxes secured with nails, and sealed with black wax in various places, upon white paper, and that the seal was that which the said colonel used in making up his despatches as governor in Pensacola; and, for our greater certainty, the seal being upon the table, we took it and compared it with the stamp upon the wax on the boxes. We also saw and examined that one of these boxes had various broken seals, which demonstrated evidently, and convinced the human understanding beyond a doubt, that the said box had been opened after it had been sealed and nailed. We observed, also, that it was secured anew, and that close by the broken seals other seals had been put with wax of the same color as the others, but the seals were of a different figure; all this was likewise observed by the officer of the United States who assisted in the examination. We also saw that the colonel took from his bed some large keys, and that with them he opened a strong-box, and from a drawer therein he took out a bag of gold, which he emptied upon a table, and counted, by pieces of gold, in our presence, two hundred and fifteen pieces, with seven pieces of silver, and two reals more; that afterwards he returned the said money into the strong-box; on his doing which, the officer of the United States said that he had finished his business, and went away.

The relation of these facts we have thought proper to present in this declaration, as they appeared to us, accompanied by the said officer of the United States, on this examination. And for its verification we sign it, at Pensacola, the 24th day of the month of August, 1821.

A true copy:

H. DE RIVAS Y SALMON.

The Secretary of State to Don Joaquin de Anduaga.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, November 2, 1821.

Previous to your arrival in this country, I had the honor of receiving from Don Hilario de Rivas y Salmon, then chargé d'affaires from your Government, a letter dated the 6th of the last month, with sundry papers enclosed, exhibiting complaints against the governor of the territories of Florida for certain proceedings in his judicial character against Colonel Don José Callava. That letter was immediately submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States, by whose directions I have now the honor of addressing you an answer thereto.

The complaints, in substance, are—

1. That Colonel Callava being a commissioner of His Catholic Majesty for delivering the province over to the United States, and entitled to the special protection of the laws of nations, his house was forcibly entered in the night time, and he, himself, being then sick in bed, was, under special circumstances of rigor and inhumanity, summoned and compelled to go before Governor Jackson to answer interrogatories.

2. That the questions put to him, and his answers to them, were both falsely interpreted; he being ignorant of the language in which the interrogatories were put.

3. That he was finally committed to prison, and there detained for the space of a day before he was released.

4. That, during the period of his detention, his house, his property, and the papers of his Government, were left at the mercy of the soldiery. That he found, on his return to his house, the seals of his Government upon certain boxes of papers broken, and some of the papers scattered about.

I am instructed by the President of the United States to assure you of his deep regret that, in the completion of a transaction of such high importance to both nations, any circumstance to excite pain on either side should have occurred.

On the merits of the proceeding complained of, all the light necessary to the formation of a correct judgment has not been received. It would be improper, therefore, in the present case, to pronounce definitively on the subject. In its intercourse with foreign Powers, the Government of the United States is scrupulously observant of the rights of the representative character of persons charged by their Governments with the performance of any duty incident to their relations with this Union. Although Colonel Callava was not clothed with the character or credentials of a public minister, it is readily admitted that, in the execution of his trust, as a commissary for the delivery of the province, he was entitled to all the protection and all the immunities necessary for the discharge of that duty. But it is not less true that, in the treaty itself, it had been stipulated that the whole transaction of the surrender of the provinces, and the evacuation of all the officers of His Catholic Majesty within it, should be completed within six months from the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, which six months had elapsed at the time when these incidents occurred. It is also true that the surrender had been completed; that the authority of Spain within the province had more than a month before ceased, and that of the United States had taken its place. The troops of His Catholic Majesty had been removed; and if Colonel Callava and other officers of Spain remained there after the consummation of that event, they could no longer claim the immunities of public agency, or any other privileges than those of strangers permitted to reside in the place—strangers not only amenable to the common judicial tribunal, but who, conformably to the Spanish laws existing before the cession of the province, would have been liable to removal from it, or to imprisonment, at the discretion of the governor, for the mere act of being there.

It is asserted by Colonel Callava that the postponement of his departure from Pensacola had been necessary, because it was impossible for him to terminate the business incident to the surrender on that day; because he was sick; and because the question, whether the artillery belonging to the fortifications was or was not included in the cession, had been referred to the decision of the two Governments. To this the reply is obvious: that, without now referring to the delays which protracted till the 17th of July the surrender which might have been effected more than two months before, there was yet ample time between that day and the 22d of August for the discharge of any business incidental to it; that the personal indisposition of Colonel Callava neither disqualified him on the 17th of July from the transaction of business, nor on the 22d of August from being present at a festive entertainment, nor immediately afterwards from undertaking and performing a long and fatiguing journey from Pensacola to New York, and thence to embark on a voyage by sea; and that, with regard to the question concerning the cannon, which was reserved for the decision of the two Governments, it furnished no sufficient motive for the continuance of Colonel Callava there—a particular receipt for them having been given by Governor Jackson, and the right of Spain to remove them, whatever its merits might be, being in no manner affected by the departure of the Spanish commissioner.

It appears, therefore, that, both by the limitation of time stipulated in the treaty for the surrender of the province, and by the nature of the functions assigned to Colonel Callava, his immunities of exemption from the ordinary process of the law had ceased before the 22d of August. The allegation that Governor Jackson had, nineteen days before that time, recognised his commissarial character as yet existing, will not affect the principles here advanced: 1st. Because the limited six months had not then expired; and 2dly. Because the only transaction of General Jackson on that day, recognising Colonel Callava as a commissioner, was, by writing him a letter complaining of a signal breach of faith by that officer, in evading, on the plea of indisposition, the performance of a stipulated promise, on the morning of the 17th of July, before the surrender, and afterwards refusing to perform it at all; which letter, after an expostulation against that proceeding, suited to the aggravation of its character, finished by a declaration of General Jackson that it closed the correspondence between him and Colonel Callava on the subject forever.

Far would it be from the intention of the American Government to draw within its rigorous limits the exemption from ordinary legal process of a foreign public officer. It would extend to them a liberal measure of time and a full portion of indulgence for the execution of the trust, and for departure after its completion. But it cannot perceive the justice of extending these privileges beyond their limits as sanctioned by custom, for purposes of injustice and wrong. And here we are led to the inquiry, what was the immediate occasion of the summons to Colonel Callava, his resistance against which prompted the subsequent rigorous measures, in reference to his person, house, and papers, complained of in the note of Mr. Salmon? He had withheld, and caused to be packed in boxes for transportation, public records, relating to the property of the province—judicial documents, indispensable for vindicating the titles to succession of infant and orphan children. Application was made to General Jackson, in behalf of those orphans, for the legal judicial process to obtain those papers. He had proof that they had been removed, after a summons from him to the person in whose possession they had been to produce them, to the house and possession of Colonel Callava, for the avowed purpose of subtracting them from the process issued by his authority. Had that officer's personal immunity been complete and unquestionable, what greater abuse of it could have been made than thus to wrest from the course of justice the vouchers on which depended the rights and the subsistence of orphans? General Jackson, considering that Colonel Callava was not entitled to such exemption from legal process, issued the ordinary summons which would have been applicable to any other individual; and, on his refusal to answer the interrogatories put to him, committed him, as others in like cases would have been committed, to prison. By the same order he issued a commission for securing the papers, which ought to have been delivered up before, with all suitable caution, to prevent the taking of any others, and, immediately after the satisfactory return of that commission, ordered the release of Colonel Callava. Such appears to have been the character of the transaction, upon the report of it made by General Jackson; and, although the President cannot but contemplate with unfeigned regret this occurrence, he thinks that blame should be imputed to the party deserving it, and whose misconduct produced it; and that it is a justice due to General Jackson to make him acquainted with the objections in the note of Mr. Salmon to his conduct, and to receive his full explanation of the motives and considerations which governed him.

In concluding this letter, I cannot forbear reminding you, sir, that not only this, but all the other transactions of a painful nature, which have arisen in the execution of that treaty, which, it was hoped, would have terminated all the differences, and have led to the most harmonious intercourse between the United States and Spain, have proceeded from the unjustifiable delays and evasions of His Catholic Majesty's officers, in direct contravention, as is understood, to his orders and intentions, in withholding the documents, archives, and vouchers, of which the delivery had been expressly stipulated—vouchers indispensable to the United States, both for the dispensation of private justice and for the establishment of public right, but utterly useless to Spain; and the detention of which, by the Captain General and Governor of Cuba, and by the Spanish Governors of both East and West Florida, however intended, and by whatever motive induced, can subserve no purposes but those of fraud, injustice, and oppression. After a succession of delays, for a period of six weeks at the Havana, in a climate noted for its unhealthiness to strangers, of the commissioner of the United States authorized to receive those documents, and of the vessel which had conveyed him, he was compelled to depart without them, nor have they yet been delivered. The attempts to carry away, both from Pensacola and from St. Augustine, many of those papers, can be viewed in no other light than as flagrant violations of the treaty. The President relies that they will be so considered by His Catholic Majesty, and that he has, ere this, given the most positive and effectual orders for the faithful execution, in this respect, of that instrument.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, November 14, 1821.

I have received your note of the 2d of this month, (which I have transmitted to my Government,) in answer to a letter of the 6th ultimo, which Don Hilario de Rivas y Salmon had the honor to address to you, relative to the proceedings of General Jackson with Colonel Callava.

I can do no less than applaud the President's resolution, so worthy of his prudence, of not pronouncing definitively upon this business until he had the whole documents concerning it before him; and I flatter myself that, when that takes place, he will do ample justice to the representation of the above-named chargé d'affaires. In this persuasion I will not, at present, enter upon an answer to the paragraphs of your said note which seem to defend the conduct of General Jackson; and I shall defer doing this unless the President (which is not to be expected) should think it his duty to approve it.

I avail myself of this opportunity of offering you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

Your obedient, humble servant,

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, November 18, 1821.

General Jackson, not satisfied with the outrages which he practised against Colonel Callava on the 22d of September last, has published, in Pensacola, a proclamation, in which, on the most frivolous pretexts, he has ordered that Don Marcos de Villiers, Don Bernardo Prieto, Don Luis Guayare, Don Civito Lasassier, Don Arnaldo Guillemard, Don Carlos de Villiers, Don Pedro de Vegas, and Don Mariano Latady, all in the service of His Catholic Majesty, should quit the above-named city on or before the 3d day of October following.

The reasons which he alleges for a proceeding so shocking are the following: 1st. That, by the seventh article of the treaty between Spain and the United States, of the 22d of February, 1819, it was stipulated that the officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty should evacuate the territories ceded to the United States six months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible, and that they should give possession of them to the officers or commissaries of the United States duly authorized to receive them; 2d. That the said officers, acting as a separate body, endeavored to sow discontent among the inhabitants; and, 3d. That they were the authors of a paper in which they criticised the proceedings which took place in the interrogatory made by General Jackson of Colonel Callava, previous to his sending him to prison.

If General Jackson, as commissary for receiving the Floridas, believed it his duty to fulfil the letter of the seventh article of the treaty, how deficient was he in that duty in permitting those officers to remain in the province more than a month after the expiration of the six stipulated. His consent and silence, during this time, afford evident proof that his opinion was, that the treaty was in no way infringed by the remaining of eight individuals after that time had elapsed; and, in truth, it being the spirit of the said seventh article to secure to the United States the peaceable possession of those territories, it is very difficult to imagine how so small a number of subjects could endanger it. Besides, if the proclamation had for its object the fulfilment of the article, why was it confined to the eight officers by name, and not extended to all those who were likewise in both Floridas?

I confess that I am embarrassed how to answer the second paragraph, because I do not know what General Jackson means by the officers acting as a distinct body. Can it be that, being subjects, and belonging to the service of a Power friendly to the United States, they were seen as companions, and were not deemed citizens of this republic, but foreigners, who for a short time remained in its territory, under the protection of the law of nations and of treaties? In this case, the same criminality might be attached to such Americans as travel through Europe, and especially to the officers of the American squadron in the Mediterranean, who, instead of outrages, meet with a reception in the ports of Spain to which their circumstances, and the friendship which unites both nations, entitle them.

The second extreme of the second paragraph and of the third are really serious accusations, and, if it be certain that the officers, either by their actions or by their writings, would have attempted to excite discontent in the inhabitants, there is no doubt of their being criminal. With regard to their actions, it is very strange that General Jackson has not thought fit, in taking a step so precipitate, to give what still was not proof—at least, the relation of what had obliged him to declare them culpable of such a crime; and as, in the mean time, neither appears evident to me, I think myself authorized to declare the accusation to be false. With regard to the writing which he cites, the officers were free to believe themselves at liberty to publish it, since they could not but have been persuaded that they were in a country where, till lately, the Spanish laws, and now those of the United States, prevailed, and where the liberty of the press was their justification in doing it. And what did they say in the paragraph copied by General Jackson? That the interrogations were not faithfully translated to Callava—a fact which the same person who acted as interpreter in that act has since confessed in a piece published in the newspapers; yet for this publication they have been expelled from the Floridas. I as little comprehend from whence arises the criminality of the passage which General Jackson copies in his proclamation, that, "if, on the one hand, they shuddered at the violent proceedings exercised against their superior, they knew also what was due to a Government which is on the most friendly footing with their own." What does he wish them to say, but that, notwithstanding the sentiments inspired by the precipitate acts against Colonel Callava, they knew that it was their duty to submit to the decisions of a Government friendly to their own? In vain will it be pretended that the object of this writing is to rouse the minds of the inhabitants; it only relates to what took place before them all, and what has since been publicly confessed by one of the agents of General Jackson himself. There is no doubt, in fact, that the hearts of the Floridians were overwhelmed with sorrow and pain to see those outrages committed against one who had so long been their superior, and had known how to gain their affection; no doubt but that, seeing the violences committed against him, and against those who a few days before were their fellow-countrymen, they were so much the more alarmed, because they believed they were passing under the pleasant yoke of a Power, the asylum of liberty and of justice, yet had been witnesses of proceedings seldom practised in the most despotic countries. But who ought to bear the reproach of effects so natural—he who caused them, or they who deplored them?

I believe I have answered the accusations contained in the proclamation; but, in order to make the irregularity of General Jackson's proceedings more evident, I will grant for a moment that they are certain and proved; I will admit that the officers have been deserving of the chastisement and dishonor which they have suffered; but yet nobody will deny me that, before it was inflicted upon them, they ought to have been cited before the proper tribunal, have heard the charges, and have had liberty and time for their defence. These are fundamental principles of the laws of Spain, and of the United States, and of every civilized country. Yet what has been the conduct of General Jackson? Without giving them the least intimation, he publishes, in a language foreign to them, a proclamation expelling them from the province, giving them scarcely time to arrange their affairs, and authorizing all officers, civil and military, to apprehend them, and bring them before him!

I forbear making reflections upon a fact of such a nature, and it would be doing an injury, sir, to your sense of justice if I should dwell upon its odiousness.

In fine, either General Jackson has expelled the above-mentioned officers because he believed them criminal, (and in this case he ought to have had them judged according to the laws,) or he thought proper to do it as a political measure, in which case he ought to have executed it as the relations between the countries demand, either by giving them notice in writing, or verbally, with that urbanity which a person of his grade ought never to forget. In place of this, he was wanting either to the laws, or to the respect which was due to the officers and subjects of a Power friendly to his Government; and, consequently, I feel it my duty to request that you will have the goodness to lay this note before the President, not doubting, from his well-known justice, that he will give to His Catholic Majesty the satisfaction which the above-mentioned conduct of General Jackson towards the before-named Spanish officers demands. Whereupon, I renew to you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration.

Your most obedient, humble servant,

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

[TRANSLATION.]

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, November 22, 1821.

By your note of the 13th of August last to my predecessor, Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, you were pleased to acquaint him that copies of the correspondence which had taken place between Don José Coppinger, governor and commissary nominated by His Catholic Majesty for the delivery of East Florida, and Colonel Butler, commissary appointed by the United States to take possession of it, had been received. Upon reading it, you cannot but applaud the zeal with which Colonel Coppinger labored to obviate and remove all the difficulties which could delay this important transaction, and the activity with which he made the aforesaid delivery, without concluding a multitude of subjects which yet remain pending, and without waiting for the term fixed by the treaty. The harmony and good understanding which prevailed between both commissaries is very praiseworthy, inasmuch as they evidently showed that, guided solely by the desire of executing their respective duties, far from throwing obstacles in the way of its accomplishment, with discussions liable to inflame the mind, they thought that urbanity and decorum were the most proper means of serving their respective Governments in the important commission with which they had been intrusted. By the aforementioned correspondence, it appears that doubts had arisen whether the artillery and certain archives ought or ought not to be delivered over to the United States, and in that you will have seen that it was clearly and definitively stipulated between Messrs. Coppinger and Butler that both should remain in St. Augustine; the former in deposite in possession of the Anglo-American commissary, and the latter in the state in which they were, and without the possibility of their being carried away to the Havana until the determination of both Governments, in a certain time, should arrive. At the departure of Colonel Butler from the said city, after the delivery had been effected, he wrote officially to Colonel Coppinger that he would have to transact his business with Captain Bell, who succeeded him; and, without doubt, from the copies of his correspondence with Colonel Coppinger, you will have observed that, on various subjects which occurred, he considered him, and interchanged letters with him, recognising him still in the quality of Spanish commissary. On the arrival of Mr. Worthington, who came to St. Augustine to supply the place of Captain Bell, the aspect of affairs was changed; and in the correspondence which took place between him and Colonel Coppinger upon an incident relative to a Spanish agent, he not only affected not to understand that Coppinger continued in the quality of Spanish commissary with the consent of his predecessors, but he was pleased to make use of expressions highly injurious to Spain, and foreign to the language which a person whom the American Government had thought worthy of its confidence ought to have used. Colonel Coppinger waited for the answer to the protest which he had made to Mr. Worthington upon the incident above mentioned; when, without any previous notice, or any other cause, the offence was committed which is related in the subjoined protests of Colonel Coppinger and of the secretary.

That the American Government had no right to demand any paper from Colonel Coppinger, is evident from the receipt of the delivery given to him by Colonel Butler on the 10th of July last, which is given for the delivery of what the treaty stipulated, and which declares expressly that the doubt relative to the artillery and certain documents was left to the determination of both Governments.

That the commissaries, Coppinger and Butler, had agreed, in virtue of their respective powers, that the archives in question should remain in the state in which they were, appears from the correspondence of both. What reason, then, what pretext, what excuse, can General Jackson and his officers give for a crime so unheard of?

From all that I have explained, and from the accompanying documents, it results—

1st. That His Catholic Majesty has been insulted, in the person of his commissary, in the most scandalous manner.

2d. That General Jackson has broken, without giving any reason for it, an agreement signed by his own officers.

3d. That, in the spoliation, or rather plunder, committed in the house of Colonel Coppinger, the law of nations, and all the known laws of civilized countries, have been trampled upon, inasmuch as he was the commissary of a foreign Power, and inasmuch as, without summons or notice, without accusation, trial, or sentence, the doors of his house have been broken, and he has not only been robbed of his family and private papers, always sacred, but of those which, being the correspondence of office, and reserved with his Government, belong to His Catholic Majesty.

The sentiments which animate a free people, and the principles which direct those who have the high honor of governing them, are well known to you. Capable of making every sacrifice where their interest alone is concerned, they never yield when their insulted honor demands just satisfaction. That His Catholic Majesty is under the necessity of demanding it for the repeated insults offered by General Jackson, his commissaries, officers, and servants, is fully proved by my remonstrances, and those of Don Hilario de Rivas; and, to be brief, I at present demand in his royal name—

1st. That the Government of the United States show, in an authentic manner, its disapprobation of the insults offered to the Spanish commissary, Don José Coppinger.

2dly. That the authors of them be punished as they deserve.

3dly. That all the papers, without any distinction, which were taken from the house of Colonel Coppinger, and of the secretary, on the 2d of October, be restored to Colonel Don José Coppinger, who will return to St. Augustine for that purpose, that he may keep those which belong to the Spanish Government, and preserve in his possession those which have been the object of doubts, until, according to the solemn stipulation by him and Colonel Butler, both Governments come to a determination respecting them.

4thly. That the Government of the United States satisfy Spain and Don José Coppinger for the damages and injuries which they have sustained by the injustice of the American authorities in the Floridas.

No doubt but the President will acknowledge the justice of this remonstrance, and I flatter myself that he will be pleased to give, without delay, to a monarch who has given such proofs of his friendship for the United States, a satisfaction which his honor and that of the Spanish nation demand.

I repeat the sentiments of my most distinguished consideration.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, December 27, 1821.

The immense sacrifices made by Spain to satisfy the claims of the United States have given her a just right to flatter herself that the American Government would, in its turn, pay attention to those which His Catholic Majesty might see necessary to make, with that readiness which is due to a friendship that he had, at such great cost, endeavored to maintain between the two cabinets. Under this impression, I believed that the President, guided by his characteristic principles of justice, and with a full conviction of the solid reasons with which, in my notes of the 18th and 22d of last month, I demanded satisfaction for the injuries of General Jackson towards the Spanish commissaries and officers in the Floridas, would have been pleased to order it to be given to me without delay. But I see with pain that, so far from my hopes being realized, the receipt of my notes, after so long a time, has not even been acknowledged. What may have been the cause of this silence, I am not able to divine, unless it be the difficulty of deciding to what satisfaction His Catholic Majesty is entitled.

If my claims were founded on matters of interest, I could have waited for the answer to them without being troublesome to you, sir; but as they originate in atrocious injuries committed against the honor of my King and my nation, I should be wanting to my most sacred duties if I did not persist in demanding the satisfaction which they require.

The more General Jackson's conduct is considered, the more evident it is that his sole aim by it has been to insult Spain. In fact, no advantage could result from it to the United States, no glory to the general himself, in trampling upon the defenceless commissaries and officers of Spain. And if none of these purposes (the only ones that could excuse him in the eyes of a cabinet less just than this) impelled him, what doubt can remain but that his sole motive was his inveterate hatred against the Spaniards? It is therefore certain that General Jackson ought not to meet protection from his Government, whose interest he did not consult, when he had the audacity to trample upon the law of nations, and the laws of every civilized people. But, admitting that his intention had been to promote the prosperity of his country, it would be doing a serious injustice to the President to suppose for a moment that he could approve of its being attained by measures so criminal. Satisfied of this truth, I have not the least doubt but that the satisfaction demanded will be given to me; and the sole purpose of this note is to request, sir, that you will be pleased to transmit it to me as soon as possible, as your own delicacy will convince you of the impatience with which His Catholic Majesty expects it, who, by how much more zealous he is to preserve the greatest harmony with the United States, by so much the more anxious will he be to see every cause tending to disturb it removed.

I embrace this opportunity to renew to you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

Mr. Adams to Mr. De Anduaga.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, December 31, 1821.

I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 14th, 18th, and 22d November, and 13th and 27th of the present month.

In my letter to you of [2d] November last, in answer to that of the 6th of October, which had been received from Mr. Salmon, I informed you that a definitive answer upon the complaints of Mr. Salmon and Colonel Callava would be given after General Jackson should have been made acquainted with them, and his explanations of the motives and considerations by which he had been governed should be received.

In your letter of 14th November, you manifested your entire satisfaction with this course of proceeding; and when, afterwards, your letters of the 18th and 22d of November were received, containing new complaints against other proceedings of General Jackson, subsequent to those to which the letter of Mr. Salmon had applied, it was presumed that you would expect that the same course should be adopted, with regard to these additional charges, as had already met your approbation in relation to the preceding subjects of complaint. This was the reason why an immediate acknowledgment of the receipt of those letters was not transmitted to you, and is the motive for postponing at present any further reply to your letter of the 27th instant.

I had the honor of informing your predecessor, General Vives, that the statement, stipulated in the fourteenth article of the late treaty to be given by the United States, of the prizes made, and of injuries suffered by the privateers, consuls, and tribunals of France, in the ports of Spain, and its amount, could be ascertained only by the result of the commission instituted by virtue of the eleventh article of the treaty. That commission has already made some progress in the investigation of the cases brought before them; and when they shall have decided upon those concerning which the statement mentioned in the fourteenth article of the treaty is to be made, it shall be transmitted to you without delay.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Don JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, January 6, 1822.

I have had the honor to receive your note of the 31st ultimo, in answer to mine of the 27th of the same month. When, in it, I deemed it my duty to repeat my demand of satisfaction for the conduct of General Jackson, I did so because I had no doubt that he, before leaving the Floridas, had informed his Government of his motives for maltreating the Spanish commissaries and officers. This persuasion was the stronger, inasmuch as I had before received letters from the Floridas considerably later than the events which gave rise to my complaints and the departure of General Jackson; but supposing his having given no account even of the reasons which impelled him to such extraordinary proceedings, (a very just impediment, for which the President may give time in order to determine on my demands,) some notice, it appears reasonable, ought to have arrived long since.

Yet, let the excuses of General Jackson be what they will, it is evident that he can give none for possessing himself of the papers belonging to His Catholic Majesty. I could have flattered myself, therefore, that the President would have been pleased to order the restoration of them, as he could not possibly have retained the least doubt in his mind about a provision so just.

In my note of the 22d of November I had the honor to communicate to you, sir, that I had ordered Colonel Coppinger to stay and return to St. Augustine to take charge of all the papers which had been taken from him.

His remaining increases the damages which have been sustained by His Catholic Majesty, and adds to the vexations of which Colonel Coppinger himself has been the victim; and I shall also take upon me to add, that the delay in the restoration of documents belonging to a monarch friendly to the United States is not conformable to what His Catholic Majesty had a right to expect from a Government to which so many proofs of his delicacy and esteem have been given.

Wherefore, sir, I request of you, anew, that the most peremptory orders may be given for the immediate delivery to Colonel Coppinger of all the papers of which he was dispossessed, and I am persuaded that the President will not refuse so reasonable a demand; in the mean time, that, in giving complete satisfaction to Spain for the injuries committed against her, he may have that of wiping off the stain which General Jackson, with his unjust and violent proceedings, has thrown upon the reputation of the American authorities.

I renew, sir, the sentiments of my most distinguished consideration, &c.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, April 18, 1822.

I communicate to the House of Representatives copies of sundry papers having relation to transactions in East and West Florida, which have been received at the Department of State since my message to the two Houses of Congress of 28th of January last, together with copies of two letters from the Secretary of State upon the same subject.

JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Worthington to the Secretary of State, dated

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, EAST FLORIDA,

ST. AUGUSTINE, January 15, 1822.

The enclosed certificates (Nos. 12 and 13) will close all the papers which I have thought it necessary to send on respecting the archives.

If the Government will direct me what to do with the papers determined to be returned to the ex-governor and escribano, I will make the disposition accordingly.

No. 12.

Colonel Forbes to Mr. Worthington.

SIR: ST. AUGUSTINE, January 8, 1822.

After the archives and documents had been investigated under your excellency's commission of the 1st of October, and the papers separated, I communicated your orders to the escribano, Mr. Entralgo, to deliver him those taken from his office, which it was deemed the United States did not claim under the treaty; also, I made a similar offer to Mr. Arredondo, the general attorney of the ex-governor, Colonel Coppinger, he being absent, to deliver those taken from him, which it was thought proper not to retain. They both declined taking them; so they remain safe, but subject to future orders. I made the offer in writing, as one of the commissioners and as marshal of the United States for the Floridas, agreeably to your written directions.

I am, &c. JAMES G. FORBES.

His Excellency W. G. D. WORTHINGTON, Secretary and Acting Governor of East Florida.

No. 13.

Mr. Law to Mr. Worthington.

SIR: ST. AUGUSTINE, January 14, 1822.

Of the archives and documents taken into the American possession under your commission of the 1st of October, from the Spanish escribano, Mr. Entralgo, part of five boxes are retained as belonging to the United States under a fair construction of the treaty, and the remainder of the five boxes determined by the commissioners to be returned to Mr. Entralgo. From the Spanish ex-governor, Colonel Coppinger, part of six boxes are retained under the above construction, and the remainder of the six boxes determined, as above, to be returned to Colonel Coppinger. Both Colonel Coppinger and Mr. Entralgo, I learn, decline taking those offered to be returned; I would, therefore, advise some final disposition to be made of them, either by yourself or the General Government, as they may be subject to casualties while in our possession. To those papers retained, Americans, Spaniards, and all persons interested, have daily access. Those determined to be returned remain nailed up, and no one is suffered to handle or inspect them.

Yours, respectfully,

EDMUND LAW, Alcalde.

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON, Secretary and Acting Governor of East Florida.

Captain Bell to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON CITY, January 5, 1822.

I had the honor to command the detachment of the United States troops on the 10th of July, 1821, the day on which an exchange of flags took place at St. Augustine, the capital of East Florida, under the late treaty with Spain. On the day following, I was, by commission from General Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, vested with all the powers of the late Spanish Governor Coppinger, which commission I received through the hands of the American commissioner, Colonel Butler, with other documents and instructions from my Government in the discharge of the duties of provisional secretary of the province, until the arrival of Mr. Worthington, who had been duly appointed by the President of the United States. Colonel Butler, the commissioner, shortly after set out for Pensacola. Among the documents left by him for my government and information, were extracts of the official correspondence between the two commissioners on the subject of the archives and documents relating to individual property, and the inhabitants of the province; by which it was agreed that they were not to be removed from St. Augustine, but to remain precisely as they were until the doubts arising on the part of the Spanish commissioner should, by reference to the Spanish authorities on his part, and to the American authorities at Washington on the part of the American commissioner, be settled. No inventory of the archives, documents, and papers, was ever made to my knowledge; none was delivered to me by Colonel Butler.

After his departure, a number of the inhabitants waited on me to know the situation in which the archives and documents relative to property and rights in the province had been left by the American commissioner, and if he had obtained possession of them. On being informed that they were said to be in the possession of the escribano, a Spanish notary and officer, until the doubts arising as to the delivery of them should be settled by the respective Spanish and American authorities, they appeared greatly dissatisfied, expressed themselves in a manner and in terms which led me to believe they had no confidence in the Spanish officers, and, finding no inventory had been made of the archives, declared, from their knowledge of the manner in which these documents were filed, that there was no security that the whole of the documents would ever be delivered; that important papers might be sent to the Havana, if not already sent; that others might be placed on the files; in fact, that the door was open to almost every species of fraud in the office, by which individual rights would be violated, and the public lands would be granted away without the possibility of detection. They strongly advised me, for the above reasons, to take possession of them. This, I informed them, I was not authorized to do, but things must remain as they were until I received further instructions. Boxes were already made in which these documents were to have been packed to be sent to the Havana, but they were in the public store, and under my charge. A Spanish armed schooner sailed, some time after the transports with the troops, for the Havana; as did also another vessel, which carried the treasurer of the province: it was said many boxes, supposed to contain documents, were taken by this officer. The whole of the archives or bureau of the city of Eugenia, which contained important documents relating to individual rights in the city, public squares, and vacant lands, were removed, or not found at the time of taking possession of the documents and papers found in the offices of the late Governor Coppinger and escribano. There was a vessel almost ready to sail for the Havana; boxes were ready in the governor's house, in which the documents found in his office were to have been placed: this, I believe, he admits in his protest. Although the papers have been seized, a sufficient examination has not been had to determine if all are there which were expected to be found. I frequently heard the persons appointed to examine them say that they did not find in the governor's office those papers which are usually kept in this office. Whether any were removed after the 23d June, which were embraced in the correspondence, I am not able to say. I have no reason to believe there were, although the inhabitants interested were constantly complaining of the situation in which they were left, and were paying great fees to the officer to obtain evidences of their papers being in the office. I must further state that the notary, Don Juan de Entralgo, had declined to take the oath of allegiance to our Government; that Governor Coppinger was respectfully applied to by me to deliver up the papers peaceably, before any resort was had to force; and when the papers were put into the hands of certain persons appointed to examine them, with directions to separate private papers from documents relating to the province, Governor Coppinger was given to understand that he, or any agent on his behalf, might attend the examination. As far as the examination has proceeded, many papers have been separated from the public documents, put into boxes, and reported to Mr. Worthington, for the purpose of being returned. By the citizens having property, and residing within the province, the conduct of the American officers in taking the papers was generally approved of.

Most respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN R. BELL.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

General Jackson to the Secretary of State.

SIR: NASHVILLE, January 22, 1822.

Your letter of the 1st instant reached me a few days since, in which you advise me of the receipt of mine of the 22d November, with its enclosures. I had also the honor to receive a copy of your communication, dated 2d November, to the minister of Spain, together with the translations of two letters from said minister, addressed to the Secretary of State, and transmitted to me by direction of the President of the United States. You inform me that the definitive answer to these letters will be deferred until you shall have the opportunity of obtaining my reply, with any remarks I may be disposed to make on the communications of the minister of Spain.

I sincerely regret that Don Joaquin de Anduaga's letter of the 22d November had not been transmitted at an earlier period, as it will be necessary, in my reply, to refer you to two communications of Captain Bell, of the 31st July and 4th August last, and to Mr. Worthington's letters on the subject of the archives at St. Augustine; the first of which is on file in the executive office at Pensacola, and the last I forwarded to you when I was informed by Dr. Bronaugh that my resignation was accepted on the 1st ultimo, not expecting to have any further use for them. Immediately on the receipt of your letter, however, I wrote Mr. Worthington, requesting him to forward you certified copies of his communications as promptly as practicable, and have adopted the same measure in relation to those of Captain Bell, although I had been advised that he had transmitted duplicates to you from St. Augustine. To these documents I must refer you, relying upon my answers thereto, and my own recollection, for their contents, and accompanying my reply with such vouchers as are within my reach; believing there will be ample testimony in your possession to enable you to rebut the statements of this minister of the Spanish Government.

Upon the subject of seizing the papers at St. Augustine, you observe that the Spanish minister dwells with much earnestness on the agreement which had been made between Colonel Butler and the late Governor Coppinger concerning these papers, and requests to be informed whether this agreement was known to me at the time the order was issued for demanding and receiving them; and, if so, to state the particular grounds on which I judged it necessary to resort to compulsory measures for obtaining possession of them.

In answer to this inquiry, I have the honor respectfully to state that Colonel Butler, the commissioner appointed to receive the transfer of East Florida from the Spanish Government, reached me on the 8th of August last, at Pensacola, and made his report. As soon as it was submitted to my examination, I was entirely satisfied that neither Coppinger on the one hand, nor Butler on the other, had any authority, either under the treaty or their instructions, to enter into such an agreement relative to the archives which were, by a positive stipulation between the two Governments, to have been delivered over, with the country, to the constituted authorities of the United States. The treaty was imperative, and vested the parties with no discretion on the subject. Believing, however, that the course adopted by Colonel Butler was perhaps the only one that could have been pursued, without the employment of force, to preserve the documents, and notwithstanding I was perfectly satisfied that Coppinger had, on his part, violated both the treaty and the order of the Captain General of Cuba, yet I felt disposed to leave the archives precisely in the same situation in which Colonel Butler had placed them under his agreement with Coppinger. I was induced to take this course, from a wish to create no unnecessary difficulties, and from a hope that the Spanish officers would comply with their arrangement, and permit the papers to remain unmolested until the arrival of the President's instructions in regard to their final disposition.

This minister states that the commissioners, Butler and Coppinger, stipulated that the artillery and archives were to remain, the first in deposite, in possession of the Anglo-American commissary, and the last where they were, and without the possibility of their being taken away to the Havana. He does not say what was their situation, but it will be recollected that the alcalde was their keeper. Nor does he tell you that Don José Coppinger permitted them to be picked, and culled, and taken away, in violation of his solemn pledge and agreement, as you will see by a reference being had to Captain Bell's letters to me of the 31st July and 4th August, 1821, duplicates of which I am advised are in your possession.

When I received these letters from Captain Bell, who exercised provisionally the powers and authorities of Secretary of East Florida before the arrival of Mr. Worthington, I acknowledge that my indignation was very much aroused. I felt that it was my imperative duty to protect the people of Florida in the enjoyment of the right secured to them expressly under the treaty. I was bound to act on the occasion. The agreement respecting the archives, although void ab initio, for the want of power, had been outrageously violated by Coppinger, or with his connivance; and the evidences of individual rights secured to the citizens were about to be fraudulently conveyed away, after he had pledged himself to Colonel Butler that they should not be removed from that place, and should remain precisely as they were.

The verbal report of Colonel Butler, as communicated in my letter of the 4th August last, affords a clue to the motives of Colonel Coppinger in attempting to practise this base deception. For the last six months previous to the transfer of the country, it is believed he had been engaged in issuing surreptitious grants for large quantities of land in East Florida. It became necessary that they should be taken to the island of Cuba, for the purpose of consummating the titles. These were no doubt the documents which were picked and culled from the balance, to be transported to the Havana, as Coppinger was convinced that the fraud would be inevitably detected if they should be surrendered to the American authorities. This explains the reason why and wherefore they were not delivered over to our commissioner in the first instance, and forms the basis of the confidential communication made to Colonel Butler on the 3d of July last, advising him that a large portion of these archives, relating to private property, were packed up for removal to Cuba, and which gave rise to his letter to Colonel Coppinger of that date, as will appear by the enclosed extract, marked E.

Speaking of the correspondence between Colonels Butler and Coppinger, Don Joaquin de Anduaga remarks that, " by the before-mentioned correspondence, it appears that doubts had arisen whether the artillery and certain archives ought, or ought not, to be delivered over to the United States." With due deference, I would ask, could any doubts exist as to the archives, under the second article of the treaty? No. Could any doubts be entertained relative to the archives embraced in the instructions of His Catholic Majesty, or the instructions given by the Captain General of Cuba to Don José Coppinger, colonel, and commanding the Spanish forces at St. Augustine, and who was charged with the delivery of the country, and all documents relating to the property and sovereignty of the country ceded? It is presumed not. In his letter to Colonel Forbes of the 16th May, 1821, the Captain General of Cuba says: " Respecting East Florida, where there ought to be found all her archives, Governor Mahy would direct that governor, as intrusted by him with the important commission, to make a formal delivery to Mr. Forbes of that province, as well as of the documents belonging to it." " A similar despatch would be addressed to the commandant of West Florida." Here is a positive declaration that such instructions were or should be given to Governor Coppinger for the delivery of all the archives included in the stipulations of the treaty. Contrast this statement of the Captain General of Cuba with the answer of Governor Coppinger to Colonel Butler's letter to him, dated July 3, 1821: " Confining myself," he says, " to a compliance with the treaty and the orders of my Government," (which, he informed Colonel Butler verbally, prevented him from delivering the archives,) " their literal sense is the only guide to my endeavor in the execution; and when any doubts arise, I consult them with that frankness necessary to ascertain my course, and warrant my responsibility."

From this exposition, no one can fail to discover a striking contradiction between the captain general (Mahy) and Governor Coppinger; the former assuring Colonel Forbes that he would direct Governor Coppinger to deliver over the documents to the American authorities, and the latter asserting that, " as an individual, he believed they should be given over;" (see E e.) but that the orders of his Government prevented him from performing that duty. We can find no excuse either for the captain general, Governor Coppinger, or Colonel Callava, for not complying with the orders of their superiors, and with good faith carrying into effect the second article of the treaty, by delivering, and being prepared to deliver, over all the archives and documents appertaining to the property and sovereignty of the Floridas. Instead of this, the captain general does not deliver them at Cuba; Coppinger, contrary to his orders, was preparing to convey them away in a clandestine manner, in violation of his agreement and solemn pledges, until arrested in his faithless conduct by Colonel Butler; and Callava, whilst professing to surrender all the archives, &c., was wickedly and treacherously attempting to carry away the testamentary papers of the heirs of Vidal, and other documents, which were the evidences of claims to private property in the country ceded to the United States.

The unjustifiable delays and evasions of the officers of Spain in withholding the archives and documents, of which the delivery had been expressly stipulated by treaty—vouchers indispensable to the United States, for the dispensation of private justice and the establishment of private right, but entirely useless to Spain—could not but impress upon me the belief that they were intended to subserve the purposes of injustice, fraud, and oppression. The attempt to carry away a number of those documents from St. Augustine and Pensacola in a clandestine manner was considered as a flagrant violation of the treaty; and I began to entertain the opinion that a systematic combination had been formed amongst the officers of Spain to deprive the honest citizens of the country of all the evidences of their right to property secured to them by the provisions of the cession.

Under these impressions, and believing myself vested with legal authority to protect the rights of the citizens, I was urged, by the most imperative duty, to exercise it in their behalf. Upon the receipt of Captain Bell's letters, before referred to, advising me that the archives at St. Augustine were picked and culled, to be conveyed away, I forthwith wrote him, on the 1st of September, 1821, the letter herewith enclosed, marked C, of which the following is an extract:

"I have this moment received your several letters of the 31st July and 4th August, with their enclosures, and regret that the shortness of time will not permit me to answer in detail. On the subject of the archives, I will barely draw your attention to the second article of the treaty with Spain, according to which all archives or documents directly relating to the property or sovereignty of the country are to be delivered by her. You will therefore, forthwith, on the receipt of this, if not already in possession of them, take them into your possession, and place them in the hands of the alcalde for safe-keeping, and who ought to be, like every other, a sworn officer under the Government, and not a Spanish officer owing no allegiance to the United States. All papers and documents in the possession of the cabildo, and, of course, in the possession of American and not Spanish functionaries, are to be retained, and none of them permitted to be culled and taken away." "I am gratified with the friendly expressions of the cabildo of St. Augustine, but am sorry to find they have so entirely mistaken the sense of the proclamation. Nothing could be more absurd than that Spanish officers, as such, should administer the Government. The true meaning is, that, whenever the incumbent will take the oath to support the constitution of the United States, and abjure that of Spain, and take the oaths of office, he shall be continued therein. That part of the proclamation which enjoins fidelity to the Government of the United States would otherwise be nonsense; and the Government has, at all times, the power to remove or dismiss him, and supply his place; but this will not be done unless it be found that he is incompetent to his trust, or unfaithful; and, whenever either is the case, this power, for the benefit of the public, ought to be exercised."

Having previously addressed Captain Bell a letter on the 13th of August, 1821, a copy of which is enclosed, marked D, and forwarded it to him by Mr. Bird, attorney for the United States in East Florida, I was gratified to find, from his answer, that, before the receipt of either of my communications, himself and Mr. Worthington had taken the steps necessary to preserve the archives, and extend to the people of East Florida that protection which was secured and guarantied to them under the treaty.

When it is recollected that the archives and documents relating to the property and sovereignty of the Floridas were to be transferred with the country, agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty, and that Governor Coppinger had been ordered to deliver those in East Florida, what indignation must fill every honest and honorable breast when we learn from the letter of the keeper of these papers at St. Augustine that he claims them as private property, which he had acquired by purchase? From whom could this purchase have been made? From the King? No; because he had stipulated to surrender them, with the country, to the American authorities. If bought at all, it must have been effected with the executive magistrate of the province. In either event, it must have originated in the grossest corruption, and was rendered null and void by the treaty between Spain and the United States.

Although Don Joaquin de Anduaga has taken occasion to heap upon me the most illiberal and indecorous epithets, he is challenged to substantiate a single instance in which myself, or those acting under me, have not scrupulously executed every article of the treaty with Spain.

It appears that the minister of Spain considers his sovereign as having been insulted in the person of his commissary, Colonel Coppinger, at the time the seizure of the papers was effected; he insists that Colonel Coppinger was entitled to all the privileges and immunities of a public officer of Spain, in consequence of his being recognised as such in doing and transacting business with Captain Bell. The fact was, that Captain Bell was not vested with any diplomatic or commissarial powers, and any such recognition on his part was as ineffectual as it was without authority.

By turning to the act of cession executed by Colonel Butler and José Coppinger, it will be distinctly seen that neither of those persons retained any powers as commissioner after the date of that instrument. If this was the case, it must be equally evident that neither Captain Bell nor Mr. Worthington could have possessed such powers at the period to which the Spanish minister has alluded. Colonel José Coppinger being the commander-in-chief, and governor ex officio over East Florida, he was charged, under the treaty, with the delivery of the country and the withdrawal of the Spanish troops. The moment these duties were performed, both his and Colonel Butler's powers as commissioners ceased. This event took place on the 10th July, 1821, when the Spanish authorities ceased the exercise of their functions, as is demonstrated by the following extract from the act of cession:

"There has been verified, at four o'clock of the evening of this day, the complete and personal delivery of the fortifications, and all else of this aforesaid province, to the commissioners, officers, and troops of the United States, and, in consequence thereof, having embarked for the Havana the military and civil officers and Spanish troops in the American transports provided for this purpose, the Spanish authorities having this moment ceased the exercise of their functions, and those appointed by the American Government having begun theirs," &c.

The surrender of the provinces had been completed, and the occasion which created commissioners ceased to exist. The authority and troops of Spain were withdrawn, and the United States put in entire and rightful possession of the country. The six months had also transpired within which the treaty provided the transfer of sovereignty should be made, as well as the evacuation of all the Spanish officers within the Floridas. Colonel Coppinger, remaining after the occurrence of these events, could no longer be considered as entitled to the privileges and immunities of a public agent: he could only be viewed as a stranger, permitted to reside in the Floridas, "amenable to the common judicial tribunals, but who, conformably to the Spanish laws existing before the cession of the province, would have been liable to removal from it, or to imprisonment, at the discretion of the governor, for the mere act of being there."

These disclosures, I hope, will exempt me from the criminal charge which Don Joaquin de Anduaga has preferred against me, of having trampled upon the law of nations and the law of every civilized country. If the detection of treachery and prevention of fraud, the security of the rights of the citizen, and a scrupulous adherence to the articles of the treaty which both Governments were sacredly bound to fulfil, are to be considered atrocities, I have to observe that I glory in the charge, and give this further assurance—that it is the course which I shall always pursue. I would inquire of this minister whether the law of nations protects the agents of Spain in the open violation of the treaty, the rights of individuals, and the orders of their Government? Does this law sanction the non-compliance with the most solemn engagements, by which the rights of individuals were to be sacrificed, by depriving them of those evidences of property stipulated to be delivered over with the country ceded? If so, then is every treaty a perfect mockery, and the law of nations becomes the authority for every species of fraud and corruption. Coppinger and Callava might not only have carried away all the archives of the country, but also the negroes, or moveable property, and their agency would have secured them from merited punishment.

To the remark of the Spanish minister, "that the more my conduct is considered, the more evident it is that my sole object has been to insult Spain," I have to observe, in reply, that it is unjust. I challenge Don Joaquin de Anduaga to establish the fact necessary to authorize such a conclusion. If I know myself, I can declare, with the utmost confidence, that I have never entertained any thing like national antipathies, and that my conduct on no occasion has ever been influenced by such base and unmanly considerations. All the measures of my administration, whilst Governor of the Floridas, were founded upon the principles of justice, the object of which was to secure to the United States, and the people who were citizens of the ceded provinces, those rights which were guarantied to them under the cession, and which the officers of Spain had wantonly violated, in contravention of the treaty, the positive orders of their superiors, and their own solemn pledges and engagements. The virtuous and honorable Spaniard claims the same share of my respect and confidence as the citizens belonging to any other nation. I rejoice in the regeneration of Old Spain, and in the independence of the American colonies, and hope that both may free themselves from that misrule and oppression with which they have been cursed for centuries past under former Governments.

The language used throughout the letters of the minister of Spain, and the charges therein contained in relation to myself, cannot but be viewed as an insult to my Government, to the American people, and to the officer whom he has endeavored to cover with odium and disgrace. It is derogatory to that comity and decorum which should always characterize diplomatic communications, and which are essential to the harmony and friendly intercourse of nations. In reply, I confidently trust that the President of the United States will take such a stand as shall secure the respect due from foreign ministers to his exalted station, to the officers of the Government, and to the nation over which he presides.

It is a subject of remark, that I have been the object of Spanish calumny and virulent animadversion ever since the transactions of the Seminole war. This spirit of hostility is to be discovered in the observation of Governor Mahy to Colonel Forbes; in the letter of the latter to the Secretary of State of the 20th May, 1821; in the protests of Colonels Coppinger and Callava; and has pervaded all the diplomatic communications of Spanish ministers subsequent to the period to which I have alluded. Although such a course is insulting to myself, to the Executive, and to the American people, I have never deemed it of sufficient importance to induce me to complain.

Feeling a confidence in having always discharged my duty whilst in the service of my country, I disregarded the abuse and vituperation of Spanish agents, from a belief that my Government would vindicate its honor and dignity: this, I flatter myself, will yet be accomplished in due time. A considerable portion of my life has been devoted to the happiness, honor, and glory of my country; and when my conduct has met the approbation of the Government, I have a right to expect that it will resist any attempt to slander my reputation. Notwithstanding I solicit the most free and unrestrained investigation into all the measures of my public life by those to whom I am responsible, it is conceived that the same latitude should not be granted to the ministers of foreign Powers: such an interference is rude and indecorous, and should be resented on all proper occasions. This, it is believed, is not due to me alone, but to the President and the nation.

I am, sir, with sentiments of great respect, your most obedient and humble servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

C.

General Jackson to Captain Bell.

SIR: PENSACOLA, September 1, 1821.

I have this moment received your several letters of the 31st July and 4th August, with their enclosures, and regret that the shortness of time will not permit me to answer in detail. On the subject of the archives, I will barely draw your attention to the second article of the treaty with Spain, according to which all archives and documents directly relating to the property or sovereignty of the country are to be delivered by her. You will, therefore, forthwith, on the receipt of this, if not already in possession of them, take them into your possession, and place them in the hands of the alcalde for safe-keeping, and who ought to be, like every other, a sworn officer under the Government, and not a Spanish officer owing no allegiance to the United States. All papers and documents in the possession of the cabildo, and, of course, in the possession of American and not Spanish functionaries, are to be retained, and none of them permitted to be culled and taken away.

I am gratified with the friendly expressions of the cabildo of St. Augustine, but am sorry to find they have so entirely mistaken the sense of the proclamation. Nothing could be more absurd than that Spanish officers, as such, should administer the Government. The true meaning is, that, whenever the incumbent will take the oath to support the constitution of the United States, and abjure that of Spain, and take the oaths of office, he shall continue therein. That part of the proclamation which enjoins fidelity to the Government of the United States would otherwise be nonsense; and the governor has, at all times, the power to remove or dismiss him, and supply his place; but this will not be done unless it be found that he is incompetent to his trust, or unfaithful; and, whenever either is the case, this power, for the benefit of the public, ought to be exercised.

I have read Mr. Fitche's report to you, and have discovered that he has viewed the constitution of Spain as in full force in the Floridas. This is not the fact. On the 4th May, 1814, it was annulled, and every act and decree passed in pursuance of it declared illegal and void. It was never re-established until 1820, after the Floridas had been ceded to the United States. Of course, Spain could not legislate for a country not her own. The first act after the re-establishment of the Cortes was to recommend the ratification of the treaty of cession; and no decrees of the Cortes were ever promulgated in the Floridas until after the ratification of the treaty. It would be strange, indeed, if Spain could legislate for a country whose sovereignty and property had passed out of her hands. The act of Congress for the occupation of the Floridas, and my proclamation, will, I think, clearly show that the Spanish constitution was not taken into view. They are precisely similar to those which preceded the occupation of Louisiana. Besides, the constitution merely provides for a form of government, of which the judiciary is a part, and a part which cannot be separated without being imperfect; and even this judiciary was never established in the Floridas by decree of the Cortes, not to speak of its entire incompatibility with the nature of our constitution and Government. The mere circumstance of uniting in the same person the different offices of captain general, intendant, and provincial governor, and leaving it to the President to prescribe the manner in which the powers of the existing officers shall be exercised, shows that there was no intention to pursue the Spanish plan of government.

The ordinances heretofore sent you are intended to distribute and organize a Government, approximating as nearly as practicable to that of Spain, and formed out of the powers with which the Spanish officers were clothed. It must be borne in mind that although Spanish laws and usages are in force, excepting so far as they may be expressly altered, yet the Spanish Government has ceased.

Mr. Fitche's ideas as to the powers of the judge appointed by the President, so far as relates to the carrying into effect the acts extended over the Floridas, are correct; but the judge can exercise no other powers, unless specially given him by the instructions of the President. Such instructions have not been given, and I doubt very much whether the President could legally give them. There is no doubt that the person exercising the powers of the Governor of East Florida can exercise all the powers exercised under the King of Spain at the time the country was ceded. The governors of the Floridas exercised judicial powers as late as the 10th July, 1820. This was up to the re-establishment of the Cortes, and the ratification of the treaty; and, to the very delivery of the country, admiralty jurisdiction.

On the subject of the archives, I have again to repeat that you will take them into your charge. Governor Coppinger's powers having ceased with the delivery of the country, he cannot be considered, as respects the United States, any more than any other individual. He is not recognised in any official capacity; he has, therefore, no right to demand any papers in the possession of the United States officers, or to hold any official correspondence on any subject arising since the delivery, by which act his official character, as to us, ceased; and even the subjects of difference which arose before the delivery were referred to the respective Governments.

Captain Willis is now here, on his way to St. Augustine; but, fearful of not being able to reach that place before the second Monday in this present month, he has therefore halted, to hear from you whether the clerk's office for the county of St. John is kept open for him. If it is, he will repair there as soon as advised of it at this place; and you will please to address him to the care of Cary Nicholas, postmaster, Pensacola.

On the subject of Indian agent, I have this day addressed a letter to the Secretary of War on that subject, enclosing Mr. Pennier's letter to him, and Mr. Dexter's.

Should you know where Mr. Pennier's is, please to inform him that I have been waiting for him to report to me in person, and that I have a letter from the Treasury Department for him.

I am, with sentiments of respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the Floridas, &c.

Captain JOHN R. BELL,
Or to such officer as may be exercising the Government of East Florida.

D.

Governor Jackson to Wm. G. Worthington, or Captain J. R. Bell, exercising the powers of the Governor of East Florida.

SIR: PENSACOLA, August 13, 1821.

On the 28th ultimo I despatched an express, Captain Hanham, to you, with sundry ordinances that I found it necessary to adopt for the better organization of the Floridas; the ordinances are only a declaration of what the Spanish law really is, and what its operations under the Cortes would have been; the constitution of Spain providing for the trial by jury in criminal cases, although never extended to the colonies, because the treaty ceding the Floridas was concluded before the constitution was adopted and carried into execution in Spain.

When I took possession here, I found nothing but an alcalde, which was filled by a Spanish military officer, who could not, therefore, hold it under our Government. I appointed an alcalde, Judge Brackenridge, in whose custody all archives received were placed. Finding that a cabildo had once existed here, I ordained the re-establishment of it in that of a mayor and aldermen of the city, adding a board of health to it; and there being no judge, I created a county court, with the powers that this court would have held under the constitution of Spain, and that of the United States.

Colonel Butler reached me on the 8th instant, and reports that he found at St. Augustine an alcalde, a cabildo, and a judge, all in operation. This will afford you great relief in carrying into effect the ordinances sent you by Captain Hanham. In every instance where the incumbents in office will take the necessary oaths of office, and are, in your opinion, of good moral character, and fit for the office, you will continue them. I have found but few here of the Spanish inhabitants that would accept an office under our Government, not having determined of themselves whether they will become citizens of the United States; and believing that taking an oath of office would be considered their election to become citizens, they have, in most instances, refused.

It is necessary, on the change of government, that all officers who are to execute it under the United States should take the necessary oaths of office, and, when this is refused, you will fill the vacancies thus occasioned by new appointments, even when the old incumbents will remain, and especially in the latter case; for, as Spanish officers, they cannot execute the government under the United States.

This will be handed you by Mr. Bird, who has the appointment, by the President of the United States, as attorney for East Florida.

I am, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Extract of a letter from Governor Coppinger to Colonel R. Butler, under date

JUNE 23, 1821.

I answer your esteemed note of yesterday, assuring your excellency, as I mentioned in my letter of the 19th, that, until I received the answer of my Government on the doubts arising on the delivery of the public archives relating to the individual property of the inhabitants of this province, and on which I have, on this date, written for information, they shall not be removed from this place, and shall remain precisely as they are.

I shall likewise remain here until this point is decided, as well as that on the artillery, on which I have made my report; and, in the mean time, have formed an exact inventory of the documents contained in these archives.

Extract from Colonel Butler's letter to José Coppinger, Governor, &c., dated

JUNE 26, 1821.

The subject of the archives relating to individual property I consider perfectly understood between us, and will, therefore, remain silent on that head until you receive the further instructions of your Government in relation thereto.

Extract from Colonel Butler's letter to Governor Coppinger, which was predicated upon information, received confidentially, that a large portion of the archives relating to private property were packed up for removal to Cuba, dated

JULY 3, 1821.

That a more perfect understanding should exist between us, in relation to the archives which are embraced by the treaty of cession, and relating to individual property, is the object of this communication.

I should, upon mature reflection, consider myself wanting in my duty to the inhabitants of this province, who are about to become citizens of my Government, if I withheld any statement in relation to the archives, which might lead to the removal of any document that would be of importance to their security, and which my Government considers as included in the treaty. The following records are deemed indispensable to this object, viz: the royal or other orders, authorizing the governor of this province to issue grants for lands, lots, or squares; the evidence of indemnity offered by Great Britain to her subjects, who might leave their property in this province and retire to her territory, after the cession to Spain; the proclamation of the Spanish authorities, calling on those individuals to come and dispose of their property, or peaceably occupy it within certain periods, or the same would be confiscated, and the order of confiscation thereafter; the original records of all grants made in the province, either by His Catholic Majesty, the Captain General of Cuba, or the governors of this province, respectively; the original records relating to all trials and decisions embracing individual property; and the original records relating to the execution of wills and administration of estates.

The foregoing explanation is given to show you what I am bound to consider as the archives relating to individual property, and which are not to be removed from this place until the decision is had on the subject by our respective Governments.

The answer by Governor Coppinger.

The note your excellency was pleased to send me yesterday, in order to point out which are the records comprehended in the treaty of cession, and appertaining to private property, I have duly examined, and have to answer that, confining myself to a compliance with the treaty and the orders of my Government, [which, he informed Colonel Butler verbally, prevented him from delivering the archives,] their literal sense is the only guide to my endeavor in the execution; and when any doubts arise, I consult them with that frankness necessary to ascertain my course, and warrant my responsibility.

Thus actuated, I early informed your excellency of the measures which I had taken with respect to the public archives, or escribano office, or records bearing on private property of the inhabitants of this province—measures to which your excellency was pleased to accede.

It now appears that your excellency advances pretensions to other documents that, I am sorry to say, are, according to my conception, excluded from the delivery. I do not comprehend the ground upon which you found your demand; therefore, and in order to report to my Government, by the earliest opportunity, that it may decide with yours on these points, and, at the same time, on those others in question, your excellency will excuse my not entering into particular observations on each of them.

Extract of Colonel Butler's answer, dated

JULY 5, 1821.

In answer to the note of yesterday, which your excellency has done me the honor to address to me, I beg leave to remark, that the only ground assumed on my part, in making the communication of the 3d instant, was that of the faithful performance of my duty to my Government, and the individuals who are about to become citizens thereof; and I did not expect you to enter into particular observations on the subject of that letter, but I wished to give you timely information of what documents I considered to be the archives in our arrangement, and would be esteemed under the treaty sufficient to guaranty the possession of the inhabitants in their property, and that they might not be removed until the decision was had on the subject, when I could adopt such further amicable measures as are warranted by my instructions.

If I comprehend your excellency aright, it is, that you will communicate a copy of that letter to the Captain General of Cuba.

Extract of Colonel Butler's letter to Captain J. R. Bell, dated

ST. AUGUSTINE, July 11, 1821.

The foregoing extracts are given you as the evidence of the actual situation of the archives relating to private property, and the decision of the Government of the United States must determine the necessary steps to be taken thereon.

The balance of the above letter relates to subjects unconnected with the archives.

ROBERT BUTLER.

E e.

Colonel Butler to General Jackson.

SIR: HERMITAGE, January 21, 1822.

On reading the correspondence between Colonel Forbes and the Captain General of Cuba, I find a promise, on the part of the latter, that the Governor of East Florida would be ordered to deliver over the archives to the American authorities; and this duty not having been performed, I consider it proper to advise you that, in the month of June last, Colonel Coppinger, late Governor of East Florida, stated to me, in a conference had on the subject of the delivery of the archives relating to individual property, that, as an individual, he believed they should be given over to the United States, but that his orders prevented him from turning them over. I mentioned to him that I had heard a report, as a reason for not turning them over, that it would be to the interest of the United States to destroy them; and remarked, that I regarded not the source from whence it came, as it could alone spring from the most wicked and unprincipled heart. As there appears an absence of good faith in the execution of the late treaty, I give you this information for the benefit of the Government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT BUTLER,

Late United States commander in East Florida.

Mr. Worthington to General Jackson.

SIR: ST. AUGUSTINE, November 9, 1821.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your highly esteemed favor of the 1st ultimo; its delay may be accounted for from this remark on the envelope: "Missent to and forwarded from Washington city, October 24, 1821."

Your approbation of my humble but honest exertions to anticipate and fulfil your intentions in the organization of this Government, I receive with sentiments of no ordinary sensibility. I assure you I had difficulties to contend with, which, had they assailed me from a legitimate quarter, I should not have valued them "a pin's point;" but, coming from a point of the horizon where I looked for only invigorating and cheering sunshine, it was peculiarly calculated to diminish and enervate my powers and official weight. I saw the whole ill policy with regret, but not dismay. I was determined the Spaniards should not see and triumph in the spectacle of the Americans quarrelling among themselves. Under the blessing of Heaven, I felt I could weather the storm, and I was conscious of your support. Your letter before me has shown I was not mistaken.

The affair of the Government-house is handsomely settled, as you will see by my correspondence, predicated on your opinion, with Colonel Eustis, marked Nos. 1, 2. To show you that I was uniform in my sentiments respecting the harmony which ought to exist between the civil and military authorities, (of your high encomium of which I am proud,) I enclose you two letters marked Nos. 3, 4. I would indeed give a mass of private evidences of this matter, but I take my leave of it, I hope forever, and sincerely pray your pardon for being so troublesome on such an affair.

I thank you for your advice on my probable intercourse with the Indians; I shall be governed by it literally. I intend, if practicable, to prepare a splendid talk for them; but they shall understand two things, at least, very distinctly: the non-natives must return amongst the Creeks; and the natives, if they stay in Florida, must be concentrated.

I sincerely hope, sir, that the visit of yourself and family to Tennessee will be as agreeable as it is no doubt judicious; and as for myself, I will endeavor to merit the additional proof of confidence which you have reposed in me during your temporary absence. Should you pay us a visit here, we will try to make the best fixture we can; but the yellow fever has sadly cut us up; even now it rages; God knows when it will stop; the first black frost, they say, is a certain bar to it; that may not come till January, if then. Yesterday, at my room, in the shade, the thermometer stood at 72; this is as cool as we have had it; at one P. M. I put it in the sun, and in ten minutes it rose to 105, so that I really do not know when we shall get rid of this plague.

I will now, sir, take leave to lay before you the remainder of the proceedings respecting our taking possession of the archives, &c.; they are marked No. 5. Any further course which you, or the Government at Washington, may direct concerning them, I will adopt; and in the interim, if any thing shall suggest itself to me as necessary to be done in the premises, I will progress in it.

The ex-governor, Coppinger, like his compeer Callava, I see, by a Charleston paper, publishes the proceedings as an "outrage." Nobody who knows the Spaniards, as the President, yourself, and many others of our countrymen, will pay much attention to these sorts of appeal. But, unfortunately for persons in public stations who get into disputes with them, too many of our fellow-citizens take sides with them because they know nothing about them. If it should be thought best, it is probable some of us who have been assailed may follow the example set at Pensacola, and publish a statement of the transaction.

As to myself, I intended to do what was right and proper, and hope my proceedings may meet your approbation. My fortune amongst the Spaniards, on both sides of the equator, has been to incur their dislike and hostility; yet, I trust, not of the good, liberal, and high-minded, on either side. Judge Duval and Mr. Hackley have not yet arrived.

With great respect, &c.

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,
Secretary and Acting Governor of East Florida.

His Excellency ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of East and West Florida.

Mr. Reynolds to General Jackson.

ST. AUGUSTINE, November 13, 1821.

The other documents referred to by Governor Worthington cannot be forwarded by this mail, as much of our time must be necessarily devoted to the sick, the dying, and the dead. His excellency residing in the island, about a mile and a half distant, prevents me from giving him this information previous to the departure of the mail. But being desirous that nothing which is in readiness should be delayed, I send you his letter to the commissioners, (No. 5,) upon their having closed the examination of archives and documents, &c., as far as was practicable under the circumstances.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. REYNOLDS, Private Secretary.

His Excellency ANDREW JACKSON, Governor of the Floridas.

No. 5.

Governor Worthington to John R. Bell, James G. Forbes, and Edmund Law.

GENTLEMEN: ST. AUGUSTINE, November 7, 1821.

I had the honor to receive your additional report of the 5th instant on yesterday evening, on the subject of the records and archives.

I felicitate you on the conclusion of the difficult and laborious duties which it was deemed necessary to assign to you, which you so cheerfully undertook, and so faithfully have discharged. I have been an eye-witness to the open and assiduous manner in which you conducted the investigation, and have no doubt, when the voluminous mass which you have transmitted shall be criticised, it will prove to be an honest and able examination.

Without detracting from the other commissioners, I must be permitted to pay a particular compliment to the president, who, during the whole tedious inquiry, while the epidemic raged in this city, with the most assiduous punctuality, presided at the board. I know the various duties of Colonel Forbes and the sickness of Mr. Law prevented them giving such full attendance as they otherwise would have done. I am perfectly satisfied with them and the whole board. You will be pleased to present my respects to the secretaries, Messrs. Betham, Guy, Lynch, and Reynolds, for the faithful discharge of their duties.

And now, gentlemen, I must be permitted to say, notwithstanding the clamor which has been raised on a similar proceeding respecting the archives at Pensacola, and even against the affair here, you have conducted and finished this commission in a manner to challenge the approbation of every disinterested and honest American in our country, and, I hope, even of every unprejudiced Spaniard, who possesses one spark of true Castilian honor and sincerity.

With great respect &c.

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON,
Secretary and Acting Governor of East Florida.

JOHN R. BELL, JAMES G. FORBES, and EDMUND LAW, Esqs.

Extract of a letter from General Andrew Jackson to the Secretary of State.

HERMITAGE, NEAR NASHVILLE, January 31, 1822.

Enclosed I send you an extract of a letter from Colonel George Walton, Secretary of West Florida, and charged with exercising the powers of governor of the same, in my absence, with its enclosure. Having received from the President of the United States his letter bearing date the 31st December last, post-marked at the city of Washington, the 9th instant, notifying me that my resignation was accepted, forecloses me from giving to Colonel Walton any instructions officially, and I have thought proper to refer him to the President for directions as to the proper course to be pursued with regard to those Spanish officers. Colonel Coulon is father-in-law to John Innerarity. Guillemard is a very base and treacherous man, being the same who piloted the British up Bayou Bienvenue in the year 1815, then an officer of Spain, when the attempt was made upon New Orleans by General Packenham.

I also enclose herewith, marked No. 2, for the information of the President of the United States, the certificate of Mr. Henry Wilson, a man of respectability, that goes to show the fraudulent practices committed by the officers of Spain, with regard to land titles in the Floridas, and forcibly adds to the propriety of adopting the rule I have heretofore recommended, of appointing none to the office of commissioners for the adjudication of land titles in Florida but those of honesty, integrity, and entirely disinterested. Should this rule not be adopted, great frauds will be imposed upon the United States.

Extract of a letter from Colonel George Walton, Secretary of West Florida, and exercising the duties of Governor of the same, to General Jackson, dated

JANUARY 7, 1822.

A few days ago, two of the Spanish officers, Colonel Marcos de Villiers, generally called Colonel Coulon, and Arnaldo Guillemard, arrived here in a vessel from Havana. It was first intimated to me that they had resigned their commissions in the Spanish service; but when arrested by my order, and brought before me, they declared they had come with the intention of asking permission to attend in person to the settlement of their private affairs, and the removal of their families. They solemnly declared that they had not returned in defiance of the proclamation, which they had promptly obeyed, and that they are ready to submit themselves to any order which should be taken in their case. For the present, I ordered them into confinement; but the calabouse being in no condition to receive them, (for, excepting the officers' room, it has no fire-place,) and as Coulon is a very old man, and his wife at this time extremely ill, I thought it best to confine them in their own houses. The situation of old Coulon was such that it would have been cruel to confine him in the dungeon with the common malefactors; and I could not, with propriety, make a distinction with respect to Guillemard. They then presented the enclosed memorial, in which they throw themselves on the mercy of the Government.

After these concessions, and the humble manner in which they sue to be permitted to remain, I was well convinced that you would have granted them the indulgence they prayed for. But, under my instructions, although a state of things was presented, by the returning sense of propriety on the part of these people, different from what is contemplated in these instructions, yet I did not consider myself authorized to go any farther than to continue them in the same confinement until further orders. I was well convinced that while, on the one hand, you were determined to cause the Government provisionally established over these provinces to be respected by every one living under it—and, as far as you were concerned, to cause the stipulations of the treaty to be enforced—yet, I also knew, from the magnanimity of your disposition, that you would instantly relent on the first manifestation of respect to the Government, and submission to its determinations. This course, however, was not adopted by me until after consultation with Colonels Fenwick and Clinch, Major Denkins, and Judge Brackenridge, who all concurred in the opinion that this was, under all circumstances, the most proper.

The sixty days in the case of Innerarity having expired, application was made for execution, as nothing had been offered by him in the mean time on any claims put in by creditors. He had got the papers on his receipt, as had been customary, and, when called upon, I found he was disposed to try his old tricks; on which I had a notice served upon him to show cause at eleven o'clock this day why an attachment should not issue. I had determined to commit him instantly if the papers were not then produced, and to keep him in prison until they should be forthcoming. He took the hint, and left them with Mr. Cannon last night. A long memorial by Mr. Acre was presented, praying a review of the whole proceedings; but I shall pay no attention to it, and will now proceed forthwith to compel the payment of the money.

I learn from St. Augustine that the splendid talk, alluded to in my last, has entirely failed, from the unaccountable and singular circumstance of there being no Indians to listen to it, as none attended on the occasion, although a considerable concourse of whites, who had assembled on the beautiful plains of Atlathna, waited impatiently several days for their arrival.

Colonel Walton to Colonel Clinch.

SIR: PENSACOLA, January 21, 1822.

I have to request that you will direct that such portion of the troops under your command as may be necessary shall be furnished, to carry into effect the proclamation issued by General Jackson in September last, requiring the departure of certain Spanish officers from the Floridas—two of the officers named in that proclamation having returned to this city without permission.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

GEORGE WALTON,
Secretary of West Florida, and Acting Governor of same.

To Captain WILSON, the Officer of the Day:

You are hereby commanded, forthwith, to apprehend and bring before me, at the Executive chambers, Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard, that they may be dealt with according to law, for the contempt and disobedience of a certain proclamation issued by his excellency General Andrew Jackson on the 29th day of September, 1821, requiring the said Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard to withdraw themselves from the Floridas.

Given under my hand and private seal, (there being no seal of office,) this 2d day of January, 1822, at Pensacola, in the province of West Florida.

GEORGE WALTON,
Secretary of West Florida, and Acting Governor of same.

By the Acting Governor: SAMUEL FRY, Private Secretary.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBERS, PENSACOLA, January 2, 1822.

Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard having this day been brought before George Walton, Esquire, Secretary of West Florida, and acting governor of the same, by virtue of his warrant, that they might be dealt with according to law for the contempt and disobedience of a certain proclamation issued by his excellency Major General Andrew Jackson on the 29th day of September, 1821, requiring the said Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard to withdraw themselves from the Floridas, and having been required to show cause why they should not be committed to prison for the said contempt, were heard by counsel; and his excellency the acting governor, not being fully advised as to the matter offered by them in excuse of their return to this province, granted further time to the said Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard, until to-morrow at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to show further cause, &c.; and, in the mean time, they were ordered to consider themselves under arrest, and confined to their own houses by parole of honor.

To His Excellency George Walton, Governor of the Floridas, &c. &c. The memorial of Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard respectfully represents:

That your memorialists, with other Spanish officers, were, by the proclamation of his excellency Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Floridas, issued on the 29th of September last, ordered to quit the Floridas within three days thereafter, for reasons therein assigned. That your memorialists, in obedience to the said proclamation, withdrew from the said provinces, and repaired to the island of Cuba; and that, after being there some time, they found themselves compelled, from the situation of their private affairs, and the illness of a part of their families, to return to this country. That, in so doing, nothing was further from their intention than any disrespect to the constituted authorities of this province, whose determinations they declare themselves ready to observe and obey so long as they remain in the same. But they beg leave respectfully to represent that, at the same time, they are Spanish officers; they and their families have also been inhabitants of this country for many years; and that they are owners of real and personal property here to a considerable amount. That, by the fifth article of the treaty, the inhabitants of the ceded provinces, who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions, shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject, in either case, to duties. That your memorialists are desirous to remove with their families to the Spanish dominions; and that, unless permitted to remain here and superintend in person these necessary arrangements, they will be exposed to serious loss and injury.

Your memorialists therefore pray that, taking the circumstances into consideration, and especially their solemn declaration that they return not as Spanish officers, but as private individuals, on private business, and with every disposition to obey and respect the existing authorities, they may be permitted to remain for the purpose of settling their affairs, and making the necessary arrangements for the removal of their families.

MARCOS DE VILLIERS,
ARNALDO GUILLEMARD.

JANUARY 3, 1822.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBERS, PENSACOLA, January 5, 1822.

I have maturely considered the memorial of Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard. Although well satisfied, from the known magnanimity of General Jackson, that, if he were present, the petition would be granted, yet, from the circumstance in which I am placed, I consider myself compelled to continue the present arrest and confinement till further orders.

GEORGE WALTON,
Secretary of West Florida, and Acting Governor of the same.

No. 2.

H. Wilson's certificate.

PENSACOLA, January 6, 1822.

I do hereby certify that, some time last spring, I made a purchase of Henry Michelet of this place, of a tract of eight hundred arpents of land on the Escambia, according to the plat of survey accompanying the grant; and on a view of which plat, the grant was confirmed by the Intendant General of Havana. About two months ago, having taken an American surveyor to examine the lines, it was found that the Spanish survey was a mere fiction, it being absolutely impossible, from the nature of the ground, and the course of the river, to obtain a tract of eight hundred arpents in any way agreeing with the description in the plat. When this was made known to Mr. Michelet, and he was convinced of the fraud, he proposed to me to make a survey of any vacant lands I should choose; that he could have the plat of this land withdrawn from the title-papers, and send the new survey to Havana, and have it certified by the surveyor general, and inserted in the place of the first. This proposal I rejected with indignation, as dishonorable to me as an individual, and a fraud upon my Government.

HENRY WILSON.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Walton.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, February 22, 1822.

The President of the United States having received and accepted the resignation of General Jackson as Governor of the Floridas, I am instructed to inform you of his direction that you should continue to exercise all the authorities vested in you by General Jackson during his absence from the province, until further provision for the government of the same shall be made by Congress, or until you shall receive further orders from the President.

I have received from General Jackson a letter, enclosing an extract of yours to him of the 7th of January last, relating to the case of the two Spanish officers, Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard, under arrest at their houses for returning to Pensacola in disobedience to the proclamation of General Jackson.

As it appears by their memorial that they returned for the settlement of their private affairs and the care of their families, and that they pledge themselves to pay due respect to the laws and to the constituted authorities of the Territory, the President directs me to instruct you to discharge them from arrest, and permit them to remain there.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

GEORGE WALTON, Esq., Secretary and Acting Governor of West Florida.

The Secretary of State to Don Joaquin de Anduaga.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, April 15, 1822.

In the letters which I had the honor of writing you on the 2d of November and 31st of December last, you were informed that a definitive answer to the complaints against certain proceedings of General Andrew Jackson, while Governor of Florida, which were contained in a letter to this Department from Don Hilario de Rives y Salmon, before your arrival in this country, and in your letters of the 18th and 22d of November, would be given after the substance of those complaints should have been made known to General Jackson, and his explanations of the motives and considerations by which he had been governed, in adopting the measures complained of, should have been received.

In performing this promise, I am commanded by the President of the United States to repeat the assurance of his deep regret that the transactions which formed the subject of these complaints should ever have occurred, and his full conviction, upon a review of all the circumstances which have attended them, that they are attributable entirely to the conduct of the Governor and Captain General of Cuba, and of the subordinate officers of Spain, in evading and refusing the fulfilment of the most express and positive stipulations of the treaty, both of evacuating the province within six months from the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, and of delivering the archives and documents relating directly to the property and sovereignty of the provinces.

At the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, your predecessor, General Vives, delivered an order from His Catholic Majesty to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba and of the Floridas, informing him of the cession to the United States of that part of the provinces of which he was the governor, that was situated on this continent, and instructing him as follows:

"I command you, and ordain, that, after the information which shall be seasonably given you by my minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary at Washington of the ratifications having been exchanged, you proceed, on your part, to make the proper dispositions, in order that, at the end of six months, counting from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible, the Spanish officers and troops may evacuate the territories of both Floridas, and that possession of them be given to the officers or commissioners of the United States duly authorized to receive them. You shall arrange in proper time the delivery of the islands adjacent and dependant upon the two Floridas, and the public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property; as also the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of the same two provinces, by placing them at the disposal of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them."

This order, thus clear and explicit, was depatched, together with letters from General Vives, to the Governor of Cuba and the Floridas, notifying him of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, by Colonel James G. Forbes, who was commissioned "as agent and commissary of the United States, to deliver to him the royal order, to arrange and concert with him, conformably to instructions committed therewith, the execution of the above stipulations, and to receive from the said governor, and from any and every person possessed of the said archives and documents, all and every one of the same, and to dispose thereof in the manner prescribed by his instructions." Colonel Forbes's authority, thus, was to receive the documents and archives, and to concert and arrange with the Governor of the Floridas the delivery of those provinces, which General Jackson was commissioned to receive, take possession of, and occupy, and of which he was further commissioned to be the governor when surrendered to the United States.

The royal order was delivered by Colonel Forbes to the Governor of the Floridas, at the Havana, on the 23d of April, 1821. There has been shown by that governor no cause or reason which could justly have required him to delay the delivery of the documents and archives, and the arrangements for the delivery of the provinces, beyond the term of a single week. There were twenty boxes of those archives and documents—the whole, or with very few exceptions—the whole of which ought, by the positive stipulation of the treaty, and by the express order of the King of Spain, to have been immediately delivered to Colonel Forbes. Not one of them was delivered to him, nor has one of them been delivered to this day.

The orders for the surrender of the provinces were delayed from day to day, notwithstanding the urgent and continual solicitations of Colonel Forbes, for the term of six weeks; at the end of which, to avoid further indefinite procrastination, he was compelled to depart without receiving the archives and documents, but with repeated promises of the governor that they should be transmitted to this Government—promises which have remained to this day unperformed.

The orders for the delivery of the provinces themselves were not only thus unreasonably withheld, but, when made out, though not furnished to Colonel Forbes till the last week in May, were made to bear date on the 5th of that month. Nor were they prepared conformably to the stipulation of the treaty, or to the royal order of His Catholic Majesty; for, instead of directing the surrender to be made to the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them, the instruction to the commanders in East and West Florida was to deliver those respective provinces to Colonel Forbes himself, who had from the United States no authority to receive them. And although expressly advised of this fact by Colonel Forbes, with the request that the orders of delivery might be amended, and made conformable to the treaty and to the royal command, Governor Mahy did not so amend it, but reduced Colonel Forbes to the alternative of submitting to further delays, or of departing with an imperfect and ambiguous order of delivery of West Florida, authorizing its surrender to the legally constituted authorities of the United States (that is, as Governor Mahy well knew, to General Andrew Jackson) only in case of any accident happening to Colonel Forbes, whom he still affected to consider, notwithstanding his own express declaration to the contrary, as the commissioned agent of the United States to that effect.

The twenty boxes of documents and archives which were at the Havana, as has been mentioned, had been transmitted thither from Pensacola, and contained all the most important records of property in West Florida. The possession of them was in the highest degree important to the United States, not only as the vouchers of individual property, but as protecting guards against the imposture of fraudulent grants.

The same persevering system of withholding documents which it was their duty to deliver has marked, I am deeply concerned to say, the conduct of both the commanders of East and West Florida, who were charged, respectively, to deliver those provinces to the United States. It is to this cause, and to this alone, as appears from a review of all the transactions of which you have complained, that must be traced the origin of all those severe measures which General Jackson himself was the first, while deeming them indispensable to the discharge of his own official duties, to lament. Charged as he was with the trust of receiving the provinces in behalf of the United States, of maintaining their rights of property within them, of guarding them to the utmost of his power from those frauds to which there was too much reason to apprehend they would be liable, and to which the retention of the documents gave so great and dangerous scope—intrusted, from the necessity of the case, during the interval of time while the general laws of the United States remained unextended to the provinces, with the various powers which had until that time been exercised by the Spanish governors, and which included the administration of justice between individuals—it was impossible that he should not feel the necessity of exercising, under circumstances thus exasperating and untoward, every authority committed to him by the supreme authority of his country, to preserve inviolate, so far as on him depended, the interests of that country, and the sacred obligations of individual right.

In the proceedings connected with the delivery of the province, he had as little reason to be satisfied with the conduct of Colonel Callava as with that of the captain general. On a plea of indisposition, that officer had, on the day of the surrender, evaded the performance of a solemn promise, which General Jackson had considered an indispensable preliminary to the act; and afterwards the colonel positively declined its fulfilment. He had, however, completed the surrender of the province with which he had been charged. He had declined producing to General Jackson any credential as a commissioner for performing that act, but had informed him that he should make the surrender as the commanding officer of the province, by virtue of orders from his superior. This service had been consummated; and Colonel Callava, whom General Jackson had formerly notified that he had closed with him his official correspondence forever, was bound, by the special stipulation of the treaty, to have evacuated, as one of the Spanish officers, the province before the 22d of August. If General Jackson had, in courtesy to Colonel Callava, considered him, notwithstanding his own disclaimer of the character, as a commissioner for the delivery of the province, there can be no pretence that he was entitled to special privileges under it, after he had avowedly performed all its duties; after he had been informed by General Jackson that their official correspondence was finally closed; and after the date when, by the positive engagements of the treaty which he was to execute, he was bound to have departed from the province. From the time when his functions for the surrender of the province were discharged, he could remain in Pensacola no otherwise than as a private unprivileged individual, amenable to the duly constituted American authorities of the place, and subject to the same control of General Jackson as a private citizen of the United States would have been to that of the Governor of the Floridas before the surrender had taken place.

That this was the opinion of Colonel Callava himself, and of his friends who applied to Judge Fromentin for the writ of habeas corpus to rescue him from the arrest under which he was placed by the order of General Jackson, is apparent from their conduct on that occasion. It is stated by Judge Fromentin that, before granting the supposed writ of habeas corpus, he required that Colonel Callava should enter into a recognizance for twenty thousand dollars, with two securities, each for the amount of ten thousand dollars: the condition of which recognizance was, that Colonel Callava should personally be and appear before the judge of the United States for West Florida, &c. whenever required so to do; that he should not depart from the city of Pensacola without the leave of the said court, nor send away, remove, or otherwise dispose of, unknown to the said court, any of the papers in question. It was only upon the promise of his friends that this recognizance should be executed, that Judge Fromentin consented to issue the writ of habeas corpus; and this recognizance renounces, in fact, every pretension of exemption from the judicial authority of the country, and, consequently, of the diplomatic privileges of a commissioner.

It has been seen that the most important documents relating to the property of West Florida had been transmitted to the Havana; there remained, however, a portion of them, particularly of judicial records, relating to the titles of individual property. Some of these Colonel Callava did deliver up with the province; others, of the same description and character, indispensable for the administration of justice in the province, and useless at the Havana, whither it was his intention to have transported them, were retained—not in his possession, but in that of Don Domingo Sousa, a Spanish officer, who, by the stipulation of the treaty, ought also to have departed from the province before the 22d of August.

The day immediately preceding that date, the alcalde of Pensacola, at the suit of a woman in an humble walk indeed of life, but whose rights were, in the eye of General Jackson, equally entitled to his protection with those of the highest rank or the most commanding opulence, had represented to him that a number of documents belonging to the alcalde's office, and relating to estates at that place, and to suits there instituted, were in the possession of Domingo Sousa; that the necessity for obtaining possession of those documents was urgent, and, therefore, he requested the governor to authorize some one to make a regular demand for them, and to ascertain what they were. Governor Jackson, accordingly, forthwith commissioned the Secretary of the Territory, the alcalde of Pensacola himself, and the clerk of the county court of Escambia, to proceed to the dwelling of Sousa to make demand of all such papers or documents belonging to the alcalde's office as might be in his possession; and, in case of Sousa's refusal to exhibit or deliver the same, immediately to report the fact to him (the governor) in writing. These commissioners the next day reported to the governor that they had examined the papers in the possession of Sousa; that they had found among them four sets of papers of the kind which belonged to the office of the alcalde, and among them those in which the woman from whom the first application had proceeded was interested; that they had, both verbally and in writing, demanded of him the delivery of those documents, which no private individual had a right to keep, as they related to the rights of persons holding or claiming property in the province, but that Sousa had refused to deliver them, alleging that he was but the servant of Colonel Callava, and could not deliver them without his order. In the transactions of Sousa, on this occasion, is manifested the same consciousness that the claim of diplomatic privilege, set up by Colonel Callava to screen him from the operation of the authority of Governor Jackson, was without foundation; for, although he refused to deliver up the papers conformably to the governor's command, he submitted to the examination of them by the commissioners, in obedience to the same authority; and, though he declined receiving from them the letter demanding the delivery of the papers, he told them that, to relieve himself from the responsibility of keeping them, he should deliver them to Governor Callava himself. They were accordingly sent to the house of Colonel Callava, and put into the possession of his steward, Fullarat. It is clear, however, that, if the papers while in Sousa's possession were privileged from being delivered up at the command of Governor Jackson, they were equally privileged from examination by the same authority; and, if they were not lawfully screened from his process in the custody of Sousa, they could not be made so by removing them to the house of Colonel Callava. The truth is, that the removal of the documents at that time, and in such a manner, was a high and aggravated contempt of the lawful authority of the governor. It not only claimed for Colonel Callava diplomatic immunities, but assumed that he was still the governor of the province, and that Sousa was amenable for his conduct only to him. Colonel Callava might, on the same pretence, have retained the whole body of the Spanish officers and troops under his command at Pensacola, and insisted upon exercising over them all his extinguished authority as governor and commander-in-chief after the 21st of August, as he could to exercise any official authority within the province over Domingo Sousa, or to extricate him from the lawful jurisdiction of Governor Jackson.

It is under these circumstances that the subsequent measures of Governor Jackson are to be considered. He immediately issued an authority to Colonel Robert Butler and Colonel John Miller to seize the body of Sousa, together with the papers, and to bring them before him, that Sousa might answer such interrogatories as might be put to him, and comply with such order and decree touching the said documents and records as the rights of the individuals, secured to them by the treaty, might require, and the justice of the case might demand. By virtue of this order, Sousa was brought before Governor Jackson, and again recognised the authority under which he was taken, by answering the interrogatories put to him. But he had already put the papers and documents out of his possession; and thus, as far as was in his power, baffled the ends of justice, and set at defiance the lawful authority of the governor.

In this transaction, Colonel Callava was avowedly the principal agent; and, altogether unjustifiable as it was, whatever consequences of inconvenience to himself resulted from it, must be imputed to him. In was an undisguised effort to prostrate the authority of the United States in the province; nor had Governor Jackson any other alternative to choose than tamely to see the sovereign power of his country, intrusted to him, trampled under foot, and exposed to derision by a foreigner, remaining there only upon his sufferance; or, by the vigorous exercise of his authority, to vindicate at once the rights of the United States, and the just claims of individuals to their protection.

Governor Jackson could consider Colonel Callava in no other light than that of a private individual, entitled, indeed, as the officer of a foreign Power, to courtesy, but not to exemption from the process of the law. Notwithstanding his improper conduct, Governor Jackson, in the first instance, authorized Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh, accompanied by Mr. Brackenridge, the alcalde, to wait upon him and his steward, and demand from them the specified papers, which Sousa had declared, in his answer to the interrogatories, to have been delivered to the steward at Governor Callava's house. It was only in case of the refusal to give up the papers that the order extended to the seizure of the person of Colonel Callava, that he might be made to appear before Governor Jackson, to answer interrogatories, and to abide by and perform such order and decree as the justice of the case might demand. This demand was accordingly made; and although at the first moment peremptorily refused, yet, upon Colonel Callava's being informed that his refusal would be considered as setting at defiance the authority of the Governor of the Floridas, and of the consequences to himself which must ensue upon his persisting therein, he desired to be furnished with a memorandum, setting forth the documents required; which was accordingly done. But when the delivery of the papers was again demanded of him, he repeated the refusal to deliver them, and attempted both to avoid the personal approach of Colonel Butler and Dr. Bronaugh, and to exhibit a resistance by force of arms to the execution of the governor's order. And it is not a little remarkable that, among the persons who appeared thus arrayed against the authority of the United States, to accomplish the denial and removal of the papers, was a man against whom the most important of those papers were judicial decisions of Governor Callava himself, in behalf of the orphan children, for the establishment of whose rights they were indispensably necessary, and at whose application they had been required.

Standing thus, in open defiance to the operation of the law, Colonel Callava was taken before the governor; and there refusing to answer the interrogatories put to him, and asserting the groundless pretension of answering only as a commissioner, and by a protest against the acts of the governor, he was, by his order, committed to prison until the documents should be delivered to the alcalde. On the next day, a search warrant for the papers was issued by the governor, upon which they were actually obtained, and directed to be delivered to the alcalde; whereupon, Colonel Callava was immediately released.

In all these proceedings you will perceive, sir, that not one act of rigor, or even of discourtesy towards Colonel Callava, was authorized by Governor Jackson, which was not indispensably necessitated for the maintenance of his authority, and the discharge of his official duty, by the unjustifiable and obstinate resistance of Colonel Callava himself.

On a review of the whole transactions, I am instructed by the President of the United States to say that he considers the documents in question as among those which, by the stipulation of the treaty, ought to have been delivered up, with the province, to the authorities of the United States; that they were, on the 22d of August, when in the possession of Domingo Sousa, within the jurisdiction of the United States, and subject to the control of their governor, acting in his judicial capacity, and liable to be compulsively produced by his order; that the removal of them from the possession of Sousa, after the governor's order to him to deliver them had been served upon him, could not withdraw them from the jurisdiction of Governor Jackson, and was a high and aggravated outrage upon his lawful authority; that the imprisonment of Colonel Callava was a necessary (though by the President deeply regretted) consequence of his obstinate perseverance in refusing to deliver the papers, and of his unfounded claim of diplomatic immunities, and irregular exercise even of the authorities of a governor of Florida, after the authority of Spain in the province had been publicly and solemnly surrendered to the United States.

That the documents were of the description of those which the treaty had stipulated should be delivered up with the province, is obvious from the consideration of their character. They related to the property of lands in the province. They were judicial records, directly affecting the rights of persons remaining in the province—rights which could not be secured without them—rights over which the appellate tribunal of the Governor of Cuba, to which Colonel Callava proposed to remove the papers, thenceforth could have no authority or control, they having become definitively subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. The only reason assigned by Colonel Callava for the pretension to retain them is, that they related to the estate of a deceased Spanish officer, and had thereby been of the resort of the military tribunal. But it was for the rights of the living, and not for the privileges of the dead, that the documents were to operate. The tribunal of the Captain General of Cuba could neither need the production of the papers, nor exercise any authority over the subject-matter to which they related. To have transferred to the island of Cuba a question of litigated property, concerning land in Florida, between persons all of whom were living, and to remain in Florida, would have been worse than a mockery of justice. Indeed, Mr. Salmon, in his note, appears to have been aware of the weakness of this allegation; declines the discussion of the question; and, in justification of the refusal of Colonel Callava to deliver up the documents, merely rests its defence upon the plea that the papers had not been demanded of him officially. It has been seen that Colonel Callava had no official character which could then exempt him from the compulsive process of the governor. But Mr. Salmon alleges that the Spanish constitution, as well as that of the United States, separates the judicial from the executive power exercised by the governor or captain general of a province.

Neither the constitution, nor the laws of the United States, excepting those relating to the revenue and its collection, and to the slave trade, had at that time been extended to Florida; and as little had the Spanish constitution been introduced there, in point of fact, however it might have been proclaimed. But, be this as it may, the cause, in relation to which the documents required in the case of Vidal had been drawn up, and were needed, was one of those which, under the Spanish constitution itself, remained within the jurisdiction of the governor. This is declared by Colonel Callava himself in the third observation of the appendix to his protest, transmitted with the letter of Mr. Salmon. It is the reason assigned by him for having withheld those documents from the alcalde. And one of them was a judgment rendered by Colonel Callava himself, after the time when the proclamation of the Spanish constitution in the province is alleged to have been made. The cause, therefore, was, on every hypothesis, within the jurisdiction of the governor; the papers were indispensable for the administration of justice in the cause; and when once applied for by a person entitled to the benefit of them, it was the duty, the inexorable duty, of Governor Jackson to put forth all the authority vested in him necessary to obtain them.

Nor less imperative was his obligation to punish, without respect of persons, that contempt of his jurisdiction which was manifested in the double attempt of Colonel Callava to defy his power and to evade the operation of its process.

With regard to the proclamation of General Jackson of the 29th of September, commanding several Spanish officers, who, in violation of the stipulation in the treaty, had remained at Pensacola after the expiration of the six months from the day of the ratification of the treaty, to withdraw within four days from the Floridas, which forms the subject of complaint in your letter of the 18th of November, it might be sufficient to say that it did no more than enjoin upon those officers to do that which they ought before, and without any injunction, to have done. The engagement of the treaty was, that they should all have evacuated the province before the 22d of August.

If they remained there after that time, it could only be as private individuals, amenable in every particular to the laws. Even this was merely an indulgence which it was within the competency of General Jackson at any time to have withdrawn. From the extract of a letter from him, of which I have the honor of enclosing a copy, it will be seen that he was far from being disposed to withdraw it, had they not, by their abuse of it, and by open outrages upon his authority, forfeited all claims to its continuance.

This extract furnishes a satisfactory answer to your question, why, if the fulfilment of the article was the object of the proclamation, it was confined to the eight officers by name, and not extended to all other Spanish officers in the Floridas. It was because the deportment of the others was as became them—decent, respectful, and friendly towards the Government under the protection of which they were permitted to abide. In the newspaper publication which gave rise to the proclamation of General Jackson, the Spanish officers avowedly acted, not as private individuals, but as a distinct body of men, speaking of Colonel Callava as their chief, their superior, and arrogating to themselves, as a sort of merit, the condescension of knowing what was due to a Government (meaning the American Government) which was on the most friendly footing with their own. This is language which would scarcely be proper for the ambassador of one nation upon the territory of another, to which he would owe not even a temporary allegiance. From persons situated as those Spanish officers were, it was language of insubordination and contempt.

In alluding to the fact that officers of the American squadron in the Mediterranean are sometimes received with friendly treatment on the territories of Spain, to make a case parallel with the present, it would be necessary to show that some superior officer of the said squadron should, while enjoying the hospitality of the Spanish nation upon their shores, first attempt to evade and to resist the operation of process from the constituted judicial tribunals of the country, and then pretend, as an American officer, to be wholly independent of them; and that some of his subalterns should not only countenance and support him in these attempts, but should affect to consider him, while on Spanish ground, as their only superior and chief, and, by unfounded and inflammatory publications in the daily journals, to rouse the people of Spain to revolt and insurrection against the judicial tribunal of their own country.

If the bare statement of such a case would be sufficient to raise the indignation of every honorable Spaniard, let it be observed that even this would be without some of the aggravations of the conduct of these Spanish officers at Pensacola; for such outrage would be far less dangerous committed against old established authorities, which might rely upon the support of the whole people surrounding them, than in the presence of a people whose allegiance had been but just transferred to a new Government, and when the revolt to which they were stimulated would seem little more than obedience to the authorities to which they had always been accustomed to submit.

The very power which the Spanish governor and officers had exercised before the surrender of the province ought to have been a most urgent warning to them to avoid every semblance of authority in themselves, or of resistance to that of the United States, after the transfer of the province had been completed.

In forbearing particularly to reply to that part of your note in which you think yourself authorized to pronounce the charge of General Jackson against these Spanish officers, of having attempted to excite discontent in the inhabitants, false, I shall barely express the hope that the term was admitted into your communication inadvertently. The conduct of the officers at the time of Colonel Callava's conflict with the authority of the governor, as well as in their insulting newspaper publication, was of a character and tendency too strongly marked to leave a doubt of the truth with which it is described in General Jackson's proclamation; and in passing unnoticed this and other mere invectives against an officer whose services to this nation have entitled him to their highest regard, and whose whole career has been signalized by the purest intentions and the most elevated purposes, I wish to be understood as abstaining from observations which, however justified by the occasion, could but add to the unpleasantness of a discussion already sufficiently painful.

That this conduct on the part of the Spanish officers was highly reprehensible, cannot reasonably be denied; and had General Jackson been disposed to animadvert upon it with severity, his course would undoubtedly have been that which you have pointed out as appropriate to the offence. They would have been cited before the proper tribunal, heard upon specific charges, allowed time and liberty to make their defence, and punished by commitment to prison. General Jackson preferred a milder and more indulgent measure; and, without prosecuting them as criminals, only withdrew from them the privilege of a protracted infraction of the treaty, by requiring them forthwith to depart from the province. To justify him in this requisition, neither arrest nor judicial trial was necessary or proper. The facts were of public notoriety, and could not be denied. The proclamation only required of them the execution of the treaty by the removal of their persons. Had their conduct even been unexceptionable, this measure would have been within the undoubted authority of General Jackson. As their deportment had been, it was the most lenient exercise of his power practicable to vindicate the insulted honor and justice of his country.

I pass to the consideration of the complaints contained in your letter of the 22d of November. In order to take a correct view of this subject, it is again necessary to advert to the royal order of His Catholic Majesty to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba and of the Floridas, commanding him to cause to be placed at the disposal of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them the archives and documents relating directly to the property and sovereignty of the two provinces.

On the 16th of May, the captain general and governor wrote to Colonel Forbes that, "respecting East Florida, where there ought to be found all her archives, he (Governor Mahy) would direct Governor Coppinger to make a formal delivery of that province, as well as of the documents belonging to it."

On the 24th of May, Colonel Forbes wrote to the captain general, reminding him of the repeated promises made by his excellency to despatch him with the archives which were to be delivered, and then were at the Havana, and with the orders for the delivery of the provinces and of the archives deliverable there; of the continual disappointments to which he had been subjected by the failure of performance of those promises, and of the necessities which urged his immediate departure. He therefore proposed "that, if any further researches should be necessary for the discovery of the said archives, they might be delivered, when more convenient, to the Spanish Government; that he (Colonel Forbes) should be allowed to proceed immediately to West Florida with the commissary appointed to carry the final order to the sub-governor there; and, lastly, that a duplicate order be given at once, as agreed upon, to the Governor of East Florida, for the delivery of that province to the constituted authorities of the United States, together with the archives which were declared to be on the spot."

On the 29th of May, the captain general answered this letter, and enclosed to him the orders to the several governors of East and West Florida for the delivery of the provinces, (antedated, as I have already mentioned,) with a declaration that the archives then at the Havana, and which ought to have been delivered to Colonel Forbes, should be transmitted to the Government of the United States as soon as they were selected—a promise, as I have before observed, yet unfulfilled.

These orders of the captain general to the commanders of East and West Florida are further remarkable by the omission of any direction in them for the delivery of the archives and documents. It had been expressly agreed by him with Colonel Forbes that the order for the delivery of East Florida should include that of the archives; but it was not sufficient for Governor Mahy to avoid the performance of this promise.

By the letter from Colonel Butler to General Jackson, of the 21st of January last, a copy of which I have the honor to enclose, it appears that, with regard to the greatest and most important part of those documents, he had expressly instructed Colonel Coppinger not to deliver them; and hence, when, on the 18th of June, Colonel Butler, the officer of the United States authorized to receive the province, notified Colonel Coppinger that he had designated Major Cross to receive the archives relating to the sovereignty and individual property of the province, he was answered by Colonel Coppinger: "As respects the delivery of the public archives containing the records of individual property of this province, that will be delayed until various doubts that occur are cleared up; but they will not be removed until then; nor will I leave this place until all matters are regulated and concluded between us that demand my personal assistance."

Thus, upon the pretence of doubts, the nature of which was not explained, Colonel Coppinger declined, positively, to deliver up documents conformably to the express stipulation of the treaty. Colonel Butler immediately proposed to him a conference on the subject, which was held on the 21st of June. At that conference Colonel Coppinger told Colonel Butler that, "as an individual, he believed these archives should be given over to the United States, but that his orders prevented him from turning them over." Colonel Butler therefore assented (as, indeed, no other alternative seemed to be left him) that Colonel Coppinger should have time to write to the Captain General of Cuba for the decision of his doubts; and mentioned to him the opportunity of a vessel then about to sail for the Havana, whence she was to return to St. Augustine, and might bring the answer of the captain general. Colonel Coppinger, on the 23d of June, informed Colonel Butler that he had that day written to the captain general for the solution of his doubts, and, until he received his answer, the archives should not be removed from St. Augustine, and should remain precisely as they were. Colonel Butler, by his letter of 26th June, agreed to remain silent on the head of the archives until the answer should be received from the captain general; but within one week from that time Colonel Butler received information that a large portion of these documents were packed for transportation. He wrote, therefore, on the 3d of July, to Colonel Coppinger, enumerating specifically several kinds of records relating directly to the property of the province, and declaring that he considered them among those which were not to be removed: the reply to which, by Colonel Coppinger, is especially to be remarked, as expressing his opinion that several of those documents were excluded from delivery. There can be no reasonable doubt that all the papers specified by Colonel Butler's letter were of those which the treaty had stipulated should be delivered up. When, therefore, General Jackson considered and compared together the express and positive order of the King of Spain to the Captain General and Governor of Cuba that he should faithfully see to the delivery of the documents; the pretences on which he evaded the delivery to Colonel Forbes of those which were at the Havana, within his own control; the promise that he would direct the delivery by Colonel Coppinger of those that were at St. Augustine; the peremptory postponement of Colonel Coppinger to deliver up any documents or records relating to individual property; his engagement that none of them should be removed until he should receive further instructions from the captain general, and, within one week after, his attempt to pack up for transportation to Cuba a large portion of them; and, finally, his pretensions that many papers, manifestly having direct relation to the property of the province, were excluded from delivery, and his recurrence to the literal sense of his orders from the captain general, with the verbal avowal to Colonel Butler of his own opinion that the documents ought to be delivered, though he was forbidden by his instructions to deliver them—it was impossible for General Jackson to close his eyes against proceedings so unjustifiable and improper. He therefore gave instructions to the officer commanding at St. Augustine to take possession of the papers which the treaty had stipulated should be delivered.

The necessity for taking possession of them had, indeed, arisen before the instructions of General Jackson were received. Most of the records relating to individual property had been left in possession of Don Juan de Entralgo, who, on the pretence that he had purchased at public sales, under the Spanish Government, not only those documents, but the office of register of them, openly advanced the claim of retaining the records as his private property, and of continuing the exercise of the office, and receiving fees for granting copies of the same.

These pretensions were raised on the 5th of September, nearly three months after the doubts of Colonel Coppinger had, with the consent of Colonel Butler, been referred to the Captain General and Governor of Cuba. Long before that time the answer of that officer ought to have been received, peremptorily commanding the delivery of the papers.

It was impossible that the United States should acquiesce in the claims of Mr. Entralgo. They were unquestionably entitled to the documents; and whatever injury he might sustain by the delivery of them, it might give him a fair demand of indemnity from his own Government, but certainly not from the United States.

Yet the secretary and acting governor, Mr. Worthington, allowed a further delay of nearly a month before taking the decisive measures necessary to obtain the documents. He then, on the 3d of October, authorized three persons of respectable character to obtain them, with the use of force if necessary, but with all suitable delicacy and respect towards the persons who had been the officers of Spain in the province. I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, copies of the orders from the secretary (Worthington) to the commissioners appointed by him to receive, and afterwards to examine and assort the papers, and of their reports to him, exhibiting the manner in which both those services were performed. They will prove that every regard was shown towards Colonel Coppinger and Mr. Entralgo compatible with the execution of the duty; and, after the assortment of the papers, all those which were not of the description stipulated to be delivered over by the treaty have ever been, and yet are, ready to be returned to Colonel Coppinger, or to any person duly authorized to receive them.

Such is the view which I am instructed to say has definitively been taken by the President of the United States in relation to the transactions which formed the subjects of your letters of the 18th and 22d of November last, and of that of Mr. Salmon of the 6th of October. He is satisfied that, by the proceedings of the Governor of Florida towards Colonel Callava on the 23d of August last, and towards certain individuals presuming to act as a body of Spanish officers in Florida, in contempt of the authority of the United States, on the 29th of September, and by those of the Secretary of East Florida, acting as governor, on the 2d and 3d of October, towards Colonel Coppinger and Don Juan de Entralgo, no intention of injury or insult to His Catholic Majesty or his Government was entertained, and that no just cause of complaint by them was given. That those measures were all rendered necessary by the total disregard of the Captain General and Governor of Cuba and the Floridas, and of his subordinate officers in the Floridas, not only of the solemn stipulation in the treaty for the delivery of the archives and documents directly relating to the property of those provinces, but of the royal order of their sovereign commanding the said captain general to see to the faithful execution of that engagement—an engagement, in the fulfilment of which the rights not only of the United States, but of every individual inhabitant of the provinces and proprietor in them, were deeply and vitally interested.

The mere enumeration of the documents, as specified in the demands of them made by the officers of the United States, before resort was had to any measure of rigor for extorting them, proves that they were indispensable for the establishment of public right, or for the security of private property. To Spain, not one of those documents could, after the transfer of the provinces, be of the slightest interest or utility. To the United States they were all-important. If the governor and secretary had so little understood their duty to the public rights of their country committed to their charge as to have suffered the removal of records essential to guard the interests of the nation against the insatiate greediness and fraudulent devices of land speculators, they had yet a sacred duty to perform to the people of the country, by retaining the common vouchers of their estates. What individual would have been secure in the tenure of his land, in the evidences of his debts, or in the very shelter over his head, if Colonel Callava could have carried to Cuba his own judgments in favor of the Vidals, because their father, when alive, had been an Auditor of War? and if Don Juan de Entralgo could have transported to the same island all the title-deeds of East Florida, because he had bought his office of recorder at public auction?

The delays of the Captain General of Cuba, with regard to the fulfilment of the royal order transmitted to him by Colonel Forbes, were so extraordinary, and, upon any just principle, so unaccountable, that the minister of the United States in Spain was, by letters from this Department of the 13th and 16th June last, instructed, upon his return to Madrid, to represent the same to your Government, and to request new and peremptory orders to that officer for the delivery of the archives in his possession, conformably to the stipulation of the treaty. The renewal of the order was declined, upon the ground of entire confidence on the part of your Government that the captain general would, before it could be received, have completed the delivery of the archives and documents, as he had been commanded by the King.

I regret to be obliged to state that this just expectation of His Catholic Majesty has not yet been fulfilled.

Captain James Biddle, commander of the United States frigate Macedonian, has therefore been commissioned to repair to the Havana, there to receive the documents and archives which Colonel Forbes was obliged to leave, and which it is hoped the Captain General and Governor of Cuba will cause to be delivered without further delay.

I pray you, sir, to receive the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, April 24, 1822.

As soon as the news was received in Madrid of the recent occurrences in New Spain, after the arrival at Vera Cruz of the captain general and supreme political chief appointed for those provinces, Don Juan O'Donojú, and some papers were seen relative to those same transactions, it was feared that, for forming the treaty concluded in Cordova, on the 24th of August last, between the said general and the traitor Colonel Don Augustin Iturbide, it had been falsely supposed that the former had power from His Catholic Majesty for that act; and in a little time the correctness of those suspicions was found, as, among other things, the said O'Donojú, when, on the 26th of the same August, he sent this treaty to the Governor of Vera Cruz, notifying him of its prompt and punctual observance, told him that, at his sailing from the peninsula, preparation for the independence of Mexico was already thought of, and that its bases were approved of by the Government, and by a commission of the Cortes. His Majesty, on sight of this, and of the fatal impression which so great an imposture had produced in some ultra-marine provinces, and what must, without difficulty, be the consequence among the rest, thought proper to order that, by means of a circular to all the chiefs and corporations beyond seas, this atrocious falsehood should be disbelieved; and now he has deigned to command me to make known to the Government of the United States that it is false, as far as General O'Donojú published beyond his instructions, by pointing out to it that he never could have been furnished with other instructions than those conformable to constitutional principles.

In compliance with this order of His Majesty, I can do no less than observe to you, sir, how unfounded one of the reasons is in your note of the 6th instant for the recognition by this Government of those of the insurgent provinces of Spanish America—that it was founded on the treaty made by O'Donojú with Iturbide; since, not having had that power or instruction to conclude it, it is clearly null and of no value.

I repeat to you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

[TRANSLATION.]

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, April 26, 1822.

I have received your note of the 15th instant, in which you are pleased to communicate to me the reasons which induce the President not only to refuse to His Catholic Majesty the satisfaction which I demanded, in his royal name, for the insults offered by General Jackson to the Spanish commissaries and officers, but to approve fully of the said chief's conduct.

Before answering the contents of the said note, I thought it my duty to request instructions from my Government; and, therefore, without delay, I have laid it before them. Until they arrive, therefore, I have confined myself to two observations: 1st. If, in my note of the 18th of November last, I said that, as General Jackson had not specified the actions which had induced him to declare the Spanish officers expelled from the Floridas criminal, or given proof of them, I thought myself authorized to declare the accusation false, I did not this through inadvertency, but upon the evident principle that every person accused has a right to declare an accusation destitute of proof false, and much more an accusation not pretended to be proved. This assertion of mine does not presume that I am not persuaded of the merit of the said general, and of the claim which he has upon the gratitude of his country; but, although it is believed the duty of his country to eulogize and reward his eminent services, yet it will be lawful for the representative of a Power outraged by him to complain of his conduct. I cannot persuade myself that, to aggravate my said expression, you could have thought that I had been wanting in due respect; it not being possible for that opinion to have entered your mind, when, by his orders, Mr. Forsyth had sent to the Spanish minister, on the 1st of September last, a note, in which, complaining of the Captain General of the island of Cuba, he accuses him of dishonorable pecuniary motives in not having delivered the archives, without giving any proof of so injurious an assertion; and I must remark that the rank of General Mahy in Spain is at least as elevated as that of General Jackson in the United States, and that the services performed by him to his country have rendered him as worthy as he of its consideration and respect.

2d. Although you are pleased to tell me that part of the papers taken from Colonel Coppinger are ready to be delivered, which the American commissioners, after having examined them, have adjudged to be returned to Spain, I do not think myself authorized to admit their return in this manner, but in the mode which I demanded in my note of the 22d of November last.

As I have seen by the public papers that the President has communicated to Congress the note which you were pleased to address to me, dated the 15th instant, and that it has been ordered to be printed, I take the liberty of requesting that you will have the goodness to use your influence that this my answer may be treated in the same manner, that Congress and the public may be informed that, if I have not answered the first part of it, as respects the general business, it is only to wait for the instructions of my Government; but that I have answered what was personal.

I renew to you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

GREAT BRITAIN: TREATY OF PEACE.

TRANSMITTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 21, 1822.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, February 21, 1822.

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents accompanying it, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of the 17th January last.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, February 21, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th January, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before the House all the correspondence which led to the treaty of Ghent, together with the protocol, which has not been made public, and which, in his opinion, it may not be improper to disclose, has the honor to submit to the President the papers embraced by that resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

[The documents communicated with the preceding message are inserted in FOREIGN RELATIONS, vol. iii, No. 271, with the exception of the following:]

The American Plenipotentiaries to the Secretary of State.

SIR: GHENT, December 25, 1814.

We have the honor of transmitting, herewith, one of the three copies of the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, signed last evening by the plenipotentiaries of His Britannic Majesty and by us.

The papers, of which copies are likewise now forwarded, will exhibit to you so fully the progress of the negotiation since the departure of the Chauncey, that few additional remarks from us will be necessary. It may be proper for us, however, to state that, in the interval between the time when our first projet of a treaty was sent to the British plenipotentiaries, and that when they communicated to us the answer to it, the despatches which we had sent by Mr. Dallas, and the instructions to us, which had been published in the United States, were republished in England.

In declining to insist on the articles respecting impressment and indemnities, we made a formal declaration that the rights of both parties, on the subject of seamen and the claims to indemnities for losses and damages sustained prior to the commencement of the war, should not be affected or impaired by the omission in the treaty of a specific provision on these two subjects.

From the time when the projet of the treaty presented by us was returned with the proposed alterations, it was apparent that, unless new pretensions on the part of Great Britain should be advanced, the only important differences remaining to be discussed were those relating to the mutual restoration of territory taken during the war, to the navigation of the Mississippi by British subjects, and to the right of the people of the United States to the fisheries within the British jurisdiction. Instead of a general restitution of captured territory, which we had proposed, the British Government, at first, wished to confine it to the territory taken by either party belonging to the other. On our objecting that this would make each party the judge whether territory taken did or did not belong to the other, and thereby occasion new disputes, they acknowledged it to be their object that each party should, until a decision had taken place with respect to the title, retain possession of all the territory claimed by both parties, which might have been taken by such party during the war. They proposed, however, to limit the exception from mutual restitution to the islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy. As it had been on both sides admitted that the title to these islands was disputed, and as the method of settling amicably those disputes was provided for in the treaty, we had not expected that the British Government would adhere to the demand of retaining the temporary possession of those islands. We insisted, therefore, on their being included in the general restoration, until we had reason to believe that our further perseverance would have hazarded the conclusion of the peace itself; we finally consented, as an alternative preferable to the continuance of the war, to this exception, upon condition that it should not be understood as impairing, in any manner, the right of the United States to these islands. We also urged for a stipulation, requiring an ultimate decision upon the title within a limited time; but to this we also found opposed an insuperable objection, and we were finally induced to accept in its stead a declaration of the British plenipotentiaries that no unnecessary delay of the decision should be interposed on the part of Great Britain.

At the first conference on the 8th of August, the British plenipotentiaries had notified to us that the British Government did not intend, henceforth, to allow to the people of the United States, without an equivalent, the liberty to fish, and to dry and cure fish, within the exclusive British jurisdiction, stipulated in their favor by the latter part of the third article of the treaty of peace of 1783. And, in their note of the 19th of August, the British plenipotentiaries had demanded a new stipulation to secure to British subjects the right of navigating the Mississippi—a demand which, unless warranted by another article of that same treaty of 1783, we could not perceive that Great Britain had any colorable pretence for making. Our instructions had forbidden us to suffer our right to the fisheries to be brought into discussion, and had not authorized us to make any distinction in the several provisions of the third article of the treaty of 1783, or between that article and any other of the same treaty. We had no equivalent to offer for a new recognition of our right to any part of the fisheries, and we had no power to grant any equivalent which might be asked for it by the British Government. We contended that the whole treaty of 1783 must be considered as one entire and permanent compact, not liable, like ordinary treaties, to be abrogated by a subsequent war between the parties to it; as an instrument recognising the rights and liberties enjoyed by the people of the United States as an independent nation, and containing the terms and conditions on which the two parts of one empire had mutually agreed thenceforth to constitute two distinct and separate nations. In consenting, by that treaty, that a part of the North American continent should remain subject to the British jurisdiction, the people of the United States had reserved to themselves the liberty, which they had ever before enjoyed, of fishing upon that part of the coasts, and of drying and curing fish upon the shores; and this reservation had been agreed to by the other contracting party. We saw not why this liberty, then no new grant, but a mere recognition of a prior right, always enjoyed, should be forfeited by a war, any more than any other of the rights of our national independence; or why we should need a new stipulation for its enjoyment, more than we needed a new article to declare that the King of Great Britain treated with us as free, sovereign, and independent States. We stated this principle in general terms to the British plenipotentiaries, in the note which we sent to them with our projet of the treaty; and we alleged it as the ground upon which no new stipulation was deemed by our Government necessary to secure to the people of the United States all the rights and liberties stipulated in their favor by the treaty of 1783. No reply to that part of our note was given by the British plenipotentiaries; but, in returning our projet of a treaty, they added a clause to one of the articles, stipulating a right for British subjects to navigate the Mississippi. Without adverting to the ground of prior and immemorial usage, if the principle were just that the treaty of 1783, from its peculiar character, remained in force in all its parts, notwithstanding the war, no new stipulation was necessary to secure to the subjects of Great Britain the right of navigating the Mississippi, as far as that right was secured by the treaty of 1783; as, on the other hand, no stipulation was necessary to secure to the people of the United States the liberty to fish, and to dry and cure fish, within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain. If they asked the navigation of the Mississippi as a new claim, they could not expect we should grant it without an equivalent: if they asked it because it had been granted in 1783, they must recognise the claim of the people of the United States to the liberty to fish, and to dry and cure fish, in question. To place both points beyond all future controversy, a majority of us determined to offer to admit an article confirming both rights; or, we offered at the same time to be silent in the treaty upon both, and to leave out altogether the article defining the boundary from the Lake of the Woods, westward. They finally agreed to this last proposal, but not until they had proposed an article stipulating for a future negotiation for an equivalent to be given by Great Britain for the navigation of the Mississippi, and by the United States for the liberty as to the fisheries within British jurisdiction. This article was unnecessary, with respect to its professed object, since both Governments had it in their power, without it, to negotiate upon these subjects if they pleased. We rejected it, although its adoption would have secured the boundary of the forty-ninth degree of latitude west of the Lake of the Woods, because it would have been a formal abandonment, on our part, of our claim to the liberty as to the fisheries, recognised by the treaty of 1783.

You will perceive by the correspondence that the ninth article was offered us as a sine qua non and an ultimatum. We accepted it, not without much hesitation, as the only alternative to a rupture of the negotiation, and with a perfect understanding that our Government was free to reject it, as we were not authorized to subscribe to it.

To guard against any accident which might happen in the transmission of a single copy of the treaty to the United States, the British plenipotentiaries have consented to execute it in triplicate; and as the treaty with the British ratification may be exposed to the same danger, the times for the cessation of hostilities, the restoration of captures at sea, and the release of prisoners, have been fixed, not from the exchange of ratifications, but from the ratification on both sides, without alteration by either of the contracting parties. We consented to the introduction of this latter provision, at the desire of the British plenipotentiaries, who were willing to take a full, but were unwilling to incur the risk of a partial ratification, as the period from which the peace should be considered as concluded.

We are informed by them that Mr. Baker, their secretary, is to go out to America with the British ratification.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most humble and obedient servants,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
J. A. BAYARD,
H. CLAY,
JONA. RUSSELL,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extract of a letter from Jonathan Russell, Esq. to the Secretary of State, dated GHENT, December 25, 1814.

My necessary occupation, at this moment, in aiding my colleagues to prepare our joint despatches, puts it out of my power to furnish you with any details or observations exclusively my own.

As, however, you will perceive, by our despatch to you of this date, that a majority only of the mission was in favor of offering to the British plenipotentiaries an article confirming the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and ours to the liberty as to the fisheries, it becomes me, in candor, to acknowledge that I was in the minority on that question. I must reserve to myself the power of communicating to you, hereafter, the reasons which influenced me to differ from a majority of my colleagues on that occasion; and if they be insufficient to support my opinion, I persuade myself they will, at least, vindicate my motives.

Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State.

SIR: GHENT, December 25, 1814.

The treaty which we signed yesterday with the British ministers is, in my opinion, as favorable as could be expected, under existing circumstances, so far as they were known to us. The attitude taken by the State of Massachusetts, and the appearances in some of the neighboring States, had a most unfavorable effect. Of the probable result of the congress at Vienna we had no correct information. The views of all the European Powers were precisely known, from day to day, to the British ministry. From neither of them did we, in any shape, receive any intimation of their intentions, of the general prospect of Europe, or of the interest they took in our contest with Great Britain. I have some reason to believe that all of them were desirous that it might continue. They did not intend to assist us; they appeared indifferent about our difficulties; but they rejoiced at any thing which might occupy, and eventually weaken, our enemy. The manner in which the campaign has terminated; the evidence afforded, by its events, of our ability to resist, alone, the now very formidable military power of England; and our having been able, without any foreign assistance, and after she had made such an effort, to obtain peace on equal terms, will raise our character and consequence in Europe. This, joined with the naval victories, and the belief that we alone can fight the English on their element, will make us to be courted as much as we have been neglected by foreign Governments. As to the people of Europe, public opinion was already most decidedly in our favor. I anticipate a settlement with Spain on our own terms, and the immediate chastisement of the Algerines. Permit me to suggest the propriety of despatching a squadron for that purpose, without losing a single moment.

I have little to add to our public despatch on the subject of the terms of the treaty. I really think that there is nothing but nominal in the Indian article, as adopted. With respect to precedent, you will find two, though neither is altogether in point, viz. the —— article of the treaty of Utrecht, and the latter part of the —— article of our treaty with Spain. You know that there was no alternative between breaking off the negotiations and accepting the article; and that we accepted it only as provisional, and subject to your approbation or rejection.

The exception of Moose island from the general restoration of territory is the only point on which it is possible that we might have obtained an alteration, if we had adhered to our opposition to it. The British Government had long fluctuated on the question of peace: a favorable account from Vienna, the report of some success in the Gulf of Mexico, or any other incident, might produce a change in their disposition; they had already, after the question had been referred to them, declared that they could not consent to a relinquishment of that point. We thought it too hazardous to risk the peace on the question of the temporary possession of that small island, since the question of title was fully reserved; and it was, therefore, no cession of territory.

On the subject of the fisheries within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, we have certainly done all that could be done. If, according to the construction of the treaty of 1783, which we assumed, the right was not abrogated by the war, it remains entire, since we most explicitly refused to renounce it, either directly or indirectly. In that case, it is only an unsettled subject of difference between the two countries. If the right must be considered as abrogated by the war, we cannot regain it without an equivalent. We had none to give but the recognition of their right to navigate the Mississippi, and we offered it. On this last supposition, this right is also lost to them; and, in a general point of view, we have certainly lost nothing. But we have done all that was practicable in support of the right to those fisheries; first, by the ground we assumed, respecting the construction of the treaty of 1783; secondly, by the offer to recognise the British right to the navigation of the Mississippi; thirdly, by refusing to accept from Great Britain both her implied renunciation of the right of that navigation and the convenient boundary of 49°, for the whole extent of our and her territories west of the Lake of the Woods, rather than to make an implied renunciation, on our part, to the right of America to those particular fisheries.

I believe that Great Britain is very desirous of obtaining the northern part of Maine, say from about 47° north latitude to the northern extremity of that district, as claimed by us. They hope that the river which empties into the Bay des Chaleurs, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, has its source so far west as to intervene between the head waters of the river St. John and those of the streams emptying into the river St. Lawrence: so that the line north from the source of the river St. Croix will first strike the heights of land which divide the waters emptying into the Atlantic ocean (river St. John) from those emptying into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, (river des Chaleurs,) and afterwards the heights of land which divide the waters emptying into the Gulf of St. Lawrence (river des Chaleurs) from those emptying into the river St. Lawrence; but that the said line never can, in the words of the treaty, strike any spot of land actually dividing the waters emptying into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence. Such will be the foundation of their disputing our claim to the northern part of that territory; but, feeling that it is not very solid, I am apt to think that they will be disposed to offer the whole of Passamaquoddy bay and the disputed fisheries as an equivalent for the portion of northern territory which they want, in order to connect New Brunswick and Quebec. This may account for their tenacity with respect to the temporary possession of Moose island, and for their refusing to accept the recognition of their right to the navigation of the Mississippi, provided they recognise ours to the fisheries.

That northern territory is of no importance to us, and belongs to the United States, and not to Massachusetts, which has not the shadow of a claim to any land north of 45° to the eastward of the Penobscot river, as you may easily convince yourself of, by recurring to her charters.

I have the honor to be, with respect, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

SPAIN: OUTRAGES UPON AMERICAN VESSELS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 31, 1822, AND FEBRUARY 5, 1823.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, January 30, 1822.

In pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, requesting information with regard to outrages and abuses committed upon the persons of the officers or crews of American vessels at the Havana and other Spanish ports in America, and whether the Spanish authorities have taken any measures to punish, restrain, or countenance such outrages, I herewith transmit to that House a report from the Secretary of State containing the information called for.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, January 30, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, requesting of the President of the United States the communication of information respecting any outrages and abuses committed upon the persons of the officers or crews of American vessels at the Havana or other Spanish ports in America, and whether any measures have been adopted, under Spanish authority, tending to punish, restrain, or countenance either such personal outrages or piratical depredations upon the property of our merchants, has the honor of submitting to the President the statement of Captain B. J. Shain, with accompanying documents, containing all the information possessed by this Department embraced by that resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The following is a statement of the outrage committed upon the American schooner Ajax, of Philadelphia, commanded by myself, while lying in the port of Havana:

On Sunday, 25th November ultimo, I left the counting-house of Messrs. Blair, Aizpurua, & Co. about 1 o'clock P. M. I had with me my accounts, which I had just received, together with the schooner's papers, and intended to sail next morning, wind and weather permitting. Soon after I got on board the schooner, I began to examine my accounts, that, in case there should be an error, it might be corrected before I sailed. I had been thus engaged but a little time, when I heard Mr. Joynes, the chief mate, say, in Spanish, "Go on shore," which he repeated several times. I then went on deck, and asked him what was the matter. He said there had two soldiers come on board, who asked to light their segars, and he himself gave them fire. After they had lighted their segars, they addressed themselves to one of the people, who was lying on the main hatch in a state of intoxication, (but quiet and without molestation,) and when they found he could speak some Spanish, they told him he was a Spaniard, and they would have him put on board the guard-ship. He told them he was no Spaniard. They insisted he was. Mr. Joynes said he then told them the man was no Spaniard; that he was an American, and one of the people belonging to the schooner. They then drew their swords. Mr. Joynes said he then picked up my cane, which was near him, and made them go on shore, telling them to go on shore, as before mentioned. I then went down below, to my accounts again, but had been there but a few minutes when Mr. Joynes came to the companion-door, and asked me what should be done; that there were a number of soldiers who seemed determined to come on board. I told him not to let them, that I would not suffer them to come, saying they have no business here. I then gathered up my papers, put them away, and went on deck with a cutlass in my hand, being of opinion they wished to commit some violation. I walked forward to the bows of the schooner, to which place the soldiers had nearly advanced. I forbade them to come on board, telling them not to trouble me; but they, regardless of my entreaties, were determined to come. I, seeing their intention, went aft and got one of my pistols; Mr. Joynes did the same. We both went forward to the bows of the schooner, and desired them again and again not to come on board; but they advanced to the railing, and were about to jump on deck, when I cocked my pistol and presented it, telling them at the same time not to board me; if they did, I would blow them through. They, finding me resolute, retreated to the foot of the stage again, where they were joined by some other soldiers, who stood there and urged them on, and called them cowards to let the Americans drive them, and tried to force them back again; they then, however, sent for a reinforcement of soldiers, who, when they came to the foot of the stage, attempted to force their way also, but Mr. Joynes and myself stood firm at the top (or head) of the stage, determined, if possible, to defend the decks, so that they dared not approach us. They then sent for a guard of soldiers, who being come, the captain of them commanded me to come on shore; which command I refused to obey, saying, at the same time, I had no business on shore; that my place was on board my vessel. He, however, commanded me several times very peremptorily to come on shore, which command I continued to disobey, telling him, at the same time, if he had any thing to say to me to come on board, that I would respect him and treat him politely; he then sent a young man on board, who could speak a little English, who told me the captain of the guard said if I did not come on shore he would send his guard on board, and take me to prison. I told the young man to tell the officer I had done nothing for which I should be put to prison; that I was on board my vessel, and had not been on shore, nor would I go unless I should be taken there. The young man went and spoke to the officer, who, together with his guard, went away. I then sent to the house of my consignees, informing them of my situation, and requested they would come to the vessel immediately, which they did. By this time there were a great number of people, soldiers, and common rabble of the streets, besides a number of boatmen, collected on the wharf before the schooner. I related the circumstance to my consignees, all that had transpired, as I have now done. They asked me if that was all I had done. I said it was. They advised me to haul the schooner astern from the wharf, seeing the people appeared to have a design against her; I immediately gave orders to do so, having previously taken on board the stage. As soon as the mob saw I was about to leave the wharf, and supposing their designs (I believe) might be frustrated, they called out not to let the vessel move, making use of the most threatening and shameful language, and laying hold at the same [time] of the forward rigging, crying out, "On board, on board; we will not let the American rascals go." We, however, succeeded in hauling her astern, although there were at that time but three men besides myself and the little boy on board; but the wind blowing very fresh, canted her head to port, and the jib-boom getting foul of the topping lift of a small Spanish schooner which lay on our larboard side, the Spaniards ran from the wharf on board her, and while we were endeavoring to clear the Ajax and haul her astern, they boarded us from the Spanish vessel; we not being able to clear-haul her astern, and prevent them from boarding all at the same time, there being then but four on board in all, and only Mr. Joynes and myself who made any resistance. In the course of one minute my decks were full of Spaniards, led on by a number of soldiers, two of whom were in front, who had long knives or daggers. The one on my left hand made a pass at me with his knife or dagger. I repelled him with my cutlass in my left hand. Perceiving he was preparing to make a second attempt, I fired my pistol, but missed my object, although I shot a soldier behind him. Mr. Joynes, seeing the imminent danger we were in, fired his pistol, and, I believe, killed the soldier I fired at. At this moment we were completely surrounded by a great number of soldiers and others, and being aft, by the companion-way, and under the awning, where we had no possible means of defending ourselves. In this situation we were attacked with swords, knives, spars, sticks of wood, and stones, which they had previously thrown on board from the wharf. Mr. Watson, my second mate, had his head cut with the cook's axe. They stabbed the steward of the ship Lucius, of Charleston, who died in about two days. They cut off one man's arm, all but the sinews, belonging to the brig Cyno, of Philadelphia, and split his mouth open. They beat Mr. Joynes with sticks and spars, and threw him overboard, where he was pursued by boatmen, who struck at him in the water with their oars, and had, at the same time, their knives in their mouths to kill him with as soon as they should hit him with their oars and prevent his swimming. He, however, being a good swimmer, dove under water, and thereby escaped their blows. They were at one time so near him that he was obliged to dive under their boat, and staid so long under water that they thought he was drowned; but at length he came up near the guard boat, the officer of which took him in and saved his life.

While I remained on board in the hands of these barbarous savages, who most cruelly beat my head and shoulders with stones and sticks, they cut the third finger of my right hand almost off, also my right wrist and my right arm; they stabbed me on the top of my breast bone, in my right shoulder, and in my back and stomach, and laid my head open with a cutlass or sword in two places, about five inches long each, to the bone, and fractured my skull; they also cut my cheek through into my mouth nearly to my ear, and nearly cut my right eye out. As soon as they thought they had killed me, (for I fell apparently dead at their feet,) they began to plunder the vessel, cut away and carried off all her running rigging; stole the long boat, six pistols, and two cutlasses; broke open the harness tubs, and stole all the beef and pork in them; took away all our fowls, stole every article of cabin furniture, such as dishes, spoons, cups, saucers, knives, forks, &c., with all the cabin stores, besides many other things too numerous to mention; they stole from me all my clothes, not leaving me a single shirt; they stole Mr. Joynes's clothes also, and even went into the forecastle, and robbed the people of theirs. While I was thus weltering in my blood, suffering, if possible, a thousand deaths, in my agony I lifted my head, and, raising partly up, supported myself in a sitting posture on the deck, by my hands, one on each side of me; I was accosted by a soldier, and asked if I was the captain. The deck seemed to be more quiet, and the mob appeared in some measure to have retired; though at that time I could not see, I presumed him to be my friend, come to relieve me: I answered yes. He instantly took his sword, which had a metal scabbard, as I heard it rattle, and, driving it at me, struck me with the end of it on the collar bone, and knocked me flat on the deck again. He then robbed me of the little change I had, and took from my fob my watch, but finding some difficulty in getting it from the fob, took his knife and cut it off. Who this soldier was I know not, but am of opinion, from the voice, that he was the captain of the guard who first commanded me on shore. After they had finished their plunder, and the mob had gone, the Government sent Mr. Joynes, one of my people, and a little boy, to prison; my second mate, the steward of the ship Lucius, and the man belonging to the brig Cyno, to the hospital: during all this time I was left lying on the deck. There was, however, afterwards, a guard sent for me, who made me get up from the deck and climb over the side of the vessel, and get into a boat which was alongside to receive me; but, not being able to support myself, I fell from the side of the schooner, partly into the boat, and partly into the water, but finally got into her. Then they took me to a small droger which lay at the wharf, and made me go on board and walk to the gang-board which led on shore; knowing it was impossible to walk the board to the wharf, I sat down on it, and tried to haul myself along, when one of the gang behind me pushed me along like a log. When I landed on the wharf, I was made to get up and walk about a hundred and fifty yards to a volante. I was told to get into it, and they drove me off to the hospital, where my second mate and the steward of the ship Lucius had already arrived—a wretched place, enough to make a well man sick. The doctor of the hospital, considering me mortally wounded, threw a bundle of rags about my head, with as little ceremony as a butcher in our market would wrap up a shin of beef to send to a customer; and, when he came to the wound in my stomach, he thrust his fore-finger into it up to his hand, and then folded up a piece of rag, as if he were going to stop the mouth of a bottle, and screwed it into the wound. In this situation I was laid on a bedstead which had boards for its bottom, with something like a pillow to support my bruised and cut head. I had lost much blood, and had lain before the door of the hospital until I was almost chilled to the heart, so that my teeth and jaws rattled. I begged for something to cover me, but could get nothing until a friend came to the door, and, finding me freezing for want of something to cover me, ran home and got me something; but, when he came with it to the hospital door, it was with difficulty he prevailed on them to let me have it. In this place I remained until about eleven o'clock the next day, when Don Francisco de P. Hornillos obtained permission, on his own responsibility, to remove me to a sick-house, attended by a number of gentlemen, some of whom went for a surgeon to dress my wounds, and brought Dr. Benjamin Huger, surgeon of the marine hospital in Charleston, S. C., residing at this time in Havana for his health. When he saw me, he said he was astonished, from the appearance of my wounds, that I had not died. Mr. Joynes and the man that was in prison were not released until the following Saturday afternoon, being nearly eight days in prison, about two days of which time he said he was without any thing to eat, and, I believe, any thing to drink. We, however, got information to Don F. de P. Hornillos of his situation, who advanced him a doubloon, with which he was enabled to buy something to support nature, although he was compelled to pay at the rate of a dollar for only about an ounce of beef, and for other things he wanted in proportion. After he heard I was not dead, he was desirous to write to me, and had to pay, he said, one dollar for the sheet of paper. Mr. Joynes told me he was informed by the officer of the guard at the prison that the officer who commanded me to come on shore intended, if I had complied with the order, to have given me up to the mob to do with me as they pleased. Mr. Joynes, my chief mate, Mr. Watson, my second mate, and the man belonging to the brig Cyno, were released on the Saturday following, December 1. The two latter were brought to the sick-house where I was. Dr. Huger was called to attend Mr. Watson as well as myself; and when he saw him, he said he believed he could not live; he, however, survived until Friday the 6th, when he died. Such was their inhumanity, that Mr. Watson did not have his wound dressed all the time he was in the hospital or prison.

WASHINGTON CITY, January 9, 1822.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, District of Columbia. } January 9, 1822.

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace in and for the county and district aforesaid, Captain Benjamin Jones Shain, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God that the foregoing statement of facts is true, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

Given under my hand and seal, this 9th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1822.

CHARLES W. WHARTON.

P. S. In relating the above narrative, I forgot to mention that, after I had got the vessel refitted and ready for sea, I was informed by Don F. de P. Hornillos, one of the gentlemen to whom I was consigned, that the schooner could not depart from the port with any one of the officers and crew on board who belonged to her previous to the outrage. I was, therefore, notwithstanding the many petitions I sent to the governor, under the necessity of shipping other officers and crew.

It was also decreed that neither Mr. Joynes nor myself should leave the place under a heavy penalty. Mr. Joynes and myself were both compelled to leave the port clandestinely, or not at all; and, before the merchants would settle with me, or suffer me to depart, I was compelled to give a receipt, acknowledging myself accountable for the penalty or other charge that might arise in consequence of my departure, if exacted by the Spanish court.

Deposition of Don Francisco de Paula Hornillos.

HAVANA, December 11, 1821.

This witness declares and deposes that, on Sunday, the 25th November last, being at home immediately after dinner, and just as he was preparing himself to go out riding, which was about the hour of five, he received information from his counting-house that some accident had occurred to the American schooner that was going to Philadelphia, and that his presence was necessary. That he immediately repaired to the wharf, to the place where the said schooner was, and there found a great concourse of people of all descriptions, close to the vessel, and the captain walking on deck, all in the greatest tranquillity and silence. That he walked on board and asked Captain B. J. Shain what had been the matter: to which he was answered that some soldiers having gone on board of his vessel and asked for fire to light a segar, the mate did politely hand it to them; and that they entered into conversation with a man on board that could talk Spanish. That the soldiers told the mate that that man was a Spaniard, who should not be in a foreign vessel, and that they were going to carry him off. That the mate objected to their doing so, as the man was not a Spaniard; and the soldiers insisting on carrying him off, he, the said Captain Shain, came out of the cabin, and observed the determination of the soldiers to carry that man away. That he would not consent to it; and as they threatened to execute their intention, and to make use of their swords, he ran to the cabin, and, taking his pistols, made them run away out of the vessel. That, soon after, the same soldiers, with some others, wanted to come on board again, which he would not consent to; and as they were walking up the stage, he approached the fore part of the vessel, and ordered them to go off, when they were already on the gunwale, or he would fire into them with his pistols if they attempted to violate or assault the inviolability of his house, which was his vessel; upon which they retired. That those soldiers then went and complained or informed against him to the officer of the guard at the treasury gate, who came before the vessel at the time that he, the said Captain Shain, was still walking on deck, which officer ordered him to come on shore. That to this command he, Captain Shain, replied that he was on board his own vessel, and would not go on shore; but if he, the officer, had any thing to say to him, he might safely step on board, about which they disputed a short while; and, finally, the officer went off, and Captain Shain remained walking on deck. This witness declares that, upon receiving this information from Captain Shain, and seeing the crowd upon the wharf rather increasing, he advised him to loose his fasts, and carry his vessel out in the stream, apprehensive that the soldiers might return to molest him again, and, chiefly to prevent some new accident occurring. That Captain Shain immediately ordered the vessel away from the wharf; and when they were hauling her astern, a Spaniard, in the dress of a sailor, held her by the rigging of the bowsprit, and cried out that the vessel should not quit the wharf; and that it was necessary to punish those rascals of Americans. That he spoke to this man, requesting him to permit the vessel to go off, as he had so directed it, with no other view than to avoid any misfortune that might occur; telling him, also, that he had nothing to do with the vessel, to retire, and not be the means of disturbing the peace. That he (the witness) could not persuade this man, nor prevail upon him to quit his hold of the rigging, while he continued crying out against the Americans, and inviting the crowd to join and help him. That another man, likewise in sailor's clothes, joined the former one, taking hold of the bowsprit rigging, and the witness also endeavored to persuade him by good means to abandon his task, but could obtain nothing else but repeated insults from both; and that, fearing some misfortune, he ran to the officer of the guard, at the treasury gate, and requested him to interpose his authority to get the vessel away from the wharf, which he (the witness) had to beg the officer repeatedly to do; remonstrating that, otherwise, some misfortune would be inevitable.

That the officer then, with some soldiers of his guard, went towards the vessel; but was of no service, as he either could not, or knew not how to make himself respected, as those two sailors, and some others that had already joined them, completely played with him, while a great part of the crowd were already crying out in the most abusive language, and exciting the multitude, saying, "On board, on board to those dogs—kill them!" That the witness, still being among the crowd, underwent repeated insults from those sailors and several others, because he was still endeavoring to quiet them; at which time he found himself taken by the arm by some person, who requested him to go away, as he had observed the witness to be in great danger. That, seeing the crowd and mob increasing, he ran up to the captain general's, and requested him immediately to take some measures towards restoring the peace on the wharf; and hardly had he explained to his excellency the object of his request, when information arrived of the vessel having been boarded, and of the misfortunes that were the result of it; and as the bearer of that information gave also notice that the captain had been wounded and nearly killed, the witness requested his excellency to order that the captain be delivered him, in order to give immediate attention to his dangerous situation on account of his wounds. That his excellency sent one of his adjutants with the witness to the wharf, for the purpose of delivering him the captain's person; and on arriving at the place where the vessel had been, he found her to have gone away astern of the other vessels, and that there remained only about six or eight persons on the wharf, one of whom was el zelador de mar, Don Francisco Baro, who had formerly also made great exertions towards keeping the peace, and had much endeavored to pacify the first man that had objected to the vessel's leaving the wharf; and who, having found there that same man, did arrest him, and sent him to jail. That at this time the witness having been informed that Captain Shain had been carried to the hospital, he applied there to get him out; but as they were actually dressing his wounds, and as it was dangerous at the moment to move him, he was left there that night, and the next morning the witness took him out upon his receipt.

FRANCO. P. HORNILLOS.

UNITED STATES COMMERCIAL AGENCY.

Be it known that, on this eleventh day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, before me, John Warner, commercial agent of the United States of America at the city of Havana, personally came and appeared Don Franco. de Paula Hornillos, subscriber to the foregoing deposition, who, being duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose to the truth of what is therein set forth.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of my office, at the city of [L. S.] Havana aforesaid, the day and year first above written.

JOHN WARNER.

HAVANA, December 13, 1821.

This is to certify, I, Benjamin Huger, of Charleston, South Carolina, surgeon to the marine hospital in that city, at present residing in the Havana for my health, did, at the request of a friend, visit Captain B. J. Shain, who had been wounded in a contest with several Spaniards. Upon examination, I found several wounds, three of which I considered highly dangerous. After much suffering on the part of Captain S., he has recovered.

This certificate is given at his request. The mate of his vessel died in consequence of wounds received at this time.

B. HUGER, S. M. H.

Copy of a letter from B. J. Shain to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, January 28, 1822.

When I was at Washington a few days ago, you advised me to forward my memorial, addressed to the President, accompanied with the extent of the damage sustained from the Spaniards at Havana, in the late outrage committed against the schooner Ajax, her officers and crew; which I would have done before now, but owing to my indisposition I was not able to accomplish it. I, however, expect to have every thing ready to forward in the course of four or five days from this time. The amount of the damage will, I presume, be but little short of $2,000, if not more, independent of our personal sufferings, which are more than can be expressed.

I am, sir, with due respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

B. J. SHAIN.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, February 5, 1823.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom, by a resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 3d ultimo, the memorial of Benjamin J. Shain was referred, to consider and report thereon to the Senate, has the honor, in compliance with that resolution, to submit the following report:

At the last session of Congress a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 16th of January, 1822, requested of the President information with regard to outrages and abuses committed upon the persons of the officers or crews of American vessels at the Havana and other Spanish ports in America, and whether the Spanish authorities had taken any measures to punish, restrain, or countenance such outrages.

In pursuance of that resolution, a message of the President of the United States communicated to the House, on the 30th of January, 1822, the statement by B. J. Shain of the outrage committed upon the American schooner Ajax, commanded by him, and upon his person, at the Havana, which forms the subject of his present memorial to Congress, together with the deposition of Don Francisco de Paula Hornillos, and the certificate of Doctor Benjamin Huger, relating thereto.

These documents were referred by the House of Representatives to their Committee of Foreign Relations, who, on the 12th of February, 1822, reported to the House their opinion that there had not been a case presented to them, in the statement and documents above mentioned, which required the interference of this Government; they therefore submitted a resolution, which was agreed to by the House, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

A short time after this decision of the House of Representatives, Captain Shain transmitted a memorial to the President of the United States, dated the 22d of February, 1822, of the same purport with that to Congress, now referred to the Secretary of State by the Senate. To which memorial to the President was annexed a similar statement of the charges and losses occasioned by the above-mentioned outrage to that which is annexed to his memorial to Congress. And there were further annexed to the memorial to the President the depositions of Littleton Joynes and of Joel Lane Reynolds, and a statement unsigned; copies of which papers, and of Captain Shain's remarks upon them, are herewith transmitted to the Senate.

On the 30th of November last, Captain Shain transmitted to the Secretary of State a second memorial to the President of the United States, of the same purport with that of the preceding 22d of February; but to which was annexed a petition of the same import, and signed mostly by the same persons, with that which is annexed to the memorial to Congress; and a similar re-statement of losses and injuries sustained by the above-mentioned outrages.

The Secretary of State, with a view to put the Senate in possession of all the representations and vouchers in this Department in support of the application of Captain Shain, has the honor of transmitting, herewith, the copies of the documents additional to those which had already been under consideration by the House of Representatives at their last session. Whether they vary in any manner the conclusion drawn by the committee of the House from the statement then submitted to them, and which is believed to be entirely correct, is respectfully submitted to the consideration of the Senate. The facts, and the principles applicable to them, appear to the Secretary of State to be the same.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Littleton Joynes, being duly sworn before me, doth depose and say: That, on the 25th day of November, 1821, while lying in the port of Havana, and acting as chief mate on board of the schooner Ajax, whereof Benjamin J. Shain was master, four soldiers came on board about one o'clock P. M., day and date as above, and asked deponent for fire to light their segars. Deponent gave them the fire which they requested; they then began conversing with one of the crew in Spanish, and after a short time said he was a Spaniard, and that they would have him impressed and put on board of a Spanish guard-ship. Deponent told them no, he was an American, and that he belonged on board of the vessel, and that they had no business with him, and to go on shore; they refused to go, and drew their swords; deponent picked up a small cane that was lying on deck, and forced them on shore. In about five minutes four more came and requested fire; deponent thought their intentions were not good, and refused them admittance, but they insisted on coming. Deponent went to the cabin-door, and told Captain Shain that there were a number of soldiers who seemed determined to come on board, and asked what should be done; Captain Shain told deponent not to suffer them—that they had no business on board. Captain Shain and deponent went forward where they were, armed with a cutlass apiece, and told them we had no fire for them, to go somewhere else and get fire; and if they persisted in coming on board, they must abide the consequence. They, finding Captain Shain and deponent resolute in not letting them come on board, went away; at this time there were a great number of soldiers, boatmen, and the common rabble of the streets, collected about the head of the schooner, making use of the most shameful language, and calling the soldiers cowards for letting the Americans drive them away; and in the course of a few minutes they brought a guard of soldiers, composed of an officer and six privates, who demanded of Captain Shain to come on shore; which command he refused to obey, telling them he had no business on shore, that he had done nothing, and if the officer would come on board he would treat him politely. The officer then sent a young man on board to tell Captain Shain if he did not come on shore that he would send his guard on board and take him to prison; but Captain Shain still refusing to come on shore, the officer and his guard went away again. About this time there were assembled on the wharf about two hundred ruffians, with knives, daggers, swords, sticks, and stones, and showed a great disposition to board the schooner; but seeing deponent and Captain Shain standing ready to receive them, with a sword in one hand and a pistol in the other, they were afraid to make the attempt. Captain Shain, seeing the danger we were in, sent word to the consignees to come immediately to the vessel; which they did. Captain Shain informed them of what had taken place, and said that he believed it was the intention of the mob to murder the officers and the crew, and plunder the schooner; they concurred with him in his opinion, and advised him to haul the schooner clear from the wharf. Deponent and Captain Shain were in the act of doing so, and had partly succeeded, but the wind blowing strong, and our hands being nearly all on shore, our jib-boom caught on the bow topping-lift of a Spanish schooner which lay alongside of us.

The mob, seeing that they were about missing their prey, cried out, "On board, on board, we will not let the American rascals go." They then began to board on the jib, bow, and in boats, until the decks were full of those ruffians; they then made several attempts to force their way aft, but Captain Shain and deponent, seeing that their intention was to murder them, stood firm to receive them, at the point of the sword; but two of them, more resolute than the rest, ventured aft with swords or daggers, but were told by Captain Shain and deponent that if they molested them they would fire, but they, regardless of what was said, pressed aft; the one made a pass at Captain Shain, but was repulsed, but made a second attempt, when Captain Shain fired his pistol, but missed his object, but shot the one deponent was contending with. Deponent, seeing the soldier about to make the second attempt on the life of Captain Shain, cocked his pistol and fired; Captain Shain fell, and likewise two soldiers. The mob, seeing there was no person to contend with but deponent, attempted to force their way aft, where deponent was, but deponent kept them off until the mob got long spars, and knocked deponent down, and threw him (deponent) overboard; when he was overboard, they tried to kill deponent in the water, by taking long spars and striking at deponent in the water, so that deponent was obliged to dive to escape their blows. When they could not kill deponent that way, the Spanish boats made off from the wharf with boat-hooks and oars to kill deponent, but deponent dove again under water and came up alongside of the guard-boat, which saved his life.

Deponent was then taken before the governor, who sent him to prison, where he was kept two days without any thing to eat, but deponent sent word to the consignees of his situation, who came to the prison and advanced deponent some money to enable deponent to purchase something to eat, but deponent was then obliged to pay at the rate of one dollar an ounce for beef, and other things in proportion. Deponent had to pay one dollar for a sheet of paper. Deponent was kept about eight days in prison, when he was released by giving bail.

Deponent deposeth and saith, that Samuel Watson, second mate, received a cut in the head with the cook's axe, which wound occasioned his death in a few days. That Captain Benjamin Shain received one wound in the breast with a sword, two in the head, two in the arm, one of his fingers nearly cut off, a cut through his cheek, and one of his eyes nearly cut out. Likewise, a seaman belonging to brig Cyno, of Philadelphia, had one of his arms nearly cut off, and was beaten in a most shocking manner in the face. Likewise, the steward of the ship Lucius, of Charleston, received several stabs at the same time, which occasioned his death in two days.

The man belonging to brig Cyno, and the steward of the ship Lucius, were on board of the Ajax at the time of the outrage, to assist in getting the vessel out from the wharf.

Captain Shain appointed deponent master of the vessel, with instructions to proceed immediately to the United States, but he was stopped by the Spaniards, and informed that no persons who came out of the Havana in the schooner Ajax would be permitted to depart the port. Deponent went to the governor to know the reason why he should not go in the schooner, and received for answer that he and the rest of the officers and crew must remain in the Havana until such time as the whole affair was settled. The governor told deponent and Don Francisco de Paula Hornillos that deponent and Captain Shain would have done well if they had shot the whole of the mob.

Deponent deposeth and saith, that he believes the intentions of the mob were to murder the officers and crew of the Ajax, and then plunder her; and that, if the Spanish authorities had interfered, they might have prevented the outrage. Deponent deposeth and saith, that, after the mob got possession of the schooner, they commenced plundering the vessel of all her running rigging, cabin stores, and cabin furniture, besides the compasses, and all deponent's and Captain Shain's clothing, besides a number of other articles too numerous to mention.

LITTLETON JOYNES.

Be it known that, on the day of the date hereof, before me, Peter Lohra, of Philadelphia, notary public, by lawful authority duly commissioned and sworn, and by law authorized to administer oaths and affirmations, personally appeared Littleton Joynes, of Philadelphia, mariner, chief mate of the schooner Ajax, under the command of Benjamin J. Shain, who, being by me duly sworn according to law, did depose and say: That the several facts, matters, and things set forth and contained in the foregoing statement, written and subscribed by him, are, to the best of his recollection, knowledge, and belief, in every respect, just and true.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my notarial seal, the eighteenth day of January, 1822.

PETER LOHRA, Notary Public.

Be it known that, on the day of the date hereof, before me, John Goodman, a notary public for the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, residing in the Northern Liberties, in the county of Philadelphia, by lawful authority duly commissioned and affirmed, and by law authorized to administer oaths and affirmations, came Joel Lane Reynolds, of the city of Philadelphia, and a native citizen of the United States, who, being by me duly affirmed according to law, did declare and say, that, on Sunday, the 25th day of November, 1821, at about half-past three o'clock P. M., being on the mole in Havana, he met Don Francisco P. Hornillos, merchant of said place, and consignee of the schooner Ajax, Captain Shain, who inquired of him if he knew the cause of the disturbance on board the Ajax. Deponent told him he did not. Mr. Hornillos then stated to deponent that Captain Shain had sent to the counting-house of Blair, Aizpurua, & Co., and requested that he would come over, as he was in difficulty. Mr. Hornillos wished deponent to accompany him on board the Ajax, which he did. On approaching the schooner, deponent noticed a great number of people, consisting principally of boatmen, with a number of soldiers, gathered together, abusing Captain Shain and his crew, threatening, at the same time, what they would do with him should they succeed in getting him on shore, which was nothing less than to take his life. Deponent succeeded in getting on board the schooner in company with Mr. Hornillos, who addressed Captain Shain to know the cause of the riot. He called Mr. Joynes, the mate, and desired him to relate to us the particulars. He stated that some soldiers had come on board and obtained permission to light their segars; after the first had lighted his segar, and whilst the remainder were so doing, he addressed himself to one of the seamen who was lying on the deck somewhat intoxicated, and, as the man answered them in Spanish, they immediately insisted upon his being a Spaniard; that he told them he was not—he was an American, and one of the crew of the Ajax; they still insisted upon it, and said they would take him out and put him on board the guard-ship, and drew their swords. They were then ordered on shore, and, upon refusing to go, he picked up a stick and drove them on shore; soon after they again came to the bow of the schooner, and insisted upon coming on board; he, as well as Captain Shain, told them not to attempt to come on board. After that, another party came with an officer at their head, and insisted upon Captain Shain's coming on shore, which he refused to do. After hearing this, and fearing what would be the result at night in case the schooner should remain at the mole, where she then was, we advised Captain Shain to haul her from it, and come to anchor in the stream. We were then obliged to leave the schooner, in consequence of the mob throwing stones on board, which made it dangerous to remain longer on the decks. Mr. Joynes and Mr. Watson, and also such of the crew as were on board the schooner, commenced casting off the bow-fasts, and, as the schooner was dropping astern, one of the leaders of the mob caught hold of the martingale-stay and cut it, which served them as a line to hold her by, to prevent her from dropping astern; she, however, got some distance from the mole, canted, and, her jib-boom getting foul of the aft-rigging of a Spanish schooner, she was prevented from getting out. The mob, at this time about two hundred and fifty, succeeded in boarding her from the decks of the Spanish schooner. Deponent, finding it dangerous to remain longer on the mole, retreated on board a Baltimore schooner with a number of Americans; before he got on board of her, he heard two pistols discharged on board the Ajax, soon after seeing Mr. Joynes, the mate, in the water, pursued by a number of boatmen, who made frequent attempts at his life; he was at last taken up by a guard-boat, and thrown into prison that night about eight o'clock. Deponent heard Captain Shain and Mr. Watson, second mate, were in the hospital much wounded; deponent went there and found Captain Shain cut in a most shocking manner, and it was thought he would not live till midnight. Mr. Watson, besides being much beaten, was cut in the head, through the skull. The next morning, on going on board the brig Cyno, of Philadelphia, which vessel deponent had there at that time, Captain Fear informed him that one of his men was much wounded in the affair of the Ajax; deponent recollected seeing him on the mole at the time he left it; deponent went immediately to the hospital, and found him in a shocking state—his right hand almost cut off, upper lip and chin laid open to the bone. Deponent made frequent attempts, through his friend Hornillos, for applications to the governor to get the man from the hospital; at last, about the 1st of December, we succeeded in getting a permit to remove him, as also Mr. Watson; we had them taken to the house of Mr. Skinner, at which place Captain Shain lay; at this time Mr. Watson was insensible, and the wound in his head quite offensive; he suffered in great agony, and died on the 6th of December.

Captain John Fear, of the brig Cyno, informs me that the unfortunate man who was so much hurt was put in the hospital at Charleston, South Carolina, and will lose his hand. As deponent is in that trade, and often in Havana, he can with truth declare that the Americans are not treated in a manner they have a right to expect, and that the abuses towards them are increasing daily; they are not protected by the Government of the place as they ought to be, and are completely at the mercy of the soldiers, who are governed by their passions, and excited by the prospects of plunder.

JOEL LANE REYNOLDS.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, at Philadelphia aforesaid, the 12th day of February, 1822.

JOHN GOODMAN, Notary Public.

I certify that Joel Lane Reynolds, who has taken and subscribed the foregoing deposition before me, is a credible witness.

JOHN GOODMAN, Notary Public.

It cannot be denied that there exists at this moment a ferment against the Americans, occasioned by their cruising against the pirates on the coast. The higher class feel mortified at seeing strangers exercising the police in their country; and the mob, being all concerned, either personally or through their friends, in these piratical excursions, see with rage the destruction of their nefarious plans; hence the animosity existing against the Americans.

Regla (a small town in Havana bay) sends out a great many of these marauders, and as yet the authorities have done nothing to repress this disorder; the plunder is brought into and sold in the Havana, and the vessels re-enter the harbor to fit out for a fresh expedition. In the case of the plunder of $10,000 from on board the American ship ———, the captors, having disputed about the booty, deposed one against the other; more than sixty from the town of Regla were concerned; the case was as public as one could wish; there were, however, but four or five arrests, and it is doubtful whether these have not been suffered to escape; one of the piratical schooners lay in the harbor; some articles from the plundered vessel were still on board, with the name of the former owner stamped on them; and yet how many steps were necessary to oblige the Government to do its duty? And when, finally, they seized the schooner, the people, who probably had previous notice, had already made their escape.

The captures made off Cape Antonio by the brig Enterprise led to many idle rumors, which were first circulated by the mob, and then credited by nearly all; such as that the Enterprise had, under insurgent colors, robbed several Spanish vessels, &c. &c. Such was the state of the public mind when the attack on the Ajax was resolved on. It is difficult to determine what motive could have led to such an atrocious act; it cannot, however, be called a fortuitous circumstance, for I have been told that, half an hour before it commenced, a man, with a large stone in his hand, had been seen parading on the key in front of the schooner, threatening that he would kill some Americans that day, and that the soldier that went on board to light his segar is the same who, on the preceding voyage, accused a sailor belonging to the Ajax of having drawn a knife against him on the deck of that vessel at twelve o'clock at night.

N. B. The name of the gentleman who wrote the above is N. N. Garesché, the brother of Mr. Garesché who has the powder factory formerly owned by Mr. Baudry, near Wilmington, and is his son-in-law; but they, residing in Havana, would not wish their names mentioned in public, as they would have to leave the place.

B. J. S.

There is a young man, an American, residing in Havana, by the name of Smith, (his first name I disremember,) who is frequently interpreter to the governor, and was at the time of the outrage in one of the guard-boats, with an officer belonging to the governor's staff, who were pulling towards the schooner. This officer and Mr. Smith were the gentlemen who picked up Mr. Joynes and saved his life. Mr. Smith also went on board the schooner (when this officer, who was sent by the governor to take the wounded to the hospital, would not venture) at the risk of his own life, and rescued me from the hands of a Spaniard who was standing over me with a knife in his hand waiting to ascertain if I was dead. Mr. Smith said he heard them saying, when he got on the deck, "We will kill every American, and set fire to the vessel," with many other shameful and outrageous expressions. This Mr. Smith being a person who is dependant on them for his living, and being so kind to me, I did not insist on his deposition, as he would have to leave the place if he gave it.

Captain Edward Shain, who is my brother, was master of the Ajax the preceding voyage, which they boarded in the night while he was asleep; he, hearing the noise, awoke and went on deck, and, the moment he got there, was attacked by a gang of soldiers, beaten by them unmercifully with their swords, shot at by them with a musket, and the ball barely missed his head by his right ear; he was driven to prison, put in the stocks with one leg up and the other down, without a stitch of clothes; to this place he was driven and kept until about 4 P. M. the next day, when he was brought before the judge, interrogated, compelled to return the judge many thanks for his favors, pay $34, and was told to go about his business.

B. J. SHAIN.

[The following report, on the same subject, was made to the House of Representatives, February 12, 1822.]

The Committee of Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 30th ultimo, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, of the same date, containing, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the 16th ultimo, "requesting information respecting any outrages and abuses committed upon the persons of the officers or crews of American vessels at the Havana, or other Spanish ports in America," &c., a statement of Captain B. J. Shain, with accompanying documents, being, according to that report, all the information to be found in the Department of State embraced by that resolution, having duly considered the said statement and documents, report:

That, on the 25th of November, while the schooner Ajax was lying at a wharf in the port of Havana, and ready for sea, a lawless assemblage of Spaniards wantonly and violently entered on board that vessel, and there assaulted Captain B. J. Shain, the master, and Mr. Joynes, his chief mate, who were armed, and resisted, and who are stated to have severally discharged a pistol, and shot one Spanish soldier, and killed another. The mob then prevailed, beating, cutting, and stabbing the captain, his chief mate, the steward of the ship Lucius, of Charleston, and a man belonging to the brig Cyno, of Philadelphia, and mortally wounding with the cook's axe the second mate of the Ajax. The mob then proceeded to plunder the vessel of her running rigging, the beef and pork in the harness tubs, fowls, cabin stores and furniture, and the clothes of officers and seamen. The captain was also robbed of his watch, while he lay wounded and helpless on deck.

Don Francisco de Paula Hornillos, one of the consignees of the Ajax, who had been early sent for by Captain Shain, and who, alarmed by the threats of the mob to board the Ajax, had run to the captain general, and requested his interference to restore peace on the wharf, had scarcely time to state his request, when information was received that the mischief was already done. The governor then, at the request of Don Francisco, sent one of his adjutants to accompany him to the wharf, for the purpose of there delivering to him the wounded person of Captain Shain. On their arrival at the wharf, the mob had dispersed, and six or eight persons only remained there, one of whom was Don Francisco Baro, zelador demar, (an officer of the marine,) who had before made great exertions towards keeping the peace, and had much endeavored to pacify the first man that had objected to the vessel's leaving the wharf, and who, having found there that man, did arrest him and send him to jail.

Captain Shain had already been carried, by Spanish authority, to the hospital, where Don Francisco de Paula Hornillos applied for him; but, as the surgeon was dressing his wounds, and it was considered dangerous then to move him, Don Francisco left him there that night. He took him out the next morning, and sent him to a sick-house, where Doctor Benjamin Huger, surgeon of the marine hospital in Charleston, was permitted to attend him.

In the mean time, Mr. Joynes, the first mate, Mr. Watson, the second mate, of the Ajax, and the man belonging to the brig Cyno, had been sent to prison, where Mr. Watson, having been attended also by Doctor Huger, died of his wounds on the following Friday, and whence the other two were discharged on the following Saturday, being the 1st of December last.

It also appears, by the documents submitted to your committee, that none of the officers or crew who had belonged to the Ajax previous to the outrage were permitted to depart in her; and that, from this cause, it became necessary to ship others to navigate her home; and that Captain Shain and Mr. Joynes were forbidden, under a heavy penalty, to leave the place. In consequence of this prohibition, Captain Shain and Mr. Joynes believed themselves obliged to leave the place clandestinely, Captain Shain first becoming responsible to his merchants for any penalty or charge which might be exacted of them by the Spanish court, in consequence of such departure.

Such is the summary of the facts submitted to your committee, and resting alone on the testimony of Captain Shain and one of his consignees. The testimony of Doctor Huger relates only to the nature of the wounds of Captain Shain. Mr. Warner, the agent of the United States at the Havana, appears to have taken no other part in the transaction than to authenticate the deposition of the consignee. Neither Mr. Joynes, the chief mate of the Ajax, and who was so deeply concerned in the affair, nor any other American who was then at the Havana, excepting Captain Shain, has furnished any evidence on the subject. From the facts thus known to your committee, it appears that the persons who boarded the Ajax, and there committed the outrages above stated, had lawlessly and riotously assembled, and were, as Captain Shain has repeatedly denominated them, a mob; that their proceedings, whatever might originally have been the motive or the object, were not only unauthorized and unsanctioned by the constituted authorities of the place, but the officer, Don Francisco Baro, who happened to be present, made great exertions to keep the peace, and, as soon as he was able so to do, actually sent to prison one of the leading rioters; and that the captain general, who only heard of the riot when it was too late to suppress it, despatched one of his adjutants to the wharf, in order to deliver the wounded Captain Shain into the hands of a friend.

It is, in the opinion of your committee, a political as well as moral duty "to do as we would be done by," and to treat the constituted authorities of other nations with the same confidence and deference which we are disposed to exact of others towards our own. A citizen of the United States, who suffers wrong or violence within the exclusive jurisdiction of a foreign sovereign, ever ought, in the first instance, to appeal to the competent tribunals of that sovereign for redress; and it is only in case of an extraordinary delay or an unwarrantable denial of justice there that he can be well qualified to resort to his own Government for its interposition in his behalf.

Captain Shain, so far from making such an appeal, has avowedly evaded the prohibition of a court to leave the scene of his alleged sufferings, which was probably imposed with a view to judicial proceedings, and to secure his presence thereat, in order either to answer the charges which might be preferred against him, or to corroborate the charges which might be brought, in his behalf, against others.

Your committee are, therefore, of opinion that there has not been a case presented to them, in the statement and documents first mentioned, which requires the interference of this Government, and therefore respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

17th Congress.] No. 327. [1st Session.

POLITICAL CONDITION OF THE SPANISH PROVINCES OF SOUTH AMERICA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 8, AND APRIL 26, 1822.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, March 8, 1822.

In transmitting to the House of Representatives the documents called for by the resolution of that House of the 30th January, I consider it my duty to invite the attention of Congress to a very important subject, and to communicate the sentiments of the Executive on it, that, should Congress entertain similar sentiments, there may be such co-operation between the two departments of the Government as their respective rights and duties may require.

The revolutionary movement in the Spanish provinces in this hemisphere attracted the attention and excited the sympathy of our fellow-citizens from its commencement. This feeling was natural and honorable to them, from causes which need not be communicated to you. It has been gratifying to all to see the general acquiescence which has been manifested in the policy which the constituted authorities have deemed it proper to pursue in regard to this contest. As soon as the movement assumed such a steady and consistent form as to make the success of the provinces probable, the rights to which they were entitled by the law of nations, as equal parties to a civil war, were extended to them. Each party was permitted to enter our ports with its public and private ships, and to take from them every article which was the subject of commerce with other nations. Our citizens, also, have carried on commerce with both parties, and the Government has protected it with each in articles not contraband of war. Through the whole of this contest the United States have remained neutral, and have fulfilled with the utmost impartiality all the obligations incident to that character.

This contest has now reached such a stage, and been attended with such decisive success on the part of the provinces, that it merits the most profound consideration whether their right to the rank of independent nations, with all the advantages incident to it in their intercourse with the United States, is not complete. Buenos Ayres assumed that rank by a formal declaration in 1816, and has enjoyed it since 1810, free from invasion by the parent country. The provinces composing the republic of Colombia, after having separately declared their independence, were united by a fundamental law of the 17th of December, 1819. A strong Spanish force occupied at that time certain parts of the territory within their limits, and waged a destructive war; that force has since been repeatedly defeated, and the whole of it either made prisoners or destroyed, or expelled from the country, with the exception of an inconsiderable portion only, which is blockaded in two fortresses. The provinces on the Pacific have likewise been very successful. Chili declared independence in 1818, and has since enjoyed it undisturbed; and of late, by the assistance of Chili and Buenos Ayres, the revolution has extended to Peru. Of the movement in Mexico our information is less authentic, but it is, nevertheless, distinctly understood that the new Government has declared its independence, and that there is now no opposition to it there, nor a force to make any. For the last three years the Government of Spain has not sent a single corps of troops to any part of that country; nor is there any reason to believe it will send any in future. Thus, it is manifest that all those provinces are not only in the full enjoyment of their independence, but, considering the state of the war and other circumstances, that there is not the most remote prospect of their being deprived of it.

When the result of such a contest is manifestly settled, the new Governments have a claim to recognition by other Powers, which ought not to be resisted. Civil wars too often excite feelings which the parties cannot control. The opinion entertained by other Powers as to the result may assuage those feelings, and promote an accommodation between them useful and honorable to both. The delay which has been observed in making a decision on this important subject will, it is presumed, have afforded an unequivocal proof to Spain, as it must have done to other Powers, of the high respect entertained by the United States for her rights, and of their determination not to interfere with them. The provinces belonging to this hemisphere are our neighbors, and have, successively, as each portion of the country acquired its independence, pressed their recognition by an appeal to facts not to be contested, and which they thought gave them a just title to it. To motives of interest this Government has invariably disclaimed all pretension, being resolved to take no part in the controversy, or other measure in regard to it, which should not merit the sanction of the civilized world. To other claims a just sensibility has been always felt, and frankly acknowledged; but they, in themselves, could never become an adequate cause of action. It was incumbent on this Government to look to every important fact and circumstance on which a sound opinion could be formed, which has been done. When we regard, then, the great length of time which this war has been prosecuted, the complete success which has attended it in favor of the provinces, the present condition of the parties, and the utter inability of Spain to produce any change in it, we are compelled to conclude that its fate is settled, and that the provinces which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognised.

Of the views of the Spanish Government on this subject, no particular information has been recently received. It may be presumed that the successful progress of the revolution through such a long series of years, gaining strength, and extending annually in every direction, and embracing, by the late important events, with little exception, all the dominions of Spain south of the United States on this continent, placing thereby the complete sovereignty over the whole in the hands of the people, will reconcile the parent country to an accommodation with them on the basis of their unqualified independence. Nor has any authentic information been recently received of the disposition of other Powers respecting it. A sincere desire has been cherished to act in concert with them in the proposed recognition, of which several were some time past duly apprized; but it was understood that they were not prepared for it. The immense space between those Powers, even those which border on the Atlantic and these provinces, makes the movement an affair of less interest and excitement to them than to us. It is probable, therefore, that they have been less attentive to its progress than we have been. It may be presumed, however, that the late events will dispel all doubt of the result.

In proposing this measure, it is not contemplated to change thereby, in the slightest manner, our friendly relations with either of the parties, but to observe, in all respects, as heretofore, should the war be continued, the most perfect neutrality between them. Of this friendly disposition an assurance will be given to the Government of Spain, to whom, it is presumed, it will be, as it ought to be, satisfactory. The measure is proposed under a thorough conviction that it is in strict accord with the law of nations; that it is just and right as to the parties; and that the United States owe it to their station and character in the world, as well as to their essential interests, to adopt it. Should Congress concur in the view herein presented, they will doubtless see the propriety of making the necessary appropriations for carrying it into effect.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 7, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th of January last, requesting the President of the United States to lay before that House such communications as might be in the possession of the Executive from the agents of the United States with the Governments south of the United States which have declared their independence, and the communications from the agents of such Governments in the United States with the Secretary of State as tend to show the political condition of their Governments, and the state of the war between them and Spain, as it might be consistent with the public interest to communicate, has the honor of submitting to the President the papers required by that resolution.

The communications from the agents of the United States are only those most recently received, and exhibiting their views of the actual condition of the several South American revolutionary Governments. No communication has yet been received from Mr. Prevost since his arrival at Lima.

There has been hitherto no agent of the United States in Mexico; but among the papers herewith submitted is a letter recently received from a citizen of the United States, who has been some years residing there, containing the best information in possession of the Government concerning the late revolution in that country, and specially of the character embraced by the resolution of the House.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Secretary of State to Mr. John M. Forbes, at New York.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 5, 1820.

The certificate from this Department, which has been made out and transmitted to you, constitutes you agent for commerce and seamen for either of the provinces of Buenos Ayres or of Chili, in whichsoever of them Mr. J. B. Prevost shall not be. He is at this time at Buenos Ayres; but having, at one period, intimated to the President a preference to return to Chili, where he some time resided, it is thought due to him to leave the selection of his residence, after your arrival at Buenos Ayres, to himself. Should he determine to continue there, you will proceed, either by land over the Andes, or in the frigate Constellation round Cape Horn, to Valparaiso, and take up your residence there, or at St. Jago de Chili, which is understood to be the seat of the revolutionary Government of that province. If he should prefer to return thither, you will remain at Buenos Ayres.

The commercial intercourse between the United States and those countries, though not very considerable, is deserving of particular attention. Whatever accurate information you can obtain relating to it, as well as to the commerce of those countries with other nations, and to their internal trade, will be particularly acceptable. The condition of our seamen there will also deserve your notice. The performance of these duties will involve also the political relations between those countries and the United States. In the progress of their revolution, Buenos Ayres and Chili have, to the extent of their powers, and, indeed, far beyond their natural means, combined maritime operations with those of their war by land. Having no ships or seamen of their own, they have countenanced and encouraged foreigners to enter their service, without always considering how far it might affect either the rights or the duties of the nations to which those foreigners belonged. The privateers which, with the commissions and under the flag of Buenos Ayres, have committed so many and such atrocious acts of piracy, were all either fitted out, manned, and officered by foreigners, at Buenos Ayres, or even in foreign countries, not excepting our own, to which blank commissions, both for the ships and officers, have been sent. In the instructions to the late Commodore Perry, (which his lamented decease prevented from being executed by him, and a copy of which is now furnished to you,) certain articles in the Buenos Ayrean privateering ordinance were pointed out, particularly liable to the production of these abuses, and which, being contrary to the established usages among civilized nations, it was hoped would have been revoked, or made to disappear from their otherwise unexceptionable code. These instructions were renewed to Commodore Morris; but the time of his stay at Buenos Ayres was so short, and he was there at a moment of so great a change in the ruling power of the state, that, although he communicated to the then existing Director the substance of the representations which Commodore Perry had been instructed to make, we know not that it was attended with any favorable result. You will consider the parts of Commodore Perry's instructions which may be still applicable on your arrival in South America as directed to yourself, and, should you proceed to Chili, will execute them there, no communication upon the subject having yet been made there. Among the inconveniences consequent upon this system of carrying on maritime warfare by means of foreigners, has been occasionally, and to a considerable extent, the enticement of seamen belonging to merchant vessels in the ports of Buenos Ayres and Chili from their engagements, to enlist them in privateers or public armed vessels of those countries. In attending to the numerous trials and convictions for piracy which have recently afflicted our country, and cast an unusual gloom over our annals, you will remark that a great proportion of the guilty persons have been seamen thus engaged, foreigners at Buenos Ayres, or enlisted in our own ports, in violation of our laws. Whether at Buenos Ayres or in Chili, you will use every exertion in your power, consistent with the respect and conciliatory deportment to be constantly observed towards the existing public authorities, to protect the seamen of the United States from all such enlistments, and the owners and masters of the merchant vessels from time to time arriving there from the loss of their men by such means.

The Commercial Digest of the Laws of Foreign Countries with which the United States are in relation, a copy of which has been furnished you, may suggest to you the nature of part of the information which is desirable from South America.

Political information will be equally acceptable. The more particular and correct the information of this nature which you can obtain, the more acceptable it will prove. Besides the struggle in South America for independence, against which Spain is the only opposite party, internal feuds and civil wars have peculiarly marked every step of the revolutions in progress upon that theatre. As an agent and citizen of the United States, the first advice I shall give you is, to observe and report, with all the vigilance and discernment, and penetration and fidelity to your own country, that you possess, the movements of all parties, but to make yourself a partisan to none. From the documents lately received here, it is apparent that a negotiation has been some time on foot between the late Government of Buenos Ayres and France. It is well known that a negotiation of much longer standing has existed between the same Government and Portugal; nor has Mr. Rivadavia been residing two or three years to no purpose in England. To ascertain the real movements of all these parties, a neutral position, a neutral heart, and an observing mind, are indispensable. In recommending it to your attention, I would add the caution, neither to take upon trust what any man shall tell you, without asking yourself what it is his interest or wish that you should believe, nor to give more weight to conjectures than the circumstances under which they are formed will warrant.

By the latest accounts that we have received, the Government, the Congress, and the constitution of the provinces of La Plata were overthrown; the province of Buenos Ayres stood alone, with Don Manuel de Sarratea as governor, at its head. They were in negotiation with General Artigas, of the Oriental Banda, and with General Ramirez, commander of the Monteneros. In what those negotiations will result, we are to learn hereafter; and what their effect will be upon the relations of all with the Portuguese at Montevideo is yet to be seen. Should you remain at Buenos Ayres, we shall expect full communications from you as frequently as opportunities for transmitting them may occur.

I am, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

JOHN M. FORBES, Esq.

Extract of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., Agent of the United States at Buenos Ayres, to the Secretary of State, dated

SEPTEMBER 2, 1821.

I shall confine myself to a general summary of leading events since my last. The first in order of date is the total defeat of the party of Ramirez by a wing of the united armies of Santa Fé and Cordova, under Don Francisco de Bedoya, Substitute Governor of Cordova. The action was fought at Francisco, on the Rio Seco, on the 10th of July, and the news was most joyfully received here on the 21st of the same month.

I have great pleasure in announcing to you a new organization of this Government, which promises great solidity and character, and from whose exertions the most important reforms are daily taking place. The Departments of State and Treasury were, until the 18th of July last, united in one person, Don Juan Manuel de Luca; the junta then decreed that these departments should be separated, and the governor called to the first, (Don Bernadino Rivadavia,) with the title of Minister of the Government and of Foreign Relations. Mr. Luca remained charged with the Department of Treasury until the 1st August when he offered his resignation, which was accepted, and a complimentary decree of the 8th August, published with acceptance of the governor. Don Manuel José Garcia, many years diplomatic agent of the Director at Rio Janeiro, has since been appointed to that office. These two gentlemen (Rivadavia and Garcia) both possess a great share of public confidence; have both acquired experience in public affairs by long residences near foreign courts; and they both seem animated by a zealous desire to establish order in the various branches of the administration, and economy in the public expenditure. This spirit of reform, which was the great cause of the overthrow of Sarratea, by exciting the discontent and violent opposition of military men, now furnishes also a hope to the partisans of Pueyrredon, who are raising great clamor against the new ministers, and working diligently to regain their influence. In short, the present moment seems to be the crisis of a struggle between public virtue and corruption, between a new-born impulse of public opinion growing in the liberty of the press with that of parliamentary debate, and the rotten legacy of the viceroyalty, the deleterious influence of military patronage. It is a struggle, on the event of which hangs the future liberty and welfare of this province. May Heaven smile on the future efforts of virtue and patriotism!

Another very important event has occurred since my last report. The annexation of the Banda Oriental to the kingdom of Brazils, and the recognition of the independence of these provinces by His Most Faithful Majesty King John—these measures were simultaneous and correlative. On the 28th July, Don Juan Manuel de Figueiredo presented himself to this Government with the character of consul of Portugal and Brazils, and with a letter of credence from the Brazilian Secretary of State, acknowledging the independence of these provinces, and expressing a hope that these provinces would acknowledge any and all Governments of fact which should be admitted and obeyed by the people of any neighboring provinces. This Government received Mr. De Figueiredo with great courtesy, and passed over in silence the recognition with its implied condition. The whole business, on both sides, appears to me to be quite theatrical. Mr. Figueiredo, a conspicuous actor in the first scene, has retired suddenly from all political agencies, and from this life! On the morning of the 21st August, being apparently in perfect health, and whilst walking in his saloon, waiting for his breakfast, he fell down instantly dead! By order of Government, his body was opened by a surgeon, in presence of some distinguished law officers, and his stomach and bowels found to be in a healthful state; whence it results that he died of apoplexy. Soon after Mr. Rivadavia's coming into the ministry, to wit, on the 5th August, I was promised a long conference with him on all the objects of my agency; but as he came to me in company with Mr. Luca, I could only hold some desultory conversation touching cursorily on some topics. Mr. R. then promised me for the next Thursday a particular audience, but I am sorry to say that the fulfilment of this promise has been delayed from week to week to this hour.

I yesterday saw Mr. Rivadavia for a few minutes, and again received an apology for his delay of the long-promised conference. I took occasion to say that I was aware of his unceasing occupation in the arduous place he held, and must conform to his convenience, but that there was one subject on which I had been instructed to communicate the views of my Government, and which, by the information daily received, became most imperiously pressing, as interesting to the character of this Government, which I knew he had so much at heart. I then stated that, by late advices from the West Indies, the horrors of piracy, which had so justly excited universal indignation, were daily increasing, as well by the numbers of the vessels as by their strength of armament and the boldness of their nefarious enterprises; that, recently, a vessel fitted out here under the name of the Confederation had changed her name and her commander, and was captured under the commission of Artigas by a French frigate, and carried into Martinique, from whence the captain and a number of the crew, being seamen of the United States, had been sent to Philadelphia in a French armed brig for trial; that all these vessels were notoriously furnished with several different commissions, and, according to the privateering regulations of this province, they were to be deemed pirates; that one of them had recently fired on a Government brig of France, and killed the commander; that I was instructed by my Government to make the strongest remonstrances on this subject. To all these observations Mr. Rivadavia replied that this evil would no longer exist; that there would soon be given an order recalling all privateers; that he was fully convinced that the most important object with this Government is to acquire the good-will and friendship of all other Governments, and that he was determined to make every sacrifice to attain this great end. He said that Governments seated in perfect peace and security reasoned calmly on these subjects, but that his country had experienced so many difficulties in its struggle for independence that the Government had been compelled to adopt the strongest measures against the Spanish commerce; but, said he, "this is now all finished."

At the moment I am writing, a salvo of artillery, and the most extravagant demonstrations of joy through the streets, announce the capture of Lima by San Martin's besieging army. If this news be true, it puts the seal to the independence of South America. The Spanish royalty, driven from its last hope in these provinces, and enlightened by a representative Government, will, I think, within six months, acknowledge their independence.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1821.

Enclosed I transmit an important state paper published here—a manifest of the governor and his secretary on the projet presented to the honorable junta in relation to the congress now assembled at Cordova, together with the projet submitted, which, as will be seen, is intended to lay the foundation for future federation. Messrs. Rivadavia and Garcia are pressing with great vigor their system of reform, and, by a strong blow at the root, have violently shaken the branches of the tree of corruption. Consternation has been spread through the ranks of smugglers, by the arrest and close imprisonment, the day before yesterday, of Don Fernando Calderon, first inspector of the custom-house. This man, although enjoying a very liberal salary, has notoriously patronized the unblushing atrocities of the giant smugglers who have totally dilapidated the revenues of the country for years past. The leading man, accustomed to ask and obtain every thing of the Government, yesterday solicited of the governor a mitigation of the imprisonment of Mr. Calderon, and perhaps his discharge on bail. The governor consulted Mr. Rivadavia on the expediency of listening to the call of mercy. The latter replied very respectfully to the governor, that he certainly had the power and the responsibility of any measures he might adopt, but that, if his excellency yielded to the solicitations in question, he (Mr. R.) must decline any further service as secretary. This firmness prevailed. The truth is, Mr. Rivadavia, being the father of the incipient system of order and virtue, from his growing influence, has become indispensable to the accomplishment of the views now cherished by the public opinion. If this system should prevail, the immediate effect of it will be the prevalence of civil over military influence.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1821.

I have a despatch from Judge Prevost, containing the gazettes from Lima, published since the revolution there, which I shall forward by the first direct opportunity. The night before the last, (26th instant,) the governor (Rodriguez) received an official despatch from General San Martin, confirming the previous news of the surrender of Lima to the liberating army, and accompanied by gazettes giving the details of that important event. Yesterday morning this great event was announced to this city by salvos of artillery from the fort and national vessels, which were repeated at noon and at sunset. At five o'clock in the afternoon, the governor, attended by his ministers and all the public functionaries, went to the cathedral to attend a Te Deum, and in the evening the city was brilliantly illuminated; other public festivities are said to be contemplated, among which a ball by the Chilian minister at the theatre, and another by the Government, are spoken of. In fact, this event is generally considered as a finishing blow in the contest for independence. Enclosed is a paper just published here, containing a familiar letter from San Martin, (addressed, I presume, to his father-in-law, Mr. Escalada,) signed Pepe, which is the familiar abbreviation of Joseph; also, various public documents relating to the taking possession of Lima; a correspondence between San Martin and the Archbishop of Lima; the declaration of the Cabildo, &c. By these public papers, it appears that San Martin has added to his fame by the moderation and respect for public opinion which he has manifested on this great occasion. Every thing here breathes joy and the brightest hope of the perfection of their political happiness. The congress at Cordova is now entirely lost in the contemplation of a grand congress, which it is said will be agreed on by the three great republics of Peru, Chili, and La Plata. Perhaps the sister Colombia may be invited to this family party.

Enclosed I send you copies of my letter to Mr. Rivadavia on the subject of privateering, or rather of piracy, dated 14th September, copy of that minister's reply, under 15th September, and of a minute of a conference I had with him on the 17th of same month. Enclosed is also minute of a previous conference with said minister on the 5th August last.

Among the important events which have occurred on this side of the mountains, I must not omit to notice the total destruction of the party of José Miguel Carrera, and the public execution of that active, intelligent, and extraordinary man. Enclosed I herewith transmit two bulletins published here concerning this event. By the first, it will appear that a colonel (Don Manuel Arias) had organized a revolution in Carrera's band, which he communicated to the Governor of Mendoza on the condition of saving his own life, and those of some of his adherents. By the second, entitled "Detail of the destruction of Carrera," it will be seen that Carrera's party was totally defeated by the Mendozinos on the 31st August, and that, on the 4th of this month, Carrera was shot on the public square at Mendoza; he died with the most heroic courage, asking for only favor of his conquerors that he might be buried in the same grave with his two brothers, who were shot in the same city on a former occasion. It would be well for humanity if the story of this event stopped here; but I again have to state another act of savage ferocity. The murdered body of this brave and distinguished man was shockingly mutilated; his head was cut off and exposed in the square of Mendoza; his right arm was sent to the Governor of Cordova, and his left to the Punta San Luis. When these particulars were known here, they excited a sentiment of horror; and it has even been said that if this victim of the ferocity of their half savage brethren at Mendoza had been sent to this place, even his life would have been probably spared.

Carrera, by his great personal resources, had proved the most dangerous enemy of the present state of things in these provinces; and had San Martin failed in Peru, and had Carrera survived that failure, he would have menaced the tranquillity of Chili; thus his death is a great event for the present rulers here, although the manner of it may be very revolting to their more civilized breasts.

OCTOBER 1, 1821.

Since writing the foregoing, there has been a further publication of papers connected with the occupation of Lima, containing certain proclamations of Generals San Martin and Arenales; this publication I herewith enclose. The new ministers have very judiciously availed themselves of the present moment to propose to the junta a general amnesty, and that all those who have been exiled for differences of political opinion should be recalled to the bosom of their country: this proposition, so worthy the high-minded cause of the present ministry, and so well calculated to conciliate all parties, is to be discussed this evening at the junta. I shall attend the debate, seats being assigned to the foreign agents. Among the events tending to consolidate the moral and physical force of these provinces, it is said that a revolution has taken place in the Entre Rios against the brother of the slain Ramirez. At the head of this revolution is a Mr. Mansilla, of whose rank and history I am ignorant. The flotilla of this province is co-operating, and further assistance has been asked of Lopez, the Governor of Santa Fé. The trade of the Baxada has been opened in consequence of this revolution. I just now met Mr. Rivadavia in the street, and took the occasion to remind him of the decree which he had promised to send me on the subject of privateering; he said it depended only on him to reduce it to writing, which he had not yet had time to do. He has given me reason to hope that he will call on me to-morrow; but the Herculean labor of cleansing the Augean stables so entirely occupies him, day and night, I sometimes fear he will be quite exhausted before he can accomplish it.

Copy of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., United States Agent at Buenos Ayres, to Mr. Rivadavia, Minister of Foreign Relations.

SIR: BUENOS AYRES, September 14, 1821.

Although I have been more than ten months in this city, I have never until now found a moment when, under all circumstances, I deemed it expedient to lay before this Government the sentiments and views of that of the United States in relation to many interesting subjects as contained in the instructions I received on my departure from Washington. On the recent organization of the Government, I intimated to you the desire to hold a full and frank conference, which you had the goodness to promise me at the commencement of the past month, but which has been unavoidably delayed by your more pressing occupations.

Appreciating as I do the great and efficient efforts now making by you in the cause of your country, I should most willingly continue to wait your convenience for the proposed conference, were I not impelled by recent information to press on the early attention of this Government one of the subjects on which I am instructed by that of the United States—I mean those indiscriminate violences which are daily committed on the ocean against the peaceful commerce of unoffending nations, under the various flags of the South American provinces.

It is now a long time since those violences have called forth the most pointed reprobation of many Governments in Europe, and of that of the United States. Several Governments have made active efforts to repress them by force. These efforts have been unavailing; these privileged plunderers

"Can add colors to the chameleon,
"Change shapes with Proteus for advantage."

There is nothing fixed but the blackness of their purpose and the boldness of their atrocities. They are furnished with various commissions, and navigated by crews of men without country, without morality, and without other ties than those of crime and plunder. By the privateering regulations of Buenos Ayres, a privateer owned here, or commissioned by this Government, who shall be furnished with a commission from any other prince or republic, even if allied with this, "shall be adjudged a good prize, and her captain or commander punished as pirates." It is therefore under the sanction of its own laws that I presume to call the early and efficacious intervention of this Government to vindicate those violated laws. But, sir, it is, above all, from a full faith in those sentiments of honor, that love of order and justice which so eminently distinguish every step of the present administration, that I derive the strongest hope that this call will not be disregarded. The public gazettes recently received from the United States contain several well-authenticated statements of new outrages committed by these freebooters, whose numbers are multiplied, and the boldness of their wicked enterprises increased by their impunity. I will not swell this written communication by any extracts from the information received; but hope that, at an early day, it will be convenient for you to admit me to a personal conference, when I shall be happy to communicate with you in that spirit of frankness, which is the best pledge of friendship, as well the facts in my possession as the feelings of the Government of the United States on this highly interesting and important subject.

I avail myself with pleasure of this occasion to renew to you, Mr. Minister, the assurances of my most distinguished consideration and respect.

JOHN M. FORBES.

To the Hon. Mr. RIVADAVIA,
Minister of Foreign Relations, Buenos Ayres.

Mr. Rivadavia to Mr. Forbes.

BUENOS AYRES, September 15, 1821.

The Minister of Government and of Foreign Relations has had the honor of receiving the official note from the agent of the United States under yesterday's date, and he considers it as his particular duty to make an acknowledgment of the honorable distinction the said agent shows towards him. With respect to the principal affair therein contained, he can only repeat what he had the satisfaction to make him acquainted with in his last interview, which was, that the Government had adopted every measure in its power to suppress the evils committed by privateers of this country towards the commerce of neutral nations from the abuse of their commissions. Nevertheless, the Minister of Government and of Foreign Relations feeling desirous of contributing towards the completion of these measures as far as they are capable of being made perfect, he will be happy to receive any further explanation on this subject that the agent of the United States may think proper to give him: for which purpose, it will be taken as an honor if the agent would take the trouble to call on the minister at his house on Monday morning, the 17th instant, at eleven o'clock.

The Minister of Government and of Foreign Relations expresses his thanks to the agent for the distinction he confers upon him, and begs to return it by the assurances of his consideration and respect.

BERNARDO RIVADAVIA.

To JOHN M. FORBES, Esq., Agent of the United States of N. A.

Extract of a minute of a conference with Mr. Rivadavia, Minister of State.

BUENOS AYRES, MONDAY, September 17, 1821.

I received this morning at ten o'clock, by the hands of one of the clerks of the department, an answer from the Minister of State to my letter of the 14th instant, containing an invitation to a conference at eleven o'clock at his house. Although the notice was too short to admit of any preparation, I gladly accepted the invitation, taking with me my instructions, including those intended for the late Commodore Perry. I found the minister, Mr. Rivadavia, quite alone, and was, as always, well received. I commenced my conversation by very sincere assurances of the enthusiasm I felt in the present march of events, and compliments to the minister on his zealous efforts for the establishment of order in the administration, and the formation of a sound public opinion in the country. I then observed that, not having had time to prepare extracts, I had brought my instructions in extenso, and would ask permission, in frankness and friendship, to read certain parts of them in the original language in which they were written, which I was aware was well understood by him. I then read the assurances of the good-will of the United States towards these provinces, and the interest they had constantly felt in the success of their efforts for independence. I continued through the history of our diplomatic correspondence and measures in relation to the South American affairs, to all which the minister listened with much attention and apparent approbation. When I communicated to him the fact that the United States Government had proposed to those of France and England to acknowledge, in concert with them, the independence of Buenos Ayres, in reply to my question he confessed his previous ignorance of that fact. I then continued the forcible expositions in the instructions to Commodore Perry of the evils and horrors of the system of piracy as practised by vessels carrying various colors of the South American provinces, and stated to him that the United States would not acknowledge as legal any commission granted in blank; which he said was perfectly just, and continued by saying that he was fully sensible of all the injury which had been done to the cause and character of these provinces, and deprecated as much as any one the atrocities which had been committed on neutral commerce; that the Government had determined on an entire change of system, and that, probably, this day a decree would be drawn up revoking all privateer commissions, and ordering them all to return within a given period. But this decree would be communicated to me, when it would be seen if any thing more efficacious remained to be done within the scope of the Government's authority. I observed that the decision of the Government was in perfect unison with the whole system now going into operation, eminently wise and politic, and would have a most important influence on the opinion of other nations in regard to this country; that, as nothing had so much operated to damp the enthusiasm of my countrymen in favor of South American liberty as the enormities committed under the patriot flags, so nothing would so effectually tend to reanimate their good wishes as the suppression of those crying abuses. I stated to the minister the measures adopted by Congress to repress the predatory system, and particularly the act of 20th of April, 1815, of which he requested and I promised a copy. I next read from the instruction of 12th July, 1820, the remarks on the subject of commercial preferences, and the magnanimous feeling with which the Government of the United States disclaimed any wish to barter an acknowledgment of the independence of these provinces for any exclusive advantages in their commerce; at the same time, their firm reliance that no such exclusive privileges would be granted to other nations to the prejudice of the United States. On this, Mr. Rivadavia assured me that it was the firm determination of this Government to grant no exclusive privileges of commerce to any nation whatever, and that I might communicate this decision to my Government, with an assurance that the most complete reliance might be placed on it. The minister proceeded, that his most decided opinion was, that no measure whatever ought to be taken to solicit an acknowledgment of the independence of these provinces by any Government. He expressed himself in flattering terms of his good-will towards me personally, and added, that it would be an abuse of the confidence I had evinced towards him if he were to engage me to make any representations to my Government tending to that end, and that he was much less disposed to take any such measure towards any Government of Europe; that such proceeding must operate, if unsuccessful, to the humiliation of the provinces, and, if successful, to mislead the people, by persuading them that such recognition was all-sufficient to their political existence and happiness; that, in his opinion, the most efficacious system would be to establish order and wise institutions of government throughout the provinces, and to show themselves worthy of the fraternity of other nations, when it would be voluntarily offered; that such voluntary recognition, in every point of view, would be much more beneficial than that protection which should result from a compromise of honor or interest; that he had told his countrymen, de haute voix, his sentiments on the important topic of self-government; that much was to be done, but that he hoped to see the successful progress of a sound system of domestic and foreign policy. Our conference lasted, with a short interruption, nearly two hours, and we separated with assurances of mutual satisfaction.

An exact minute taken immediately after the conference.

J. M. FORBES.

SIR: BUENOS AYRES, September 22, 1821.

Enclosed I have the honor to transmit a correct copy of the act of Congress passed on the 20th of April, 1818, for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, to which act reference was had in the conference to which you did me the honor to admit me on Monday, the 17th instant.

I pray you, Mr. Minister, to accept the renewed assurances of my highest consideration and respect.

J. M. FORBES.

To the Hon. B. RIVADAVIA, Minister, &c.

Mr. Rivadavia to Mr. Forbes.

BUENOS AYRES, October 6, 1821.

The Minister of Government and of Foreign Relations, in consequence of the offer made, has the honor to transmit to the agent of the United States a copy of the decree which has just been issued by the Department of War and Marine concerning privateering.

The minister salutes the agent with his most distinguished consideration.

BERNARDO RIVADAVIA.

DECREE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, BUENOS AYRES, October 6, 1821.

Among the resources which the unfortunate rights of war have rendered lawful, and its object necessary, is privateering. The wars of the independence of the provinces of Holland and of the United States of North America have proved that this kind of warfare is the most advantageous for a country which prepares to defend its independence against a more ancient and remote country that has governed it. It is impossible to prevent or repress all the abuses which may result from privateering. The Government which finds itself under the painful necessity of authorizing, and even of encouraging it, has only two ways of lessening its illegal consequences, and in so far has only two obligations in this respect: the first is, to dictate such rules and take such precautions and guaranties as may correct abuses, not suffering them to pass unpunished. In this respect the Government of these provinces has fulfilled its duty, and the regulation of privateers proves it. The other obligation is, to put an end to this kind of warfare, either when it shall be no longer necessary to the object which induced it, or when the effect which it produces no longer equals the risks and inconvenience which result from it. The Government considers these two cases as having taken place, and, in virtue thereof, it has agreed upon, and now decrees, the following articles:

1. In future, no commission of privateering whatever shall be granted without a previous solemn publication, expressing the cause which obliges the Government to have recourse to this measure.
2. Every individual who possesses any commission, and shall be now in the territory of this province, shall be obliged to present it to the Minister of Marine within fifteen days from the date of this decree.
3. Those individuals who hold privateer commissions, and are in countries situated on the other side of the equinoctial line, or on the coast of the Pacific, shall be held to present the said commissions at the Ministry of Marine within the term of eight months.
4. The sureties given shall answer for the fulfilment of the foregoing articles.
5. Every commander of a vessel armed as a privateer in virtue of a commission of any one of the Governments which have commanded in this capital, on sight of this decree, shall cease to cruise, and shall put into port to disarm and return his commission.
6. Every one who shall contravene the preceding article will incur the pains of piracy.
7. Every vessel which, after the term of eight months from the date of this decree, shall continue to cruise under the authority of a commission of the Government of this country, shall be treated as a pirate.
8. The Minister of War and Marine is charged with the execution of this decree.

MARTIN RODRIGUEZ, Minister of War and Marine.
FRANCISCO DE LA CRUZ.

Copy of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., Agent of the United States at Buenos Ayres, to the Secretary of State, dated

SIR: OCTOBER 8, 1821.

The detention of the vessel by which I had prepared to send the foregoing despatch furnishes an opportunity to communicate a translation of the promised decree for suppressing privateering. It has not yet been published here, but will undoubtedly appear in the first official register, which will perhaps be printed to-morrow or next day. I hope that the terms of it will prove satisfactory to the Government of the United States. Although the right is reserved of resorting again to this kind of warfare, yet I hope that the restrictions under which it will be renewed will be more efficient to guard against those abuses which have heretofore been so justly and extensively complained of.

By the schooner Essex, to sail to-morrow for Providence, I shall have the honor to transmit duplicates, together with Judge Prevost's despatch, mentioned in the foregoing.

I am, &c.

JOHN M. FORBES.

October 11, 1821.

P. S. By this vessel, (the Essex, via Providence,) I send Judge Prevost's despatch, and a large file of newspapers. The decree against privateering was published yesterday in the "Registro Oficial."

Hon. John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Extracts of a letter from J. M. Forbes, Esq. to the Secretary of State, dated

Buenos Ayres, October 26, 1821.

I have previously reported the total destruction of the parties of Ramirez and Carrera, together with the death of those chiefs, the barbarous mutilation of their bodies, &c. By these events, the influence of this province over the others is much increased, and, by the wise course of the present administration, the moral force of a sound and exemplary political deportment will be added to the success of their arms; and I hope that the day is not far distant when all the jarring jealousies which have hitherto so perniciously counteracted the progress of civil liberty will be put to silence, and the wise men of every section of this country will be brought to a cordial co-operation to attain the high objects of their political destiny. But much, very much, remains to be done before the general union of the great sections of this almost boundless country in any one system of government can be effected.

In the mean time, Rivadavia and Garcia, firm as they are enlightened and patriotic, are pursuing "the even tenor of their way." They have added public credit to the other sinews of war which this province before possessed, by repaying with great punctuality, in gold, several loans, (a thing without example in the history of this revolution;) they enjoy now to so great a degree the confidence of the community, that I believe they could borrow to any reasonable amount for an immediate exigency. It is said, also, that an entirely new system of finance is agreed on, and will appear in a few days. But this tariff, as it has been represented to me, the duties, with a very few exceptions, will be ad valorem, and will vary from five to fifteen per cent. Every possible measure is taken to prevent smuggling, and public opinion and morality are cherished by the Government. If, therefore, Buenos Ayres, in all the darkness of her most gloomy period, public sentiment paralyzed by deadly dissensions, and public resources completely dilapidated, has been able to struggle successfully against the machinations of the other provinces, it is not too rash to expect that when she fights with a twofold armament of reason and force, seconded by a vigorous public credit, the victory must eventually be hers. The most deplorable result, however, of these continued agitations, is the necessity of continuing an onerous military establishment.

The most alarming state of agitation prevails in the neighboring kingdom of Brazil. It was some days since confidently reported, on the authority of Captain McLean, of the British Government brig Beaver, in six days from Rio to Montevideo, that Prince Don Pedro was to have been crowned King of Brazil on the 13th of the present month. Subsequent accounts contradict this fact, and it is now no longer believed. It is, however, well known that the public mind there is in a most feverish state, and, should civil war burst forth, it would be the signal of the emancipation of a numberless horde of slaves, and the most horrid scenes of blood and devastation would overwhelm that kingdom, and eventually threaten these provinces, where it would find easy victims in the scanty white population here. The progress of this all-destroying flame could only be arrested by the Indians, and, in such a conflict, this delightful country would be totally lost to civilization.

Mr. Forbes to the Secretary of State.—Extract.

Buenos Ayres, November 8, 1821.

Since my last respects, we have received news from Lima and Chili, by which it appears that the royalist army, which had evacuated Lima on the 6th July under La Serna, had returned on the 22d August under the command of Canterac, La Serna remaining sick at Xauxa. The strength of the returning army was between three and four thousand men; the official accounts say that they avoided an engagement with San Martin, but I have seen several private letters, and one from a citizen of the United States, who was two days in San Martin's camp, in view of the royalist troops, and who states that San Martin's force was much superior, and extremely anxious to give battle; but that San Martin retired, and permitted the unmolested march of the royalists into Callao. The motive of such a proceeding is generally deemed strange and incomprehensible; but it occurs to me that San Martin, being sure of eventually forcing the garrison of Callao, augmented as it is, to a capitulation, prefers to continue his influence by protracting the military conflict until the civil organization of this new-born republic shall be completed, rather than to put down the remnant of the royal troops, and leave the country to the agonies of conflicting factions; or, in a few words, to make himself, at his own choice, King, Dictator, or Director. He has at present taken the head of the civil and military power, with the title of Protector. All accounts agree in the enthusiasm for independence prevailing in Lima. On the late return of the royalist troops, it became necessary to imprison twelve hundred old Spaniards, as it is said, to preserve them from the popular fury. I have conversed on these events with several gentlemen well acquainted with Peru and Lima, and particularly with a sensible friar, native of, and, until recently, resident at Lima, who agrees in the general opinion that the return of the troops to Callao is a most fortunate event, inasmuch as it places the termination of the war in the hands of San Martin; whereas, had La Serna kept the country, and increased his forces, he might have continued the war for a very long time. I send enclosed a bulletin issued on the subject, by which you will be able to see and appreciate events in their detail.

Of this province I have only to say that there are still active but occult efforts making to overturn the present administration, and bring the Pueyrredon party into power.

Extracts of a letter from John M. Forbes, Esq., Agent of the United States at Buenos Ayres, to the Secretary of State, dated

NOVEMBER 13, 1821.

Since my last, we have the important news of the surrender of Callao. I send enclosed the bulletin published here, by which you will see the particulars of the capitulation. Private letters state that Canterac's army was much harassed on its retreat, and was still pursued. It is said that eight hundred of his army had joined that of San Martin. It was thought that there would not remain five hundred men to join La Serna. I have seen a private letter which states that when the report reached Lima of Canterac's approach, funds to the amount of five or six hundred thousand dollars were embarked on board the ships at Ancon. Lord Cochrane had been for some time making every exertion to procure money to pay off the crews of his ships, but without effect.

On hearing that this amount was on board the different transports, he repaired to Ancon with the O'Higgins and Esmeralda, and forcibly took possession of the whole sum, in defiance of the strong representations of the general, and immediately paid the arrearage due to his men. Report says that he has not dared to put his foot on shore since he took this violent measure.

NOVEMBER 16, 1821.

The "Registro Oficial," No. 13, published yesterday, contains the resolution of the honorable junta on the subject of general amnesty, and oblivion of political acts and opinions, together with a decree of the governor, by which all those who have been exiled under the special powers vested in the Executive by the decree of 6th of October, 1820, and all who have voluntarily absented themselves to avoid the evils of political agitation, may forthwith return without passports: only nine persons are excepted from this amnesty, and they are not named.

It is said that an officer has arrived here, sent by the Governor of Tucuman, charged to solicit military aid to deliver that province and its vicinity of the presence of the royalist troops, and at the same time to declare a perfect coincidence of opinion with that put forth by this Government on the subject of the confederation. Every thing continues to go on well here. Enclosed I send a printed paper entitled "Dictamen de un Arribeno," (which means citizen of the interior provinces.) It goes to maintain the inexpediency of a confederation at present, which is the ground taken by this province.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Prevost, Agent of the United States in South America, to the Secretary of State.

ST. JAGO DE CHILI, June 30, 1821.

In my last I mentioned the departure of Lord Cochrane from Huacho, with six hundred troops, for the purpose of landing them somewhere to the southward of the capital, so as to intercept the supplies from that quarter. It is now ascertained that his lordship has directed this force to a different point, with objects distinct from those contemplated by the general. After proceeding to Pisco, and pillaging that place, he went to Arica, where there was a considerable quantity of merchandise in deposite for the market of Lima, took possession of the town at the point of the bayonet, and as much of the moveable property as he could grasp. It is the third or fourth time different sections of the coast have been thus distressed by a mode of warfare injurious to the cause, always at variance with that strictly enjoined and as rigidly adhered to by the general. In addition to which, he has lately committed outrages upon the British flag, by impressing seamen, and by detaining the vessels from which they were taken, in order to use them as transports. These acts, of course, are disavowed by the Government; but they have given rise to a correspondence which threatened a serious result. Among other subjects, that of the blockade was introduced: the one insisting upon its nullity in toto, if contemplated to embrace any portion of the coast not covered by an actual force; the other denying the consequence, and maintaining the sufficiency of the force. Although this Government might have sustained the position assumed, by recurring to British practice, yet, in their situation, it was neither prudent nor justifiable to assume any equivocal grounds, particularly on such a subject; and I thought it proper, therefore, to present a note to the Secretary of State, asking the truth of the case, and stating specifically the principle to be recognised. No. 1 is a copy of mine, and No. 2 of that of the Director, written in our language and in his own handwriting. I had hoped [to have procured] the correspondence, but the delays are such here in all the public offices that I cannot avail myself of it for this opportunity; it is not now, however, important, except for the greater satisfaction of the President, inasmuch as an order has been issued in conformity with his note, and conveyed to Sir Thomas Hardy, who acquiesced in its propriety. There have been upwards of a dozen English merchantmen under capture, some of which have already been condemned.

Nothing has reached us from the army later than the 4th of May, when San Martin had resumed his former station at Ancon, within a few leagues of the capital. It is feared here that the absence of Lord Cochrane on the expedition I have already referred to may retard the views of the general, if not wholly defeat the object of his approach. Bolivar has sent a considerable force to Guayaquil, seven hundred of which have already landed at the place, from whence they are to march for the Congress of Quito.

Mr. Prevost to Mr. Joaquin de Echeveria, Secretary of State of the Republic of Chili.

SIR: ST. JAGO DE CHILI, June 18, 1821.

I understand that there is a letter in town from Sir Thomas Hardy, addressed to the British merchants of this place, in which it is stated that this Government considers the whole coast of Peru south of the capital as under blockade, although there is no force stationed before any one port except that of Callao. This information is so much at variance with the impressions I have uniformly received during my residence here, that I must believe some mistake has arisen either with my informant or with the British admiral.

Will you therefore allow me, sir, to ask from you the fact on this subject? It is a question of great moment, one of peculiar interest in the United States since our last contest with Great Britain, and one upon which I am anxious that there should exist no difference of opinion. The principle upon which the right of exclusion from any specific port is founded, is the temporary sovereignty acquired by the presence of the force of one belligerant, competent, as to the other, to control the mouth of such port or harbor. Hence, it is obvious that to the legal exercise of the rights growing out of the blockade the force must be permanent in its station.

There will offer a conveyance to the United States in a few days, of which I could wish to avail myself, as well to satisfy the President of the strict adherence to principles maintained by his excellency the Supreme Director, as to defeat the effect of rumors that must have a pernicious tendency at home.

J. B. PREVOST.

The Hon. JOAQUIN DE ECHEVERIA, Secretary of State of the Republic of Chili.

No. 2.

General O'Higgins to Mr. Prevost.

MY DEAR SIR: JUNE 23, 1821.

I am very much obliged to you for the indication which favors me with your note of this day. You might be sure of my resolution about the necessity of an actual force to be stationed at the sight of the ports that are to constitute the blockade. This very moment I am answering Sir Thomas Hardy about this point, declaring that must be considered as such to the ports from Pisco to Ancon, and orders will be despatched to the vice admiral, Lord Cochrane, and General San Martin, by the first safe conduct.

By next Tuesday's post to Valparaiso will be sent to you, by the Minister of State, all which has occurred about the matter; meanwhile, I remain yours, most sincerely,

B. O'HIGGINS.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Hogan, Commercial Agent of the United States at Valparaiso, to the Secretary of State, dated

AUGUST 18, 1821.

I have now the honor to inform you that, on the 13th instant, a despatch vessel arrived here from Callao, which place she left on the 23d ultimo, with advices to this Government of the surrender of Lima to General San Martin, and of the inhabitants having sworn to the independence of the place. On the 12th July the Spanish troops proceeded to the mountains with their general, who first placed a garrison of two thousand men in Callao, which place had not surrendered when the despatch came away, but could not be expected to hold out, as there was not more than a week's provision in the fortress, which was to be attacked by land and by sea from the squadron. The sufferings of the people in Lima for want of bread-stuffs and other food had been great; but there is no public gazette issued explanatory of the proceedings, and private letters are short and unsatisfactory. It is impossible to say to what extent they had carried their attachment to royalty, or rather their opposition to being conquered by the forces of Chili, whom they had even treated and considered as an inferior people, not entitled to the enjoyment of equal rights with themselves. To expect them to submit tamely to the dictation of this slip of country is, I believe, more than will be realized, although there can never be any doubt of the country of South America facing the Pacific ocean being forever free from the Government of Old Spain.

An additional export duty of fifteen per cent. is laid by this Government upon all articles shipped from this port for Lima; many vessels are in port ready to depart as soon as permitted. The Constellation was at Callao, and may (by report only) be expected here soon.

Mr. Prevost is expected from Santiago, to embark by the first vessel from Lima. I send this letter in duplicate by two ships bound this day to London, in the hope that either may be put on board of some vessel bound to the United States. I have also written to Mr. Rush by them, requesting he may communicate the information by the earliest opportunity.

Soon after my arrival here, I wrote to Captain Ridgely, requesting he would use his endeavors to inform you, by way of Panama, of the fall of that important section of South America, which I doubt not will be the first communication you will receive.

ACT OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF PERU.

IN THE ROYAL CITY OF PERU, July 15, 1821.

The señors who compose it having yesterday assembled in the most excellent Senate, with the most excellent and most illustrious señor the Archbishop of this holy Metropolitan Church, the prelates of the religious convents, titulars of Castile, and various neighbors of this capital, for the purpose of fulfilling what had been provided in the official letter of the most excellent señor the general-in-chief of the liberating army of Peru, Don José de San Martin, the contents of which were read; and persuaded thereof, reduced to what persons of known probity, learning, and patriotism, who inhabit this capital, would express if the general opinion for independence had been resolved on, which vote would serve as a guide to the said general for proceeding to take the oath: all the señors agreeing for themselves, and satisfied of the opinion of the inhabitants of the capital, said that the general will was decided for the independence of Peru of the Spanish dominion, and of any other foreign dominion whatever, and that they would proceed to its sanction by means of the corresponding oath; it was compared with a certified copy of this act to the same most excellent señor, and the señors signed it.

Mr. Brent, Chargé des Affaires of the United States at Madrid, to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MADRID, July 10, 1821.

The late session of the Cortes had far advanced when most of the deputies from Mexico arrived. They had been detained two months at Vera Cruz by the commander of the frigate Pronta, and were at last obliged to make the best of their way to Spain in foreign vessels, running every risk, and incurring great expense. They had not been long in Madrid when they began to press their claims; and on the 3d of May, Count Toreno, one of the most distinguished members of the Cortes of Old Spain, a friend, as is supposed, to their cause, made a motion in the Cortes that a special committee be appointed, composed of deputies of Ultramar and Europe, to consider of and propose, conjointly with the Executive, such measures as they should deem most proper "to terminate the dissensions prevailing in the various parts of America." This motion was agreed to, and the committee appointed.

While this committee were engaged in their important duties, the news was received, about the beginning of June, of the insurrection of Iturbide, and the form of government proposed by him to be adopted, (copy of which I transmit, marked A,) and, in consequence of a resolution offered by an American deputy, the ministers appeared on the 4th June before the Cortes, to give an account of the occurrences that had taken place in New Spain. The American deputies availed themselves of this occasion to show to the Cortes and Executive the impracticability of the provinces of America being governed as those of the Peninsula, according to the provisions of the constitution, on account of their great distance from the metropolis; proved the necessity of adopting prompt and efficacious measures, and pressed the Government and committee to come to an early decision. They then moved that the Government should be requested to direct, without delay, the Viceroy of Mexico to inform Iturbide that the Cortes were occupied in projecting a plan of government for America, and to propose a suspension of hostilities until the resolution should be finally made by the Cortes and Executive. It was stated that, should this step be taken, they were perfectly convinced that Iturbide, and those under his standard, would suspend hostilities the moment they knew that the deputies of New Spain had arrived at the capital in time to be able to make the "just reclamations of those Spaniards." This was not agreed to. A resolution was then offered and adopted, directing that the minister of Ultramar, "in consideration of the state of New Spain, should propose the measures he might think proper whilst the Cortes were occupied in taking radical ones for its complete pacification."

The committee labored with great assiduity, and had various conferences with the ministers, who, at first, coincided in the opinions advanced, and in the arrangement proposed by it to be adopted in regard to Spanish America, and which would have been satisfactory to the American deputies. When, however, it was laid before the King, he was strenuously opposed to it on the ground, as he informed them, that the arrangement contemplated would be a violation of the constitution; that the public opinion was not prepared for it; that it was against the interest, both of the Peninsula and America; and, finally, he spoke of the opposition that might be made to it by foreign Powers, since they had not been consulted. In consequence of this, the accord between the ministers and committee ceased; and as according to the resolutions of Count Toreno, which gave rise to the appointment of the committee, it was unauthorized, without the concurrence of the Executive, to offer any plan, none was proposed to the Cortes. The committee made their report to the Cortes on the 24th June, (copy marked B,) and state that the Government not believing that the moment had arrived of convenience and necessity for the adoption of certain measures, they can do nothing more than excite the zeal of the ministers, to the end that the wished-for moment may be accelerated, and recommend that the Executive should be pressed "to present to their deliberations, with the greatest despatch, the fundamental measures they may think proper, as well for the just and complete pacification of the revolted provinces of America, as to secure to all of them the enjoyment of a firm and solid happiness."

The disappointment and vexation of the American deputies at this result was proportionate to the flattering hopes that had been excited by the unanimity of sentiment that prevailed at the first conferences of the ministers and committee. They then determined to present, themselves, a plan to the Cortes, having the object in view; and the propositions (copy marked C) were made on the 25th June, which, in substance, are the same as those that had at first met the approbation of the ministers.

These propositions are, that there shall be three divisions made of America; in each a Cortes, having the powers delegated by the constitution to the General Cortes, with the exception of the 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th powers, that part of the 7th relative to the sanction of treaties, and the second part of the 27th power. In each division, a delegate appointed by the King from among the persons most distinguished for their high qualifications, not excludingmembers of the royal family, removable at his will, who shall exercise, in the name of the King, the executive power, to be inviolable with respect to the American Cortes, and only responsible to the King and General Cortes. In each, four ministers: of the interior, of finance, of grace and justice, and of war and marine. In each, a supreme tribunal of justice and a council of state. The commerce between the Peninsula and America to be considered as from one province to another; and the inhabitants of the latter to have equal eligibility with those of the former to all public employments.

New Spain binds herself to pay 200,000,000 reals in six years, and contribute annually 40,000,000 reals to the support of the navy; the other parts of America to contribute in the manner that shall be subsequently arranged. New Spain will also pay all the debt contracted within its territory; and all public property to belong to it. On the sitting of the 25th of June, two of the deputies offered an amendment to the fifth article, having for object to prevent the appointment of delegates being conferred on any of the royal family.

These propositions were preceded by an exposé read in the Cortes, a copy of which I transmit herewith. In it they state that "they desire the constitution which ought to make them happy, but which, in the actual state of things, they consider to be a beautiful theory, that can only be reduced to practice in the Peninsula. The Americans are freemen, are Spaniards, have the same rights as the Peninsulars; they are acquainted with and have sufficient virtue to support them."

The measures recommended by the committee (to request the Government to present a plan at an early period) have been acted upon, as you will perceive by the King's speech, in which he says that his Government, "urged by the Cortes to propose the measures they may think proper for their welfare, on a consideration of the state of those countries, will do so immediately, and with all possible generosity." These will, without doubt, be proposed on the meeting of the Cortes extraordinary, which the speech of the President of the Cortes to the King will have shown you is to take place. It is supposed that its convocation will not be delayed longer than the 1st of October, if so long.

You will perceive that the deputies do not demand an acknowledgment of independence, and pretend not even to aspire to it; and they have declared in the Cortes, on the 4th June, that, if the revolutionists desire independence, it is because means have not been devised that should make the welfare of those provinces compatible with their union with the Peninsula.

The commissioners of Bolivar, (who are still here,) on the contrary, insist upon the acknowledgment of their independence as the basis of any arrangement with Spain. Nothing has been concluded between them and this Government, and all negotiation is suspended.

It is difficult to conjecture what will be the determination of the Cortes and the Executive on this great and interesting question, when we consider, on the one hand, that they cannot be wholly blind to the just claims, the strength, and resources of America, and view, on the other, the prejudices and illiberality that still exist in a high degree in the Executive, and a great portion of the members of the Cortes, and the observation in the King's speech "that the Spaniards of both hemispheres ought to be persuaded there is nothing he desires so much as their felicity, founded in the integrity of the monarchy, and in the observance of the constitution."

As far as I have been able to form an opinion, it is, that the foreign Powers, during the agitation of the American question, have endeavored to prevent any arrangement between the parties.

On the 9th instant I received a note from Mr. Ravenga, one of the commissioners of Bolivar, requesting an interview with me, (copy marked D,) to which I immediately replied, (copy marked E,) stating that I would receive him that very evening.

In this interview he spoke of his mission to Spain. He said that, when he left Colombia, he had no idea of meeting with the least obstacle; he had calculated to a certainty that his object would immediately be accomplished.

He spoke of the ignorance of this country of the real state of Spanish America, of their illiberality, and their prejudices, with warmth, and particularly so of the expression of the King, in his speech, respecting Spanish America. He calculated, he said, upon the friendship of the United States to promote the independence of the republic of Colombia; he had a full conviction that he could rely upon it. Mr. Monroe, when Secretary of State, had informed him that all the ministers of the United States in Europe had instructions to advance the acknowledgment of their independence by foreign Powers.

I sympathized with him in the unpleasant situation in which he was placed, and feared that the sentiment in Spain was not as favorable as could be desired. He was perfectly justified, I said, in relying upon the good dispositions of the United States. It was their interest and their sincere wish that the acknowledgment of the independence of Spanish America should be accelerated. The United States had not only been more forward than any other Power in publishing to the world their wishes with respect to her, but had accompanied them with actions, which certainly afforded the best proof of their sincerity; and, among them, I adverted to the message of the President to the Congress of the United States at the commencement of its last session, in which, alluding to the proposed negotiation between the late colonies and Spain, the basis of which, if entered upon, would be the acknowledgment of their independence, he says: "To promote that result by friendly counsels, including Spain herself, has been the uniform policy of the Government of the United States."

The friendship of the United States, he said, was very grateful to the republic of Colombia, and he hoped and expected that, at the commencement of the next meeting of Congress, the acknowledgment of its independence would be decided upon; the moment had arrived when all the Powers of the world would see the propriety of it. He calculated that the United States would be the first to take this step; hoped to see a confederacy of republics throughout North and South America, united by the strongest ties of friendship and interest; and he trusted that I would use my exertions to promote the object he so much desired.

I heartily concurred with him in the hope that all Governments would resolve to adopt a measure so conformable to justice; joined with him in the agreeable anticipations of the progress of free principles of government, of the intimate union and brilliant prospects of the states of our new world. I presumed, I said, it was not necessary to bring to his mind the high interest felt by the United States in their welfare—an interest in which I deeply participated, and desired, as much as he possibly could, the happiness of our Spanish American brethren. What would be the determination of the United States at the period of the commencement of Congress, it was impossible for me to foresee; whether they would consider it a seasonable moment for doing that which was so much desired, was a point I could not resolve.

In this interview, Mr. Ravenga confirmed to me what I had previously learned, that his instructions do not authorize any terms short of the acknowledgment of independence. I observed to him that I presumed no arrangement would be made under them that might have an injurious bearing on the commercial interests of the United States. To this his reply was, that none would be entered into by the republic of Colombia with Spain that would not be perfectly reciprocal.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS L. L. BRENT.

Article. 1. The religion of New Spain is, and shall be, the Roman Catholic Apostolical, without tolerating any other.

2. New Spain is independent of Old Spain, and of every other Power, even on our continent.

3. Its Government shall be a moderate monarchy, according to a constitution peculiarly adapted for the empire.

4. Ferdinand VII. shall be Emperor; and if he do not come in person to Mexico to make oath before the Cortes within the time prescribed by them, the most serene infants Don Carlos, Don Francisco de Paula, the Archduke Charles, or some other branch of the reigning family, shall be appointed in his place by the Congress.

5. Until the meeting of the Cortes, there shall be a Junta which shall have their union for its object, and the compliance with this plan in its whole extent.

6. Said Junta, which shall be styled Governmental, must be composed of the deputies mentioned in the official letter of the viceroy.

7. Until Ferdinand VII's arrival in Mexico, and his taking the oath, the Junta will govern in the name of His Majesty, in virtue of the oath of fidelity taken by the nation; but until His Majesty hath sworn, any orders he may give shall be suspended.

8. If Ferdinand VII. should not deign to come to Mexico, the Junta or Regency shall govern in the name of the nation, until it be resolved who shall be crowned Emperor.

9. This Government shall be sustained by the army of the three guarantees, of which mention shall be made hereafter.

10. The Cortes shall resolve whether the Junta shall continue, or a Regency be substituted in its place, until the arrival of the person who is to be crowned.

11. The Cortes shall immediately establish the constitution of the Mexican empire.

12. All the inhabitants of New Spain, without distinction of Africans, Europeans, or Indians, are citizens of this monarchy, with eligibility to all employments according to their virtues or merits.

13. The person of every citizen and his property shall be respected and protected by the Government.

14. The clergy, secular and regular, shall preserve all their privileges and pre-eminences.

15. The Junta shall take care that every branch of the state remain without any alteration, and all the officers, political and ecclesiastical, civil and military, on the same footing as at present. They alone shall be removed who decline entering into this plan, substituting in their place those persons who are most distinguished for their virtue and merit.

16. A protecting army shall be formed, under the title of the three guarantees, because it takes under its protection, 1st. The preservation of the Catholic religion, co-operating, with all its efforts, that there may not be a mixture of any other sect, and attacking all the enemies who may injure it; 2d. The independence under the system already manifested; 3d. The intimate union of Americans and Europeans, guarantying such fundamental bases of the felicity of New Spain. Each individual, from first to last, will prefer sacrificing his life rather than permit the infraction of any of them.

17. The troops of the army shall observe the most strict discipline, according to their regulations, and the chiefs and officers shall remain on the same standing as at present, that is, in their respective classes, with eligibility to such public employments as are vacant, or may vacate in consequence of those who may not wish to follow their career, or any other cause, and those which may be considered as necessary or convenient.

18. The troops of said army shall be considered as of the line.

19. In the same light shall be considered those who may afterwards adopt this plan. Those who do not defer it, those of the former system of independence who shall immediately join said army, and the countrymen who may desire to enlist, shall be considered as troops of national militia; and the form of each for the interior and exterior security of the empire shall be dictated by the Cortes.

20. The employments shall be conceded to true merit, in virtue of references to the chiefs, and in the name of the nation.

21. While the Cortes are assembling, the proceedings against criminals shall be according to the Spanish constitution.

22. For conspiring against the independence, criminals shall be imprisoned until the Cortes decide the greatest punishment next to "lesa Majestad Divina."

23. A strict watch shall be kept over those who may attempt to create disunion, and they shall be reputed conspirators against the independence.

24. As the Cortes which are about to be installed are to be constituent, it is necessary that the deputies should receive sufficient powers to that effect, and, consequently, the electors ought to be informed that their representatives are to be for the Congress of Mexico, and not of Madrid. The Junta will prescribe just rules for the elections, and will fix the necessary time for them, and the opening of the Congress.

Since the elections cannot take place in March, the term shall be shortened as much as possible.

ITURBIDE.

IGUALA, February 24.

B.

The special committee, appointed to propose to the Cortes what it judges most conducive to put a stop in the most effectual manner to the disputes and dissensions which unfortunately prevail in the provinces of America, is duly penetrated with the importance of the charge, and desirous of corresponding to the confidence with which the Cortes has honored it. Few questions of such magnitude can be presented to the deliberations of a legislative assembly and to the resolves of a Government as that which at present occupies the attention of the Spanish Cortes; on their resolution and the wisdom of their measures depend the greatest events, perhaps the tranquillity of America, and the rapid civilization of the whole world. Spain seems destined to give to the world, from time to time, striking examples of grandeur, by turns heroical, or singularly original. The remote seas and regions discovered by her sons since the time of Columbus, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; the renowned valor and martial deeds (which border on the fabulous) of Cortes, Balboa, and Pizarro, did not suffice to their glory; nor that Sebastian del Cano, in his ship Victory, styled the Competitor of the Sun, should be the first to sail round the globe: to complete its measure, they added the arts, civilization, and the religion of their fathers; those vast regions participated of the benefits enjoyed in Europe, and the discoverers did not delay in making extensive to them the advantages derived from their own country. With what enthusiasm and pleasure (as we are assured by Inca Gacilaso) they assembled to enjoy in reciprocal union, and to spread, by their care and attention, over the whole country, the first productions of Europe! The laws relative to India are an eternal monument of the desire which always animated the Spanish Government that America should be treated with the same care and equality as the other provinces of Europe; they state that its natives shall be treated, favored, and defended as the other subjects of the Peninsula. From such just and prudent policy resulted the advantages which afterwards were derived. Cities were erected, which, for their population, beauty, and extension, rivalled the principal in Europe; their products served to augment the traffic and commerce of the whole world; the sons of America, with their talents and wisdom, enlightened the country of Manco Capac and Montezuma; and, not satisfied with spreading their knowledge over their native land, they have come to Europe to co-operate in the amelioration and prosperity of the Spains, it being conspicuous that many estimable deputies from thence, in the anterior and present Cortes, have taken an active and very principal part in the most important decisions. Such are the fruits which have been collected from the civilization and culture which Spain has succeeded in diffusing beyond the Atlantic, and from them are most evident the injustice and levity with which foreign writers have spoken of Spanish domineering in those regions. The disorders and injustice that there have been there have not arisen from the laws, nor from the interests, nor from the ambition of the metropolis, but from the men, the prejudices of the age, from the evils under which Spain herself groaned, and from the distance which always rendered null the responsibility of the governors. But, in spite of this, America continued faithful, and closely united with the mother country; the dissensions in Europe, the war of the succession, produced no desire to disturb interior tranquillity, or to effect a separation; neither was the glorious war for independence a sufficient motive: they succored us with their treasures; and it has been said, in honor and to the glory of America, that the principle of her revolt had a noble origin, similar to what impelled Spain to defend herself against a hostile irruption. When Andalusia was invaded in 1810, the greater part of our provinces were occupied by the enemy, our Government dispersed, and our armies nearly annihilated; the destiny of Spain was considered as decided, and her ruin inevitable. It would, indeed, have been difficult to imagine that, from an insulated extremity of the Peninsula, the nation would rise again not only independent, but regenerated and free. The Americans, mistrustful of their chiefs, feared that, being Europeans, they would desire to follow the destiny of Spain, whatever it might be; they, therefore, resolved not to submit to a foreign yoke, and preferred separating from the Peninsula to the indignity of obeying an unjust invader. This was the noble principle of the commotions in America; and, if any of her chiefs had motives less pure, he was obliged to dissemble, and cover them with the pretext of so just a cause.

The Spanish arms, in conjunction with their allies, having beaten and harassed the enemy in every direction, obliged him to evacuate the Peninsula. Such a happy state of affairs announced a speedy reconciliation with the revolted provinces of America; but all the hopes of those who loved their country were dispelled by the fatal decree of the 4th of May, and the execrable system which followed. The war continued to rage in many parts, and the passions, irritated to the highest degree, left but little prospect of a conclusion to such a destructive quarrel. Nevertheless, New Spain, or, more correctly, all Spanish North America, almost entirely quelled at that epoch, put a stop to this devastating warfare. A great part of Peru had constantly remained united to Spain; as also Cuba and the other islands. Thus, while Terra Firma, Buenos Ayres, and Chili presented the spectacle of Spanish and American blood spilled by the same hands whose interest it was to preserve it, the most important part of Spanish America was free from so much desolation. But this tranquillity does not suffice; though it should extend all over America, and be more durable, it is not sufficient to satisfy the lovers of humanity. America must fix her happiness on a more stable basis, which, instead of prejudicing, may add to that of Europe. The Cortes, soaring above the prejudices of some and the passions of others, must take such wise measures as shall entitle them to be considered worthy rivals of those Cortes who, upon a rock, and under the enemy's cannon, dictated laws at this day respected and obeyed by so many and such distant provinces. The committee, fully persuaded of this, discussed, in various conferences, the questions which appeared to it most proper to produce the great end to which we all aspire; it examined them conjointly with His Majesty's ministers, who at first entirely concurred with the opinions that were generally adopted. Peculiar circumstances have since obliged them, in some measure, to suspend their judgment, under the impression that the public opinion is not yet prepared for a definitive resolution. In this dilemma the committee can propose nothing to the Cortes; because, as it appertains to the Government to decide the question of fact, that is, the convenience and necessity of adopting certain measures, and Government not thinking the moment has yet arrived, the committee must confine itself to excite the zeal of the ministers, that they may accelerate the wished-for moment. Justice calls aloud for this: the precarious and uncertain destiny of so many Europeans, Spaniards established in those regions; the Americans likewise; the different tribes who have sustained by force of arms the cause of the metropolis; in fine, the true felicity of America and the Peninsula, call aloud for it. The happiness of America consists in a solid peace, guaranty of its future prosperity; that of Spain, in not meeting impediments at every moment, and not having its attention drawn off from its deliberations to make the provisions which such distant provinces require. The knowledge of the century, and an enlightened policy, must guide the Government in so new and glorious a resolution. The committee, possessed with the grandeur of the subject, and convinced that its decision may have some influence in the destiny of the universe, is desirous of communicating to all Spaniards its intimate conviction that they, on their part, may contribute to the happy termination of such an undertaking. Spain would derive advantages that otherwise she will not realize; and the ties of relationship and religion, united to commercial relations, and those which are derived from free institutions, would be the most certain pledge of our harmony and close union. The committee, therefore, not able of itself to determine on any thing, must confine itself to proposing that the zeal of the Government be excited so that it may present to the deliberations of the Cortes, without delay, the fundamental measures it may think proper, as well for the speedy and complete pacification of the revolted provinces of America, as to secure to them the fruition of a firm and solid felicity.

C.

Article 1. There shall be three sections of Cortes in America: one in the north, and two in the south. The first shall be composed of the deputies of all New Spain, including the internal provinces of Guatemala: the two other sections shall comprehend—the one, New Granada and the provinces of Terra Firma; the other, Peru, Buenos Ayres, and Chili.

2. These sections shall unite at the time appointed by the constitution for the ordinary Cortes, governing themselves, in every respect, according to the rules prescribed for these; and they shall have in their territory the same legal representation and powers, excepting the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth, which are reserved for the General Cortes; the part of the seventh relative to approving offensive and defensive treaties; and the second part of the twenty-third.

3. The capitals where these sections shall for the present unite are the following: The section of New Spain in Mexico; that of New Granada and Terra Firma in Santa Fé; and that of Peru, Buenos Ayres, and Chili, in Lima. If the sections, with the consent of the executive power of those countries, should think proper to change the seat of Government, they may select whatever place may appear best suited to their purpose.

4. There shall be in each of these divisions a delegation, to exercise in the name of the King the executive authority.

5. These delegations shall each be composed of one person, named by the will of His Majesty, selected from amongst men of the most transcendent talents, without excluding the members of the royal family. This delegate shall be removable at the pleasure of His Majesty: he shall be inviolable in regard to the sections of Cortes of those countries, and shall only be responsible for his conduct to His Majesty and the General Cortes. The ministers of this delegation shall be responsible to the respective sections of the Cortes, according to the constitution.

6. There shall be four departments: of the interior, of finance, of justice, of war and marine; some of which may be united, according as it may be judged convenient, in virtue of a law.

7. There shall be three sections of the supreme tribunals of justice, composed of a president, eight ministers, and an attorney general.

8. There shall be three sections of the council of state, each composed of seven individuals, but the legislative sections may at pleasure reduce their number to five.

9. The commerce between the Peninsula and America shall be considered as interior from one province of the monarchy to another; and, consequently, the Spaniards of both hemispheres shall enjoy in them the same advantages as their respective natives.

10. They shall likewise reciprocally enjoy the same civil rights and equal eligibility to employments and public offices as their respective natives.

11. New Spain and the other countries comprehended in the territory of their legislative section oblige themselves to deliver to the Peninsula the sum of two hundred millions of reals in the space of six years, which shall commence on the 1st of January, 1823, in order to contribute to the payment of the foreign debt, hypothecating the revenue of the state, and the lands that appertain, or may hereafter appertain, to it, in the above-mentioned New Spain and indicated territory.

The said two hundred millions of reals shall be paid by instalments; the first at the commencement of January, 1823, and thus, successively, in six posterior years, until its final liquidation, which will take place on the 1st January, 1828, so that thirty millions may be paid during each of the first four years, and forty during the two last. The term of these instalments may be curtailed, with the approbation of the legislative section that shall be established in New Spain.

12. New Spain and the other territories comprehended in her legislative section likewise bind themselves to contribute to the navy expenses of the Peninsula, with forty millions of reals annually. The payment of this sum shall commence from the time when the legislative section shall first assemble, and shall be delivered at furthest at the expiration of a year from that period: this sum shall be augmented when the circumstances of New Spain shall permit, and delivered, along with the other, specified in the preceding article, in some one of the ports belonging to New Spain in the Gulf of Mexico.

13. The rest of the countries of America comprised in the other sections shall contribute to the Peninsula in the manner that shall be hereafter fixed upon, and according to their circumstances.

14. New Spain takes upon herself the payment of all the public debt contracted in her territory, by order of her agents in her name and by her authority; the lands, revenues, and other property of the state, of whatever nature, without prejudice to what has been agreed upon in the eleventh article, shall be made over to her, to serve as an hypothecation of what has been stipulated in said article.

15. The deputies of the respective sections, at the time of taking the oath to observe, and cause to be observed, the constitution of the Spanish monarchy, shall add that of complying with and causing this law to be executed.

Manuel Torres, Agent and Chargé des Affaires of the Republic of Colombia, in the United States, to John Quincy Adams, Esq., Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 20, 1821.

The republics of Venezuela and New Granada, which, after a devastating war of more than ten years, have victoriously achieved the independence which they had declared since the year 1811, were united by virtue of a fundamental law of the Sovereign Congress of Venezuela, of the 17th December, 1819, with the glorious title of the Republic of Colombia, under which it has taken its rank among other independent nations.

In consequence, I have received the order of my Government to communicate to you, sir, this resolution worthy of Colombia, and to accompany it with the subjoined authenticated copy of the said fundamental law, in order that you may be pleased to lay it before the President of the United States.

I have also the honor to present to you, sir, the credentials of my public character, and a drawing of the national standard, which will henceforth distinguish Colombia among other sovereign and independent states.

Although the foundation of the republic of these United States would completely justify the right of Colombia, yet, with respect to the custom which has been introduced among nations, the causes which have rendered this measure indispensable have been explained in the declaration of independence of Venezuela, of the 5th of July, 1811, a copy of which Don Telesforo de Orea, then agent extraordinary of that republic, transmitted to your predecessor on the 6th of November of the same year: the other declaration of Venezuela, of the 2d of November, 1818, and the manifesto of the President of the Sovereign Congress of Colombia, of the 26th of August last, copies of which I sent you with my official letter of the 15th of last December, likewise mention them.

The conduct of Colombia being thus in all respects justified, no doubt my Government will be recognised by that of the United States as a free and independent nation, a sister republic, situated likewise in the same hemisphere. It is also hoped that, to the recognition of the independence of Colombia on the part of the United States, treaties of commerce and navigation will be added, founded upon the bases of reciprocal utility and perfect equality, as the most efficacious means of strengthening and increasing the relations of amity between the two republics.

As you are already acquainted with the solicitude of Colombia, permit me, sir, to add that it is of the greatest importance to my Government to know the determination of the United States in regard to it.

I repeat, sir, the homage of the sentiments of high respect and distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to remain, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

MANUEL TORRES.

Fundamental law of the Sovereign Congress of Venezuela, of the 17th of December, 1819, for the union of the Republics of New Granada and Venezuela, under the title of the Republic of Colombia.

THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

The Sovereign Congress of Venezuela, to whose authority the people of New Granada, lately emancipated by the arms of the republic, have voluntarily submitted, considering—

1. That, by uniting the provinces of Venezuela and New Granada in one republic, they will have the means of attaining the highest degree of power and prosperity;

2. That if they should remain in separate republics, however great the bonds that might unite them, yet, far from benefiting by so many advantages, with difficulty would they consolidate their sovereignty, and cause it to be respected;

3. That these truths, clearly perceived by every man of sound understanding and genuine patriotism, had excited the Governments of both republics to agree to their confederation, which the vicissitudes of war have heretofore prevented;

From these considerations of necessity and reciprocal interest, and in conformity with the report of the select committee of the deputies from New Granada and Venezuela, in the name and under the auspices of the Supreme Being, has decreed, and does decree, the following fundamental law for the republic of Colombia:

ARTICLE 1. The republics of Venezuela and New Granada shall be from the present day united, under the glorious title of the Republic of Colombia.

2. Its territory shall be those comprehended in the former captain generalship of Venezuela, and the vice-royalty of the new kingdom of Granada, embracing an extent of one hundred and fifteen thousand square leagues, whereof the exact boundaries shall be fixed at a more seasonable opportunity.

3. The debts contracted by the two republics, separately, are acknowledged in solidum by this law, as a national debt of Colombia, for the discharge of which the goods and property of the state are pledged, and the most productive of the revenue shall be destined.

4. The executive power of the republic shall be exercised by a President, and, in his absence, by a Vice President, both to be appointed pro tempore by the present Congress.

5. The republic of Colombia shall be divided into three great departments—Venezuela, Quito, and Cundinamarca, which shall comprehend the provinces of New Granada, whereof the name shall be henceforward suppressed. The capitals of these departments shall be the cities of Caraccas, Quito, and Bogota, the addition of Santa Fé being omitted.

6. Each department shall have a superior administration, and chief magistrate, to be appointed for the present by this Congress, with the title of Vice President.

7. A new city, bearing the name of the liberator, Bolivar, shall be the capital of the republic of Colombia. The plan and site thereof shall be determined by the first General Congress, upon the principle of making it suitable for the conveniences of the three departments, and proportioned to the grandeur for which this rich country is destined by nature.

8. The General Congress of Colombia shall assemble on the 1st day of January, 1821, in the town of Rosario de Cucuta, which, in every respect, is considered the most suitable place. The convocation shall be made by the President of the republic, on the 1st of January, 1820, who shall also communicate the plan for the elections, to be devised by a select committee, and approved by the present Congress.

9. The constitution of the republic of Colombia shall be formed by the General Congress, to whom shall be presented the projet of one already decreed, together with the laws enacted by this Congress, to be immediately carried into execution, by way of experiment.

10. The arms and flag for Colombia shall be decreed by the General Congress. In the mean time, those of Venezuela shall be employed, as they are known.

11. The present Congress shall dissolve on the 15th January, 1820, in order that the new elections may take place for the General Congress of Colombia.

12. A commission of six members, with a president, invested with special powers, to be decreed, shall occupy the place of Congress during its recess.

13. The republic of Colombia shall be solemnly proclaimed to the citizens and the armies with public feasts and rejoicings, to take place in this capital on the 25th December instant, commemorating the nativity of the Savior of mankind, under whose protection the state has been regenerated by this reunion.

14. The anniversary of this political regeneration shall be perpetually celebrated by a national feast, where virtue and talents, as formerly at Olympia, shall be distinguished and rewarded.

The present fundamental law for the republic of Colombia shall be promulgated in the settlements and armies, inserted in the public journals, and deposited in the archives of the cabildos, municipalities, and corporations, whether ecclesiastical or secular.

Given at the palace of the Sovereign Congress of Venezuela, in the city of St. Thomas of Angostura, on the 17th day of December, A. D. 1819, and in the ninth year of our independence.

REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

ANGOSTURA, 1820.

JUAN GERMAN ROSCIO, Vice President of the Department of Venezuela, and charged with the Government of the Republic, on account of the absence of the President on the campaign, and of the Vice President on commission.

Whereas it is important to the prosperity of Colombia, and to the dignity of that station to which it has been elevated, to establish diplomatic intercourse with other nations, and to make treaties which may confirm its friendship with them, regulate its commerce, and protect mutual interests; and this Government being desirous of drawing more close the relations and bonds of union and good correspondence which already happily exist with that of the United States: Therefore, I have nominated, and, by these presents, do appoint and authorize, Manuel Torres, Esq., that, in the rank and with the character of agent and chargé des affaires of the republic of Colombia, he present himself and treat with the said United States, and, conformably to the instructions which have been given him, to promote the interests and advantages of Colombia, by reconciling them with those of said States, upon the principles of the most intimate, frank, and sincere friendship.

Given at the palace of Government, at Angostura; signed by my hand, sealed with the provisional seal of the republic, and countersigned by the Secretary of State and Foreign Relations, the 15th of May, 1820.

JUAN G. ROSCIO.

By his excellency the Vice President of Venezuela, charged with the Government of Colombia:

JOSE R. RAVENGA,

The Minister of State and Foreign Relations.

[TRANSLATION.]

Don Manuel Torres to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, November 30, 1821.

Since I had the honor of addressing to you my official note of the 20th of February last, requesting of the President of the United States the formal acknowledgment of the independence of the republic of Colombia as a free, sovereign, and independent state, new successes have taken place, which, at the same time that they remove any well-founded obstacle which might at that time have been in the way of the Government of the United States to prevent their acceding to the wish of that republic, render now the said measure more urgent, and I might say indispensable, in consequence of the recent events in Peru and New Spain, and the conduct of the Spanish Government towards America, always unjust, and always capricious.

In compliance with the orders which I have received from the Minister of Foreign Relations, of date the 3d of August, in Cucuta, I hasten to communicate to you, sir, what has occurred in Colombia since the recommencement of hostilities with Spain, and to inform you of the real actual state of the republic, that you may be pleased to lay it before the President of the United States.

In conformity with the fundamental law of the 17th of December, 1819, the solemn act of the installation of the General Congress of the republic of Colombia, composed of representatives named by the people of the nineteen free provinces of New Granada and Venezuela, took place on the 6th of May last in the city of Rosario de Cucuta, as is shown by the official document No. 1, which I have the honor to enclose to you.

The General Congress being installed, one of the first measures which called the attention of the legislative body was the great question of the fundamental law; and, after long and elaborate debates, in which each member expressed his opinion with the greatest freedom, the union of New Granada and Venezuela into one body as a nation, under the express agreement of a popular representative Government, divided into legislative, executive, and judicial authorities, was adopted and sanctioned by a plurality of votes; and also the division of the territory of the republic into departments or circles, according to the evidence in No. 2.

The document numbered 3 is the manifesto which, on the 6th of June, the President of Congress addressed to the people and armies of the republic, notifying them of so important a measure; and No. 4 contains the fundamental law.

Whilst the Congress was engaged with patriotic spirit in discussing and making laws conducive to the correct administration of justice, to the regulation and management of the revenues, and to the promotion of public instruction in all the provinces and places of the state, the attention of the Liberator President was engaged in conducting an active war against the enemy, to expel them entirely from the territory of the republic. The arms of Colombia experienced once more the aid of a beneficent Providence, and they accomplished, at one blow, the entire destruction of the Spanish power in Venezuela, in the memorable battle of Carabobo, on the 24th of June.

The enemy lost their park of artillery, their baggage, their all, in their very intrenchments; and of more than six thousand men who were assembled at that military point, scarcely could a small number escape, who were able to retire within the walls of Porto Cabello.

The formidable fortress of Carthagena, and that of Cumana, also fell successively; so that Porto Cabello, in Venezuela, and the isthmus of Panama, in New Granada, are the only two points which the Spaniards for the moment occupy in all the vast territory of Colombia; and probably before the termination of the present year both will be incorporated with the republic.

Although the isthmus of Panama, from its scanty population, its absolute want of agriculture, and its situation, can contribute little or nothing to the increase or facility of the interior or exterior commerce of the new republic, still its occupation is of great importance to Colombia, under the view of its own future security and that of the rest of America, and from the great facility which the river Chagres affords for the commerce of Peru, and that of the provinces of New Spain which lie along the Pacific, since the distances, the dangers, and expenses of a navigation by Cape Horn are considerably diminished.

But it was not enough for the Liberator President to annihilate the formidable legions with which the Spaniards oppressed the country; it was also necessary to preserve good understanding and harmony among the inhabitants of Colombia, and to maintain among foreign nations the respect and reputation of the authorities of the republic which the agents of Ferdinand VII. have constantly defamed, by circulating, through the medium of the press, the most infamous falsehoods against them. He had no other means of realizing his object but exposing to the impartial world the perfidious conduct which the Peninsular Government had incessantly observed towards the Americans; and, to the incontrovertible manner in which he did so, by the proclamation which he addressed to the Spaniards on the 25th of April, from the city of Barinas, is partly due the success of the republican arms in Colombia and in Peru.

The inhabitants of Colombia, after eleven years of war, as unjust as cruel and destructive, guided by the genius of their Liberator President, have achieved the liberty and independence of their country without the least foreign aid; have given themselves a popular and representative Government, and a constitution well calculated to preserve the principles of liberty and equality, and to promote the general prosperity.

With respect to the ability and capacity of Colombia to maintain its independence, no well-founded doubt can arise upon that point, if we consider on one hand the great population of the republic, which exceeds 3,600,000 souls, the extent of its territory, its natural and artificial resources, and its situation; and, on the other, the great military talent displayed by its generals and officers, and the discipline and valor manifested by its troops on all occasions, but particularly in the celebrated battles of Boyaca and Carabobo, in the capture of St. Martha, defended by seventeen exterior batteries, all taken by assault, and the reduction of the fortresses of Carthagena and Cumana.

Some idea may be also formed of the degree of splendor, power, and future prosperity of the new republic, by considering it placed in the centre of the universe, with an extent of coast of twelve hundred miles on the Atlantic, from the Orinoco to the isthmus of Darien, and of seven hundred miles on the Pacific ocean, from Panama to Bahia de Tumbez, and exempt, at all seasons, from any of those dreadful hurricanes which cause such disasters in the Antilles, in the Gulf of Mexico, and in other places.

The great canals which are formed by the river Orinoco and its tributary streams, the Sulia, with the lake of Maracaibo, the Magdalena, the Cauca, and the Atrato, which all empty into the Atlantic, render Colombia the most favored part of the universe for interior navigation; and, by a union of all climates, unite also, in great abundance, the productions of the three kingdoms of nature.

Agriculture is further advanced in Colombia than in any other part of continental America, formerly Spanish; and its products of exportation, which consist chiefly of cocoa, coffee, indigo, tobacco of Barinas, and some cotton, are of a quality superior to those of other countries, except the cotton. With respect to the precious metals, Colombia is inferior neither to Mexico nor Peru, with the advantage that their discovery is more easy and less expensive. She also unites, by prolonged canals, two oceans which nature had separated; and, by her proximity to the United States and to Europe, appears to have been destined by the Author of Nature as the centre and the empire of the human family.

Under these auspices it was that the new republic took her rank among other free, sovereign, and independent nations, and that I had the honor, in my note to you, sir, of the 20th February last, to solicit the recognition of her independence on the part of the President of the United States; which request I repeat anew in this.

The glory and the satisfaction of being the first to recognise the independence of a new republic in the south of this continent belongs, in all respects and considerations, to the Government of the United States; and this recognition would be, after all, but a measure which the humanity, the justice, and the convenience and interest of this nation demand.

Reduced as Spain is to an absolute inability to continue the war, her pride wishes an opening, perhaps, to meet with a pretext for making her peace with the Americans, and nothing would better answer her purpose than the recognition of the independence of Colombia by the Federal Government.

On the other hand, if the war between Spain and Colombia must continue, the law of neutrality of the United States would operate with equality with respect to both belligerants, which was not and cannot be the case whilst this Government does not recognise the independence of the new republic. Lastly, between the United States and Colombia there can never exist a competition or rivalship in agriculture, commerce, and navigation, because Colombia has no mercantile navy, nor can she form one for many years, and the products of exportation of her agriculture are entirely different from those which are cultivated in the United States. She wants annually twenty thousand barrels of flour and other provisions from these States, for which she pays in coffee, indigo, hides in the hair, and in money, according as the intercourse between the two countries is favorable to the agriculture of both.

The political events of Peru and Mexico render the recognition of the independence of Colombia urgent, on account of the great confidence with which this act would inspire those nations to establish popular representative Governments. All South America formerly Spanish is emancipated—that is, upwards of eleven millions of souls; this has given a new importance to the new world, and now they are no more afraid of the machinations of the Holy Alliance to keep America dependant upon Europe, and to prevent the establishment of free Governments.

The present political state of New Spain requires the most earnest attention of the Government of the United States. There has occurred a project, long since formed, to establish a monarchy in Mexico, on purpose to favor the views of the Holy Alliance in the new world; this is a new reason which ought to determine the President of the United States no longer to delay a measure which will naturally establish an American alliance, capable of counteracting the projects of the European Powers, and of protecting our republican institutions. My Government has entire confidence in the prudence of the President, in his disposition to favor the cause of the liberty and of the independence of South America, and his great experience in the management of public business.

Confined for about three months past to my bed or my chamber by a grievous indisposition, which still gives me very few moments of repose, it has not been in my power to address this communication to you sooner.

I have the honor to remain, with the highest respect and distinguished consideration, sir,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

MANUEL TORRES.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, December 30, 1821.

The General Congress of the Republic of Colombia, in the session of the 6th of September, appointed the liberator and captain general, Simon Bolivar, President of the State, and General Francisco de Paula Santander, Vice President, for the constitutional term of four years; and on the 3d of October they took possession of their respective magistracies, after having taken the oath prescribed by the constitution.

The functions of the executive power devolved, from the 10th of said October, on the Vice President of the State, agreeably to the 158th article of the constitution, in consequence of the Liberator President having taken the command of the armies of the republic.

The Supreme Government has fixed its residence in the city of Bogota, in virtue of a decree of the General Congress of the 8th of the same October; and, by another decree of the Liberator President of the 7th, the Señor Pedro Gaul has been appointed Secretary of State and Foreign Relations of the Government of Colombia.

I communicate this to you, sir, that you may be pleased to communicate it to the President of the United States.

I renew to you, sir, the sentiments of respect and distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to remain, &c.

MANUEL TORRES.

Don Manuel Torres to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, January 2, 1822.

In the official note which I addressed to you on the 20th of February of the last year, soliciting the recognition of the republic of Colombia on the part of the President of the United States, I represented how important it was to my Government to know the determination of the United States respecting the said demand.

In that which I had the honor to transmit to you dated the 30th of November last, I repeated the substance of that of the 20th of February, and I suggested some additional powerful reasons which urgently required the positive knowledge of the decision of the President of the United States in regard to a question of so much importance to my Government in the present circumstances, for the regulation of its political and commercial relations with other nations.

I ought not to conceal, sir, my pain in being compelled to distract your attention by requesting once more an answer to my former notes. This course, under all circumstances an indispensable duty of my station, has been rendered the more urgent by the negotiations of peace between Colombia and Spain having lost all their importance in consequence of the Peninsular Government tenaciously persisting in its extravagant and unjust pretensions, at the very time of its most absolute incapacity and impotence to invade the territory of the republic, or to prevent the prosperity which its inhabitants now begin to enjoy—a blessing of the independence which they have gained by their arms, and of the liberty which their constitution secures to them.

The present state of my health does not yet permit me to visit the capital; but I shall do so as soon as I can undertake the journey without inconvenience.

Be pleased, sir, to accept the homage of the sentiments of esteem and distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.

MANUEL TORRES.

The Secretary of State to Don Manuel Torres.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, January 18, 1822.

In reference to your letters of the 30th of November last and the 2d of this month, I have the honor of informing you that the subject to which they relate is under the consideration of the President of the United States, whose definitive decision concerning it shall, when taken, be forthwith communicated to you. In the mean time, should you receive advices of the surrender of Porto Cabello and the isthmus of Panama, I have to request you would favor me with the information of those events as early as may suit your convenience.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

To the Secretary of State of the United States of America.

SIR: MEXICO, October 25, 1821.

The love of my country, the spring of every noble and generous action, induces me to communicate to you, for the information of the President, and for the benefit that may result to the Government and citizens of the United States, the following circumstantial and exact account of the happy revolution that has lately occurred in this kingdom of New Spain, which, by the blessing of God, the intrepidity, talents, and exertions of its patriotic chief, General Don Augustin Iturbide, the enlightened policy of its mother country, and the liberal and philanthropic ideas of its late captain general, Don Juan O'Donojú, has ended in its complete and entire emancipation.

That you may have a clear and distinct view of the subject, be fully impressed with the justice of the cause of this hitherto afflicted and oppressed people, and have also a general idea of the face of the country, its inhabitants, productions, &c., it may not be improper to state that, since its conquest, (which, if my memory serves me, was in the year 1521,) it has been governed by sixty-two viceroys, and innumerable commandant generals, governors, and superintendents of provinces, who, according to general tradition, have been, with very few exceptions, as many merciless and mercenary tyrants, the rapacity and unfeeling barbarity of whom nothing could have withstood for such a length of time but a land enriched by the beautiful hand of nature to a most extraordinary degree, and a people born and brought up, until of late, in all the intolerance of superstition and ignorance, and accustomed from their earliest infancy to the innumerable, and I may say almost incredible impositions of both church and state.

Few foreigners have, perhaps, had an opportunity of seeing as much of the kingdom as myself, having travelled on horseback from the port of Guaymas, on the Gulf of California, to almost every part of Sonora, and afterwards through the provinces and superintendencies of New Biscay, New Galicia, San Luis Potosi, Queretaro, and Mexico, to this city, a distance at least of seven hundred leagues, passing through all the principal cities, visiting the most celebrated mines, and conversing familiarly with all classes of people.

The provinces of Puebla, Mexico, Mechoacan, San Luis Potosi, and Guanajuato, may be termed the central ones, and, of those I have seen, the best watered, most fertile, most productive, and most inhabited; those that border on the Gulf of Mexico are Merida de Yucatan, Oaxaca, Vera Cruz, New Santandero, and Texas; the second, from all accounts, beautiful in the extreme; and the third and last very fertile, but almost entirely uncultivated: those on the Pacific ocean and Gulf of California, New Galicia, Sinaloa, and Sonora, fertile in parts, but very scant of water; and the extensive internal ones of New Leon, New Biscay, and New Mexico, that reach to the latitude of forty-two degrees north, which have for the most part the same defect, and which may be called a general one throughout the kingdom, there being in most parts but little rain, and in no part, excepting Texas, what we would call rivers. Where there is an abundance of water, however, the country is wonderfully fertile, producing in many parts two or three crops a year, and yielding each time four and five hundred for one, with the singular advantage of a diversity of temperature within very short distances, produced by the greater or less elevation of the lands, the centre of the kingdom being from eight to twelve thousand feet above the level of the sea; so that it is not uncommon to see in the same market all the fruits, grains, and other productions of temperate, hot, and cold climates, as is the case in this, and most of the principal cities.

Before the insurrection of the year 1810, the kingdom contained six millions of inhabitants; and it is worthy of remark, that Providence has been no less lavish in the distribution of her gifts as respects mankind, than in the fertility and production of the earth; the natives of this country, not excepting even the Indians, being endowed with a quickness of perception and ability to acquire and make themselves masters of the arts and sciences that is very notable, and far exceeds that of the inhabitants of Old Spain, and perhaps many other countries. At the above-mentioned period, the kingdom may be said to have been at its acme of prosperity; the royal revenue exceeding $20,000,000, and the money coined at the mint of this city upwards of $28,000,000 annually; it has, however, ever since been on the decline, in consequence of the devastations committed by both parties in the long and cruel war carried on between the Europeans and Americans, so that the population cannot now be computed at more than four millions, the revenue at more than half of what it was, and the money coined yearly at from 5,000,000 to $8,000,000; this year it will probably not exceed $4,000,000.

I have been informed that a very correct history of this insurrection, up to the unfortunate expedition of General Mina, has been written by a Mr. Robinson, and published in Philadelphia; it is useless, therefore, to say more on the subject than that its commencement was undoubtedly caused by the abuses daily committed in all branches of the Government in this kingdom, by the disorder in which Spain was thrown in consequence of the invasion of the French, and by the imprudent measures adopted in this city, one of which was the arrest of the Viceroy Iturigaray, and many of its principal American inhabitants. It is also worthy of remark that, in proportion as it was prolonged, the evils increased, and its symptoms became more malignant; the various incidents of the struggle, imbruing its character with blood, produced other passions, and among them those of rancor and hatred, which, irritated and inflamed by the inconsideration, imprudence, and want of policy on both sides, divided the kingdom into two parties, the Europeans and Americans, whose respective opinions formed essentially the war that destroyed both.

Among those that contributed most to quell the insurrection was the before-mentioned General Don Augustin Iturbide, then colonel of the regiment of Celaya, and native of the city of Valladolid, in the province of Mechoacan. Born of European parents, and animated by a mistaken zeal, he was induced to embrace the royal cause, and, with a fervor and impetuosity peculiar to his character, committed many arbitrary and violent acts, that in a great degree tarnished what would otherwise have been deemed brilliant achievements, and over which it is necessary to draw a veil, his subsequent conduct having entirely effaced them from the memory even of those most aggrieved. Indeed, it would appear that a sense of the injustice he had committed, an innate conviction of the impropriety of adhering to the party he had espoused, and a remorse of conscience, were the principal causes of the change in his political sentiments; for we see him all at once assuming a different character, and at a moment when his sovereign had heaped upon him innumerable honors.

The impossibility of re-establishing peace and quietness in the kingdom by the force of arms was fully ascertained during the viceroyalty of the Captain Generals Venegas and Calleja, of whom it may be said that they rather dispersed than conquered the Americans, the country being in a complete state of revolt, and full of chieftains that commanded from three to six hundred, and even a thousand men each, and bands of robbers that infested the highways in September, 1816, when the Viceroy Apodaca arrived. To this disinterested, good, and virtuous man is due the pacification of the kingdom; his penetration, skill, and humanity having suggested to him the propriety of laying aside the arms that had hitherto been in use, and of winning the affections of the people by means of persuasion, pardons, and premiums, who, without general officers, money, or any immediate expectation of establishing the liberty of their country, and weary of the wandering and wretched life they had so long endured, embraced readily the opportunity that presented of returning to the bosoms of their families. No sooner was the plan adopted than its wisdom became palpable; entire towns and districts yielding to the solicitations of the agents appointed by the Government for carrying it into execution, so that at the end of two years all was tranquillity, and you could travel in every direction without escort of arms, except that of Acapulco, between which and this city the chieftains Guerrero, Asensio, and a Colonel Bradburn, of Virginia, that came with General Mina, with about fifteen hundred men, had taken refuge, and fortified an almost inaccessible mountain, from whence they made predatory excursions. To reduce these to obedience was the ultimate object and wish of the Government; and, with this view, General Iturbide was invested with the important military command of the department of the south, that contained about three thousand veteran troops, and had its head-quarters in the town of Iguala, distant about thirty leagues from this city, on the direct road to Acapulco. It is proper to mention here that, a few months previous to his nomination, news had been received of the regeneration of Old Spain, and of the establishment of the constitution in that country—a circumstance that created great alarm in this among the clergy and friars; the lower class of people were also taught to believe that the planting of it here would be attended with the entire destruction of their long-established form of religion.

The viceroy, (Apodaca,) who was now graced with the title of "Conde del Venadito," was also opposed to the new system, and discovered so much reluctance in the change of his measures, that his unwillingness and tardy mode of proceeding became evident to all, and gave occasion to many just and violent complaints that were made by its admirers, who publicly accused him of its infraction; while the American writers, taking advantage of the liberty of the press, and the confused and unsettled state of public opinion, called aloud for independence as the only certain remedy for the numerous evils that surrounded them.

The crisis was too important and obvious to escape the penetration of our hero, Iturbide, who was also instigated to an immediate execution of the plan he had, in consequence, formed, of liberating his country forever from its thraldom, by the mutiny of several of the officers of the regiment of the "four military orders," that had before given many unequivocal proofs of disaffection and insubordination, which was supposed to extend to the soldiers of that corps, and by the departure of a convoy for Acapulco with near a million of dollars, that was intended to be embarked in a ship bound to Manilla, that he resolved on detaining. He immediately, therefore, concerted his measures with the clergy and friars, and, with the specious pretext of upholding them in their privileges and immunities, secured their favor and protection. He also communicated his design to such of the governors of the provinces as he thought likely to aid him in the execution of it, and, on his arrival in Iguala, persuaded a great part of the troops under his command to join him in the undertaking, in the belief that the Government secretly favored it—a circumstance that they at first readily gave credit to, from their knowledge of the anti-constitutional sentiments of its leading members, but in which they were soon after undeceived, and, in consequence, not more than a thousand remained faithful of those that espoused his party. The design was also made known to Guerrero, Asensio, and Bradburn, who pledged themselves to support him in the enterprise; and, thus prepared, he openly declared the independence of the kingdom, swearing it in the most solemn manner at the head of his army, in the said town of Iguala, on the 24th day of February last, seizing, at the same time, and appropriating to the use of the nation, the treasure destined for the Manilla ship.

His next step was to form a plan for the installation of the new Government, (a copy of which I enclose,) and to give to his army the style and title of the "army of the three guarantees," from the protection it was to afford to the Catholic religion, to the independence of the kingdom, and to the indissoluble union between the Europeans and Americans. A copy of the plan was immediately sent by him to the viceroy, with a letter, stating all that had passed, explaining his motives for having formed and adopted the new system; inviting him and the Government to aid and assist in its establishment; and, finally, naming the said viceroy, the "Conde de Cortina," and the president of the royal audience, the members that were to compose the regency, reserving to himself the command that he had assumed of the national army.

The viceroy, had he been left to himself, would, I believe, have assented to the proposal, from the vehement desire he has ever manifested to avoid the effusion of blood, and the miseries concomitant to a renewal of the war, as well as from the conviction that the plan and policy adopted by Iturbide could not fail to gain him innumerable friends, and to enable him, finally, to accomplish his views. It was necessary, however, to call to his counsel the members of the various tribunals of which the Government was composed, as well as the principal military officers, all of whom, counting on the versatility that had been conspicuous in the American character up to that period, resolved, unanimously, to maintain the then existing Government, in the belief that the few troops that had adhered to Iturbide would leave him the instant the royal army should approach Iguala.

The old favorite system of blood and murder was also upheld; but to this the viceroy would not consent, and an amnesty was offered to all, not excepting Iturbide. The Field Marshal Linan was named commander-in-chief, and a numerous staff and army was committed to his charge. He was, however, so slow in his motions, that a detachment of troops sent by Iturbide had taken possession of the town and castle of Acapulco, and he himself, and the remainder, were on their march in the direction of Valladolid before the army of Linan moved from its cantonment in the neighborhood of this city.

The cry of independence was no sooner raised in Iguala than it spread in all parts, and an army was formed in the provinces of Puebla and Vera Cruz, by the Colonels Herrera, Bravo, and Santa Ana, that took possession of the cities of Orizaba, Cordova, and Xalapa; which was a most important conquest, the two former being the depots of the Government tobacco, of which a prodigious quantity fell into the hands of the Independents, with a large sum in specie—circumstances that were attended with the double advantage of being a powerful succor to them, and an irreparable loss to the Government, which counted on the remission to, and sale of, the tobacco in Mexico as its principal means of supporting the war.

In this state of things, it was resolved to divide the Government army into three divisions: one of which, under the command of Colonel Margues, was to retake Acapulco; another, commanded by Colonel Hebia, to march against the cities of Orizaba, Cordova, and Xalapa; and the third to return for the defence of this capital, on the supposition that Iturbide might suddenly change his route, and take the city by surprise. It, however, soon appeared that his intention was very different, and that his object was to pass Valladolid, and unite with a Colonel Bustamente, of San Luis Potosi, who had risen at this critical period, and proceeded against the city of Guanajuato with a considerable part of his regiment of dragoons, declaring independence in all the cities and towns in the Bajio, the inhabitants of which received him with open arms. On arriving at Guanajuato, it also surrendered to him; and, as he was joined by the garrisons of the several places he passed through, Iturbide, on meeting him, found himself at the head of an army of five thousand men, including the divisions of Colonel Barragan and Major Parres, that left Valladolid with what troops they could seduce, as soon as they knew of his intention to pass that way. With this respectable force it was determined to attack that city, which was the best fortified of any in the kingdom, and had a garrison of seventeen hundred men. It however made no defence, and its commandant, Colonel Quintanar, and all but about six hundred of the troops, went over to Iturbide.

At Guanajuato, where is one of the richest minerals in the kingdom, a mint was established, that proved afterwards very serviceable to the Independents, and injurious to the royal party; the silver from all the neighboring mines taking the direction of that city instead of Mexico.

Acapulco remained but a short time in possession of the Independents, the castle having capitulated before the arrival of the division of Colonel Margues to two Spanish frigates that accidentally arrived there from Panama. San Juan del Rio, a fortified town between this city and Queretaro, was next invested; the siege, however, lasted but a few days; the greater part of the garrison, being Americans, deserted, and joined the Independents, obliging the few that remained to capitulate.

The division of Colonel Hebia that had marched, as before stated, against the cities of Orizaba, Cordova, and Xalapa, surprised Colonel Bravo, with about fifteen hundred Independents, in the town of Tepeaca, about nine leagues from Puebla, who, unprepared for action, retired with his troops to a large convent of the order of San Francisco, that was constructed by Hernando Cortez, soon after the conquest, in the form of a fortress, to serve as a place of refuge for him and his followers in the event of any sudden emergency. Hebia had with him his own regiment of "Castile," and other European troops, that equalled in number those of Bravo. A field-piece was, however, necessary to make a breach in the wall of the convent, and, to obtain this, he sent immediately to Puebla, asking, at the same time, for a reinforcement of five hundred men, that the success of the action might be placed beyond all doubt. Bravo, suspecting his intention, resolved on a sortie, with the determination to cut his way and escape, as Iturbide had given positive orders to all his officers to avoid the effusion of blood, and to act solely on the defensive, from the double motive of conciliating the enemy and avoiding the butchery of his countrymen; sensible where one European should be killed, four or five Americans would fall, the number of the latter in the King's service exceeding greatly that of the former. In the first and second attempts he made, he was unsuccessful; the third, however, proved more fortunate, and he got off with the loss of fifty or sixty men, killing as many of those that were opposed to him.

This was the first action that had occurred, and the result proved highly important to the independent cause; the gallant conduct of their troops inspiring a universal confidence, animating their companions in arms throughout the kingdom to a singular and unexpected degree, and demonstrating to the political and military officers of the Government of Mexico that they had to contend with a brave and determined enemy.

Disappointed and chagrined at the result of the action, and undeceived as to the sort of troops he had to deal with, Hebia proceeded on his march to Cordova, where he was killed in the first assault, and his army obliged to retire from the siege by Colonel Herrera, and the valiant troops that defended the city. While these scenes of glory were achieving in the provinces of Puebla and Vera Cruz, the siege of the city of Queretaro, one of the most beautiful in the kingdom, and the third in rank as respects size, opulence, and commerce, was pushed with much vigor by Iturbide in person. Its garrison was composed of nine hundred Europeans, draughted from various regiments, and about six hundred Americans, all under the command of Brigadier General Loaces, a native of the kingdom of Peru, colonel of the regiment of Saragossa, and a brave and experienced officer. He had determined to make a vigorous and desperate defence; and, as the fate of the kingdom depended in a great measure on that of this city, the Government resolved to abandon that of San Luis Potosi, and to succor Queretaro with the European regiment of Zamora that was stationed there. The order to this effect was no sooner despatched than Iturbide knew of it, and concerted measures to surprise the troops on their march, which were so well executed that they found themselves surrounded when they least expected it by a body of three times their number, and compelled to surrender at discretion. This happy occurrence for the Independents was a deathblow to the Government, who found itself at once deprived of the important capital and province of San Luis Potosi, that were immediately occupied by the Independents, and without the means of contributing to the relief of Queretaro, which capitulated shortly after; the American part of the garrison joining Iturbide, as usual, and the Europeans going on parole to Celaya, until such time as they could be transported to the Havana. These troops, to their eternal disgrace, proposed afterwards to their colonel to rise and march to Mexico; but he, like a man of honor, sent the letter to Iturbide, who immediately ordered them to be disarmed and dispersed.

The next action of any importance was in the neighborhood of Toluca, fourteen leagues from the city, between the regiment of Fernando VII., commanded by Colonel Castillo, and a body of the Independents of an equal number, under the orders of Colonel Filisola, which was indecisive, both parties claiming the victory, after an obstinate battle, in which more than two hundred were left dead on the field, and the Independents in possession of two cannon, that their opponents were obliged to abandon.

At this period, General Negrete, commander of the troops in the province of Guadalaxara, rose with the whole of his army, obliged the commandant, General Don José de la Cruz, to fly from the capital of that name, where, and in all other parts of the province, independence was sworn; the commerce of the port of San Blas was also declared free to all nations. Cruz took the road leading to the internal provinces, with the intention, it was said, of uniting with Brigadier Don Joaquin Arredondo, commandant general of the eastern provinces, of raising an army in union with him, and of returning, either to reconquer his own province, or to the aid of that of Mexico. Arredondo had, however, already caused independence to be sworn throughout his district, and, on hearing this, Cruz made a halt in the city of Zacatecas, but, being pursued by Negrete, fled to Durango, the capital of the province of New Biscay, carrying with him a large sum in specie that he found in the treasury at Zacatecas, which city soon after surrendered to a detachment that was sent against it by the commandant of San Luis Potosi.

On the death of Hebia, the command of the regiment of Castile devolved on Lieutenant Colonel Luna, who, on the fall of Queretaro, was ordered to return to Mexico by forced marches, in the expectation that Iturbide would now attack the capital. Similar orders were also sent to Colonel Margues, in whose division was a principal part of the insubordinate regiment of the "four military orders." The male inhabitants of Mexico, from the age of sixteen to fifty, were also ordered to enrol themselves in the militia, without exception or distinction of persons, and every possible precaution was taken to prevent a surprise and maintain the city until such time as an answer should be received to despatches that had been sent to Spain, or troops should arrive that were expected from the Havana.

All this, however, was not sufficient to allay the rancor that a certain part of the community had conceived against the viceroy, nor to convince them of his upright intentions, or extinguish the sparks of insubordination I have already hinted at in some of the European troops, which, from the first, was more immediately directed at his person than at the Government. A report was, therefore, industriously circulated that he was in secret correspondence with Iturbide, and that there was no real intention to defend the city, notwithstanding the preparations that were ostensibly making for its protection: the whole a prelude to the scandalous revolution of the 5th of July, which had for its object the arrest of that most excellent man, and, without doubt, was accomplished by dint of money paid by the merchants to the officers that took part in the affray, who had the temerity to secure the persons of their colonels and other principal military men opposed to their project, to assault the palace and make a prisoner of the viceroy, and afterwards the audacity to place against its gates and the corners of the principal streets, for the information of the public, who were so many witnesses of their atrocity, a paper setting forth that he had of his own accord, and at the respectful petition of the officers of the European regiments, delivered the political and military command of the kingdom to Field Marshal Don Francisco Novella, the person they had pitched upon as the leader of the faction.

This gentleman had under his command the various corps of artillery and engineers that existed in the kingdom; and as his education and occupation until now had been altogether confined to that line, you will readily imagine him entirely unfit for the discharge of the arduous and complicated duties of viceroy of these extensive provinces.

Indeed, he himself was sensible of his incompetency, and very prudently declined the offer; as unsuitable, however, as he was, there was no other person they could avail themselves of that was less so, and the same necessity that compelled them to name him obliged him to accept the appointment. From a Government constituted by the insubordination of a few soldiers that had the vanity to compare their iniquitous conduct with the noble enthusiasm of the Spanish nation, which, tired of obeying tyrants that abused the goodness of their monarch, rose in a mass to recover the rights of which they had unjustly been deprived, no good was to be expected; and we see it employed from its very commencement in destroying the constitutional regimen, of which it did not leave a vestige, and in substituting the most arbitrary and tyrannical system that it is possible to imagine; all of which was fomented and sanctioned by a body that Novella had created, with the denomination of the "Junta Consultiva," composed of a few individuals who had contributed with their money to place the power in his hands, were furious at seeing approach the expiration of their authority, and with sentiments diametrically opposed to the system of liberality and philanthropy at present predominant.

At the time these scenes of horror were transacting in the capital, and to which I myself had like to have been a victim, notwithstanding the great prudence I observed in my deportment, a bloody occurrence took place in Vera Cruz in consequence of the storming of that city by a party of troops commanded by an inconsiderate but brave young officer named Santa Ana, who scaled the walls and got complete possession of the town, but was afterwards obliged to retire with great loss, his soldiers having abandoned their arms with a view to plunder, and the inhabitants setting upon them when in that defenceless state.

The city of Puebla de los Angeles, the largest in the kingdom except Mexico, next attracted the attention of General Iturbide, in front of which was a large army of Independents composed of the divisions of the Conde de la Cadena, Herrera, Bravo, Filisola, and others, that only awaited the orders of their general to make the attack, and to prevent which, and the loss of many valuable lives, he went in person, preferring, in all cases, the plan he had from the first adopted of reducing his enemies by means of persuasion and negotiation rather than by force of arms. The fate of Puebla was all-important to the Government in the critical situation in which it found itself, being one of the chain of fortified towns that connect Mexico with Vera Cruz, to which port it had resolved to retire with the European part of the army and inhabitants, in the event of not being able to sustain itself in the capital. Puebla was, therefore, well garrisoned, served with an excellent park of artillery, and defended with many cannon of a large calibre, so that its commander-in-chief, Brigadier Don Ciriaco Llano, the Marquis de Vivanco, and other experienced officers stationed there, had, until the last, sanguine hopes of being able to defend it. Iturbide, however, called to his assistance a part of the army he had left in Queretaro, and surrounded the city with so many troops that resistance would have been nothing short of an act of madness; it therefore capitulated.

On the surrender of Puebla, the army of Iturbide, which had now augmented to the number of about eighteen thousand, and which was composed entirely of veteran troops that had been disciplined in the King's service, and had gone over to him clandestinely, or joined him on the fall of the various cities he had conquered, received orders to march in separate columns to different towns in the neighborhood of Mexico, with the intention of manifesting to the Government of that city the folly of any further resistance. It was, however, entirely in vain that the general had adopted this prudent measure; in vain that one or two praiseworthy citizens had ventured to reason on the subject with Señor Novella; and in vain that he was assured he could not rely on more than one-third part of the troops that composed the garrison. War! war! was the cry of him and his Junta Consultiva, and the motto they wore on their hats, and that worn by all their officers and troops, was, "Vivir y morir fieles y utiles."

Iturbide, after having rested a few days in Puebla, and partaken of the effusion of gratitude manifested towards him by the good people of that city, was on the point of leaving it, with the intention of fixing his head-quarters near the town of Chalco, and directing from thence the attack that was to have been made on Mexico, when he received a letter from Lieutenant General Don Juan O'Donojú, who had recently arrived at Vera Cruz, informing him that he had been named by the King of Spain captain general and political chief of the kingdom, and had accepted the appointment at the solicitation of his friends, the representatives of America in the Cortes of Spain; that he had risked his health and life, and sacrificed his convenience, at a period when he intended to retire from the public service, without any other desire than that of acquiring the love and esteem of the people of New Spain, and without other sentiments than those of tranquillizing the disastrous inquietude that reigned in the kingdom—not by consolidating or perpetuating the despotism that existed, or prolonging the colonial dependence, or falling into the errors or imitating the defects of many of his predecessors in supporting a system of government, the tyranny and injustice of which arose from the barbarity of the age in which it was established, but by reforming the ideas of the misled, calming the passions of the exasperated, and pointing out to the people generally the mode of obtaining with security, and without the horrible sacrifice they were making, the happiness which the illustration of the era in which they lived had induced them to seek after, and which no rational person could disapprove. He also required Iturbide to appoint a place at which they could have an interview, and realize the sincere and ardent desire he had to prevent the evils and misfortunes inseparable to a state of hostility, until such time as the treaty they might conclude, founded on the basis of the plan published in Iguala, should be ratified by the King and Cortes.

What a blow was this to the existing Government of Mexico, and to those that preceded it since the year 1810! what a contrast to their iniquitous and shameful mode of proceeding! The wise and beneficent O'Donojú, reading the public papers of the Independents, applauding the enterprise of their hero Iturbide, confirming his ideas, commending his virtues, and desiring his friendship, as he does in the conclusion of his letter; while the intrusive Novella and his Junta Consultiva, in imitation of their barbarous predecessors, Vanegas and Calleja, were persecuting with unrelenting fury, and almost to death itself, those that communicated with the Independents, or in whose possession should be found any of their seditious writings; proscribing the chiefs of the revolution, and heaping upon them every species of reproach and ignominy!

But the scene had changed; the star of liberty that rose in our own country had happily spread its influence in the more eastern and western hemispheres, and displayed to the world the criminal conduct of the Caligulas and Neros that had for such a length of time dishonored Spain and abused human nature.

This letter of O'Donojú, with another that he wrote to Sr. Novella, was sent by Iturbide to the Mexican Government, accompanied with a proposal for the suspension of arms until such times as the definitive treaty should be signed in Cordova, the city named by Iturbide as the point of conference. Novella would, however, hear nothing of the sort, and the letters were declared spurious, notwithstanding that Sr. Alcocer, a venerable curate of this city, who had been intimately acquainted with O'Donojú in Spain, proved to the Junta the identity of the signatures, by showing others that he had in his possession; which contumacy on the part of Novella exasperated Iturbide so much that he set off for Cordova, leaving orders with his generals for the immediate occupation of the towns of Tacuba, Tacubaya, Azcapuzalco, and Guadalupe, neither of which was distant more than half a league from Mexico, and all of them in possession of the European troops.

This was an unexpected circumstance to Novella and the Junta, who had the folly and vanity to suppose they could frighten the Independents from the execution of their plan by means of the silly proclamations they almost daily issued, in which they affected to despise their number, challenged them openly to commence the attack, and declared the Generals Luaces and Llano traitors to their King and country for having surrendered the cities of Queretaro and Puebla. The heroes of Tepeaca, Cordova, and Toluca were, however, not so easily scared, and a column of fifteen hundred men sent by Colonel Bustamente against Azcapuzalco presented to the inhabitants of Mexico the sight of a most bloody and desperate action that took place between them and an equal number of the regiments of Castile and military orders that composed the garrison of Azcapuzalco, the result of which was at least six hundred killed and wounded, and the abandonment of the town by the Europeans. A few days after, an attempt was made to dislodge the Europeans that were stationed in Guadalupe, by means of cannon placed on a neighboring hill; and while this operation was carrying on by a part of the Independents, and others were taking possession of Tacuba and Tacubaya, from both of which towns the Europeans had retired, an aid-de-camp arrived with a copy of the treaty of Cordova, concluded between General O'Donojú and Iturbide, and an order from the former to Sr. Novella, commanding him to obey him as captain general of the kingdom, to cause him to be recognised as such by the troops, to cease all hostilities from the instant he should receive the order, and to adopt measures for the evacuation of the city. This peremptory mandate on one side, and the near approach of the Independents on the other, placed Novella, the Junta, and their European troops in an awkward predicament; inasmuch as, if they obeyed the order, they would be subject to arrest and trial for the scandalous imprisonment of the late viceroy; and if they refused compliance, to be treated as rebels against the King's authority: their object, therefore, was to shelter themselves from the punishment they had justly deserved in the best manner they could. And, with this view, although they were perfectly convinced of the presence of O'Donojú in the kingdom, and of the reality of the treaty signed in Cordova, they nevertheless affected to doubt the truth of one and the other, alleging that all might be a stratagem of Iturbide; and on this frivolous pretext refused to evacuate the city. On the deposition of the Conde del Venadito, the Junta Provincial Ayuntamiento, and other bodies corporate, hesitated to acknowledge the authority of Novella, but were obliged to do so eventually, from the fear of the bayonets he had at his command.

Now, however, that they were surrounded by the Independents, and backed by O'Donojú, they openly protested against his proceedings, and, in consequence, he was obliged to ask for an armistice, and compelled to send one of the Junta Consultiva to Puebla to ascertain, as he said, the identity of the captain general. This envoy, who had hitherto been one of the most strenuous supporters of the measures of Novella, and one of the most active members of the Junta, received such a fright from the lecture O'Donojú gave him, that he immediately returned, explained fully to Novella all that had passed, and forever afterwards ceased to meddle in the matters at issue. Novella was also inclined to succumb, and would have renounced his employ, had it not been for fear of the troops; he having lost all authority, and they having usurped the command, so that the city was in the utmost anarchy and confusion, and dreading at every instant a general massacre and pillage, with which it had been threatened daily for near a month, and which would most assuredly have succeeded had it not been for the proximity and number of the Independent army, that cut off all possibility of escape for the European troops, whose idea was to commit all sorts of enormity, rob what they could, and take the road for Vera Cruz.

Things had got to that pass that it was impossible to confide in a servant, and dangerous to do so in a friend; every thing like social intercourse was at an end; those that could with any sort of convenience leave the city, fled: and those that were obliged to remain, sought security in their houses; so that, in this once populous metropolis, there was scarce a soul to be seen. In this state of things, the Generals O'Donojú and Iturbide arrived at Tacubaya, and the former had an interview with Sr. Novella, in the course of which he gave him to understand the impropriety of his conduct in resisting the legitimate authority as long as he did, the impossibility of defending the city, and the certainty of the massacre of the Europeans, should it be taken by assault; remonstrated with him respecting the insubordination of the troops, pointed out to him the illegality of their conduct, and enjoined him to prevent the effusion of blood, by exercising the little influence he had with the subaltern officers and soldiers, in the understanding that he would not take upon him to scrutinize their conduct in the arrest of the late viceroy, but leave them to exculpate themselves in the best way they could on arriving in Spain. The following day news was received of the surrender of the city of Durango and General Cruz to General Negrete, after an obstinate resistance, in the course of which many lives were lost, and the declaration of independence in the western internal provinces, under the command of Field Marshal Alexo Garcia Conde; so that if the soldiers of Novella had before any hope, it now entirely disappeared, and, in order to avoid a disgraceful capitulation, were obliged to acknowledge the supremacy of General O'Donojú, obey his orders by evacuating the city, and march to that of Toluca, there to wait until it was convenient for them to embark.

To complete the independence of the kingdom, there was now wanting the declaration of the province of Merida de Yucatan, which followed almost immediately the surrender of Acapulco, the castle of Perote, and Vera Cruz; the two former of which capitulated soon after, and the latter has, without doubt, ere this followed their example, advice having been received yesterday by the Government that it was on the eve of surrendering. The province of Guatemala, which has always been a separate viceroyalty from that of Mexico, was also sensible of the general impulse, and, desirous of becoming an integral part of the Mexican empire, has likewise sworn independence, which, without doubt, will extend to its neighboring provinces, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Veragua, so that we may from this instant consider North America, with the exception of Canada, as divided into two grand and important commonwealths, that may, with the aid of those that are forming in South America, be able, in the course of time, to give the law to the opposite continent.

I am very far from believing myself possessed of the qualities necessary to treat with the energy and exactness that it merits a subject of the importance of that on which I have ventured to write, and certainly should not have had the temerity to have touched upon it, had it not been for the particular situation in which I found myself, an eye-witness of all that passed, and from the conviction I have ever been under, that each individual is bound to contribute towards the good of his country to the utmost of his ability, be it great or small. With this view, therefore, I shall, now that I have finished my narrative, take the liberty to add a few remarks, and to say, in the first place, that the revolution which I have attempted to describe is not one of those that have been accomplished by means of unbridled passions, cruelty, rancor, or revenge, but, on the contrary, has, from its commencement, been accompanied with brotherly love, patriotism, disinterestedness, truth, and good faith; so that the more I reflect on its origin and progress, the more is my admiration excited, and the more am I tempted to exclaim that America has produced two of the greatest heroes that ever existed—Washington and Iturbide. Secondly, that the new Government is established on a sure and solid foundation, the people being highly delighted with it, and the subordinate chiefs, officers, and soldiers having one and all implicitly followed the example of moderation set them by their magnanimous leader, who, to obviate strife, envy, and emulation, has absolutely refused the crown, and insisted that the Emperor shall come from Spain, as he first proposed in the town of Iguala. Indeed, the plan there published has been adhered to with the most religious scrupulosity, except the slight variations made in it by the treaty of Cordova, at the suggestion of General O'Donojú; and the empire is, in consequence, governed by a regency of five of its most distinguished and enlightened statesmen, who have elected General Iturbide President, and appointed him commander-in-chief of the land and sea forces, and by a convention of thirty-six of the principal personages in the empire, as respects talents, rank, and riches. The independence is to be sworn in this city on the 27th instant, and the Cortes are to meet on the 24th of February next, the anniversary of the declaration in Iguala. In the mean time, the convention will be employed in enacting the most salutary decrees; and among those already passed is one declaring the commerce of this empire free to all nations; another, doing away all the arbitrary taxes, impositions, and excises imposed by the former Government; a third, reducing the duties from sixteen to six per cent.; a fourth, for the encouragement of the miners, relinquishing to them the quota of silver formerly paid to the King, with other imposts that amounted to seventeen per cent.; so that many poor minerals that could not be worked before, can now be used to advantage; and a fifth, recognising and making the new Government responsible for the debt contracted by the old one, of thirty-six millions of dollars.

That there is a strong bias in the minds of the people of this country in favor of the Government and citizens of the United States in preference to all other nations, is beyond a doubt; and that the convention, of which four-fifths are native Americans, and the Regency, which is composed entirely of them, are actuated with the same sentiments, is also certain. On this subject I have had various conferences with the leading members of the administration, whose sentiments will be fully explained to you shortly by Don Juan Manuel de Elizalda, the minister plenipotentiary that is already named, and now preparing to go to Washington, where I have no doubt he will be received and acknowledged as the representative of a free and independent nation; the Mexican empire being so at this time to all intents and purposes, in the first place, by the unanimous wish and consent, power and authority, of its inhabitants; and, secondly, by the treaty signed at Cordova, between the Generals O'Donojú and Iturbide, the deputed agents of Spain and this empire.

Your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES SMITH WILCOCKS.

Treaties concluded in the city of Cordova, on the 24th instant, between the Señors D. Juan O'Donojú, Lieutenant General of the armies of Spain, and D. Augustin de Iturbide, First Chief of the Imperial Mexican Army of the Three Guarantees.

The independence of New upon Old Spain being declared, and it having an army capable of supporting this declaration, the provinces of the kingdom being subdued by it, the capital, where the legitimate authority had been deposited, being besieged, and when there only remained for the European Government the fortresses of Vera Cruz and Acapulco, dismantled and without the means of resisting a siege well directed and which would last some time, Lieutenant General D. Juan O'Donojú arrived at the first port with the character and authority of captain general and superior political chief of this kingdom, appointed by His Catholic Majesty, who, being desirous of avoiding the evils which afflict the people in vicissitudes of this sort, and trying to conciliate the interests of both Spains, invited the first chief of the imperial army, D. Augustin de Iturbide, to an interview, in which they might discuss the great business of the independence, by loosening without breaking the chains which united the two continents. The interview took place in the city of Cordova, on the 24th of August, 1821; and the first with the authority of his character, and the latter with that of the Mexican empire, after having conferred at length on what was most proper for both nations, considering the present situation and the last occurrences, agreed upon the following articles, which they signed by duplicates, to give them all the force of which documents of this sort are capable, each one keeping an original in his possession for the greater security and validity:

1. This America shall be recognised as a sovereign and independent nation, and shall in future be called the Mexican Empire.

2. The Government of the empire shall be a constitutional limited monarchy.

3. There shall be named, to reign in the Mexican empire, (after the oath which the fourth article of the plan points out,) in the first place, the Señor D. Ferdinand VII., Catholic King of Spain, and, upon his renunciation or non-admission, his brother, the Most Serene Señor Infant D. Carlos; upon his renunciation or non-admission, the Most Serene Señor Infant D. Francisco de Paula; upon his renunciation or non-admission, the Most Serene Señor D. Carlos Luis, Infant of Spain, formerly heir of Etruria, now of Lucca; and upon his renunciation or non-admission, he whom the Cortes of the empire shall designate.

4. The Emperor shall fix his court in Mexico, which shall be the capital of the empire.

5. Two commissioners shall be appointed by his excellency General O'Donojú, who shall go to the court of Spain to place in the royal hands of Señor D. Ferdinand VII. a copy of this treaty, and the exposition which shall accompany it, for the service of His Majesty first, whilst the Cortes of the empire offer him the crown, with all the formalities and guaranties which a business of so much importance demands; and entreat His Majesty that in the case of the third article he deign to notify their Serene Highnesses the Infants, mentioned in same article, in the order in which they are named; interposing his benign influence that one of those personages designated from his august house may come to this empire, inasmuch as the prosperity of both nations is concerned in it; and for the satisfaction which the Mexicans will receive in adding this to the other bonds of friendship with which Spaniards can and desire to be united.

6. There shall be immediately appointed, according to the spirit of the plan of Iguala, a Junta composed of the first men of the empire for their virtues, for their stations, for their fortunes, authority, and judgment, of those who are designated by the general opinion, the number of whom may be very considerable, that the union of lights may insure the success of their determinations, which are emanations of the authority and powers which the following articles grant them.

7. The Junta, of which the following article treats, shall be named the Provisional Junta of Government.

8. Lieutenant General D. Juan O'Donojú shall be one of the Provisional Junta of Government, in consideration of the convenience of a person of his rank taking an active and immediate part in the Government, and from its being indispensable to admit some of those who were designated in the said plan, in conformity with its very spirit.

9. The Provisional Junta of Government shall have a President appointed by itself, and whose election shall take place in one of its own members or not, who shall have an absolute plurality of votes; and if an election does not take effect at the first voting, they shall proceed to a second scrutiny, beginning with the two who may have together most votes.

10. The first step of the Provisional Junta of Government shall be, to publish its installation, and the motives which unite it, with the explanations which it may consider proper, to illustrate to the people their interests, and the mode of proceeding in the election of deputies to the Cortes, of which mention shall be made hereafter.

11. The Provisional Junta of Government shall appoint, after the election of its President, a Regency, composed of three persons, either of its own members or otherwise, in which shall be vested the executive power, and which shall govern in the name of the monarch, until he shall take the sceptre of the empire.

12. The Provisional Junta, being installed, shall govern provisionally according to the existing laws, in every thing not opposed to the plan of Iguala, and until the Cortes form the constitution of the state.

13. The Regency, immediately after being appointed, shall proceed to the convocation of the Cortes, agreeably to the method which the Provisional Junta of Government may determine, in conformity to the spirit of the twenty-fourth article of the said plan.

14. The executive power is vested in the Regency, the legislative in the Cortes; but as it has happened for some time before that they were united, that both may not again fall under one authority, the Junta shall exercise the legislative power, first in the cases which may occur, and which cannot await the meeting of the Cortes; and then shall proceed in accordance with the Regency: secondly, to serve as an auxiliary and consultive body to the Regency in its determinations.

15. Every person who belongs to a society, the system of government being changed, or the country passing into the power of another prince, remains in the state of natural liberty to transport himself, with his fortune, to what place he pleases, without there being any right to deprive him of this liberty, (unless he shall have contracted some debt with the society to which he belonged, by crime, or in other ways known to publicists:) in this case Europeans are admitted into New Spain, and the Americans resident in the Peninsula; consequently, they shall be free to remain, adopting this or that country; or to demand their passports, which cannot be refused to them, for removing from the realm in the time prefixed, bringing or carrying with them their families and effects, but satisfying, at the departure of the last, the established duties of exportation, or which may hereafter be established by competent authority.

16. The former alternative shall not have place with respect to public officers or military men who are notoriously disaffected to the independence of Mexico; but these shall of necessity quit this empire within the term which the Regency may prescribe, carrying away their property, and paying the duties mentioned in the preceding article.

17. The occupation of the capital by the troops of the Peninsula being an obstacle to the realizing of this treaty, it becomes indispensable to overcome it; but, as the first chief of the imperial army, uniting his sentiments to those of the Mexican nation, is desirous not to take it by force, because there are abundant resources, notwithstanding the valor and constancy of the said Peninsular troops, for the want of means and ability to support themselves against the system adopted by the whole nation, Don Juan O'Donojú offers to use his authority that the said troops may complete their departure without the effusion of blood, and by an honorable capitulation.—City of Cordova, 24th of August, 1821.

Manifesto of the Provisional Board of Government to the People of the Empire.

After the long night of three ages in which America has lain plunged in darkness, the aurora of her felicity at last burst forth; that day dawned for which she had sighed, and which she desires may be perpetual. This consummation would never have been obtained if it had not been founded in justice, or if justice herself were not to be the base of the Government which is to consolidate it. But the Junta has the satisfaction to announce that both considerations are combined in the emancipation which we have accomplished.

Nature has marked out the territories of nations by rivers, mountains. and other boundaries, which establish their limits. How many states are divided by the Po and the Rhine, as the Alps and the Pyrenees divide France from Italy and from Spain. From this last, immense seas and a vast distance divide America—distances which not only make them different as kingdoms, but establish them as belonging to two different worlds. Policy must necessarily conform to the order of nature; and as it would be monstrous to put in the same space the contrary elements of fire and water, it is equally so to unite in one province people who are distinct and distant, especially if that difference and distance extend to the extremity of the two worlds. Since, then, it embraces all the contrarieties which climate can originate, two vast globes and opposite movements cannot revolve without embarrassment upon one axis, but each requires its own. In the same manner, two empires of distinct and opposite qualities require two Governments, without being susceptible of being united in one, which is never sufficient to govern both well.

If, occasionally, the order of nature is violated, in departing from the boundaries she fixes, it must happen, as with fire enclosed in the mines, that an explosion will finally take place. The two Spains, Old and New, or, which is the same thing, Castile and Mexico, which have hitherto borne those names, belong to distinct regions of the earth, to different portions of the globe, to opposite zones of the sphere—differences which at once evince the justice of their separation. If they have been united, as Esau and Jacob in the womb of Rebecca, and have long remained so, this alone, giving to the latter her growth, has rendered it necessary that they should separate, as these twins did, first in the maternal bosom, and afterwards in their descendants.

The growth of nations constitutes, successively, their youth and virility—ages which demand their separation. It is very natural that when a nation has arrived at these ages, she should refuse to depend upon one whose assistance she no longer needs, in order to act for herself. If, even among brutes, the teats of the dam are forsaken by the offspring, which has now become capable of receiving other aliment than milk; if the chick whose wings have grown flies alone, and no longer suffers itself to be conducted by the bird which formerly transported it; if the pubescent virgin consents to the nuptials which compel her to abandon the paternal dwelling, in order to form a new family; is it not just that America, having acquired the strength which justifies it, should emancipate herself?

It has been long since she arrived at her youth; but it has also been long since assent was refused to her emancipation; for, before that was accomplished, she had attained the age of virility, which justifies it still more. The qualifications which demonstrate that age are to be found in her, both the moral ones of refinement and intelligence, and the physical ones of arms and population. The increase of their families alone prevented Abraham and Lot from dwelling in common, and they took different routes in order to live separate.

Why, then, deny to America the justice which may assist her in emancipating herself, supposing this to be her situation and circumstances? Must she not listen to the voice of nature, which speaks to her even through her insensible organs? May she not burst, like the plant, the teguments which covered her when young? Must she be forever in pupilage, though at the age of puberty? and must she remain a child of the family even when she is both able and willing to shake off the paternal authority? But even this is not all: nature tells her still more, especially through the organ of reason.

Whenever the bird can force the door of its cage, or any other animal break the ligaments which confine it, they do not hesitate a moment in doing so, for reason teaches them to seek their own happiness. This is what justifies still more the independence of America. She has been able to burst her fetters in order to acquire her liberty, and to escape from the yoke which impeded her prosperity, and placed her labor, industry, commerce, and all her movements, within such bounds and restraints as might enfeeble them, in order to make preponderant the importance of the mother country, or rather in order that the sole and absolute power might be vested in the latter. Between the power and performance in this case, and with respect to such high and interesting objects as are dictated by nature and demonstrated by reason, there ought to be no space whatever, for they immediately touch each other.

The Provisional Board of Government installed for these purposes, in consequence of their attainment and the occupation of the capital, has no other view than them. It has been assembled in order to found, perfect, and perpetuate them. The fundamental principles of government which they have adopted appertain to the first; the mode of procedure upon which they have resolved to the second; the ties and ligaments which they have proposed to themselves to the third; and they expose it all to the people, in order that they may judge of the sincerity and propriety of their intentions and conduct.

The foundations should correspond to the edifice, and are what give it its principal strength. The principles of government which have been adapted conformably to the plan of Iguala and the treaty of Cordova are those received by the most illustrious nations. A representative in preference to an absolute government, a limited monarchy, and a constitutional system with which we are already acquainted, are the fundamental maxims, the angular stone of our edifice. There is nothing to apprehend from the ideas opposed to these, nor from those which will not bear the light of day. Those which animate us are purely liberal. Until the meeting of the Cortes, the Spanish constitution and laws will be observed, so far as they are not inapplicable to the peculiar situation of the country.

The plan of operations or mode of proceeding of the Junta has been to appoint a Regency to exercise the executive power, reserving to itself the legislative power for such purposes as cannot be delayed until the meeting of the Cortes, to whom this branch of the Government appertains. Had the Junta assumed this power in its whole extent, it would have usurped it from the people; but if it were not to exercise it provisionally in cases of urgency, the Government would remain defective; the necessities of the moment could not be provided for, nor the thousand junctures which may present themselves be met.

To obviate both the one and the other, they have already prescribed to themselves a rule, not to sanction any thing, even provisionally, unless its nature is such that it will not admit of being delayed until the meeting of the Cortes, to whom every thing else is referred. The wisdom of their measures, which involves the perfection of the liberty and happiness of the people, depends upon the choice which they may make of proper representatives. The province of this board is to inform them on the subject, in order that, all passions being laid aside, and intrigue and party spirit banished, they may have no other end in view than the welfare of the country. For this the Junta is now laboring, and to take such measures that the Congress may be assembled in as short a time as possible.

In the mean time, the public debt, so called, has been acknowledged, and ordered to be paid as soon as affairs are in a condition to do so; at the same time, a stop has been put to the arbitrary contributions with which the inhabitants were oppressed without any advantage to the treasury. The first fact is announced for the satisfaction of the creditors, the second for that of the public, and both as an evidence of the proceedings of the Government.

Would it were possible for the latter to pay another debt much greater, and of a superior kind, of which it confesses itself a debtor. Such is that of the deserving army, which, animated by the purest patriotism, and braving dangers and difficulties at the expense of inexpressible sacrifices, have consummated the arduous undertaking which Heaven was pleased to protect and crown with success. But there is no tongue to express what it deserves, no hand to remunerate its services. Who is there competent to relate what all and each of its individuals have performed—the actions which have signalized many of the soldiers and chiefs, especially the first, who animated the rest? What reward can we give them, or what can recompense their benefits? as Tobias the youth demanded of his father, speaking of his benefactor. We have no other choice, inasmuch as reward is impossible, but to manifest to them our gratitude; to which end many steps have been taken, and others will continue to be taken.

Finally, the bonds which the Junta has proposed to itself, in order to insure and prolong our independence, are, besides the union of the inhabitants of the empire, which constitutes one of the guarantees, an alliance, federation, and commerce with other nations. The Spanish nation, to whom we owe our origin, and to whom we are attached by the closest ties, ought to be the first and most privileged in our consideration. We do not content ourselves with the mere family connexion which results from calling one of their princes of the royal blood to our empire. We aspire to more; we desire to unite ourselves in a fraternity which may turn to the advantage of the whole nation, and let it know that our political independence, to which we have been compelled by the causes set forth, does not loosen the bonds which unite us, nor cool our affections, which ought to be the more sincere, in order to destroy all resentment.

We desire, then, that our fraternity may be made known to the whole world; that European Spaniards, in virtue of that title alone, may domiciliate themselves in our country, subjecting themselves to its laws, and under the inspection of our Government; that our ports may be opened to them for the purposes of trade in such a manner as may be arranged by our laws, and that a preference may be given to them as far as possible above other nations; that there may be established between them and us, if practicable and agreeable to them, a good reciprocal understanding, regulated by definitive treaties; and that in every thing there may appear the most cordial amity. With regard to foreign nations, we shall preserve harmony with all, commercial relations and others, as may be expedient.

The Junta congratulates itself that the people of the empire will perceive, in what has been set forth, at least their wishes for a successful result, which they expect from the patriotism and intelligence of the inhabitants, who may suggest to it whatever they deem conducive to a better government, which the Junta will hold in due consideration.

To the Senate of the United States: Washington, April 26, 1822.

I transmit to the Senate, agreeably to their resolution of yesterday, a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of the papers requested by that resolution, in relation to the recognition of the South American provinces.

JAMES MONROE.

Department of State, April 25, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the Senate of this day, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate any information he may have, proper to be disclosed, from our minister at Madrid, or from the Spanish minister resident in this country, concerning the views of Spain relative to the recognition of the independence of the South American colonies, and of the dictamen of the Spanish Cortes, has the honor to submit to the President copies of the papers particularly referred to.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

Sir: Washington, March 9, 1822.

In the National Intelligencer of this day, I have seen the message sent by the President to the House of Representatives, in which he proposes the recognition by the United States of the insurgent Governments of Spanish America. How great my surprise was, may be easily judged by any one acquainted with the conduct of Spain towards this republic, and who knows the immense sacrifices which she has made to preserve her friendship. In fact, who could think that, in return for the cession of her most important provinces in this hemisphere; for the forgetting of the plunder of her commerce by American citizens; for the privileges granted to their navy; and for as great proofs of friendship as one nation can give another, this Executive would propose that the insurrection of the ultramarine possessions of Spain should be recognised? And, moreover, will not his astonishment be augmented to see that this Power is desirous to give the destructive example of sanctioning the rebellion of provinces which have received no offence from the mother country to those to whom she has granted a participation of a free constitution, and to whom she has extended all the rights and prerogatives of Spanish citizens? In vain will a parallel be attempted to be drawn between the emancipation of this republic and that which the Spanish rebels attempt; and history is sufficient to prove that, if a harassed and persecuted province has a right to break its chains, others, loaded with benefits, elevated to the high rank of freemen, ought only to bless and embrace more closely the protecting country which has bestowed such favors upon them.

But even admitting that morality ought to yield to policy: what is the present state of Spanish America, and what are its Governments, to entitle them to recognition? Buenos Ayres is sunk in the most complete anarchy, and each day sees new despots produced, who disappear the next. Peru, conquered by a rebel army, has near the gates of its capital another Spanish army, aided by part of the inhabitants. In Chili, an individual suppresses the sentiments of the inhabitants, and his violence presages a sudden change. On the coast of Firma, also, the Spanish banners wave, and the insurgent generals are occupied in quarrelling with their own compatriots, who prefer taking the part of a free Power to that of being the slave of an adventurer. In Mexico, too, there is no Government; and the result of the questions which the chiefs commanding there have put to Spain is not known. Where, then, are those Governments which ought to be recognised? where the pledges of their stability? where the proof that those provinces will not return to a union with Spain, when so many of their inhabitants desire it? and, in fine, where the right of the United States to sanction and declare legitimate a rebellion without cause, and the event of which is not even decided?

I do not think it necessary to prove that, if the state of Spanish America were such as it is represented in the message; that if the existence of its Governments were certain and established; that if the impossibility of its reunion with Spain were so indisputable; and that if the justice of its recognition were so evident, the Powers of Europe, interested in gaining the friendship of countries so important for their commerce, would have been negligent in fulfilling it. But, seeing how distant the prospect is of even this result, and faithful to the ties which unite them with Spain, they await the issue of the contest, and abstain from doing a gratuitous injury to a friendly Government, the advantages of which are doubtful, and the odium certain. Such will be that which Spain will receive from the United States, in case the recognition proposed in the message should take effect; and posterity will be no less liable to wonder that the Power which has received the most proofs of the friendship of Spain should be the one delighted with being the first to take a step which could have only been expected from another that had been injured.

Although I could enlarge upon this disagreeable subject, I think it useless to do so, because the sentiments which the message ought to excite in the breast of every Spaniard can be no secret to you. Those which the King of Spain will experience at receiving a notification so unexpected will be doubtless very disagreeable; and at the same time that I hasten to communicate it to His Majesty, I think it my duty to protest, as I do solemnly protest, against the recognition of the Governments mentioned, of the insurgent Spanish provinces of America, by the United States, declaring that it can in no way now, or at any time, lessen or invalidate in the least the right of Spain to the said provinces, or to employ whatever means may be in her power to reunite them to the rest of her dominions.

I pray you, sir, to be pleased to lay this protest before the President, and I flatter myself that, convinced of the solid reasons which have dictated it, he will suspend the measure which he has proposed to Congress, and that he will give to His Catholic Majesty this proof of his friendship and of his justice.

I remain, with the most distinguished consideration, praying God to guard your life many years, your most obedient, humble servant,

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State to the Minister from Spain.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, April 6, 1822.

Your letter of the 9th of March was, immediately after I had the honor of receiving it, laid before the President of the United States, by whom it has been deliberately considered, and by whose direction I am, in replying to it, to assure you of the earnestness and sincerity with which this Government desires to entertain and to cultivate the most friendly relations with that of Spain.

This disposition has been manifested not only by the uniform course of the United States in their direct political and commercial intercourse with Spain, but by the friendly interest which they have felt in the welfare of the Spanish nation, and by the cordial sympathy with which they have witnessed their spirit and energy exerted in maintaining their independence of all foreign control and their right of self-government.

In every question relating to the independence of a nation, two principles are involved: one of right, and the other of fact; the former exclusively depending upon the determination of the nation itself, and the latter resulting from the successful execution of that determination. This right has been recently exercised, as well by the Spanish nation in Europe, as by several of those countries in the American hemisphere which had for two or three centuries been connected as colonies with Spain. In the conflicts which have attended these revolutions, the United States have carefully abstained from taking any part respecting the right of the nations concerned in them to maintain or newly organize their own political constitutions, and observing, wherever it was a contest by arms, the most impartial neutrality. But the civil war in which Spain was for some years involved with the inhabitants of her colonies in America has, in substance, ceased to exist. Treaties equivalent to an acknowledgment of independence have been concluded by the commanders and viceroys of Spain herself with the republic of Colombia, with Mexico, and with Peru; while, in the provinces of La Plata and in Chili, no Spanish force has for several years existed to dispute the independence which the inhabitants of those countries had declared.

Under these circumstances, the Government of the United States, far from consulting the dictates of a policy questionable in its morality, has yielded to an obligation of duty of the highest order, by recognising as independent states nations which, after deliberately asserting their right to that character, had maintained and established it against all the resistance which had been or could be brought to oppose it. This recognition is neither intended to invalidate any right of Spain, nor to affect the employment of any means which she may yet be disposed or enabled to use, with the view of reuniting those provinces to the rest of her dominions. It is the mere acknowledgment of existing facts, with the view to the regular establishment with the nations newly formed of those relations, political and commercial, which it is the moral obligation of civilized and Christian nations to entertain reciprocally with one another.

It will not be necessary to discuss with you a detail of facts upon which your information appears to be materially different from that which has been communicated to this Government, and is of public notoriety, nor the propriety of the denominations which you have attributed to the inhabitants of the South American provinces. It is not doubted that other and more correct views of the whole subject will very shortly be taken by your Government, and that it, as well as the other European Governments, will show that deference to the example of the United States which you urge it as the duty or the policy of the United States to show to theirs. The effect of the example of one independent nation upon the councils and measures of another can be just only so far as it is voluntary; and as the United States desire that their example should be followed, so it is their intention to follow that of others upon no other principle. They confidently rely that the time is at hand when all the Governments of Europe friendly to Spain, and Spain herself, will not only concur in the acknowledgment of the independence of the American nations, but in the sentiment that nothing will tend more effectually to the welfare and happiness of Spain than the universal concurrence in that recognition.

I pray you, sir, to receive the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Don JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA, Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

[TRANSLATION.]

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, April 11, 1822.

I have had the honor of receiving your note of the 6th instant, in which you were pleased to inform me that this Government has recognised the independence of the insurgent provinces of Spanish America. I despatched immediately to Spain one of the secretaries of this legation to carry to His Majesty news as important as unexpected; and, until I receive his royal orders upon the subject, I have only to refer to my protest of the 9th of March last, still insisting upon its contents as if its substance were repeated in the present note.

With the greatest respect, I renew the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, February 14, 1822.

I have the honor to enclose to you a hurried translation of the last dictamen of the commission of the Cortes on the affairs of Spanish America, and the determinations made by that body.

Dictamen of the commission to whom it was referred to report on the state of the provinces of Ultramar, presented February 12, 1822.

The commission has meditated maturely and circumspectly on the proposition of the Minister of Ultramar, and, after having heard him, has considered the diverse circumstances in which the provinces of both Americas are at present, and may be found hereafter; the fruitlessness and inefficacy of the commissions that have been directed to the Government established in them; and, possessed with the noble desire that the same may not again, with the waste of public treasure, and the sacrifice of humanity, occur, is of opinion that the Cortes ought not to lose time in considering the proposition of the ministry, since it will be a consequence of the results; and, in order to obtain them, the Government, and the commissioners it elects, ought to be authorized to hear and to transmit to the legislative power every class of propositions, be they what they may; at the same time it judges that the national decorum, and the protection which in justice is due to the European and American Spaniards, call for the establishment of a basis useful and conducive to the welfare of the Spains.

Before fixing this basis, and that it may be as productive to the common felicity as policy and the national honor require, the commission lays down the fixed principle that this new, grand, and legitimate path for pacific communications being opened, all treaties be esteemed of no value or efficacy that have been formed between Spanish chiefs and American Governments, which ought to be understood as null, as they have been from their origin, as respects the acknowledgment of independence, inasmuch as they were not authorized, nor could such authority be given them, unless by previous declaration of the Cortes.

The commissioners may hear all the propositions that may be made to them in order to transmit them to the metropolis, excepting such as take away or limit in any manner the absolute right of the European and American Spaniards, residing in whatever part of the ultramarine provinces, to remove and dispose of their persons, families, and property, as they may think proper, without being opposed by any obstacle or measure that might prove injurious to their fortunes. With this explanation, the commission reproduces its anterior dictamen; and the Cortes will resolve what may be most proper.

Espiga,	Oliver,
Cuesta,	Murphy,
Alvarez Escuden,	Navarette,
Toreno,	Paul.
Moscoso,

The particular vote of the Señor Oliver proposes to add the following clause to the dictamen:

"That it ought to be understood as not affecting the responsibility which persons, whoever they may be, may have incurred in this affair, nor the rights of the Spanish nation represented by the Cortes and the King."

The particular vote of the Señors Moscoso, Toreno, and Espiga, proposes the following additions to the dictamen:

"1. That the Cortes declare that the treaty called that of Cordova, celebrated between General O'Donojú and the chief of the dissidents in New Spain, Don Augustin Iturbide, as well as any other act or stipulation relative to the recognition of Mexican independence by that general, are illegitimate, and null in their effects as to the Spanish Government and its subjects."

"2. That the Spanish Government, by a declaration to all others with which it has friendly relations, make known to them that the Spanish nation will regard, at any epoch, as a violation of the treaties, the recognition, either partial or absolute, of the independence of the Spanish provinces of Ultramar, so long as the dissensions which exist between some of them and the metropolis are not terminated, with whatever else may serve to convince foreign Governments that Spain has not yet renounced any of the rights belonging to it in those countries."

"3. That the Government be recommended to take all possible measures, without any delay, to preserve and reinforce those points of the provinces of Ultramar that remain united to the metropolis, obedient to its authority, or that resist the separation from it by the dissidents; proposing to the Cortes the resources it requires, and are not at its disposal."

"4. That the Cortes declare that the provinces of Ultramar that have declared their independence of the metropolis, or do not acknowledge de facto the supremacy of the Government of it, ought not to have deputies in the Cortes during their continuance in this state."

The additional vote of Señors Murphy, Navarette, and Paul, to the anterior dictamen, states that it is their opinion that, in case of the approbation by the Cortes of the dictamen of the commission, they should not approve the additional votes presented by some individuals of it, as being contrary to the ends proposed by the same commission, but should put in execution the measures included in the dictamen without delay, without prejudice to what the ordinary Cortes may opportunely resolve upon, whatever else they may esteem convenient.

After a short discussion, whether the dictamen should be discussed by itself, or with the additional votes, it was determined that the dictamen of the commission should be first discussed. During the discussion, propositions to the following effect were presented by the Señor Solanot, viz:

"That the Cortes, with a generosity peculiar to the constitutional system by which we are governed, and for the general interest of the Spaniards of both worlds, declare the independence of all those provinces of both Americas that actually are so at this day, on condition that each one of those Governments pay an annual subsidy in recompense of the rights which are renounced; that a treaty of commerce be formed on the basis most convenient to the reciprocal interests of the American and Peninsular Spaniards; that all hostilities be completely suspended until this treaty be completely approved; that all the Spaniards who may wish to retire to the Peninsula may do so freely, with all the funds belonging to them, without being obliged to pay any duty whatever; that any Spaniard who wishes to live in America shall have preserved to him the enjoyment of all his rights and property; that every Spaniard who may have been deprived of his property and of his rights, in consequence of the anterior disturbances, shall be reinstated in them; that all the wealth and property belonging to European Spain shall remain at its disposal, and be removed to the Peninsula at the expense of America; that all the troops that are actually in America, belonging to European Spain, shall be maintained in the same points at the cost of the American Government, until the ratification of this treaty; that European Spain may dispose of the naval force it has in America; and that there be established a confederation composed of the American Governments, under the protection of European Spain, upon the basis that may be most convenient, and guarantied as may be accorded."

Señor Munoz Torrero demanded that the author of these propositions should withdraw them immediately, as he had no powers to authorize his making them, or, if he had, to exhibit them. The Cortes accorded that these propositions should be withdrawn, as contrary to the power given to them by the constitution.

After considerable discussion, the Cortes approved of the dictamen as proposed by the commission.

On the following day the particular votes were discussed, and decided as follows:

That of Señor Oliver was not admitted to a vote.

That of Señors Moscoso, Espiga, and Toreno, the three first articles approved, and the fourth withdrawn by its author.

[The following report, upon the same subject, was made to the House of Representatives, March 19, 1822.]

The Committee of Foreign Affairs, to whom were referred the message of the President concerning the recognition of the late Spanish provinces in America, and the documents therewith communicated, having examined the same with the most profound attention, unanimously report:

That the provinces of Buenos Ayres, after having, from the year 1810, proceeded in their revolutionary movements without any obstacle from the Government of Spain, formally declared their independence of that Government in 1816. After various intestine commotions and external collisions, those provinces now enjoy domestic tranquillity, and a good understanding with all their neighbors, and actually exercise, without opposition from within, or the fear of annoyance from without, all the attributes of sovereignty.

The provinces of Venezuela and New Granada, after having separately declared their independence, sustained, for a period of more than ten years, a desolating war against the armies of Spain, and having severally attained, by their triumph over those armies, the object for which they contended, united themselves, on the 19th of December, 1819, in one nation, under the title of "the Republic of Colombia."

The republic of Colombia has now a well-organized Government, instituted by the free will of its citizens, and exercises all the functions of sovereignty, fearless alike of internal and foreign enemies. The small remnant of the numerous armies commissioned to preserve the supremacy of the parent state is now blockaded in two fortresses, where it is innoxious, and where, deprived as it is of all hope of succor, it must soon surrender at discretion. When this event shall have occurred, there will not remain a vestige of foreign power in all that immense republic, containing between three and four millions of inhabitants.

The province of Chili, since it declared its independence, in the year 1818, has been in the constant and unmolested enjoyment of the sovereignty which it then assumed.

The province of Peru, situated, like Chili, beyond the Andes, and bordering on the Pacific ocean, was for a long time deterred from making any effectual effort for independence, by the presence of an imposing military force, which Spain had kept up in that country. It was not, therefore, until the 12th of June of the last year that its capital, the city of Lima, capitulated to an army, chiefly composed of troops from Buenos Ayres and Chili, under the command of General San Martin. The greater part of the royal troops which escaped on that occasion retreated to the mountains, but soon left them to return to the coast, there to join the royal garrison in the fortress of Callao. The surrender of that fortress, soon after, to the Americans, may be regarded as the termination of the war in that quarter.

When the people of Peru found themselves, by this event, free to express their will, they most unequivocally expressed it in favor of independence, and with a unanimity and enthusiasm which have nowhere been excelled.

The revolution in Mexico has been somewhat different in its character and progress from the revolutions in the other Spanish American provinces, and its result, in respect to the organization of its internal government, has also not been precisely the same. Independence, however, has been as emphatically declared and as practically established, since the 24th of August last, by the "Mexican empire," as ever it has been by the republics of the south; and her geographical situation, her population, and her resources, eminently qualify her to maintain the independence which she has thus declared, and now actually enjoys.

Such are the facts which have occupied the attention of your committee, and which, in their opinion, irresistibly prove that the nations of Mexico, Colombia, Buenos Ayres, Peru, and Chili, in Spanish America, are in fact independent.

It now remains for your committee to examine the right and the expediency, on the part of the United States, of recognising the independence which those nations have thus effectively achieved.

In this examination, it cannot be necessary to inquire into the right of the people of Spanish America "to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the Powers of the earth that separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them." The right to change the political institutions of the state has, indeed, been exercised equally by Spain and by her colonies; and for us to deny to the people of Spanish America the right to independence on the principles which alone sanction it here, would be virtually to renounce our own.

The political right of this nation to acknowledge their independence, without offending others, does not depend on its justice, but on its actual establishment. To justify such a recognition by us, it is necessary only to show, as is already sufficiently shown, that the people of Spanish America are, within their respective limits, exclusively sovereign, and thus, in fact, independent. With them, as with every other Government possessing and exercising the power of making war, the United States, in common with all nations, have the right of concerting the terms of mutual peace and intercourse.

Who is the rightful sovereign of a country, is not an inquiry permitted to foreign nations, to whom it is competent only to treat with "the powers that be."

There is no difference of opinion on this point among the writers on public law; and no diversity, with respect to it, in the practice of civilized nations. It is not necessary here to cite authority for a doctrine familiar to all who have paid the slightest attention to the subject, nor to go back for its practical illustration to the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster. Long since the chiefs of those conflicting houses alternately triumphed and ruled, and were alternately obeyed at home and recognised abroad, according as they successively exercised the power, without demonstrating the right; monarchies have become commonwealths or republics, and powerful usurpers have been recognised by foreign nations, in preference to legitimate and powerless pretenders. Modern history is replete with instances in point. Have we not, indeed, within the brief period of our own remembrance, beheld Governments vary their forms and change their rulers according to the prevailing power or passion of the moment, and doing so in virtue of the principle now in question, without materially and lastingly affecting their relations with other Governments? Have we not seen the emperors and kings of yesterday receive, on the thrones of exiled sovereigns who claimed the right to reign there, the friendly embassies of other Powers with whom those exiled sovereigns had sought an asylum? and have we not seen to-day those emperors and kings, thus courted and recognised yesterday, reft of their sceptres, and, from a mere change of circumstances, not of right, treated as usurpers by their successors, who, in their turn, have been acknowledged and caressed by the same foreign Powers?

The peace of the world and the independence of every member of the great political family require that each should be the exclusive judge of its own internal proceedings, and that the fact alone should be regarded by foreign nations. "Even when civil war breaks the bonds of society and of government, or at least suspends their force and effect, it gives birth in the nation to two independent parties, who regard each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge." It is of necessity, therefore, that these two parties should be considered by foreign states as two distinct and independent nations. To consider or treat them otherwise, would be to interfere in their domestic concerns, to deny them the right to manage their own affairs in their own way, and to violate the essential attributes of their respective sovereignty. For a nation to be entitled, in respect to foreign states, to the enjoyment of these attributes, "and to figure directly in the great political society, it is sufficient that it is really sovereign and independent; that is, that it governs itself by its own authority and laws." The people of Spanish America do notoriously so govern themselves, and the right of the United States to recognise the Governments which they have instituted is incontestable. A doubt of the expediency of such a recognition can be suggested only by the apprehension that it may injuriously affect our peaceful and friendly relations with the nations of the other hemisphere.

Can such an apprehension be well founded?

Have not all those nations practically sanctioned, within the last thirty years, the very principle on which we now propose to act; or have they ever complained of one another, or of us, for acting on that principle?

No nation of Europe, excepting Spain herself, has hitherto opposed force to the independence of Spanish America. Some of those nations have not only constantly maintained commercial and friendly intercourse with them in every stage of the revolution, but indirectly and efficiently, though not avowedly, aided them in the prosecution of their great object. To these the acknowledgment by the United States of the attainment of that object must be satisfactory.

To the other nations of Europe, who have regarded the events occurring in Spanish America not only without interference, but with apparent indifference, such an acknowledgment ought not to be offensive.

The nations who have thus respectively favored or never opposed the Spanish American people during their active struggle for independence cannot, it is believed, regard with dissatisfaction the formal recognition of that independence by a nation which, while that struggle lasted, has religiously observed towards both the conflicting parties all the duties of neutrality. Your committee are, therefore, of opinion that we have a right on this occasion confidently to expect, from what these nations have done or forborne to do, during the various fortunes of the civil war which has terminated, that they will frankly approve the course of policy which the United States may now think proper to adopt in relation to the successful party in that war. It surely cannot be reasonably apprehended that nations, who have thus been the tranquil spectators, the apparent well-wishers, if not the efficient supporters of this party, and who have not made the faintest attempt to arrest its progress, or to prevent its success, should be displeased with a third Power for merely recognising the Governments which, owing to that success, have thus been virtually permitted, or impliedly approved, in acquiring the undisputed and exclusive control of the countries in which they are established. It is, therefore, on the consistency as well as on the justice of these nations of Europe that we may confidently rely that the simple recognition, on the part of the United States, of the necessary effect of what has already been done will not be considered as a just cause of complaint against them, while the interested and immediate agents who have been directly and actively engaged in producing that effect have neither been opposed nor censured.

Your committee, therefore, instead of seriously apprehending that the recognition by the United States of the independence of Spanish America will be unacceptable to these nations, are not without hope that they may practically approve it, by severally adopting a similar measure. It is not, indeed, unreasonable to suppose that those Governments have, like this, waited only for the evidence of facts which might not only suffice to justify them, under the laws and usages of nations, but to satisfy Spain herself that nothing has been prematurely done, or which could justly offend her feelings, or be considered as inconsistent with her rights. As their motives for not having hitherto recognised the independence of Spanish America may thus be supposed to have been analogous to our own, it is permitted to presume that the facts and reasons which have prevailed on us no longer to hesitate will, confirmed as they are by our example, have a like influence on them.

No nation can entertain a more sincere deference for the feelings of Spain, or take a more lively interest in her welfare, than the United States. It is to this deference, too evident to be doubted or misunderstood, that ought to be ascribed the hesitation of this Government, until now, to yield to the claims of Spanish America, although these claims were in perfect accordance with our own principles, feelings, and interests. Having thus forborne to act, even at the hazard of having those principles and feelings misunderstood on this side of the Atlantic, we have, as your committee believe, given at once satisfactory proof of our disinterestedness and moderation, and of our scrupulous respect to the principle which leaves the political institutions of every foreign state to be directed by its own view of its own rights and interests.

Your committee have been particularly anxious to show, in a manner satisfactory to Spain herself, that the measure which this Government now proposes to adopt has been considered with the most respectful attention, both in relation to her rights and to her feelings.

It is not on the laws and usages of nations, or on the practice of Spain herself, on like occasions, that your committee have relied for our justification towards her.

The fact that for the last three years she has not sent a single company of troops against her transatlantic colonies has not been used as evidence of their actual independence, or of her want of power to oppose it. This fact, explained as it is by the public acts of Spain herself, is regarded by your committee as evidence only of her policy.

The last troops collected at Cadiz in 1819, which were destined to suppress the revolutionary movements in Spanish America, not only rejected that service, but joined in the revolution which has since proved successful in Spain herself. The declaration of the leaders in that revolution was, that "Spanish America had a right to be free, and that Spain should be free." Although the constitution which was re-established by that revolution guarantied the integrity of the Spanish dominions, yet the principles on which that constitution was founded seem to discountenance the employment of force for the accomplishment of that object, in contempt of the equal rights and declared will of the American portion of the Spanish people. The conduct of the Government organized under that constitution has uniformly been, in this respect, in conformity to those principles. Since its existence, there has not been even a proposal by that Government to employ force for the subjugation of the American provinces, but merely recommendations of conciliatory measures for their pacification.

The answer of the Cortes, on the 10th of July, 1820, to the address of the King, furnishes conclusive proof of this policy.

"The intimate union," says this answer, "of the Cortes with your Majesty, the re-establishment of the constitution, the faithful performance of promises, depriving malevolence of all pretext, will facilitate the pacification of the ultramarine provinces, which are in a state of agitation and dissension. The Cortes, on its part, will omit no opportunity to propose and adopt measures necessary for the observance of the constitution and restoration of tranquillity in those countries, to the end that the Spains of both worlds may thus form a single and happy family."

Although the ultramarine provinces are not here encouraged to expect absolute independence, yet they are no longer treated as vassal colonies, or threatened with subjugation, but are actually recognised as brothers in the great constitutional and free family of Spain.

A report made to the Cortes on the 24th of June, 1821, by a committee appointed by that body, not only manifestly corroborates the policy above stated, but sufficiently intimates that the recognition of the independence of Spanish America by Spain herself had nearly been the measure recommended by that committee.

That report avers that "tranquillity is not sufficient, even if it should extend throughout America with a prospect of permanency: no! it falls short of the wishes of the friends of humanity."

In speaking of the measure demanded by the crisis, it says that this measure was not only warmly approved by the committee, but at first entirely assented to by the ministers, with whom it had been discussed, and failed only to be proposed to the Cortes "by these ministers having, on account of peculiar occurrences, suspended their judgment." It speaks of this measure as indicative of a new and glorious resolution; that it was demanded by America and the true interests of the Peninsula; that from it Spain might reap advantages which otherwise she could never expect; and that the ties of kindred and the uniformity of religion, with commercial relations, and those emanating from free institutions, would be the surest pledge of mutual harmony and close union.

Your committee do not feel themselves authorized to say positively what that measure was, but they do not hesitate to declare their entire conviction that no measure short of a full recognition of unconditional independence could have deserved the character, nor been capable of producing the effects ascribed to it.

It is, therefore, sufficiently manifest that Spain, far from wishing to call into action her means of prosecuting hostilities against the people of Spanish America, has renounced even the feelings of an enemy towards them, and, but for "peculiar occurrences," had been prepared, nearly a year ago, to consent to their independence.

She has not only practically discontinued, and even emphatically deprecated, the employment of force to restore tranquillity to Spanish America, but she has declared that even universal and permanent tranquillity there "falls short of the wishes of the friends of humanity."

While she appeals to "the ties of kindred," she undoubtedly feels them; and if she has not abandoned her desire, so often avowed, of mere constitutional union and equal commercial intercourse with her former colonies, as between provinces of the same empire—a union and an intercourse which intervening Andes and oceans seem to render highly inconvenient, if not utterly impracticable—she evidently refers the accomplishment of this desire to the unawed deliberations and to the congenial and kindred feelings of the people of those colonies, and thus substantially acknowledges their independence.

Whatever may be the policy of Spain, however, in respect to her former American colonies, our recognition of their independence can neither affect her rights, nor impair her means, in the accomplishment of that policy. We cannot, for this, be justly accused of aiding in the attainment of an independence which has already been established without our assistance. Besides, our recognition must necessarily be co-existent only with the fact on which it is founded, and cannot survive it. While the nations of Spanish America are actually independent, it is simply to speak the truth to acknowledge them to be so.

Should Spain, contrary to her avowed principles and acknowledged interests, renew the war for the conquest of South America, we shall indeed regret it, but we shall observe, as we have done, between the independent parties, an honest and impartial neutrality; but, on the other hand, should Spain, faithful to her own glory and prosperity, consent that her offspring in the new world should enjoy the right of self-government equally with their brethren in the old, we shall sincerely rejoice; and we shall cherish with equal satisfaction, and cultivate with equal assiduity, the friendship of regenerated Spain and of emancipated America.

Your committee, in justice to their own feelings and to the feelings of their fellow-citizens, have made this declaration without disguise; and they trust that the uniform character and conduct of this people will save it from all liability to misinterpretation.

Happy in our own institutions, we claim no privilege; we indulge no ambition to extend them to other nations; we admit the equal rights of all nations to form their own governments and to administer their own internal affairs as they may judge proper; and, however they may, in these respects, differ from us, we do not on that account regard with the less satisfaction their tranquillity and happiness.

Your committee having thus considered the subject referred to them in all its aspects, are unanimously of opinion that it is just and expedient to acknowledge the independence of the several nations of Spanish America, without any reference to the diversity in the forms of their governments; and, in accordance with this opinion, they respectfully submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President in his message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the American provinces of Spain which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognised by the United States as independent nations.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition.

Extract from the report of the committee [of the Cortes] to whom was referred the disturbances in the American provinces, with instructions to prepare measures for their general pacification.

Still New Spain, or rather the whole of the Spanish provinces in North America, having almost entirely returned to a state of tranquillity, at that period so desolating a war was terminated; while, on the other hand, a considerable part of Peru constantly adhered to Spain, as has also been the case with Cuba and the other islands. Thus while on the main, in Buenos Ayres, and in Chili, the afflicting spectacle was beheld of Spanish and American blood being shed by the very hands which had the greatest interest in its preservation, the most important part of Spanish America remained free from so many calamities. But this tranquillity is not sufficient, even if it should extend throughout America with a prospect of permanency: no! it falls short of the wishes of the friends of humanity. It is necessary that America should build her happiness upon a solid foundation, so that, far from counteracting, she may contribute to the prosperity of Europe.

Your committee, persuaded of this truth, discussed in their several sittings the questions which appeared most proper to attain the grand object we all have in view. These were examined in conjunction with His Majesty's ministers, who, in the beginning, entirely coincided in the general opinion prevailing in the committee, but were subsequently induced, by peculiar occurrences, to suspend their judgment, believing that public opinion was not yet prepared for a final decision. In this situation your committee are unable to bring forward any formal proposition, inasmuch as it belongs to the Government to determine the matter of fact—that is to say, as to the expediency and urgency of certain measures; and the cabinet not thinking that moment yet arrived, nothing now remains to your committee but strongly to recommend to ministers the acceleration of so desirable a moment. This is loudly called for by justice; it is demanded by the uncertain and precarious fate of so many European Spaniards settled in those countries; it is demanded by the natives themselves, and the different classes who have so gallantly supported the cause of the metropolis; in fine, it is demanded by America and the true interests of the Peninsula: the prosperity of the former resting in the restoration of tranquillity, which will prove a source of incalculable benefit to her; and that of the latter in not being obstructed in her progress, by having her councils distracted by cares created by the deplorable situation of those distant climes. The lights of the age and a wise policy ought to guide the Government in forming so new and so glorious a resolution.

Your committee, fully sensible of the greatness of the subject, and believing that their decision will, perhaps, affect the interests of the whole world, would wish to impress upon the minds of all Spaniards this their firm conviction, that they might all contribute to the completion of so great a work. Spain would reap advantages which otherwise she can never expect; and the ties of kindred, and the uniformity of religion, together with commercial relations, and those emanating from free institutions, would be the surest pledge of mutual harmony and close union. Your committee, therefore, not being able alone to come to any determination, content themselves with simply proposing that ministers be urged to lay before the Cortes, with the least possible delay, the fundamental basis of such measures as they may deem advisable and just, both for the complete pacification of the distracted provinces of America, and to secure to them all solid and lasting happiness.

17th Congress.] No. 328. [1st Session.

GREAT BRITAIN AND RUSSIA: TERRITORIAL CLAIMS UPON THE NORTHWEST COAST OF AMERICA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 17, 1822.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, April 15, 1822.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th of February last, requesting the President of the United States "to communicate to that House whether any foreign Government has made claim to any part of the territory of the United States upon the coast of the Pacific ocean north of the forty-second degree of latitude, and to what extent; whether any regulations have been made by foreign Powers affecting the trade on that coast, and how far it affects the interests of this republic; and whether any communications have been made to this Government by foreign Powers touching the contemplated occupation of Columbia river," I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, containing the information embraced by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, April 13, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th of February last, requesting the President of the United States "to communicate to that House whether any foreign Government has made claim to any part of the territory of the United States upon the coast of the Pacific ocean north of the forty-second degree of latitude, and to what extent; whether any regulations have been made by foreign Powers affecting the trade on that coast, and how far it affects the interests of this republic; and whether any communications have been made to this Government by foreign Powers touching the contemplated occupation of Columbia river," has the honor of submitting to the President sundry papers, containing the information embraced by the resolution.

At the time when the subject of the proposed occupation of the Columbia river was presented to the consideration of Congress, at their last session, the minister of Great Britain, at two several interviews with the Secretary of State, suggested that Great Britain had claims on the northwest coast of America, with which he conceived that such occupation on the part of the United States would conflict; and requested to be informed what were the intentions of the Government of the United States in this respect. The Secretary of State declined answering those inquiries, or discussing those claims, otherwise than in writing. But no written communication upon the subject has been received.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Baker, Chargé d'Affaires from Great Britain.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 18, 1815.

It is represented that an expedition which has been sent by your Government against a post of the United States, established on Columbia river, had succeeded in taking possession of it. By the first article of the treaty of peace, it is stipulated that all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, shall be restored without delay, with the exception only of the islands in Passamaquoddy bay, which should remain in the possession of the party in whose occupation they then were, subject to the decision provided for in the fourth article. As the post on Columbia river was taken during the war, and is not within the exception stipulated, the United States are of course entitled to its restitution; measures, therefore, will be taken to reoccupy it without delay. It is probable that your Government may have given orders for its restitution: to prevent, however, any difficulty on the subject, I have to request that you will have the goodness to furnish me with a letter to the British commander there to that effect.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER, Esq.

Mr. Baker, Chargé d'Affaires from Great Britain, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, July 23, 1815.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 18th instant, acquainting me that it had been represented to the American Government that a British force, sent for that purpose, had succeeded in taking possession of the United States establishment on Columbia river, and claiming its restoration under the words of the first article of the treaty, upon the ground of its having been captured during the war; stating, likewise, that His Majesty's Government may have given order for its restitution, but requesting, with a view to prevent any difficulty on the subject, that I would furnish a letter to that effect to the British commander there.

As I have received no communication from His Majesty's Government on the subject of these orders, you will readily, I am convinced, perceive the impracticability of my furnishing a letter of this nature; and although it is believed that the post in question has been captured, of which, however, the American Government does not appear to have any certain information on which to ground the claim of restitution, yet another point, equally essential, remains in great uncertainty, viz: whether any persons whatsoever were left to retain possession of it. My impression is, that the establishment was broken up, and the persons found there brought away. Vice Admiral Dixon, however, the commander-in-chief of His Majesty's naval forces on the Brazil station, in whose command the Pacific ocean is included, is no doubt in possession of every necessary information in relation to this post, and will be able to communicate on the subject with any authorized agent on the part of the United States.

Having observed that you have stated, in two letters which I have lately had the honor of receiving from you, that I had been particularly charged with the execution of the treaty of peace, I avail myself of this opportunity of noticing the circumstance, simply with a view of preventing any possible misapprehension which might be produced by it. You will perceive, on a reference to the two credentials empowering me to exchange the ratifications, and to act as His Majesty's chargé d'affaires, that no such particular authority was vested in me, although the general powers of the above character would undoubtedly enable me to promote, and in some respects accomplish, this object.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect,

Sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER.

Mr. Bagot, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, November 26, 1817.

From the conversation which you did me the honor to hold with me two days ago upon the occasion of the inquiry which I thought it my duty to make relative to the reported destination of the United States sloop of war Ontario, I am, I presume, warranted in inferring that the information which I had previously received upon that subject is essentially correct, and that one of the objects of the voyage of the Ontario is to establish a settlement in the neighborhood of the Columbia river, on the northwest coast of America.

It will be remembered that, some months after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of peace, an application was made to Mr. Baker, then His Majesty's chargé d'affaires in this country, claiming the restitution of a post which had been held by the United States upon the Columbia river, and which was alleged to have been captured during the war; and Mr. Baker was requested to take steps for the purpose of facilitating its restoration.

Mr. Baker, having, in his reply, pointed out the insufficiency of the evidence on which the claim of restitution appeared to be founded, and having represented his want of authentic information and instructions upon the subject, referred the Secretary of State to the British admiral, within whose command he conceived the Pacific ocean to be included.

In consequence of this correspondence, an application was soon afterwards made by Mr. Baker to the Governor General of Canada, in the expectation that he, perhaps, might be enabled to furnish some information upon the subject, in the event of the question being again brought into discussion.

From the reports then made by him, it appeared that the post in question had not been captured during the late war, but that the Americans had retired from it, under an agreement made with the Northwest Company, who had purchased their effects, and who had ever since retained peaceable possession of the coast.

As it thus appears that no claim for the restitution of this post can be grounded upon the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and as the territory itself was early taken possession of in His Majesty's name, and has been since considered as forming a part of His Majesty's dominions, I have to request that you will do me the honor to furnish me with such explanation as you may judge proper of the object of the voyage of the Ontario, so far as it may relate to establishments upon the territory to which I refer, in order that I may represent to His Majesty's Government, in its just point of view, a measure in which His Majesty's rights and interests appear to be so materially involved.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, February 14, 1818.

I am now to have the honor of stating all that passed in the conversation with Lord Castlereagh on the 1st of this month.

His lordship introduced in the last place (assuaging as much as possible, by his manner, the essential character of his remarks) the affair of the establishment at the mouth of the river Columbia. A despatch from Mr. Bagot, he observed, had acquainted the Government here with the steps lately taken by the Government of the United States to repossess itself of that post; and he had to express to me the regret which had been felt at the measure. It was to have been wished, he intimated, that, before the Ontario sailed, notice had been given to the British minister at Washington of the intention to despatch her, with a communication of the objects of her destination; Great Britain having a claim of dominion over the territory in question. He went on to inform me that Mr. Bagot had sent in a remonstrance upon the occasion, to which, at the last dates, an answer had not been returned. His lordship closed by saying that it was the desire of this Government to submit to the Government of the United States a proposal that the claim of title to this post should, as in the two former instances, go before commissioners, and be governed, in other respects, by the precedent of the treaty, annexing to it a third supplemental article as the groundwork of an eventual arbitration.

To his propositions and remarks I made such replies as the nature of all, and the novelty of some of them, appeared to demand. First, as to the settlement at Columbia river: Having heard nothing from the Department upon the subject, I was necessarily uninformed of what passed at Washington. I could only treat it as my first impressions dictated. I expressed the surprise which I felt at its assuming an aspect of complaint. The just grounds upon which England claimed dominion were, I said, unknown to me. Granting that there did exist in her favor any claim or pretence of right, was it possible that the lawfulness of the step taken could be drawn into question? That the spot was in our possession before the war, was a fact known to the world; that it fell, by belligerant capture, into the hands of Britain, whilst it raged, was alike notorious. How, then, under a treaty which stipulated the mutual restitution of all places reduced by the arms of either party, was our right to immediate and full repossession to be, for an instant, impugned? I adverted to the familiar case of Nootka sound and the Falkland islands. Here Great Britain, under circumstances far less strong, had asserted the undeniable principle of which we had claimed the benefit. In fine, I knew not how to illustrate or justify, by argument, a measure which seemed to rest upon so broad and indisputable a foundation of national right. It is proper, at this stage, to say that Lord Castlereagh admitted, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating of the title. The manner of obtaining it, he said, was alone to be lamented, declaring that it arose from the possible tendency which it might have to give some momentary disturbance in that region to the general harmony subsisting between the countries. He hoped sincerely this would not be the case, and added that, with a view to forestall, by the most prompt and practicable means, such a result, he had addressed a note to the lords of the admiralty, and another to Lord Bathurst, Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, on the 26th of last month, desiring that the proper orders might be expedited to prevent, under whatever form, all hostile collision. A copy of these notes he took down and read to me.

I proceeded with further remarks. Though it was scarcely to be expected, I said, that I could yet have received information from my Government relative to the measure, and although, in fact, nothing had reached me, I was nevertheless most abundantly confident that it had originated in no unfriendly motive or feeling. It had so happened, I continued, that I had been honored with some knowledge of the executive deliberations at about the time the Ontario sailed, which left me the less scruple in making this assertion. It was true I had come away before her final departure; but sure I felt that there could have been no alteration in the unexceptionable views that had suggested the voyage; and, above all, I subjoined, that the use of force, as a means of re-establishing our previous dominion, had in nowise coupled itself with the intentions that were formed. These assurances, I thought, appeared to go some lengths towards placing the transaction in its innocent and justifiable lights. Given, as they were, frankly, I hope that what I said may be found to meet the President's approbation. I felt all the extravagance of the supposition that there had been any deviation, on the part of the Government, in this instance, from its wonted respect to the rights of other nations. Lord Castlereagh did not, in any way, unfold the nature of the British claim.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Rush, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in London, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 20, 1818.

From the tenor of your correspondence with Lord Castlereagh, reported in your despatch No. 7, as well as from the communications made here on the same subject by Mr. Bagot, it appears that the British Government have acceded to the proposals heretofore made on our part, to refer the question which has arisen upon the construction of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, in relation to the restitution of slaves carried away from the United States after the ratification of the treaty of peace, to the arbitration of a friendly sovereign. This accession is understood to be absolute and unconditional, but accompanied with the suggestion of a wish on the part of the British cabinet to try, as a previous measure, the experiment adopted for the adjustment of other questions between the two countries, of submitting the case to the decision of commissioners mutually chosen by the two parties; submitting at the same time to the same, or other commissioners appointed in like manner, the ascertainment and demarcation of a boundary line from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods, westward; and the right and title of the United States to a settlement at the mouth of Columbia river on the Pacific ocean.

If the proposal to refer to commissioners the decision of the question relating to the slaves, before having recourse to the arbitration, had been confined to that object, it would have been accepted without hesitation or delay. But it has been so connected with the others, that Lord Castlereagh at least avoided committing his Government to the engagement of disposing, in that manner, of this particular point of difference by itself. Mr. Bagot's statement of the proposal is of the same character. Without explicitly declaring that the British Government would decline submitting the slave question alone to commissioners, he did not profess to be authorized to agree to it separately, and urged, on various grounds, the expediency of arranging, as soon as possible, and by the same means, all the subjects which might even be hereafter occasions of misunderstanding between the two countries.

Taken altogether as a complicated proposal, it involves a multitude of considerations, which require some deliberation before a definitive answer can be given. As soon as the President shall have come to a determination concerning it, the result will be immediately communicated to you. In the mean time, it may be proper that you should assure Lord Castlereagh that it was entirely owing to accident, and to the communications which had previously passed between the late Secretary of State and Mr. Baker concerning the restitution of the post at the mouth of Columbia river, that the Ontario was despatched for the purpose of resuming our possession there, without giving notice of the expedition to Mr. Bagot and to his Government. Copies of these communications are herewith enclosed, from which it was concluded that no authorized English establishment existed at that place; and as they intimated no question whatever of the title of the United States to the settlement which existed there before the late war, it did not occur that any such question had since arisen, which could make it an object of interest to Great Britain. You are authorized to add, that notice of the departure of the Ontario, and of the object of her voyage, would nevertheless have been given, but that the expedition was determined, and the vessel despatched, during the President's absence from the seat of Government the last season.

These explanations have already been given to Mr. Bagot, who has expressed himself entirely satisfied with them, and his conviction that they will be equally satisfactory to his Government. As it was not anticipated that any disposition existed in the British Government to start questions of title with us on the borders of the South sea, we could have no possible motive for reserve or concealment with regard to the expedition of the Ontario. In suggesting these ideas to Lord Castlereagh, rather in conversation than in any more formal manner, it may be proper to remark the minuteness of the present interests, either to Great Britain or to the United States, involved in this concern; and the unwillingness, for that reason, of this Government to include it among the objects of serious discussion with them. At the same time you might give him to understand, though not unless in a manner to avoid every thing offensive in the suggestion, that, from the nature of things, if in the course of future events it should ever become an object of serious importance to the United States, it can scarcely be supposed that Great Britain would find it useful or advisable to resist their claim to possession by systematic opposition. If the United States leave her in undisturbed enjoyment of all her holds upon Europe, Asia, and Africa, with all her actual possessions in this hemisphere, we may very fairly expect that she will not think it consistent either with a wise or a friendly policy to watch with eyes of jealousy and alarm every possibility of extension to our natural dominion in North America, which she can have no solid interest to prevent, until all possibility of her preventing it shall have vanished.

Extract of a letter from R. Rush, Esq., Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at London, to the Secretary of State, dated

JULY 25, 1818.

Lord Castlereagh returned from Ireland sooner than was expected, having got back on the 14th of this month. On the 15th I wrote him a note, requesting an official interview, which he granted me on the 16th.

I began the conversation by affording the explanations embraced in your despatch No. 4, respecting the Ontario's voyage to the mouth of the river Columbia. In the course of them, I particularly dwelt, according to your instructions, upon the correspondence which took place between the Secretary of State and Mr. Baker soon after the peace, in which the latter never made a question as to the valid title of the United States, or intimated the existence of any authorized establishment at that post, on the part of Great Britain, before the war. His lordship said nothing in reply, though it appeared to me that the explanation was satisfactory to him, removing as it does all ground of complaint.

From Mr. Prevost to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MONTE REY, NEW CALIFORNIA, November 11, 1818.

In conformity with mine of the 27th July, which I had the honor to address to your Department from Lima, I proceeded in His Britannic Majesty's sloop of war Blossom to the mouth of the Columbia, and entered the river on the 1st of October following. A few days thereafter, to wit, on the 6th, as you will perceive by referring to a copy of the act of surrender, (marked A,) I received in the name and on the part of the United States the possession of the establishment at Fort George, made under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, by Captain Hickey, of the royal navy, in compliance with the orders of the Prince Regent for that purpose, signified to him through the medium of the Earl Bathurst. The British flag was thereupon lowered, and that of the United States hoisted in its stead, where it now waves in token both of possession and of sovereignty.

The establishment, of which the annexed sketch (No. 1) will give you a correct idea, has been considerably extended and improved by the agents of the Northwest Company of Canada, who will continue to occupy and protect it under our flag, until it shall please the President to give orders for their removal. I will, however, suggest that, when this disposition shall take place, time ought to be granted in a ratio with the distance, to enable them to obtain the means of transporting the private property deposited there, consisting of dry goods, furs, and implements of war, to a large amount. Shortly after the ceremony and surrender, I received a note on this subject from Mr. Keith, the gentleman whose signature accompanies that of Captain Hickey, which, together with a copy of my answer, (No. 2,) is submitted for your inspection. A sense of justice would have dictated the assurances I have given him in reply; but I had a further motive, which was that of subsiding the apprehensions excited by the abrupt visit of the Ontario. It appeared to me prudent, in this view, to take no notice of the suggestion relative to a discussion of boundary, and, in answering, to avoid any intimation of immediate or of future removal, as either might have induced him to form a settlement elsewhere on the river, and thus give rise to collisions between the two Governments which may now be wholly avoided.

The bay is spacious, contains several anchoring places in a sufficient depth of water, and is by no means so difficult of ingress as has been represented. Those enjoying the exclusive commerce have probably cherished an impression so favorable to its continuance, growing out of the incomplete survey of Lieutenant Broughton, made under the orders of Vancouver, in 1792. It is true that there is a bar extending across the mouth of the river, at either extremity of which are, at times, appalling breakers; but it is equally true that it offers, at the lowest tides, a depth of twenty-one feet of water throughout a passage exempt from them of nearly a league in width. The Blossom, carrying more guns than the Ontario, encountering a change of wind while in the channel, was compelled to let go the anchor, and, when again weighed, to tack and beat in order to reach the harbor, yet found a greater depth, and met with no difficulty either then or on leaving the bay. The survey marked C may be relied on for its accuracy. The bearings, distances, and soundings were taken by Captain Hickey, who was kind enough to lend himself to the examination, and to furnish me with this result. It is the more interesting as it shows that, with the aid of buoys, the access, to vessels of almost any tonnage, may be rendered secure. In addition to this, it is susceptible of entire defence, because a ship, after passing the bar, in order to avoid the breaking of the sea on one of the banks, is obliged to bear up directly for the knoll forming the cape, at all times, to approach within a short distance of its base, and most frequently then to anchor. Thus, a small battery erected on this point, in conjunction with the surges on the opposite side, would so endanger the approach as to deter an enemy, however hardy, from the attempt.

This outlet, the only one between the thirty-eighth and fifty-third degrees of latitude, embraces the entire range of country from the ocean to the mountains, and its interior unites the advantage of a water communication throughout, by means of the many streams tributary to the Columbia; two of which disembogue opposite to each other, within twenty-five leagues of the port, are navigable, and nearly of equal magnitude with this beautiful river. The ocean teems with the otter, (mustela,) the seal, and the whale; while the main land affords, in innumerable quantities, the common otter, (musk,) the bear, the buffalo, and the whole variety of deer.

It has been observed by those exploring this coast that the climate to the southward of 53° assumes a mildness unknown in the same latitude on the eastern side of the continent. Without digressing to speculate upon the cause, I will merely state that such is particularly the fact in 46° 16′, the site of Fort George. The mercury during the winter seldom descends below the freezing point; when it does so, it is rarely stationary for any number of days, and the severity of the season is more determined by the quantity of water than by its congelation. The rains usually commence with November, and continue to fall partially until the latter end of March or beginning of April. A benign spring succeeds; and when the summer heats obtain, they are so tempered by showers as seldom to suspend vegetation. I found it luxuriant on my arrival, and during a fortnight's stay experienced no change of weather to retard its course. The soil is good; all the cereal, gramina, and tuberous plants may be cultivated with advantage, and the waters abound in salmon, sturgeon, and other varieties of fish.

The natives, in appearance as well as in character, differ essentially from those with us. They are less in stature, more delicately formed, and singular in the shape of the head, which, in infancy, is compressed between two small plates of wood or metal, so as in its growth to obtain the semblance of a wedge. They are inquisitive, cheerful, sagacious, possess fewer of the vices attributed to the savage, and are less addicted to cruelties in war; scalping is unknown to them, and a prisoner suffers the infliction of no other punishment than that of becoming a slave to the captor; but as they neither sow nor reap, an observer cannot easily discern in what the servitude consists. The wants of the one are supplied by his own address in the use of the bow and the spear, while those of the other require the same efforts and equal skill for their gratification.

The language on the side of the falls bears a strong analogy to that of Nootka, so much so that, with the aid of a Spanish vocabulary of the latter, accompanying the voyage of Valdes, I could, notwithstanding the imperfection in this mode of conveying and of obtaining sounds, express my wants and be perfectly understood. I met with several of the natives who had heretofore volunteered on board of some one of our vessels in their fur excursions, two of whom had acquired a sufficient knowledge of our language to speak it with some ease, and were extremely solicitous to embark with us.

I regret that I could not collect sufficient data upon which to ground an estimate of the furs gathered on the Columbia; it was impossible, for reasons that are obvious. Humboldt has undertaken to number those of the otter taken on the coast and shipped to China, of which he assigns five-sixths to the American; he may be correct in the quantity, but I doubt whether the proportion be quite so great, as it frequently happens that the English adventurer confides his stock to our countrymen in order to participate in the benefit of a market, from a direct intercourse with which he is excluded by the laws of his country.

Perhaps I have gone too much into detail; but it appeared to me that, by exhibiting the importance of the position only, I should not have fulfilled the object of the President; that it was equally incumbent upon me to present a view of the country, of its inhabitants, of its resources, of its approach, and of its means of defence. I shall now conclude with the relation of an occurrence which may and ought to influence the course to be adopted and pursued as to this station.

The speculations of Humboldt, his glowing descriptions of the soil and climate of this province, have probably given a new direction to the ambition of Russia, and determined its Emperor to the acquisition of empire in America. Until 1816 the settlements of this Power did not reach to the southward of 55°,* and were of no consideration, although dignified by them with the title of Russian America. In the commencement of that year two distinct establishments were made, of a different and of a more imposing character: the first at Atooi, one of the Sandwich islands; the other in this vicinity, within a few leagues of San Francisco, the most northerly possession of Spain, in 37° 56′. The sketch I subjoin, marked D, was procured from a member of the Government at this place; from whom I also learned that its augmentation has since become so considerable as to excite serious alarm. Two Russian ships left this on their way thither a few days anterior to our arrival; the one having on board mechanics of every description, together with implements of husbandry. We passed sufficiently near the spot assigned to it to distinguish the coast with some precision, and ascertained that it was an open road—a circumstance that renders the position liable to many objections, if intended to be permanent; in other respects, the choice is judicious for an infant colony. It enjoys a climate still milder than that of Columbia, is environed by a beautiful country, and its proximity to an old settlement enables the Russian to partake of the numerous herds of black cattle and horses that have been there multiplying for the last fifty years. The port of St. Francis is one of the most convenient, extensive, and safe in the world, wholly without defence, and in the neighborhood of a feeble, diffused, and disaffected population. Under all these circumstances, may we not infer views to the early possession of this harbor, and ultimately to the sovereignty of entire California? Surely the growth of a race on these shores, scarcely emerged from the savage state, guided by a chief who seeks not to emancipate but to enthral, is an event to be deprecated—an event, the mere apprehension of which ought to excite the jealousies of the United States, so far, at least, as to induce the cautionary measure of preserving a station which may serve as a barrier to a northern aggrandizement.

I have not been able to gather other information respecting the settlement at Atooi than that of an assurance of its existence—a fact corroborated by the visit of the two ships to those islands in their route hither. The Russians are not yet such enterprising navigators as to augment sea risks by extending a voyage several thousand miles without an object. Such was the case in this instance, unless connected with the settlement, as they had sailed from Lima abundantly supplied a few weeks prior to my first visit to that city, in April last.

These islands yield the sandal wood, so much esteemed in China, and have been resorted to by our vessels for years past, not only in search of this valuable article, but of the necessary stock of fresh provisions to supply the crew during their cruise on the northwest coast. How far this intercourse may be affected hereafter by this encroachment, is also a subject for the consideration of the President.

I have taken the liberty to enclose a note marked E, of the authorities, Spanish as well as English, that have fallen under my view, illustrating the discovery of the Columbia by Mr. Gray, in 1791. Its subsequent occupation in 1811, by which the sovereignty of the United States was completed, to the exclusion of any European claimant, is a fact of which the surrender of the sole establishment on the river is conclusive evidence.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, your very humble servant,

J. B. PREVOST.

Act of surrender and acknowledgment.

In obedience to the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, signified in a despatch from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, addressed to the partners or agents of the Northwest Company, bearing date 27th January, 1818, and in obedience to subsequent orders, dated the 26th July last, from William H. Sheriff, Esquire, captain of His Majesty's ship Andromache, we, the undersigned, do, in conformity to the first article of the treaty of Ghent, restore to the Government of the United States, through its agent, J. B. Prevost, Esquire, the settlement of Fort George, on the river Columbia.

Given under our hands, in triplicate, at Fort George, Columbia river, this 6th of October, 1818.

F. HICKEY,
Captain of His Majesty's Ship Blossom.
JAMES KEITH,
Of the Northwest Company.

I do hereby acknowledge to have this day received, on behalf of the Government of the United States, the possession of the settlement designated above, in conformity to the first article of the treaty of Ghent.

Given under my hand, in triplicate, at Fort George, Columbia river, this 6th of October, 1818.

J. B. PREVOST,
Agent for the United States.

No. 1.

Mr. Keith to Mr. Prevost.

SIR: FORT GEORGE, COLUMBIA RIVER, October 6, 1818.

Now that the restitution and the settlement have been made, and that the Northwest Company are still allowed to occupy it in the prosecution of their commercial pursuits, permit me to submit to you the following important queries, to which I request a candid and explicit reply: Whether or not you feel authorized, on behalf of the United States, to tender me any assurance, or to afford any security, that no abandonment or relinquishment of said settlement will be claimed by your Government in favor of any of its subjects, to the ejectment and exclusion of said Northwest Company, prior to the final decision of the right of sovereignty to the country between our respective Governments? And pending such discussion, as also in the event of such sovereignty being confirmed to the United States, may the Northwest Company implicitly rely on the justice and equity of your Government, that adequate allowance will be made for any extension or amelioration of aforesaid settlement, or of the trade dependant thereon, of which circumstances may from time to time suggest the propriety?

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES KEITH,
Acting for self and Northwest Company.

J. B. PREVOST, Esq.

No. 2.

SIR: FORT GEORGE, COLUMBIA RIVER, October 6, 1818.

In answer to your note of this morning, I have the honor to state that the principal object of the President in sending me thus far was to obtain such information of the place, of its access, and of its commercial importance, as might enable him to submit to the consideration of Congress measures for the protection and extension of the establishment. From hence you will perceive that, until the sense of the Government may be taken upon my report, any assurances I might offer to meet the wishes expressed by you would be as unauthorized as unavailing.

I, however, sir, have no hesitation in saying that, should it hereafter comport with the views of the nation to foster the settlement, any claim of the Northwest Company, justified by the usages of nations, will be liquidated with great liberality; and that, should its policy induce a system of exclusion, it will never extend to your removal without sufficient notice to prevent loss and injury to the company.

I cannot take my leave, sir, without expressing my approbation of the manner in which an establishment so precarious has been managed, nor without offering a hope that the same judicious course may be pursued under the change of flag for its success, until the pleasure of the President can be known.

J. B. PREVOST.

The Chevalier de Poletica to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, January 30, [February 11,] 1822.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, in consequence of orders which have lately reached him, hastens herewith to transmit to Mr. Adams,

Secretary of State in the Department of Foreign Affairs, a printed copy of the regulation adopted by the Russian American Company, and sanctioned by His Imperial Majesty, relative to foreign commerce in the waters bordering the establishments of the said company on the northwest coast of America.

The undersigned conceives it to be, moreover, his duty to inform Mr. Adams that the Imperial Government, in adopting the regulation, supposes that a foreign ship, which shall have sailed from a European port after the 1st of March, 1822, or from one of the ports of the United States after the 1st of July of the same year, cannot lawfully pretend ignorance of these new measures.

The undersigned eagerly embraces this occasion of offering to Mr. Adams the assurance of his high consideration.

PIERRE DE POLETICA.

Mr. ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Edict of His Imperial Majesty, Autocrat of all the Russias.

The Directing Senate maketh known unto all men:

Whereas, in an edict of His Imperial Majesty, issued to the Directing Senate on the 4th day of September, and signed by His Imperial Majesty's own hand, it is thus expressed:

"Observing, from reports submitted to us, that the trade of our subjects on the Aleutian islands, and on the northwest coast of America, appertaining unto Russia, is subjected, because of secret and illicit traffic, to oppression and impediments; and finding that the principal cause of these difficulties is the want of rules establishing the boundaries for navigation along these coasts, and the order of naval communication, as well in these places as on the whole of the eastern coast of Siberia and the Kurile islands, we have deemed it necessary to determine these communications by specific regulations, which are hereto attached.

"In forwarding these regulations to the Directing Senate, we command that the same be published for universal information, and that the proper measures be taken to carry them into execution."

COUNT D. GURIEF, Minister of Finances.

It is therefore decreed by the Directing Senate that His Imperial Majesty's edict be published for the information of all men, and that the same be obeyed by all whom it may concern.

Be it accordingly.

ALEXANDER.

KAMENNOY OSTROFF, September 4, 1821.

Rules established for the limits of navigation and order of communication along the coast of the Eastern Siberia, the northwestern coast of America, and the Aleutian, Kurile, and other islands.

SEC. 1. The pursuits of commerce, whaling, and fishery, and of all other industry, on all islands, ports, and gulfs, including the whole of the northwest coast of America, beginning from Bhering's strait to the fifty-first degree of northern latitude, also from the Aleutian islands to the eastern coast of Siberia, as well as along the Kurile islands from Bhering's strait to the south cape of the island of Urup, viz: to 45° 50′ northern latitude, are exclusively granted to Russian subjects.

SEC. 2. It is therefore prohibited to all foreign vessels not only to land on the coasts and islands belonging to Russia, as stated above, but also to approach them within less than a hundred Italian miles. The transgressor's vessel is subject to confiscation, along with the whole cargo.

SEC. 3. An exception to this rule is to be made in favor of vessels carried thither by heavy gales, or real want of provisions, and unable to make any other shores but such as belong to Russia; in these cases, they are obliged to produce convincing proofs of actual reason for such an exception. Ships of friendly Governments, merely on discoveries, are likewise exempt from the foregoing rule, (section 2.) In this case, however, they must previously be provided with passports from the Russian Minister of the Navy.

SEC. 4. Foreign merchant ships which, for reasons stated in the foregoing rule, touch at any of the above-mentioned coasts, are obliged to endeavor to choose a place where Russians are settled, and to act as hereunder stated.

SEC. 5. On the arrival of a foreign merchant ship, wind and weather permitting, a pilot will meet her to appoint an anchoring place appropriated for the purpose. The captain who, notwithstanding this, anchors elsewhere without being able to assign a proper reason to the commander of the place, shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars.

SEC. 6. All rowing boats of foreign merchant vessels are obliged to land at one place appointed for them, where in the daytime a white flag is hung out, and at night a lantern, and where a clerk is to attend continually to prevent importing and exporting any articles or goods. Whoever lands at any other place, even without an intent of smuggling, shall pay a fine of fifty dollars; and if a person be discovered bringing any articles ashore, a fine of five hundred dollars is to be exacted, and the goods to be confiscated.

SEC. 7. The commanders of said vessels being in want of provisions, stores, &c. for the continuation of their voyage, are bound to apply to the commander of the place, who will appoint where these may be obtained, after which they may without difficulty send their boats there to procure all they want. Whosoever deviates from this rule shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars.

SEC. 8. If it be unavoidable, for the purpose of repairing or careening a foreign merchant ship, that she discharge the whole cargo, the master is obliged to ask the permission of the commander of the place. In this case, the captain shall deliver to the commander an exact list of the nature and quality of the goods discharged. Every one who omits to report any part of the cargo will be suspected of smuggling, and shall pay a fine of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 9. All expenses incurred by these vessels during their stay in the Russian territories must be paid in cash or bills of exchange. In case, however, the captains of these ships have no money on board, and nobody gives security for their bonds, the commander can, at their request, allow the sale of such articles, stores, or goods, required merely for defraying the above-stated expenses. These sales, however, can be made only to the company, and through the means of the commander, but must not exceed the expenses of the ships, under penalty of the cargo being seized, and a fine paid of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 10. As soon as said foreign merchant vessels are ready for their cargoes, stores, provisions, &c., they must immediately proceed to take them in; and after an examination, if they have loaded all the above-stated articles, and a written certificate of their not having left any thing behind, they are to set sail.

Such vessels as have not been unloaded are likewise subjected to sail without the least delay, as soon as they are able to proceed to sea.

SEC. 11. It is prohibited to all commanders of the said foreign vessels, commissioners, and others, whosoever they may be, to receive any articles, stores, or goods in those places where they will have landed, except in the case as per section 7, under penalty of seizure of their ship and cargo.

SEC. 12. It is prohibited to these foreign ships to receive on board, without especial permission of the commanders, any of the people in the service of the company, or of the foreigners living in the company's settlements.

Ships proved to have the intention of carrying off any person belonging to the colony shall be seized.

SEC. 13. Every purchase, sale, or barter is prohibited betwixt a foreign merchant ship and people in the service of the company. This prohibition extends equally to those who are on shore and to those employed in the company's ships.

Any ship acting against this rule shall pay five times the value of the articles, stores, or goods, constituting this prohibited traffic.

SEC. 14. It is likewise interdicted to foreign ships to carry on any traffic or barter with the natives of the islands and of the northwest coast of America, in the whole extent hereabove mentioned. A ship convicted of this trade shall be confiscated.

SEC. 15. All articles, stores, and goods, found on shore in ports or harbors belonging to Russian subjects, (carrying on prohibited traffic,) or to foreign vessels, are to be seized.

SEC. 16. The foreign merchant ships lying in harbor, or in the roads, dare, under no pretence, send out their boats to vessels at sea, or to those already come in, until they have been spoken to and visited, according to the existing customs. Whenever a foreign vessel hoists a yellow flag, to announce an infectious disease being on board, or the symptoms of the same, or any other danger of which she wishes to be freed, every communication is interdicted until said flag is taken down. From this rule, however, are excepted persons appointed for the purpose, and whose boats are under the colors of the Russian American Company.

Any vessel acting contrary to this regulation shall pay a fine of five hundred dollars.

SEC. 17. No ballast may be thrown overboard but in such places as are appointed by the commanders. The transgressor is liable to a fine of five hundred dollars.

SEC. 18. To all foreign merchant ships, during their stay in anchoring places, harbors, or roads, it is prohibited to have their guns loaded either with balls or cartridges, under the risk of paying a fine of fifty dollars for each gun.

SEC. 19. No foreign merchant ship in port, or in the roads, or riding at anchor, may fire guns or muskets without previously informing the commander of the place or settlement, unless it be for pilots, signalizing the same by the firing of one, two, or three guns, and hoisting her colors, as is customary in similar wants. In acting contrary thereto, she is subjected to a fine of one hundred dollars for each shot.

SEC. 20. On the arrival of a foreign ship in the harbor, or in the roads, a boat will immediately be sent to meet her, and to deliver to the captain a printed copy of these regulations, for which he must give receipt in a book destined for the purpose. He is further obliged to state in the book, as per annexed form, all information required of foreign vessels. All ships refusing to comply with these regulations dare not approach the harbor, roads, or any anchoring place.

Name and burden of the vessel.	What nation.	Name of the owner.	Name of the captain.	Number of the crew.	Number of guns.	Cargo.	Place where the vessel comes from.	Destination of the vessel.

SEC. 21. The captain of a foreign merchant ship, coming to anchor in a port, or in the roads, is obliged, on his arrival, to give a statement of the health of the ship's crew; and should, after this, a contagious illness be discovered on board of his vessel, he must immediately inform the commander of the place thereof. The vessel, according to circumstances, will be either sent off, or put under quarantine in a place appropriated for the purpose, when the crew may be cured without putting the inhabitants in danger of infection. Should the captain of such a ship conceal the circumstance, the same will be confiscated, with her whole cargo.

SEC. 22. The master of a vessel, at the request of the commander of a place, is obliged to produce a list of the whole crew and all the passengers; and, should he omit any, he shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars for every one left out.

SEC. 23. The captains are bound to keep their crews in strict order and proper behavior on the coasts and in the ports, and likewise to prevent their trading or bartering with the company's people. They are answerable for the conduct of their sailors and other inferiors. Illicit trade carried on by sailors subjects the vessel to the same penalty as if done by the captain himself; because it were easy for the captains to carry on smuggling without punishment, and justify themselves by throwing the fault on the sailors. Therefore, every article found upon sailors, which they could not hide in their pockets, or under their clothes, to screen from their superiors, sold or bought on shore, will be considered as contraband from the ship, and is subject to the prescribed fine.

SEC. 24. Foreign men-of-war shall likewise comply with the above-stated regulations for the merchant ships, to maintain the rights and benefit of the company. In case of opposition, complaints will be made to their Governments.

SEC. 25. In case a ship of the Russian Imperial navy, or one belonging to the Russian American Company, meet a foreign vessel on the above-stated coasts, in harbors or roads within the before-mentioned limits, and the commander find grounds, by the present regulation, that the ship be liable to seizure, he is to act as follows:

SEC. 26. The commander of a Russian vessel, suspecting a foreign to be liable to confiscation, must inquire and search the same, and, finding her guilty, take possession of her. Should the foreign vessel resist, he is to employ, first, persuasion, then threats, and at last force; endeavoring, however, at all events, to do this with as much reserve as possible. If the foreign vessel employ force against force, then he shall consider the same as an evident enemy, and force her to surrender according to the naval laws.

SEC. 27. After getting every thing in order and safety on board the foreign vessel, the commander of the Russian ship, or the officer sent by him, shall demand the journal of the captured vessel, and on the spot shall note down in the same that, on such a day, month, and year, at such an hour, and in such a place, he met such and such a foreign vessel; and shall give a brief account of the circumstance, pursuit, and, finally, of the seizure. After signing the same, he shall desire the captain of the captured vessel to confirm the same in his own handwriting.

Should he, however, refuse to sign the same, the Russian officer is to repeat his summons in presence of all the officers; and if, on this, it be again refused, and nobody will sign in lieu of the captain, he is then to add this circumstance, signed by himself.

After this arrangement, the journal, list of the crew, passports, invoices, accounts, and all further papers, respecting the views and pursuits of the voyage of the vessel, shall be put up in one parcel, as well as all private papers, viz: the journals of the officers, letters, &c., and sealed with the seals of the Russian officer, and those of the captain and first officer of the foreign vessel. This packet shall remain unsealed with the commander of the Russian vessel until their arrival in the port of St. Peter and Paul, where it shall be deposited in the court, as mentioned in section 33. Besides this, every thing else must be sealed by the Russian officer and the foreign captain that is not requisite for the continuation of the voyage to the port of St. Peter and Paul, excepting the effects for immediate and sole use of the ship's crew, which shall not be withheld from them.

Sec. 28. Having thus fixed all means of precaution, the officer sent to arrest the foreign vessel shall instantly make his report to his chief, and await his orders.

Sec. 29. Thus should, by any cause stated in the second, eleventh, twelfth, and twenty-first sections of these regulations, a foreign vessel be subjected to confiscation in any port near the settlements of the Russian American Company, the commander of that settlement is obliged either to ask the assistance of the Russian man-of-war, if there be any, and the commander of which, on receipt of a written request, is obliged to arrest the vessel, and use all the precautions prescribed in the foregoing article; or, if there be no Russian man-of-war in the harbor or its neighborhood, and the commander of the settlement find that he and his people can arrest the vessel by themselves, he then is to act according to the twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, and twenty-eighth sections; and, putting ashore the captain, and every means of getting the vessel away, he must endeavor, as soon as possible, to give information of this event, either to the governor of the colonies of the Russian American Company, or the commander of the Imperial man-of-war, if it be known where she lies.

Sec. 30. When, in consequence of such a report, the governor of the colonies shall send a company's vessel, or a Government vessel arriving, then the commander of the place shall deliver up the vessel seized, and all belonging to her, and shall report respecting his reasons for confiscating the vessel.

Sec. 31. The commander of the vessel taking charge of the seizure, per inventory, shall examine immediately into all circumstances mentioned, and compare it with the accounts of the commander of the settlement, who will give every elucidation required.

Sec. 32. All vessels detained by Russian men-of-war are ordered by these regulations to be brought to the port of St. Peter and Paul, where the sentence is to be passed on them by a court established for adjudging such cases.

Sec. 33. This court, under the presidency of the commander of Kamtschatka, shall consist of the three senior officers under him, and of the commissioner of the Russian American Company.

Sec. 34. As soon as a Russian vessel, bringing into the port of St. Peter and Paul a foreign vessel arrested by her, has come to anchor in the place assigned her, the commander of her is immediately to repair to the commander of Kamtschatka, stating briefly what vessel he has brought in, the number of the crew and of the sick, specifying their diseases, and reporting likewise whether the vessel has sufficient victuals, and what goods, guns, and other arms, powder, &c. are on board.

Sec. 35. The commander of Kamtschatka, on receiving this report, will order two officers and a sufficient number of men on board the detained vessel.

Sec. 36. These two officers, together with the officers who brought in the detained ship, when on board, are to summon the master, and two of his mates, or men in command next to him, inspect all the seals put on the vessel, and then, taking them off, begin immediately to make an accurate list of all the effects belonging to the vessel.

Sec. 37. This list is to be signed by all the officers on both sides who were present in drawing it up. The commander of Kamtschatka is to use all possible endeavors to secure from embezzlement or damage all effects belonging to the detained vessel.

Sec. 38. The crew of the vessel are then to be sent ashore to such places as shall be appointed by the commander of Kamtschatka, and remain there until the close of the investigation.

Sec. 39. The commander of the Russian vessel is obliged, in the course of two days after his arrival at the port of St. Peter and Paul, to make a minute representation to the commander of Kamtschatka of all that shall have happened at the detention of the foreign vessel brought in by him, and to deliver said vessel, together with the sealed packet containing her papers, expressed in section 27.

Sec. 40. If the Russian vessel that brought into the port of St. Peter and Paul a foreign vessel cannot, for reasons, remain there until the close of the investigation, but be obliged to proceed to sea in a very short time, the commander, in order not to detain her, shall use all possible despatch, by bringing forward the investigation of such points as may require the presence of the Russian vessel.

Sec. 41. Having settled every thing on board the arrested vessel, and landed the crew, the court shall immediately open the session, and endeavor to ascertain as soon as possible the solution of the inquiry, "Whether the vessel be lawfully arrested or not?"

Sec. 42. In order to ascertain this, the following proofs shall be substantiated:

1st. That the vessel was met with within the boundaries prescribed in the second section of these regulations, and that her having been within said limits was not occasioned by reasons stated in section 3.

2d. That the vessel is a lawful prize by virtue of the sections 2, 11, 12, 14, and 21 of these regulations, and section — of the instructions to the commander of the Russian man-of-war.

Sec. 43. In order to decide either case, the court is to inspect all documents presented, and, tracing on one part all proofs of guilt, and on the other all doubts which might clear the foreign vessel, summon the commanding officer of the Russian vessel to give all additional information deemed needful; and completing thus all circumstances condemning the foreign vessel, the court shall draw up a clear statement of the reasons of her condemnation.

Sec. 44. Should the court, in making out said statement, find that the foreign vessel has been arrested without sufficient cause, said court, on passing the sentence, is to determine the damages suffered by such detention, and to furnish both parties with a certified copy of this resolution.

Sec. 45. In the course of two days both parties shall declare whether they are satisfied with the decision of the court or not, and in the latter case (should it happen) assign it in writing.

Sec. 46. Should both parties be satisfied with the decision of the court, then the commander of Kamtschatka is to release immediately the detained vessel, returning every thing to the master according to the inventory, along with the adjudged damages, exacting them from whomsoever is to pay the same.

SEC. 47. If, on the contrary, the court receive on the third day an appeal from its decision, it is bound to take that appeal into immediate consideration, and, finding it just, to change its decision; if not, to confirm the same, and make it known to the parties a second time. After this, no representations shall be admitted, and both parties shall be summoned before the court, which will allow them to make their protest in writing, and will then state all the reasons why the sentence passed should be carried into execution.

SEC. 48. If the court find by the indictment that the vessel has been lawfully detained, then the master of the foreign vessel, or the two oldest in command under him, shall be summoned, and the reasons of their detention made known to them, giving them a certified copy of the condemnation.

SEC. 49. The court is to receive within three days, and no later, the representations of the master; and if he do not present the same within the time limited, the court summoning him, with two of his crew, notifies that his silence is received as a mark of compliance, and that the condemnation is just.

SEC. 50. In this case the court comes to its final decision, which, on the following day, is communicated to the whole crew of the foreign vessel, who shall sign, all and every one, that such sentence has been made known to them; after which, the commander of Kamtschatka is to carry the sentence of the court into execution, as will be explained hereafter.

SEC. 51. Should, however, the master deliver within the limited time his protest, then the court, examining it with all possible impartiality, shall call for all further explanations; and, having inserted the whole into the journal of the court, shall pass a final sentence, and pronounce it as stated in section 47.

SEC. 52. If by the sentence of the court the arrested vessel be released, and adjudged to receive damages for her detention, and if the vessel has been arrested by any of the company's officers, and the damages are not above five thousand rubles, the commander of Kamtschatka shall demand immediate payment of said sum from the officer of the Russian American Company; but if the damages exceed that sum, he is to notify it to the company's office, and give to the foreign master a certificate; but the money cannot be paid by the company otherwise than after the inspection and resolution of its court of directors. If, on the other hand, the foreign vessel has been detained unlawfully by a Russian man-of-war, the commander of Kamtschatka is to pay the adjudged damages (not exceeding the sum of five thousand rubles) out of any Government sum, and to report in order to incash it from the guilty; but if the damages should exceed the sum of five thousand rubles, the commander of Kamtschatka is to furnish a certificate for the receipt of that money after the regulation and confirmation of the Russian Government.

SEC. 53. The reimbursement of such damages as may have been incurred by unlawful detention shall be exacted from the commander, and all officers of the man-of-war who, having been called by the commander to a council, shall have given their opinion that such a ship ought to be detained.

SEC. 54. As soon as a foreign ship is sentenced to be confiscated, the commander of Kamtschatka is to make due arrangements for transporting the crew to Ochotzk, and from thence to any of the ports of the Baltic, in order to enable every one of them to reach his own country. With the confiscated ship and cargo he is to act as with a prize taken in time of war.

SEC. 55. After this, the commander of Kamtschatka shall order a committee to value the vessel and her cargo. This committee is to be composed of one member appointed by the commander of Kamtschatka, one by the commander of the man-of-war, and a third by the Russian American Company.

SEC. 56. These commissioners are to make up a specified list and valuation, according to the following rules:

1st. All provisions, rigging, iron, powder, and arms shall be put down at such prices as they cost Government there.

2d. All merchandises which might be used in Kamtschatka and the company's colonies, and which are carried there at times from Russia, shall be valued at their prices then existing.

3d. All goods which are not imported into these places from Russia, but are wanted there, shall be valued like goods brought from Russia, being the nearest to them, and in proportion to their wants.

4th. All goods not in use at Kamtschatka or the colonies, shall be sent to Irkutzk, and sold at public auction by the proper authorities.

SEC. 57. The said commissioners shall present their valuation to the commander of Kamtschatka for his approbation; who, in case of not finding the same exact, shall return it with his remarks, and shall appoint other officers to inspect such articles as may appear unfairly valued.

SEC. 58. If the commissioners hereafter continue in their opinion, and the commander of Kamtschatka find it impossible to agree thereto, he shall provisionally consent, and leave the final decision to Government.

SEC. 59. According to this valuation, the commander of Kamtschatka shall mark for the use of Government all those articles which he thinks are wanted; the remainder is left at the disposal of the officers of the ship, or of the Russian American Company. The seized vessel shall be valued by the court, and the valuation sent immediately to the Minister of the Navy, with a report whether such a vessel is wanted for Government service or not.

SEC. 60. The whole sum of valuation of the confiscated vessel and cargo is to be divided in the following manner: the expenses necessary to forward the ship's crew to one of the ports on the Baltic are to be deducted, and the remaining sum divided, if the vessel has been taken by the Russian American Company's officers, and carried to the port of St. Peter and Paul by a ship of said company, without the interference of a man-of-war, into five parts, of which one goes to Government, and the remaining four-fifths to the American Company; if the vessel be taken in any of the company's settlements by the company's officers, but brought to the port of St. Peter and Paul by a man-of-war, after deducting one-fifth for Government, two-fifths are to belong to the crew of the man-of-war, and the remaining two-fifths to the Russian American Company; and, finally, if such foreign vessel be detained by men-of-war only, without the assistance of the company's officers, then, after deducting one-fifth for Government, the remainder is left to the officers of the men-of-war.

But if a vessel be taken by the conjoint forces of a man-of-war and a company's vessel, then the prize shall be divided between them, in proportion to their strength, regulating the same according to the number of guns.

SEC. 61. The sum coming to the officers of the man-of-war shall be divided according to the rules for dividing prizes in time of war. In all cases, officers who had a share in seizing foreign vessels convicted of the intention of infringing the privileges most graciously granted to the Russian American Company may expect to receive tokens of His Imperial Majesty's approbation, especially when, after deducting the expenses for conveying the crew, their part in the prize money should prove but trifling.

SEC. 62. If a foreign vessel, detained by a Russian, being under the command of a Russian officer, should be cast away before reaching the port of St. Peter and Paul, the following principles shall be observed:

If the foreign vessel alone be lost, and the Russian accompanying her arrive at the port of St. Peter and Paul, then the court acts according to the foregoing rules, to determine whether that vessel was lawfully seized. In this case Government takes upon itself the expenses of conveying to a port of the Baltic such of the ship's crew as were saved. But if such vessel should not be proved to have been detained lawfully, then, independent of those expenses, the ship shall be valued, and such valuation forwarded to Government for the payment of what may be deemed just. At the same time, investigations shall be made on the loss of the vessel; and the officer that had the command (if saved) is to be tried according to the maritime rules and regulations.

SEC. 63. The commander of Kamtschatka is bound to make a special report to the Governor General of Siberia respecting every circumstance happening to foreign vessels, annexing copies of all documents, journals, and sentences of the court, and of all papers relating thereunto.

COUNT D. GURIEF, Minister of Finances.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Poletica.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, February 25, 1822.

I have had the honor of receiving your note of the 11th instant, enclosing a printed copy of the regulations adopted by the Russian American Company, and sanctioned by His Imperial Majesty, relating to the commerce of foreigners in the waters bordering on the establishments of that company upon the northwest coast of America.

I am directed by the President of the United States to inform you that he has seen with surprise, in this edict, the assertion of a territorial claim on the part of Russia, extending to the fifty-first degree of north latitude on this continent, and a regulation interdicting to all commercial vessels other than Russian, upon the penalty of seizure and confiscation, the approach upon the high seas within one hundred Italian miles of the shores to which that claim is made to apply. The relations of the United States with His Imperial Majesty have always been of the most friendly character; and it is the earnest desire of this Government to preserve them in that state. It was expected, before any act which should define the boundary between the territories of the United States and Russia on this continent, that the same would have been arranged by treaty between the parties. To exclude the vessels of our citizens from the shore, beyond the ordinary distance to which the territorial jurisdiction extends, has excited still greater surprise.

This ordinance affects so deeply the rights of the United States and of their citizens, that I am instructed to inquire whether you are authorized to give explanations of the grounds of right, upon principles generally recognised by the laws and usages of nations, which can warrant the claims and regulations contained in it.

I avail myself of this occasion to assure you of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The CHEVALIER DE POLETICA,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Russia.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Chevalier de Poletica to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 28, 1822.

I received two days since the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the same day, by order of the President of the United States, in answer to my note of the 11th current, by which I discharged the orders of my Government in communicating to you the new regulation adopted by the Russian American Company, and sanctioned by His Majesty the Emperor, my august sovereign, on the 4th [16th] of September, 1821, relative to foreign commerce in the waters which border upon the establishments of the said company on the northwest coast of America.

Readily yielding, sir, to the desire expressed by you in your letter of knowing the rights and principles upon which are founded the determinate limits of the Russian possessions on the northwest coast of America, from Bhering's strait to the fifty-first degree of north latitude, I am happy to fulfil this task by only calling your attention to the following historical facts, the authenticity of which cannot be contested:

The first discoveries of the Russians on the northwest continent of America go back to the time of the Emperor Peter I. They belong to the attempt made towards the end of the reign of this great monarch to find a passage from the Icy sea into the Pacific ocean.

In 1728 the celebrated Captain Bhering made his first voyage. The recital of his discoveries attracted the attention of the Government, and the Empress Anne intrusted to Captain Bhering (1741) a new expedition in these same latitudes. She sent with him the academicians Gmelin, Delile dela Crayere, Muller, Steller, Fisher, Krasilnicoff, Kræcheninicoff, and others; and the first chart of these countries which is known was the result of their labors, published in 1758. Besides the strait which bears the name of the chief of this expedition, he discovered a great part of the islands which are found between the two continents; Cape or Mount St. Elias, which still bears this name upon all the charts, was so called by Captain Bhering, who discovered it on the day of the feast of this saint; and his second, Captain Tchiricoff, pushed his discoveries as far as the forty-ninth degree of north latitude.

The first private expeditions undertaken upon the northwest coast of America go back as far as the year 1743.

In 1763, the Russian establishments had already extended as far as the island of Kodiak, (or Kichtak.) In 1778, Cook found them at Ounalashka, and some Russian inscriptions at Kodiak. Vancouver saw the Russian establishment in the bay of Kinai. In fine, Captains Mirs, Portlock, and La Perouse unanimously attest the existence of Russian establishments in these latitudes.

If the Imperial Government had at the time published the discoveries made by the Russian navigators after Bhering and Tchiricoff, (viz. Chlodiloff, Screbreanicoff, Krassilnicoff, Paycoff, Poushcareff, Lazareff, Medwedeff, Solowieff, Lewasheff, Krenitsin, and others,) no one could refuse to Russia the right of first discovery, nor could even any one deny her that of first occupation.

Moreover, when D. José Martinez was sent, in 1789, by the court of Madrid, to form an establishment in Vancouver's island, and to remove foreigners from thence under the pretext that all that coast belonged to Spain, he gave not the least disturbance to the Russian colonies and navigators; yet the Spanish Government was not ignorant of their existence, for this very Martinez had visited them the year before. The report which Captain Malespina made of the results of his voyage proves that the Spaniards very well knew of the Russian colonies, and in this very report it is seen that the court of Madrid acknowledged that its possessions upon the coast of the Pacific ocean ought not to extend to the north of Cape Blanc, taken from the point of Trinity, situated under 42° 50′ of north latitude.

When, in 1799, the Emperor Paul I. granted to the present American Company its first charter, he gave it the exclusive possession of the northwest coast of America which belonged to Russia, from the fifty-fifth degree of north latitude to Bhering's strait. He permitted them to extend their discoveries to the south, and there to form establishments, provided they did not encroach upon the territory occupied by other Powers.

This act, when made public, excited no claim on the part of other cabinets, not even on that of Madrid, which confirms that it did not extend its pretensions to the sixtieth degree.

When the Government of the United States treated with Spain for the cession of a part of the northwest coast, it was able to acquire, by the treaty of Washington, the right to all that belonged to the Spaniards north of the forty-second degree of latitude; but this treaty says nothing positive concerning the northern boundary of this cession, because, in fact, Spain well knew that she could not say that the coast as far as the sixtieth degree belonged to her.

From this faithful exposition of known facts, it is easy, sir, as it appears to me, to draw the conclusion that the rights of Russia to the extent of the northwest coast, specified in the regulation of the Russian American Company, rest upon the three bases required by the general law of nations and immemorial usage among nations—that is, upon the title of first discovery; upon the title of first occupation; and, in the last place, upon that which results from a peaceable and uncontested possession of more than half a century—an epoch, consequently, several years anterior to that when the United States took their place among independent nations.

It is, moreover, evident, that if the right of the possession of a certain extent of the northwest coast of America, claimed by the United States, only devolves upon them in virtue of the treaty of Washington, of 22d of February, 1819, (and I believe it would be difficult to make good any other title,) this treaty could not confer upon the American Government any right of claim against the limits assigned to the Russian possessions upon the same coast, because Spain herself had never pretended to similar right.

The Imperial Government, in assigning for limits to the Russian possessions on the northwest coast of America, on the one side Bhering's strait, and on the other the fifty-first degree of north latitude, has only made a moderate use of an incontestable right; since the Russian navigators, who were the first to explore that part of the American continent, in 1741, pushed their discovery as far as the forty-ninth degree of north latitude. The fifty-first degree, therefore, is no more than a mean point between the Russian establishment of New Archangel, situated under the fifty-seventh degree, and the American colony at the mouth of the Columbia, which is found under the forty-sixth degree of the same latitude.

All these considerations united have concurred in inspiring the Imperial Government with an entire conviction that, in the last arrangements adopted in Russia relative to her possessions on the northwest coast, the legitimate right of no foreign Power has been infringed. In this conviction, the Emperor, my august sovereign, has judged that his good right, and the obligation imposed by Providence upon him to protect with all his power the interests of his subjects, sufficiently justified the measures last taken by His Imperial Majesty in favor of the Russian American Company, without its being necessary to clothe them with the sanction of treaties.

I shall be more succinct, sir, in the exposition of the motives which determined the Imperial Government to prohibit foreign vessels from approaching the northwest coast of America belonging to Russia within the distance of at least one hundred Italian miles. This measure, however severe it may at first view appear, is, after all, but a measure of prevention. It is exclusively directed against the culpable enterprises of foreign adventurers, who, not content with exercising upon the coasts above mentioned an illicit trade very prejudicial to the rights reserved entirely to the Russian American Company, take upon them besides to furnish arms and ammunition to the natives in the Russian possessions in America, exciting them likewise in every manner to resistance and revolt against the authorities there established.

The American Government doubtless recollects that the irregular conduct of these adventurers, the majority of whom was composed of American citizens, has been the object of the most pressing remonstrances on the part of Russia to the Federal Government from the time that diplomatic missions were organized between the two countries. These remonstrances, repeated at different times, remain constantly without effect, and the inconveniences to which they ought to bring a remedy continue to increase.

The Imperial Government, respecting the intentions of the American Government, has always abstained from attributing the ill success of its remonstrances to any other motives than those which flow (if I may be allowed the expression) from the very nature of the institutions which govern the national affairs of the American federation. But the high opinion which the Emperor has always entertained of the rectitude of the American Government cannot exempt him from the care which his sense of justice towards his own subjects imposes upon him. Pacific means not having brought any alleviation to the just grievances of the Russian American Company against foreign navigators in the waters which environ their establishments on the northwest coast of America, the Imperial Government saw itself under the necessity of having recourse to the means of coercion, and of measuring the rigor according to the inveterate character of the evil to which it wished to put a stop. Yet it is easy to discover, on examining closely the last regulation of the Russian American Company, that no spirit of hostility had any thing to do with its formation. The most minute precautions have been taken in it to prevent abuses of authority on the part of commanders of Russian cruisers appointed for the execution of said regulation. At the same time, it has not been neglected to give all the timely publicity necessary to put those on their guard against whom the measure is aimed.

Its action, therefore, can only reach the foreign vessels, which, in spite of the notification, will expose themselves to seizure by infringing upon the line marked out in the regulation. The Government flatters itself that these cases will be very rare; if all remain as at present appears, not one.

I ought, in the last place, to request you to consider, sir, that the Russian possessions in the Pacific ocean extend, on the northwest coast of America, from Bhering's strait to the fifty-first degree of north latitude, and on the opposite side of Asia, and the islands adjacent, from the same strait to the forty-fifth degree. The extent of sea, of which these possessions form the limits, comprehends all the conditions which are ordinarily attached to shut seas, (mers fermées,) and the Russian Government might consequently judge itself authorized to exercise upon this sea the right of sovereignty, and especially that of entirely interdicting the entrance of foreigners. But it preferred only asserting its essential rights, without taking any advantage of localities.

The Emperor, my august sovereign, sets a very high value upon the maintenance of the relations of amity and good understanding which have till now subsisted between the two countries. The dispositions of His Imperial Majesty in this regard have never failed appearing at all times when an occasion has presented itself in the political relations of the United States with the European Powers; and surely, in the midst of a general peace, Russia does not think of aiming a blow at the maritime interests of the United States—she who has constantly respected them in those difficult circumstances in which Europe has been seen to be placed in the latter times, and the influence of which the United States have been unable to avert.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

PIERRE DE POLETICA.

The Secretary of State to Mr. De Poletica.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, March 30, 1822.

I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 28th ultimo, which has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States.

From the deduction which it contains of the grounds upon which articles of regulation of the Russian American Company have now, for the first time, extended the claim of Russia on the northwest coast of America to the fifty-first degree of north latitude, its only foundation appears to be the existence of the small settlement of Novo Archangelsk, situated, not on the American continent, but upon a small island in latitude 57°; and the principle upon which you state that this claim is now advanced is, that the fifty-first degree is equidistant from that settlement of Novo Archangelsk and the establishment of the United States at the mouth of Columbia river. But, from the same statement, it appears that, in the year 1799, the limits prescribed by the Emperor Paul to the Russian American Company were fixed at the fifty-fifth degree of latitude, and that, in assuming now the latitude 51°, a new pretension is asserted, to which no settlement made since the year 1799 has given the color of a sanction.

This pretension is to be considered not only with reference to the question of territorial right, but also to that prohibition to the vessels of other nations, including those of the United States, to approach within one hundred Italian miles of the coasts. From the period of the existence of the United States as an independent nation, their vessels have freely navigated those seas, and the right to navigate them is a part of that independence.

With regard to the suggestion that the Russian Government might have justified the exercise of sovereignty over the Pacific ocean as a close sea, because it claims territory both on its American and Asiatic shores, it may suffice to say that the distance from shore to shore on this sea, in latitude 51° north, is not less than ninety degrees of longitude, or four thousand miles.

As little can the United States accede to the justice of the reason assigned for the prohibition above mentioned. The right of the citizens of the United States to hold commerce with the aboriginal natives of the northwest coast of America, without the territorial jurisdiction of other nations, even in arms and munitions of war, is as clear and indisputable as that of navigating the seas. That right has never been exercised in a spirit unfriendly to Russia; and although general complaints have occasionally been made on the subject of this commerce by some of your predecessors, no specific ground of charge has ever been alleged by them of any transaction in it which the United States were, by the ordinary laws and usages of nations, bound either to restrain or to punish. Had any such charge been made, it would have received the most pointed attention of this Government, with the sincerest and firmest disposition to perform every act and obligation of justice to yours which could have been required. I am commanded by the President of the United States to assure you that this disposition will continue to be entertained, together with the earnest desire that the most harmonious relations between the two countries may be preserved.

Relying upon the assurance in your note of similar dispositions reciprocally entertained by His Imperial Majesty towards the United States, the President is persuaded that the citizens of this Union will remain unmolested in the prosecution of their lawful commerce, and that no effect will be given to an interdiction manifestly incompatible with their rights.

I am happy to renew the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The CHEVALIER DE POLETICA, Envoy Extraordinary, &c. from Russia.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Chevalier de Poletica to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, March 21, [April 2,] 1822.

I had the honor yesterday to receive the letter which you were pleased to address to me, dated 30th March last; and, not being authorized to continue the discussion to which it refers, I find myself under the necessity of taking the contents of that letter ad referendum, reserving myself to communicate it to my Government as soon as possible.

In the mean time, I shall take the liberty of submitting to your consideration some observations which have been suggested to me by certain passages in your letter which require particular notice.

In the first official letter which I had the honor of addressing to you, dated 16th [28th] February last, I thought I had succeeded in clearly demonstrating that the rights of Russia to the possession of a certain extent of the northwest coast of America, as far as these rights can be rendered legitimate by the first discovery, the first occupation, and a possession not contested for more than half a century—that these rights, I say, go back to times considerably earlier than the reign of the Emperor Paul I.

When this sovereign granted, in 1799, to the Russian American Company its first charter of incorporation, there had never been a question about abandoning to that company the right of sovereignty over one determinate portion of the northwest coast of America in all its plenitude. The question was purely and simply of conceding to the said company a part of the sovereignty, or rather certain exclusive privileges of commerce, and it is in this view that the act of 1799, to which you refer, sir, fixed the limits of the operations of the Russian American Company.

The rights of sovereignty belonging to Russia could lose nothing of their local extent in consequence of the concessions made to that company in the reign of the Emperor Paul. That these rights extended, in the opinion of the Imperial Government, farther south than the fifty-fifth degree of latitude, appears evident from the structure of the third article of the act of incorporation, which authorizes the company to form establishments south of the fifty-fifth degree of north latitude.

But what will dispel even the shadow of doubt in this regard is the authentic fact that, in 1789, the Spanish packet St. Charles, commanded by Captain Haro, found, in the latitude 48° and 49°, Russian establishments to the number of eight, consisting, in the whole, of twenty families, and four hundred and sixty-two individuals. These were the descendants of the companions of Captain Tchiricoff, who was supposed till then to have perished.

With such titles justifying the rights claimed by Russia, you yourself, sir, will agree that it is perfectly immaterial whether the Russian establishment at Novo Archangelsk be small or large. If the rights of territorial possession were measured according to the dimensions of the points occupied, what would become of those of the United States upon a very considerable extent of the same northwest coast? for the only American establishment ever yet known is certainly very inferior in stability to that of Russia at Novo Archangelsk.

In the same manner the great extent of the Pacific ocean at the fifty-first degree of latitude cannot invalidate the right which Russia may have of considering that part of the ocean as close. But as the Imperial Government has not thought fit to take advantage of that right, all further discussion on this subject would be idle.

As to the right claimed for the citizens of the United States of trading with the natives of the country of the northwest coast of America, without the limits of the jurisdiction belonging to Russia, the Imperial Government will not certainly think of limiting it, and still less of attacking it there. But I cannot dissemble, sir, that this same trade beyond the fifty-first degree will meet with difficulties and inconveniences, for which the American owners will only have to accuse their own imprudence after the publicity which has been given to the measures taken by the Imperial Government for maintaining the rights of the Russian American Company in their absolute integrity.

I shall not finish this letter without repeating to you, sir, the very positive assurance which I have already had the honor once of expressing to you, that, in every case where the American Government shall judge it necessary to make explanations to that of the Emperor, the President of the United States may rest assured that these explanations will be always attended to by the Emperor, my august sovereign, with the most friendly, and, consequently, the most conciliatory dispositions.

Be pleased to accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

PIERRE DE POLETICA.

17th Congress.] No. 330. [1st Session.

NORWAY: COMMERCIAL RECIPROCITY.

TRANSMITTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 2D OF MAY, 1822.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, May 1, 1822.

In the message to both Houses of Congress at the commencement of their present session, it was mentioned that the Government of Norway had issued an ordinance for admitting the vessels of the United States and their cargoes into the ports of that kingdom upon the payment of no other or higher duties than are paid by Norwegian vessels, of whatever articles the said cargoes may consist, and from whatever ports the vessels laden with them may come.

In communicating this ordinance to the Government of the United States, that of Norway has requested the benefit of a similar and reciprocal provision for the vessels of Norway and their cargoes which may enter the ports of the United States.

This provision being within the competency only of the legislative authority of Congress, I communicate to them, herewith, copies of the communications received from the Norwegian Government in relation to the subject, and recommend the same to their consideration.

JAMES MONROE.

The Count d'Engestrom to Mr. Hughes.

STOCKHOLM, January 25, 1821.

By the express order of the King, the undersigned, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs, has the honor to inform Mr. Hughes, chargé d'affaires of the United States of North America, that, hereafter, vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, as well as their cargoes, will be subject, in the ports of the kingdom of Norway, to no other or higher duties of entry or clearance than those payable by the national vessels and their cargoes; so that every sort of distinction between Norwegian and American vessels may cease, and that neither the place from which a vessel arrives, nor the place of her destination, may be any cause of exception from the general rule. The cargoes may consist of the productions of the soil, or of the industry of such country, whatever it may be.

In requesting Mr. Hughes to be pleased to communicate the contents of this note to his Government, the undersigned embraces this opportunity of renewing to Mr. Hughes the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

COUNT D'ENGESTROM.

[TRANSLATION.]

Baron de Stackelberg to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1821.

The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of His Majesty the King of Sweden and of Norway, has the honor to address, officially, his excellency the Secretary of State of the United States, to inquire if, in virtue of the commercial regulations existing in the United States, the Norwegian commerce will enjoy in the ports of the said States the same advantages and immunities which have been lately granted in the ports of Norway to the American commerce.

The undersigned takes this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his high consideration, &c.

STACKELBERG.

The Secretary of State to Baron de Stackelberg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, July 23, 1821.

The Secretary of State, in reference to the note of Baron de Stackelberg of the 11th instant, has the honor of informing him that, by an act of Congress of 3d March, 1815, "so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty of tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, is repealed, so far as the same respects the produce or manufacture of the nation to which such foreign ships or vessels may belong; such repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation, whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished."

And this act, by a subsequent act of Congress of 3d March, 1819, will cease and expire on the 1st day of January, 1824.

From the copy of a note from his excellency Count d'Engestrom to Mr. Hughes, of the 25th of January last, it appears that all discriminating or countervailing duties in the kingdom of Norway, so far as they operated to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished; and if it be desired by the Baron de Stackelberg that a proclamation from the President should issue, declaring Norwegian vessels entitled to the advantages set forth in the act of Congress of 3d March, 1815, it will immediately be issued. But the baron will observe that this act is not so extensive as the ordinance for the kingdom of Norway, notified by Count d'Engestrom, inasmuch as the latter expressly provides that "the cargoes may consist of the productions of the soil, or of the industry of any and all countries, without exception," and as it is without limitation of time.

The Secretary of State requests the Baron de Stackelberg to accept the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The BARON DE STACKELBERG, Chargé d'Affaires from Sweden.

Baron de Stackelberg to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, August 16, 1821.

The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of His Majesty the King of Sweden and of Norway, has had the honor to receive the note of his excellency the Secretary of State of the United States, dated the 23d of last month, the substance of which is, that the Government of the United States cannot grant to the Norwegian commerce in their ports the same advantages and immunities which have been granted by the Swedish and Norwegian Government in the ports of Norway to the American commerce, which advantages are stipulated in a note, dated the 25th of January last, addressed by his excellency the Count d'Engestrom, Minister of State and of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of Sweden and of Norway, to the chargé d'affaires of the United States at Stockholm; according to which, if the undersigned desire it, the President of the United States has been pleased to consent to issue his proclamation declaring the Norwegian commerce to have a right to enjoy the advantages granted by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1815.

In consideration whereof, and in obedience to the orders of the King, his master, the undersigned ought instantly to demand a perfect reciprocity on the part of the United States towards the Norwegian commerce; yet, as the laws of the United States do not appear to have given an extent equivalent to that which has been granted to American commerce in Norway, and until an arrangement can be made upon this subject, it is his duty, officially, to require for the Norwegian commerce the advantage contained in the act of Congress of 3d March, 1815, as well as the act of 1st March, 1817, which says: "After the thirtieth day of September next, no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture; or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation: Provided, nevertheless, That this regulation shall not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which has not adopted, and which shall not adopt, a similar regulation:" consequently, as the American commerce can enter into the ports of Norway with cargoes of the productions of the soil or of manufactures of their country, the undersigned considers the act of navigation in question as being reciprocally applicable to the Norwegian commerce in the ports of the United States.

The undersigned likewise proposes, officially, to the Government of the United States, in order to establish a perfect reciprocity in the commerce between the two countries, to pass a law by which the Norwegian commerce may enjoy in the ports of the said States the same privileges and advantages as have been mentioned in the note of his excellency the Count d'Engestrom in favor of the American commerce in the ports of the kingdom of Norway.

The undersigned prays the Secretary of State to be pleased to lay this note before the President of the United States.

The undersigned has the honor to be, &c.

STACKELBERG.

The Secretary of State to Baron de Stackelberg.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, August 21, 1821.

I have the honor of enclosing, herewith, a copy of a proclamation of the President of the United States, declaring the vessels of Norway to be entitled in the ports of the United States to the benefit of the advantages prescribed by the act of Congress of 3d March, 1815. They will also be entitled, without further proceeding, to those prescribed by the act of 1st March, 1817, as I had the honor of explaining verbally to you its purport.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The BARON DE STACKELBERG,
Chargé d'Affaires of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway.

17th CONGRESS.] No. 331. [1st SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN: DUTIES ON IRON.

TRANSMITTED TO CONGRESS, MAY 3, 1822.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, May 1, 1822.

I transmit, herewith, to Congress copies of letters received at the Department of State from the minister of Great Britain on the subject of the duties discriminating between imported rolled and hammered iron.

I recommend them particularly to the consideration of Congress, believing that although there may be ground for controversy with regard to the application of the engagements of the treaty to the case, yet a liberal construction of those engagements would be compatible at once with a conciliatory and a judicious policy.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Antrobus to Mr. Adams.

SIR: WASHINGTON, November 22, 1819.

I have the honor to inform you that I have been instructed by His Majesty's Government again to bring under your notice the difference of duties levied in the ports of this country on British and other foreign iron in bars and bolts.

It is stipulated by the commercial convention between Great Britain and the United States that articles the growth, produce, and manufacture of Great Britain shall pay no higher duties on importation into the United States than like articles the growth, produce, and manufacture of any other foreign countries.

Mr. Bagot, in a letter of the 18th November, 1816, addressed to Mr. Monroe, at that time Secretary for the Department of State, to which I beg leave to refer you, has clearly pointed out that iron manufactured in Great Britain by rolling ought to be considered a like article to iron manufactured by hammering, both in Sweden and Russia; and I feel confident it is only necessary for me to call your attention to this similarity in the state of the manufacture of British and other foreign iron in bars and bolts, to decide the Government of the United States to adopt measures for the admission to importation of this article on terms more consistent with the spirit of the treaty of commerce existing between the two nations.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

G. CRAWFURD ANTROBUS.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Antrobus to Mr. Adams.

SIR: WASHINGTON, May 1, 1820.

In the month of November of the year 1816, Mr. Bagot had the honor of addressing to Mr. Monroe, at that time Secretary of State, a note calling his attention to a provision of an act of Congress passed on the 27th of April of that year, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," imposing on the importation into the United States of iron in bars and bolts, manufactured by rolling, a duty equal to that paid on anchors; whereas, by it, iron in bars and bolts, manufactured by hammering, was subject to a lower duty.

On the 22d November last, I had the honor to address a note to you on the same subject, requesting the adoption by the American Government of such measures as would give to the British merchant the advantages secured to him by the second article of the treaty of commerce between Great Britain and the United States, namely, "that no higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign countries."

As it is understood that the modification of the tariff thus sought for can only be effected by an act of the Legislature, and as it is believed that the present session of that body is now drawing to a close, I take the liberty of again bringing this matter under your notice, and of expressing a hope that the present high rate of duty on the importation of rolled iron will no longer be allowed to exist, to the prejudice of the British manufacturer, and, it would seem, contrary to the spirit of the commercial treaty.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

G. CRAWFURD ANTROBUS.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Adams.

SIR: WASHINGTON, March 31, 1821.

It is in obedience to instructions which I have lately received from His Majesty's Government, that I have the honor to recall your attention to a subject of considerable interest, on which Mr. Bagot and Mr. Antrobus have already had occasion, respectively, to open a correspondence with your office—I mean the discrimination established by Congress in the duties on imported iron manufactured by rolling or hammering.

I abstain, for the present, from troubling you with any additional argument in support of the general principles asserted by Mr. Bagot; but, as there is reason to suppose that some erroneous notions have prevailed with respect to the process of rolling iron as employed in the British manufactories, it is confidently hoped that an authentic statement of the real process will suffice to remove any objections which the Government of the United States may still entertain to an equalization of the duties in question.

The pig iron is first purified or refined in what is called a finery; during which stage of the process it loses in weight about 2½ cwt. per ton.

The metal thus refined is taken to the puddling furnace, from which, after it has undergone the operation of puddling, it is conveyed in balls, each weighing about sixty pounds, to the slabbing rolls, and there rolled into a slab or rough bar.

This bar is then divided into several pieces, which are placed in piles of three or four pieces together, and, after being again heated in a reverberating furnace, are rolled into what is called a merchant bar.

In these two stages there is a further waste of about 5 cwt. in the ton.

The metal, after being refined in the puddling furnace, is sometimes placed under a helve, or iron hammer of three or four tons weight, and shingled or hammered into what is termed a half bloom, which is subsequently cut into pieces, and rolled into a merchant bar, in the same way as the piled slabs. The quality of the manufactured metal, and the cost of the operation, are very nearly the same in both cases.

To these facts, which are derived on authority to all appearance unquestionable, from the principal iron manufactories in England, it may be added that, even the pig iron employed there is probably of a superior quality, owing to the great care with which the dross is drawn off from the ore.

Persuaded that the preceding statement will receive at your hands an attentive and liberal consideration, I beg, sir, that you will accept the assurances with which

I have the honor to be, your most obedient, humble servant,

STRATFORD CANNING.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Adams.

SIR: WASHINGTON, November 26, 1821.

On the 31st of March I did myself the honor of writing to you with reference to the discriminating duties laid by Congress on imported rolled and hammered iron. It is under the special instructions of my Government that I now return to a subject which has been repeatedly pressed upon your notice, in full persuasion that, sooner or later, the Legislature of the United States would recognise the propriety and justice of repealing the exceptionable duty.

I do not feel myself at liberty to draw any inference unfavorable to this expectation from the silence with which you received my former letter. I abstained on that occasion from going at large into the merits of the question, conceiving that an exposition of certain facts, capable of being verified, would be sufficient until the meeting of Congress should furnish a fit occasion for examining the whole subject in a more complete and deliberate manner.

You will remember, sir, that the facts which I then stated, and to which I again solicit your attention, were calculated chiefly to remove the erroneous impressions entertained by some persons in this country with respect to the real nature of British rolled iron, and the process of that manufacture. It had been asserted that, in rolling iron according to the practice of Great Britain, the metal was only twice heated, and so rapidly converted into bars as not to allow of its acquiring those qualities which are supposed to be imparted to it by the more laborious operation of hammering. It now appears, from the testimony of many respectable individuals acquainted with this important branch of industry, that the iron is heated no less than three times; that it is refined with such effect as to lose 7½ cwt. per ton in passing from the state of pig iron to that of merchant bars; and, further, that it is cut into pieces after the first rolling, and piled so as to cross the grain when again heated and rolled.

In the qualities of rolled, as in those of hammered iron, there may be an occasional difference resulting from the nature of the ores employed in its composition. The British ironmasters use a great variety of ores, the different mixtures and combinations of which have, doubtless, a considerable effect in producing a better or an inferior article. But to suppose that any difference is made in the quality or manufacture of British iron when destined for the foreign market, other than when it is kept for home consumption, is an error which cannot be met with too distinct and positive a denial.

This notion, groundless as it is, has, however, been brought forward with others equally erroneous, to prevent an equalization of the duties on imported iron. It has even been alleged that, while rolled iron is exported from Great Britain for the use of foreign countries, the British import large quantities of hammered iron from the north of Europe for their own use; and that, in shipbuilding, this latter article, owing to its superior quality, is indispensable.

In reply to these assertions, I appeal with confidence to the accounts of British and foreign bar iron employed in Great Britain at three successive periods within the last sixteen years. In 1806, in 1814, and in 1820, the respective quantities of the former were 101,877, 137,365, and 136,642; and those of foreign bar iron were 27,411, 11,635, and 6,242. To confirm the results suggested by this statement, it may be added that in Ireland, where a strong prejudice is known to have once prevailed in favor of foreign iron, the consumption, which, in 1807, was 5,690 of British, and 3,229 of foreign, was, in the year 1820, 474 of the latter, and no less than 13,073 of the former.

For the manufacture of steel, and for that alone, the Baltic iron has some advantage over British; and whatever quantity of it is imported into Great Britain is either converted into steel, (in which way it is at present almost exclusively used,) or re-exported to those countries, where the nature and properties of British rolled iron are as yet imperfectly understood.

Concerning the particular point, of shipbuilding, the abstract which follows of the respective quantities of British and foreign iron, employed at different times by His Majesty's Navy Board, must of itself carry conviction to every impartial mind:

Years.	Foreign.	British.
1806,	457	1,343
1810,	289	1,668
1815,	82	1,743
1820,	51	1,824

The truth is, that, except for making steel, any superior fitness for which is clearly an accident of nature, and not the effect of hammering, English bar iron is at least equal to that of Sweden and Russia. It is used throughout Great Britain in the most important constructions—in her manufactories, dock-yards, and military establishments. It is prepared exactly in the same manner for exportation as for domestic consumption. It is never finished by a single rolling, except at a very few works, where the metal has been previously formed by hammering. It rarely happens, indeed, that the ironmaster knows, at the time of manufacturing, for which market the iron is destined; and when he is apprized of this circumstance, a sense of his own interest, the interest of the trade, would alone restrain him from sending an inferior manufacture to the foreign market.

It is, in short, the greatest of delusions to imagine that the consumers of iron are interested in giving a preference to the process of hammering over that of rolling. The Baltic manufacturers have, doubtless, their reasons for adhering to their former practice; but so far from their deriving any claim to superiority from that circumstance, it is well known to persons familiar with the trade that their iron would be improved rather than deteriorated by the application of the rolling machine. This being the case, it would be absurd to defend the discriminating duty on the ground of its preventing the manufacture of rolled iron in the northern countries of Europe.

Even in the counter-statements which have been made upon this subject, it is admitted, not only that the ores of England may be equal to those of other countries, but also that the process of rolling only requires to be repeated in order to place it upon a level with that of hammering. Allow me, sir, to remark, in reference to this admission, that, in the present state of your legislative enactments, the British iron imported into the United States might pass under the roller any number of times, without being relieved, on that account, from the pressure of which I complain.

The difference of value or cost at which the rolled and hammered iron may be prepared for sale can surely present no argument in favor of the discriminating duties. That difference, whatever it may be, is a natural result of labor-saving machinery; it is the just reward of ingenuity employed with success in the service of mankind. Science and inventive genius are peculiar to no soil; all nations have an interest in their progress; and to grudge them a fair remuneration would be no less unworthy of the character than foreign to the views of an enlightened Legislature.

I have now, sir, replied, and I trust conclusively, to such parts of the explanatory statement which you communicated to Mr. Antrobus in your letter dated the 31st of May, 1820, as were grounded (how justly I leave to your candor) on the principle of expediency. It remains for me to take a more comprehensive view of the case, as involving, in my belief, a breach of agreement, unintentional no doubt, but not therefore less prejudicial to His Majesty as a contracting party, nor calling the less for a seasonable amendment.

By the second article of the convention of commerce subsisting between the two countries, it is declared that "no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country." To secure certain stipulated advantages reciprocally to both the contracting parties was the general object of the convention; to secure to the produce and manufactures of Great Britain a fair unshackled competition in the markets of the United States with all articles of a similar nature imported from other foreign countries, is the plain, indisputable object of this particular clause. But how can these objects be considered as fully or adequately effected while British bar iron is made to pay, on its importation into the United States, double the amount of duty levied on the same article when imported from Sweden and Russia? I am aware of the distinction which has been drawn between rolled and hammered iron, and of the assertion, founded on that distinction, that, so long as all importations of hammered, and all importations of rolled iron are subject, respectively, to the same rate of duty, Great Britain has no right to complain. But Great Britain being the sole exporter of rolled iron, the discriminating duties do in fact operate to her prejudice; and, in point of principle, it will not be difficult to show that the articles in question are truly and essentially like articles, such as cannot, with any color of reason, be excluded from the benefit of the treaty.

You will readily admit, sir, that like articles, in the sense of the convention, must necessarily be such as are similar to each other in their leading characteristic properties. On any other supposition, the clause in question is an idle form of words, and, contrary to the very end and purpose of the treaty, a door would be opened to arbitrary interpretation in one of its principal provisions. Now, the process or mechanical operation by which an article is manufactured can surely never be reckoned among its properties. Any difference of use or quality resulting from the mode of manufacture may, indeed, constitute a fair ground of distinction; but there is every reason to believe that no such difference exists in the present instance. It has been shown, on the contrary, that, for all the ulterior purposes to which bar iron, as such, is applicable, the rolled is equally good with the hammered; that both the one and the other are sent to market in the same stage of manufacture, and that the only difference between them is one of a retrospective nature, not affecting the identity of their present state, but relating solely to the process by which they were brought to the same point.

To borrow an illustration from language—two words of similar meaning, in common acceptation, would surely not be deemed the less synonymous because they might be traced to different roots, or had passed through different modes of formation.

I further entreat you, sir, to observe with what facility the same distinction may be extended to other articles of commerce. Even the chief staple of your Southern States might, upon the same principle, be discriminated in British ports from the cotton of Brazil or the Levant, for no other reason than because it had been prepared by Mr. Whitney's ingenious and useful machinery. Examples bearing upon either party might easily be multiplied; I have taken this because it is the most obvious. In fact, the same natural productions are common to so many different countries, while the means of improving them are varied according to the vast diversity of local resources, that, even of those articles which barely rank as manufactures, few might not be brought within range of the same distinction which is now applied (unwarrantably, I think,) to bar iron. That a latitude of interpretation, thus tending to nullify one of the principal clauses of the treaty, should have been contemplated by those who framed it, is utterly inconceivable. Yet this, sir, is the conclusion to which we must come, if it be admitted that rolled and hammered bar iron are not like articles—an admission which, taking the fair and natural meaning of that phrase, would surely be equivalent to saying that what is bar iron when hammered is not bar iron when rolled.

It is with regret, sir, that I have found it necessary to take up so much of your time on this subject; but I feel persuaded that you will appreciate its importance, and that it will receive from the American Government an early and equitable revisal, to the end of relieving, by law, the importations of British rolled iron from the present discriminating duty, and thereby fulfilling the obligations of the commercial treaty.

I embrace this opportunity, sir, to repeat to you the assurance of my perfect consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.
